Mr. Rabaud shared with him the honors of the "Mountain Symphony." While Mr. Rabaud has given notable performances of much greater music since his entree into Boston, he has done nothing that has pleased the rank and file of his audience more than this work. The symphony, almost a series of variations on a French mountain air with secondary themes, elaborate working-out, etc., demands absolute clarity. From the announcement of the theme, beautifully played on the English horn, to the brilliant final, defined as a kermis in the blaze of day, Mr. Rabaud's performance was clear as crystal.

There are many surprising combinations of instruments in the work. The instruments, the harps, the piano, the various wood winds, the French horn and the English horns were played with lovely quality. The balance of tone was always exactly right, the third movement was played with flaming beauty. No wonder that the audience remained in their places after the close of the concert and paid just respect to Mr. Cortot, to Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra for the virtuoso performance.

The Bach suits arranged for modern orchestra rather lacked archaic flavor, but formed a pleasing interlude between the rather thick Hadley Fantasia and the Franck variations. The air, which makes up the second movement, the most familiar of all Bach music, was played in a straightforward fashion, without applause getting, long drawn out sweetness.

The arrangement of this program prompts one to pause for a moment to comment of the excellence of Mr. Rabaud's programs. His music is worth hearing; his novelties are perhaps at time a concession to the demands for "something new" but necessary, the juxtaposition of his selections is excellent, his programs constantly stimulate the auditor without fatiguing him. He plays the Beethoven symphonies frequently, thank Heavens for that. He is hampered, as are all composers today, by having to choose from a limited repetoire-war necessity. Next week he puts his first Brahms on the Symphony program.

MASTER OF PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Ideal Union of Great Band, Conductor and Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The ideal union of a great orchestra, a great conductor and a great soloist, and, to complete the effect, a programme admirably arranged, is seldom a fact, even in the affairs of the best regulated artistic organizations.

The concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, with Alfred Cortot, pianist, as soloist, was such an event, superlatively representative of the greatest traditions of these concerts.

MORE THAN A VIRTUOSO

Mr. Cortot took part in two performances, those of the Franck "Variations Symphonique" and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." In both these works the pianist is far more than a haranguing virtuoso. The piano is an element of the orchestra, important but organic.

In the D'Indy, it might be said, the piano is another orchestra, with a host of effects all its own, and only slightly inferior in capacities of tone-color and sonority to the hundred instruments which surround it. The pianist becomes less a soloist than a second conductor, whose authority is exceeded only by the man with the baton. In such circumstances the pianist can be either an indifferent performer, accustomed to musical routine, an executant intent on displaying his own gifts, or a great artist who subordinates himself completely to the music and thinks with the conductor as one man.

Two Masters of Art

Seldom in the history of these concerts has there been witnessed such union of spirit and intellect between two musicians of the first rank, and such superb mastery of every aspect of their art, as was shown by Mr. Rabaud and Mr. Cortot yesterday. Their performances were, indeed, historic. Mr. Rabaud we now know as a musician, and our admiration of him increases with every concert that he gives. An inspired student of his art, he inspires the orchestra, which not only obeys him and plays, but understands him and speaks.

Mr. Cortot is what a famous pianist should be, and seldom is—first of all a great musician, with a burning enthusiasm for his art, and, second, a virtuoso of extraordinary powers, for whom physical difficulties apparently do not exist. It may be said without exaggeration that although at least two performances of Franck's variations had been given in this city, the music was heard here yesterday for the first time.

New Beauties in Variations

It had not had its rightful aspect before. The poetic qualities of the composition, its development and finish of workmanship, had been realized, but we had not been permitted to perceive the strength and dramatic character of the music, as was revealed in the very first phrase of the strings, as interpreted by Mr. Rabaud. The revelation was overwhelming. We knew Franck as mystic, the secluded dreamer—these qualities are not wholly absent in the variations—but there were passages in which one thought of Michelangelo.

Most variations are separate fragments, loosely bound together into a whole. Franck's are not, and the continuity of the thought, the force and the germinative power of the composer's imagination were unforgettably demonstrated. The second variation was the inevitable consequence of the first, and so on. The momentum of the music and the performance was irresistable and exciting to the last degree.

D'Indy's Symphony

D'Indy's symphony on a "Mountain Air" is for the writer one of the most beautiful and brilliant compositions of a modern master. Conductor, pianist and orchestra surpassed themselves in its performance. Mr. Cortot, though he sat at the piano among the other instrumentalists, played as one who was at the same time immersed in his task and sufficiently far from it to understand equally the great outlines and the finest details of the composition. When the occasion arose, he led authoritatively, stating a theme or some important phrase of its development with as much breadth and conviction as though he had composed the music himself; at other times he supplied only tone color as a background for solo instrument, or again was virtually the conductor in setting the pace of a movement and sustaining it for measures as the basis of the orchestral performance. Technically his performance can only be called by an abused and misappropriated term, "colossal," or, if you like, "overwhelming." The skill, imagination, musicianship of all who took part were placed at the service of the composer, who would himself have rejoiced if he could have heard this performance of his music.

Hadley's Fantasia

Henry Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" op. 46, was played for the first time at these concerts. This is not one of Mr. Hadley's late compositions. It was published in 1907, and there had been performances of it before that time. We prefer this music to other compositions of Mr. Hadley which have come since it was completed. It has mood and the music is full of enthusiasm. The idiom is strongly tinctured with Wagnerianism. The orchestra is the big Wagnerian orchestra, which is used to the limit. The effect is full and brilliant. The composer liked to make his instruments sound, and did so with a youthful gusto which is contagious. It is sincere, direct writing, and as such gave much pleasure to the audience.

Not the least item of the concert was the suite of Bach in D major which contains the famous air known because of a violin transcription as the "Air for the G String." Again Mr. Rebaud showed his eclectism and not only his understanding but his enthusiasm for music of all schools. Witness the two-fisted vigor and swing of the overture, the serenity and classic outline of the famous air. This, indeed, was a concert long to remember.

88

RABAUD GIVES NOBLE READING

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Performed Faultlessly at Concert

MISS MABEL GARRISON PLEASES WITH VOICE

Her California Song, However, Draws Deeper ApplauseThan Mozart's Aria

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.
Mozart, Concert Aria, "Mia Speranza."
Soloist, Miss Mabel Garrison.
St. Saens, "Phaeton" Symphonic Poem.
Kelley, "A California Idyl."
Miss Garrison.
Lalo, Rhapsody in A major.

The above was the program of the Friday and Saturday concerts. There may be a suspicion that we are getting a trifle too much of Beethoven and also St. Saens, but without going as far as the frightened conservatory student who, when the professor thundered "How many symphonies did Beethoven write?" trembled back "two, the fifth and the ninth," we can always welcome the fifth as one of the best of the nine. And on this occasion it became its own best excuse, for it received a reading and a performance that may rank among the best that we have heard. Too often conductors try with might and main to read something original and new into Beethoven—and fail.

M. Rabaud gave a reading that was in the noblest Beethoven school, without exaggeration, save that he dwelt somewhat long upon the great opening figure, and the finale was read with a glory of heroic triumph that aroused the entire audience.

BEETHOVEN AND CONTRABASSES.

We are always disposed to give the chief laurels of this work to the contrabasses, of which Beethoven was the liberator. Before his time they generally gave merely fundamental bass notes. At the very end of the fourth symphony Beethoven wrote a most difficult set of violin figures for these instruments. Weber satirized the proceeding most keenly in the musical press.

Poor Beethoven could only swear (he was a master in this branch of oratory) in return, but his real answer to the rival composer was in the fifth symphony, where we have the same instruments again introduced and the contrabasses giving a variation in the slow movement, telling a mysterious ghost story at the beginning of the scherzo, and playing a furiously difficult set of phrases in the trio of this movement.

The manner in which they played spoke well for their artistry and for M. Rabaud's drillmastership. The whole orchestra played famously. We remembered that we had this same symphony very well given by Messager and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra a few weeks ago, but we must decidedly give the palm to the reading of M. Rabaud and the playing of his orchestra.

The other two selections, although not new to Boston, were less familiar. St. Saens' "Phaeton" tells in music of what might befall a young man if he tries to run his father's aeroplane without having had any experience. One can watch the machine miss fire, dip, drive; we can hear the tank explode and the whole affair finally turn turtle. It is perfectly evident that Phaeton is driving without a license and ought never to have been allowed at the wheel.

MISS GARRISON PLEASES.

Seriously this is not a great work. It seemed the tamest portion of the concert, in spite of the fact that the interpretation left nothing to be desired. Coming after the exceptionally heroic and brilliant finale of the fifth symphony it seemed merely bombastic, and it is a comparatively easy matter to gallop horses in music with an anapaestic rhythm; it is one of the few things that program-music can unmistakably picture.

Miss Mabel Garrison won a success as soloist. She is a coloratura soprano of high register, sure intonation and great flexibility of voice. Mozart's concert aria, however, did not appeal greatly to the auditor. One does not thrill to the conventional "pena" and "pianto" and other agonies of the old-fashioned musical heroine. Edgar Stillman Kelley's California song came much nearer the modern heart. Not only was there great display of vocal technique here, but the orchestral part was finely developed. The voice was balanced against the fluate at times, as both Handel and Donizetti have done, and the new solo flute-player gave an excellent account of himself.

Mr. Kelley did not indulge in any modern ugliness, but united melodic beauty with vocal and orchestral display. The work ended on the heights, away up in alt, almost in altissimo, with a good climax. Miss Garrison was heartily applauded and recalled after both numbers, but one could note the spontaneity of the enthusiasm which followed the Kelley number.

LALO'S RHAPSODY.

Lalo's Rhapsody has not been heard here in a long time, so it was practically a novelty. It is derived from Norwegian inspiration and we like this Frenchman better in Norway than in Spain. The essence of the Springtanz and the Halling are both well caught up. The last movement is chiefly a Halling. We have been present at one of these dances north of Christiania, where, in a barn, the young men strove, to the wild scraping of fiddles and the yelling of excited maidens, to kick the overhanging rafters. The fiercely exuberant music brought back the scene, and it was played with a dash and heartiness that demands unstinted praise.

Therefore, M. Rabaud's triumphs were made at the beginning and end of the concert. Yet of course the very beginning was "The Star Spangled Banner," which we suppose will be reserved for especial occasions after the coming peace. Possibly they might begin the "Pop" concerts, at least in July, with the old tune, "How Dry I Am."

The rule about speaking only good of the dead also applies to Charity Concerts. But were it altogether lifted one could only praise Ephraim Zimbalist for his violin work at the concert in Symphony Hall last Monday in aid of the Jewish War Fund. Great violinists are rather crowding each other in Boston in recent days, yet even amidst the throng the work of Zimbalist demands especial record. It took place in Symphony Hall, but might have been held to better advantage in a smaller auditorium.

The full, rich tone of the artist was well displayed in the aria of the Goldmark concerto, and there was much brilliancy shown in David's arrangement of Corelli's "La Follia." Cesar Cui's "Orientale," given as an encore during the evening, seemed to awaken especial interest. If many more violin celebrities come to Boston they will be obliged to give recitals to each other.

More of d'Indy's music was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its twelfth program, heard on the afternoon of Friday, Jan. 24, Mr. Alfred Cortot playing the piano part in the "Symphony on a French Mountain Song," Op. 25. Being closer akin to program music than is the string quartet, the moments of pure musical inspiration are fewer. Mr. Cortot submerged himself in the ranks of the players, and made no attempt to turn the symphony into a concerto. Mr. Rabaud, as is the case with all that he does, showed perfect familiarity with the score and a great anxiety to do justice to its poetry and beauty. Mr. Cortot's ability to exert just the right amount of force through his fingers at just the right instant to bring about the elasticity in a phrase that marks the true artist was in evidence in the César Franck symphonic variations. These found much favor with the audience, which gave the soloist long and loud applause. No pianist has been heard in Symphony Hall this year who can put more poetry into his tone than can Mr. Cortot. The program began with a symphonic fantasia, Op. 46, by Henry Hadley, heard for the first time at these concerts. The work suggests Wagnerian influence, but with a striving along approved lines for modernity. On the program was the Bach suite in D major, No. 3, which plentifully satisfied any yearnings for structural and melodic music.

Sunday afternoons.

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be soloist at the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities instead of Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, who, unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagements. The schedule for the next two weeks runs as follows:

Worcester, Massachusetts, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 28. The soloist will be the American contralto, Mme. Merle Alcock.

Boston, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. The soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Washington New National Theater, Monday afternoon, Feb. 3. Soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Baltimore, Lyric Theater, Tuesday evening, Feb. 4. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

Philadelphia, Academy of Music, Wednesday evening, Feb. 5. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New York, Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 6.

Brooklyn, Academy of Music, Friday evening, Feb. 7. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New York, Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, Feb. 8.

1919

MORE PIANISM OF HIGH ORDER AT THE SYMPHONY

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Henri Rabaud, conductor; Alfred Cortot, pianist, soloist. Twelfth concert of the season, Symphony Hall. The program:—

J. S. Bach—Orchestral Suite in D major.
Franck—Symphonic Variations.
Hadley—Symphonic Fantasia.
D'Indy—Symphony on a Mountain Air.

Early in the fall this promised to be a violinistic year. Pianists, so the outlook seemed, were to be rare birds. Yet this has developed decidedly into a pianistic, rather than a violinistic, season. Of the fiddlers that great and glorious youth, Jascha Heifetz, is with us again. Mr. Rosen, much anticipated, came, but did not create the expected furore. Mr. Seidel, most eagerly anticipated of the younger violinists excepting Mr. Heifetz, has not appeared as yet. Other fiddlers seek non-Bostonianical fields and box offices. With the appearance of Mr. Cortot with the Conservatory, Paris, Orchestra, came the first of the pianistic surprises. The niceness, the clarity, the poetry of his playing, as well as his sufficient technique and obvious musicianship, made an immediate impression. There were requests on all sides that he play with the local orchestra. Then at a symphony concert Mr. Levitzki made a great success. With the light, popular Saint-Saens concerto he established himself as a favorite. Mr. Rachmaninoff then appeared out of the East. His playing, as well as his fame as a composer, made him at once the outstanding figure of the musical season. Now Mr. Cortot reappears this week as the soloist with the Boston orchestra and through the non-appearanec of Mr. Rubenstein, the announced soloist for next week, Mr. Rachmaninoff will have his opportunity to play with Mr. Rabaud's men next week. Add to these pianistic feats the brilliant playing of Mme. Leginska at a Sunday concert and the much anticipated playing of Miss Christie, a most talented pianist, in recital a little later in the winter, and a season, which promised little fine pianism, develops into a season of keyboard delights.

Cortot yesterday heightened the impression he made when he played with Mr. Messager. Appearing in the Franck Variations and D'Indy symphony, his art was seen in all its phases. The beauty of his tone was continuous. His sound musicianship never let him make the piano a solo instrument; he kept it, as it is intended in the D'Indy symphony, an integral part of the orchestra. There were times in the symphony when the Cortot tone was as delicate as that of the harps that play almost continuously through parts of the symphony with the piano. Rapid passages were played at great speed, but never blurred, never made muddy. To everything he brought a fine feeling that suggested the poet in all he did. At other times and in other places Mr. Cortot has been accused of exaggeration in rubato and caprices with tempi—certainly no accusations such as these can fairly be brought against his artistry yesterday. He is, as Boston finds him, that rare bird, a pianist with a wonderful touch, well nigh perfect technique and above and beyond all, a distinct personality.

Mr. Rabaud shared with him the honors of the "Mountain Symphony." While Mr. Rabaud has given notable performances of much greater music since his entree into Boston, he has done nothing that has pleased the rank and file of his audience more than this work. The symphony, almost a series of variations on a French mountain air with secondary themes, elaborate working-out, etc., demands absolute clarity. From the announcement of the theme, beautifully played on the English horn, to the brilliant final, defined as a kermis in the blaze of day, Mr. Rabaud's performance was clear as crystal.

There are many surprising combinations of instruments in the work. The instruments, the harps, the piano, the various wood winds, the French horn and the English horns were played with lovely quality. The balance of tone was always exactly right, the third movement was played with flaming beauty. No wonder that the audience remained in their places after the close of the concert and paid just respect to Mr. Cortot, to Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra for the virtuoso performance.

The Bach suits arranged for modern orchestra rather lacked archaic flavor, but formed a pleasing interlude between the rather thick Hadley Fantasia and the Franck variations. The air, which makes up the second movement, the most familiar of all Bach music, was played in a straightforward fashion, without applause getting, long drawn out sweetness.

The arrangement of this program prompts one to pause for a moment to comment of the excellence of Mr. Rabaud's programs. His music is worth hearing; his novelties are perhaps at time a concession to the demands for "something new" but necessary, the juxtaposition of his selections is excellent, his programs constantly stimulate the auditor without fatiguing him. He plays the Beethoven symphonies frequently, thank Heavens for that. He is hampered, as are all composers today, by having to choose from a limited repetoire-war necessity. Next week he puts his first Brahms on the Symphony program.

MASTER OF PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Ideal Union of Great Band, Conductor and Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The ideal union of a great orchestra, a great conductor and a great soloist, and, to complete the effect, a programme admirably arranged, is seldom a fact, even in the affairs of the best regulated artistic organizations.

The concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, with Alfred Cortot, pianist, as soloist, was such an event, superlatively representative of the greatest traditions of these concerts.

MORE THAN A VIRTUOSO

Mr. Cortot took part in two performances, those of the Franck "Variations Symphonique" and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." In both these works the pianist is far more than a haranguing virtuoso. The piano is an element of the orchestra, important but organic.

In the D'Indy, it might be said, the piano is another orchestra, with a host of effects all its own, and only slightly inferior in capacities of tone-color and sonority to the hundred instruments which surround it. The pianist becomes less a soloist than a second conductor, whose authority is exceeded only by the man with the baton. In such circumstances the pianist can be either an indifferent performer, accustomed to musical routine, an executant intent on displaying his own gifts, or a great artist who subordinates himself completely to the music and thinks with the conductor as one man.

Two Masters of Art

Seldom in the history of these concerts has there been witnessed such union of spirit and intellect between two musicians of the first rank, and such superb mastery of every aspect of their art, as was shown by Mr. Rabaud and Mr. Cortot yesterday. Their performances were, indeed, historic. Mr. Rabaud we now know as a musician, and our admiration of him increases with every concert that he gives. An inspired student of his art, he inspires the orchestra, which not only obeys him and plays, but understands him and speaks.

Mr. Cortot is what a famous pianist should be, and seldom is—first of all a great musician, with a burning enthusiasm for his art, and, second, a virtuoso of extraordinary powers, for whom physical difficulties apparently do not exist. It may be said without exaggeration that although at least two performances of Franck's variations had been given in this city, the music was heard here yesterday for the first time.

New Beauties in Variations

It had not had its rightful aspect before. The poetic qualities of the composition, its development and finish of workmanship, had been realized, but we had not been permitted to perceive the strength and dramatic character of the music, as was revealed in the very first phrase of the strings, as interpreted by Mr. Rabaud. The revelation was overwhelming. We knew Franck as mystic, the secluded dreamer—these qualities are not wholly absent in the variations—but there were passages in which one thought of Michelangelo.

Most variations are separate fragments, loosely bound together into a whole. Franck's are not, and the continuity of the thought, the force and the germinative power of the composer's imagination were unforgettably demonstrated. The second variation was the inevitable consequence of the first, and so on. The momentum of the music and the performance was irresistable and exciting to the last degree.

D'Indy's Symphony

D'Indy's symphony on a "Mountain Air" is for the writer one of the most beautiful and brilliant compositions of a modern master. Conductor, pianist and orchestra surpassed themselves in its performance. Mr. Cortot, though he sat at the piano among the other instrumentalists, played as one who was at the same time immersed in his task and sufficiently far from it to understand equally the great outlines and the finest details of the composition. When the occasion arose, he led authoritatively, stating a theme or some important phrase of its development with as much breadth and conviction as though he had composed the music himself; at other times he supplied only tone color as a background for solo instrument, or again was virtually the conductor in setting the pace of a movement and sustaining it for measures as the basis of the orchestral performance. Technically his performance can only be called by an abused and misappropriated term, "colossal," or, if you like, "overwhelming." The skill, imagination, musicianship of all who took part were placed at the service of the composer, who would himself have rejoiced if he could have heard this performance of his music.

Hadley's Fantasia

Henry Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" op. 46, was played for the first time at these concerts. This is not one of Mr. Hadley's late compositions. It was published in 1907, and there had been performances of it before that time. We prefer this music to other compositions of Mr. Hadley which have come since it was completed. It has mood and the music is full of enthusiasm. The idiom is strongly tinctured with Wagnerianism. The orchestra is the big Wagnerian orchestra, which is used to the limit. The effect is full and brilliant. The composer liked to make his instruments sound, and did so with a youthful gusto which is contagious. It is sincere, direct writing, and as such gave much pleasure to the audience.

Not the least item of the concert was the suite of Bach in D major which contains the famous air known because of a violin transcription as the "Air for the G String." Again Mr. Rebaud showed his eclectism and not only his understanding but his enthusiasm for music of all schools. Witness the two-fisted vigor and swing of the overture, the serenity and classic outline of the famous air. This, indeed, was a concert long to remember.

RABAUD GIVES NOBLE READING

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Performed Faultlessly at Concert

MISS MABEL GARRISON PLEASES WITH VOICE

Her California Song, However, Draws Deeper ApplauseThan Mozart's Aria

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.
Mozart, Concert Aria, "Mia Speranza."
Soloist, Miss Mabel Garrison.
St. Saens, "Phaeton" Symphonic Poem.
Kelley, "A California Idyl."
Miss Garrison.
Lalo, Rhapsody in A major.

The above was the program of the Friday and Saturday concerts. There may be a suspicion that we are getting a trifle too much of Beethoven and also St. Saens, but without go-would be frightened conserfo' bein' progressive.

"In the foldin' seat ahead o' n is a boy named Frank Verno Frank is unique in many way Durin 'the swimmin' season he w a hale lad well met. An' from t startin' o' school to the recitatio on the last day Frank was nev known to have his hair cut. H had bangs what hung way dow over his nose. He could allus get laugh by blowin' back this bangi hedge. But the boy's chief ass was warts. He had 'em all t way from solitaires to sunburst an' was mighty proud o' 'en especially o' the crown jew square on the end o' his nose.

"In them days' son, the li'l gir wore red an' blue celluloid ha combs what were sort o' horsesho oval in shape. They reached fro ear to ear jus' like the metal co traptions what our telephon operators wear now. By startin these combs at the forehead yo could rake all the hair straig back with it. Do you begin to se the plot o' the piece?

"Well, sir, we all line up on th schoolhouse steps, the photographe wraps the big green cloth 'roun his head an' shoulders an' every thing is lovely. I've got Frank Vernon standin' in front o' me an' he's gigglin' because he's goin' t be a headliner. I take li'l Sadie Helling's curve comb an' plunge it into Frank's five months' crop o' mane. Up comes his hair all spread out like a peacock's tail. An' that prize winnin' wart on the end o' his beak has been given two coats o' red ink. Son, to this day I'll tell it to the entire world that I put the punch in that picture. An' when the riot had been quelled the principal calls on me with an old-fashioned idea not all his own. He was not progressive, son; he was a drab person with no imagination in his soul.

"The old-time travelin' photographer what used to line the classes up on the schoolhouse steps—I wonder what's become o' him?"

PORTDOM

rt Madrigal have been allowed at the wheel.

MISS GARRISON PLEASES.

Seriously this is not a great work. It seemed the tamest portion of the concert, in spite of the fact that the interpretation left nothing to be desired. Coming after the exceptionally heroic and brilliant finale of the fifth symphony it seemed merely bombastic, and it is a comparatively easy matter to gallop horses in music with an anapaestic rhythm; it is one of the few things that program-music can unmistakably picture.

Miss Mabel Garrison won a success as soloist. She is a coloratura soprano of high register, sure intonation and great flexibility of voice. Mozart's concert aria, however, did not appeal greatly to the auditor. One does not thrill to the conventional "pena" and "pianto" and other agonies of the old-fashioned musical heroine. Edgar Stillman Kelley's California song came much nearer the modern heart. Not only was there great display of vocal technique here, but the orchestral part was finely developed. The voice was balanced against the fluate at times, as both Handel and Donizetti have done, and the new solo flute-

Last Edition

Boston Even

ESTABLISHED 1830—90TH YEAR—No. 20 FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, 1919

ARY 1, 1919

First Photograph

Ever Taken of The

PRESENT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Showing the Entire Famous Reorganized Boston Organization with Henri Rabaud Conducting

Together With a Breezy Personal Description of the Musicians by Olin Downes With the Big 30-Inch Photo

MADE EXPRESSLY AND EXCLUSIVELY FOR THE Next Sunday Post

STATES WEATHER BUREAU

Brilliant Future of Symphony

Problems of Those Who Assume Big Yearly Deficits —Surprise and Pleasure of Concerts Under French Conductor—The Reward of Study—A Pianistic Premier of Poland—Local Musical Activities

Elsewhere in the Post is a description of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present season. Not for many seasons has this celebrated organization been in so strong a position, musically, and as regards its right to public patronage, as today. New appointments have brought fresh blood into the orchestral body and added skilled instrumentalists to its ranks without impairing its distinctive tone-qualities or technical capacities. French conductors have replaced those of the German school, with immediate and manifest advantage to the artistic character of the concerts. The Boston Symphony concerts were provincialized by conductors of a nation which has never ceased to hug its provincialism to its bosom. We are no longer dominated by German conceptions of music in Symphony Hall, and, war or no war, it was high time that this change had been made.

The public approval of the results of these arrangements has been immediate and unmistakable. There are other things, however, than artistic performances and public approval which intimately affect the existence and development of big artistic bodies. Money is as essential in music as in war. A great orchestra, even when managed as ably as the Boston Symphony, does not pile up packers' profits as the years roll by. Through 37 years, Major Higginson, generously, without protest or self-display, and with the one thought of the artistic future of the organization he founded, paid from his private funds the yearly deficits. He resigned all active connection with the Boston Symphony and financial support of that body at the close of the season of 1917-18. The trustees who undertook the responsibility of the task Major Higginson relinquished, with zeal and sincerity in the public interest, are now finding out what running a big orchestra means. It develops that the deficit for this season will be much larger than was calculated, and that this condition will doubtless continue through the years immediately following. The deficit is due partly to the tardiness of the trustees in securing the conductor for the present season, and the unfortunately amateurish manner in which the arrangements were announced, which had a strong effect on the public subscriptions; to various expenses of the orchestra itself; and to the increased cost of travelling, hall rent and other items of orchestral management which are always present. This large deficit has, however, been subscribed for this season and for seasons to come. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, thanks to such generous support, appears to be at the beginning of a new and brilliant epoch in its history.

The trustees and certain of the wealthier subscribers to the concerts have done their part. It is now the turn of the public. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is remade and at its best today, a conductor of singular and distinguished talent is giving a series of concerts of exceptional brilliancy. The programmes are excellently arranged. The list of soloists, as it turns out, offers many unusual attractions. Those who hesitated to subscribe to a season when they did not know what conductor they would hear, if they would hear any at all, are not to blame for their hesitation, especially in view of financial stresses of the time. But these may now feel more than reassured about the quality of the performances and should do everything in their power to pack Symphony Hall to its capacity for the balance of this season and the seasons to come. Major Higginson's gift to the city and the country will never be relinquished by those who inherit his task and his responsibilities, but the reward of their efforts and the reward of the man who founded the orchestra can only come through the deserved approval and co-operation of the community.

MUSIC

Boston Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The thirteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on the afternoon of Friday, Jan. 31, was one of great significance in the musical affairs of this city, for it introduced Mr. Rabaud as an interpreter of Brahms. Now many conductors essay Brahms, some regarding him metronomically, some sentimentally, some enveloping him in a chill atmosphere of austerity, some striving for a luxuriance of exotic warmth. A few there be who recognize Brahms for the poet he was, and, appreciative themselves of noble sentiments and aspirations, grasp the grandeur of Brahms' poetry and sense the compelling beauty in which he expressed it. Such are the real conductors of Brahms, and among them is Mr. Rabaud. The importance to Boston in the discovery of Mr. Rabaud as a capable conductor of Brahms lies in the fact that it removes at once any lingering doubt as to whether or not he should be intrusted with the destinies of the orchestra after the year for which he was engaged is ended.

Accepted at first with a somewhat ungracious feeling of reserve by his public, unaccustomed possibly to real modesty in a leader of its orchestra, Mr. Rabaud has steadily grown in favor as respect for his musical attainments has succeeded doubt, and as the kindly self-effacing courtesy of the man has become recognized. Now, after the reading of the fifth Beethoven symphony of two weeks ago and the second Brahms symphony of yesterday, there can be no question of his ability to draw from the men under him the effects he seeks. This being so why should not an invitation be extended him to continue as Boston's conductor? Whether he would accept, is, of course, another matter. For him this is a year of exile; his none too pleasant reception in Boston and the apathy of his public toward him doubtless do not incline him to a markedly favorable opinion of the field of his labors. If, however, he should be willing and the announcement could be definitely made that he would remain for a term of years, there can be no doubt that with a feeling of permanence would come the fondness for the man that his abilities warrant. It is to be hoped that the trustees of the orchestra will give an inkling of their intentions soon.

The Brahms symphony was not the only achievement of Mr. Rabaud in this concert. The accompaniment he furnished Mr. Rachmaninoff, who played the piano part in his own second concerto in C minor, Op. 18, was an indication of a high order of leadership. The sudden and puzzling changes of tempo in the third movement were executed with exactness no matter how rapid the pace. Attention of the audience, of course, centered on Mr. Rachmaninoff, and both man and music justified the eager interest. The pianist subordinated himself, becoming one of the orchestra and keeping a watchful eye always on Mr. Rabaud's bâton. His amazing technical facility found opportunity for display, not for its own sake, but in the proper setting forth of arabesque and ornament. The orchestration was of particular interest because of the unusual, though not bizarre, effects obtained. The program also included the "Entr'acte Symphonique" from Bruneau's "Messidor."

REDUCTION RATIO

15x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Of Today Under Henri Rabaud

PHOTO

Photograph (C) Carl J. Horner.

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Post publishes today photographs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it was in the second year of its existence, 1882, and as it is today.

The changes in personnel have been gradual, at least until recently. Some seasons—usually those in which a new conductor made his advent—saw more changes than others. But the practical idealism, the unflinching devotion to the highest standards, which inaugurated the existence of this famous organization, have remained, and are with it still.

In spite of the unheavals of public feeling and the results of recent managerial misunderstanding with the public, the orchestra remains today firmly on its feet, worthy in the artistic qualities of its performance of its most brilliant traditions and secure in the esteem of its patrons.

Thirty-eight years have gone by since Georg Henschel first raised the baton in the old Music Hall. During 37 of those years the orchestra was the faithful reflection of the energy and generosity of Major Higginson, and a testimony to the enduring faith which made it possible for him, with the help of his right-hand man, Charles A. Ellis, and the distinguished musicians they brought to America, to realize an ambition which seemed to many in 1881 as impracticable and remote as the stars in the heavens. Not only were there questions of a kind which made the most severe demands on the business foresight of the manage- [illegible] the abilities of the conductors and the pocket [illegible] above all, a [illegible] to be brought to appreciate the things the orchestra was doing, to love great music, and support a growing organization and its growing needs more and more warmly through the years.

Time was when the performance of a new and revolutionary score saw more people on the stage than in the audience, the larger part of that audience having signified its disapproval by quietly uprising and getting out. This occurred when Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was played by Mr. Gericke in 1887. Today Strauss, Debussy, d'Indy, Ravel, find an eager and intelligent welcome at the concerts.

A National Influence

The influence of the orchestra, not merely on local musical conditions, but over wide tracts of the United States, is today one of its most notable distinctions. This influence has been felt directly in its many tours, of which the one to the San Francisco exposition of 1915 was the most notable; in the famous conductors it has presented the American public; in the unrivalled artistic quality of its performances; and indirectly in the number of significant smaller organizations which have developed from its ranks.

First of these was the celebrated Kneisel Quartet, recently and regrettably disbanded. Franz Kneisel came to America as concertmaster under Wilhelm Gericke in 1885. With him, among other new men Mr. Gericke had engaged, were Louis Svecenski, for many years a member of "the Kneisels"; Emmanuel Fiedler, violinist, whose son, Arthur Fiedler, is one of the youngest members of the orchestra today; Max Zach, since 1907 conductor of the St. Louis Orchestra, and A. Moldauer, for many years a member of the Adamowski Quartet, as was also Mr. Zach. "All the new musicians," wrote Mr. Gericke, in a letter which has since been made public, "were very young men; and the concertmaster one of the youngest; so young, that he did not even know how to smoke. On our trip over, I felt it my duty to teach him this art, in which he has certainly been past master ever since!"

Kneisel resigned from the Symphony Orchest[illegible] in 1903 to devote himself wholly to his quartet work, the other members of the quartet, which included Franz Kneisel, Julius Theodorowitz, Louis Svecenski and Alvin Schroeder, going with him. In the same year Mr. Kneisel's deskmate in the orchestra, Charles Martin Loeffler, resigned to devote himself to composition. His scores are today among the most significant items of the Boston Symphony library; and there is a Mecca, which violinists, composers and all serious musicians visit as a high artistic privilege, at Medfield.

Fernandez Arbos, the concertmaster who succeeded Kneisel for a brief period, founded in the season of 1903-04 the Arbos Quartet. Arbos was succeeded by Willy Hess, and the Hess-Schroeder Quartet came into being, performing through the seasons of 1904-05 to 1906-07.

Anton Witek, following Hess as concertmaster, developed the Witek-Malkin trio, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Witek, the latter pianist, and Josef Malkin, now first 'cellist of the orchestra.

In the meantime there had been formed the Adamowski Quartet, in 1888, and the Adamowski Trio, which enlisted, in addition to the services of Timothee and Josef Adamowski, violinist and 'cellist, those of Mme. Szumowska, pianist.

Quartets That Won Fame

Of all the string quartets composed of Boston Symphony players, the Hoffman String quartet, founded and headed by Jacques Hoffmann, violinist, remained longest faithful to its original membership. It is now in its 17th season. War conditions caused its concerts to be suspended last season. These conditions were also mainly responsible for [illegible] changes in the membership of the quartet, soon to resume its public activities, and give, as of old, concerts in many of the principal cities of the United States. The broad educational work which his string quartet accomplished and his activities as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are not the only directions in which Mr. Hoffmann has done public service. He was for many years concertmaster of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, and has frequently appeared as soloist at these concerts and also at the subscription Symphony concerts of the winter season. His activities as a teacher have been extensive. He has been for six years conductor of the People's Orchestra of the Boston Music School Settlement. Mr. Hoffmann's son, Ernst H. Hoffmann, a graduate cum laude of Harvard University, is a violinist and pianist of uncommon attainments, who is soon to appear in public, and was successively concertmaster, soloist and conductor of the orchestra of the Perian Sodality of Harvard.

An admirable string quartet led by Richard Czerwonky, second concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, appeared in the season of 1907-08. Next season Czerwonky was concertmaster of another orchestra, and Boston knew his quartet no more. It was missed, for it played with uncommon fire and musical feeling.

Ranking with the Kneisel Quartet in its artistic standards and in its distinctive accomplishment is the Longy Club of players on wind instruments. Georges Longy, of world-fame as an artist on his instrument, the oboe, came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as first oboist in the season of 1898-99. He founded the Longy Club in the season of 1900-01. It quickly became known as a body of virtuosi and musicians of the highest rank, whose performances were revelations of the capacity of a wind ensemble and of the character of much valuable modern music, particularly modern music by French composers.

No member of the Boston Symphony has rendered more service to his art while in the orchestra than Mr. Longy. He remains the leader of the woodwind section of the Boston Symphony, and his solo passages alone would reflect distinction on these concerts. He was leader of Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral club from 1899 to 1913, and in this position showed his capacities as a brilliant conductor, though almost all of his players were amateurs. The programmes were of the most exceptional interest, introducing many modern orchestral works in Boston years before they were played by the Boston Symphony. In 1915 Mr. Longy became conductor of the Harvard Club of this city, in which capacity he directs both the orchestra, which is now a substantial body capable of brilliant performances, and the chorus founded more recently by the officers of this organization.

This season Mr. Longy is also conductor of the Cecilia, while his school of music, founded several seasons ago, has become a flourishing and important musical institution. It is good to know that the Longy Club, which, like the Kneisel Quartet and other of the organizations which radiated from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was assisted for years by the generosity of Major Higginson, is reorganized this season, after a winter when the exigencies of war-time scattered its personnel and made impossible its customary series of concerts, and will soon commence to make public appearances. By Mr. Longy, sits Clement Lepom, second oboist, a member of the orchestra since 1901, a conductor at the Pops, teacher of solfege, oboe and wood-wind at the New England Conservatory, a sterling musician, active in many capacities in this city.

The Changes of Today

Today the conditions which govern the policies of the Boston Symphony are changed in many important respects from those of the years intervening between 1881 and 1917. The orchestra in those years had character and the policies of a privately owned and directed institution, supported by an enthusiastic public. Its existence was due first of all to Major Higginson's initiative, energy and generosity; secondly to the foresight and efficiency of the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis, whose policies were not merely those of a trained and exceptionally able business man, but of one who was keenly and intelligently interested in the musical future of the organization, and finally to the distinguished European conductors who were given absolute control of all that pertained to the artistic quality of the per- [illegible]

Recently Major Higginson, [illegible] years [illegible] weary of the personal responsibilities entailed on him, gave up his personal share in the development of the orchestra and entrusted it to a body of trustees who are fully aware of the fact that the future of the Boston Symphony must be the future of an organization which belongs essentially to the public and ministers to the public need. Mr. Ellis has resigned his position in favor of his previous assistant business manager, William H. Brennan, who joined the managerial staff of the orchestra in 1909, following the death of Fred R. Comee.

As a result of all this, and in response to legitimate and inevitable public sentiment, extensive changes in the personnel of the orchestra have taken place. Principal among these is the replacement of German musicians by French and Americans.

A German conductor of distinguished gifts, false to his trust and the confidence reposed in him by the management in a most delicate situation, has been replaced by two Frenchmen, the first Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who conducted the early concerts of the present season until the present conductor of the Boston Symphony, Henri Rabaud, recently made a member of the French Institute, arrived. Both men have added to the prestige of the orchestra. Both have proven conductors of individuality and exceptional talent. The changes made have been invaluable, if only for the fact that they have shown the fallacy of the superstition that great conductors are born only in Germany.

French the New Spirit

It is not too much to say that the predominant foreign musical influence in Boston for some time to come will be French, following the long German regime. The difference between the methods of Dr. Muck and Mr. Rabaud is interesting and typical of two different schools of music and morals. The writer of these words came over with Mr. Rabaud from New York. Noting the extreme sensitiveness of feature, the kindliness of glance the simplicity, sincerity, and, in the highest sense of the word, gentleness which characterized the man, one thought, "What a fine nature. But how will he control the orchestra?"

For an orchestra of the dimensions and the makeup of the Boston Symphony is not an easy thing to control. Dr. Muck made the men fear him. He had ears and eyes all around his head and an extremely caustic tongue. He knew how to be brutal. One does not easily think of Mr. Rabaud in connection with these characteristics.

"This is the way in which a member of the orchestra summarized the difference between the two: 'With Muck—well, you have a general. He is a very good general. You may not love him, but if he says 'Charge. You will be killed,' you obey. You charge. You are killed. But Monsieur Rabaud—we love him. We give him gladly all there is in us. Also, he has great tact and is very practical. If a little thing goes wrong in rehearsal, he says to himself, 'This man is a musician. He knows he has done wrong. I do not have to tell him so. Next time he will do right.' And we do! We think of the music—the big things in the music, not merely the details of technic. We like to play—for him."

"This musician," said Philip Hale in a recent review of a performance by Rabaud, "of broad sympathies, kindly authority and a spirit which blazes when the music makes demand."

The story of many of the Frenchmen who have joined the orchestra this season is a romance of war.

Ferdinand Thillois, the new first violin, has served at the front in the 91st Infantry. He fought at the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and Chemin des Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital playing for wounded comrades. He came to Boston last spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville in the department of Arden, July 19, 1890; was a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied with Lefort, the teacher of Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Thillois was a member of the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras.

New Faces and New Hands

Mr. Bar[illegible] [illegible] Replaces [illegible] violin, also a Conservatoire graduate, and a member of the Lamoureux Orchestra, was likewise in the French army and was seriously wounded in the trenches. After his recovery he came to America.

Mr. Mage, a member of the French band, is one of the new violas. He is a very versatile musician and sang solo when the French band appeared at the Pop concert in Boston last spring. He served not only on the French front, but in Serbia and at Saniki. He was taken prisoner early in the war and exchanged in July, 1915.

Georges Miquelle, from the French band, is a veteran of the war, a Conservatoire graduate and was one of the principal 'cellists of the Colonne Orchestra.

Emile Stievenard, the new bass clarinet, was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a clarinet in the Lamoureux concerts and the orchestra of the Opera Comique, and was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Louise Speyer, formerly of the French band, was a first prize of the Paris Conservatorie in 1911, and, Mr. Longy states, one of the most promising oboe players the Conservatoire has produced in many years.

Aydon Laus, the new first bassoon, is a first prize winner of the Paris Conservatoire and was four years in the orchestra of the grand opera.

The first trombone is Mr. Sordillo, an excellent musician of this city.

Agesilao Villani, the new Italian contra-bass player, is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma and began his career under Faccio in the orchestra of La Scala, Milan. He played in South America for 15 years as the principal contra-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Ayres. He has played in France, England, Italy and Germany under the direction of Mascagni, Martucci, Mancinelli, Toscanini, Campanini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, Rabaud, Messager, Leroux, Chevillard and Richter.

Eugene Adam, the trombonist, was born at Metz July 18, 1881. He studied in Nancy and later in Paris. At both conservatories he took first prizes. He was successively member of the orchestras of the Gaiete Lyrique and Opera Comique, and later with the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire.

Georges Laurent, the new first flute, was born in Paris June 7, 1886. His teacher of the flute at the Conservatoire was M. Taffanel. He received first prize for flute-playing in 1905, was first flutist at Monte Carlo and later in the orchestra of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire. He has as a soloist in France and Belgium.

M. Tatas, born at The Hague, studied the [illegible] with Spoor and became a member of the Re[illegible] Orchestra before he came to America. Di [illegible] Italian by birth, has been since his childhoo[illegible] America, was a pupil of Loeffler and Fiumara, was formerly a member of the orchestra of the [illegible]ton Opera House.

Americans of Talent

Americans of talent who add fresh blood and, with the other new members, bring invaluable new material into the orchestra are M. Bryant, one of the youngest members of the orchestra, being 23 years of age. He was with the orchestra last season and has had experience as a conductor in leading the concerts of the People's Orchestra in the absence of Mr. Hoffmann.

S. Diamond, a native of Boston, studied with Felix Winternitz, and travelled as concert master with the Victor Herbert operetta companies. He has been a member and soloist of the Boston Sextet Club.

C. Deane, born at Saco, Me., was a member for years of the Boston Festival Orchestra, directed by Emil Mollenhauer, who was himself a member of the Boston Symphony from 1884 to 1889.

C. Stockbridge is a pupil of Mr. Loeffler and a member of the Boston Sextet Club and the Boston Festival Orchestra.

N. Forlani, formerly a member of the St. Louis Orchestra, was drafted for one year at Camp Devens, and then enrolled in the Boston Symphony.

R. Henkle has played with the Boston Opera Orchestra and the Imperial Russian ballet, from which came Mr. Fradkin, concertmaster.

The new concertmaster, Mr. Fradkin, re- [illegible] upon to the Boston public [illegible] the facts of his career and of his solo performances have been told many times in the last few days. Among the oldest members of the band are Messrs. Gerhardt, double-bass (1885); S. Goldstein, violin (1885-); F. Mueller, English horn (1885) and Otto Roth (1887).

Later arrivals are Josef Malkin, the brilliant first 'cellist, who came here in 1914 just after the outbreak of the war. He is a Russian, and was offered the chance, in Germany, of getting out of the country or joining the prison camp for civilians at Ruhleben. The Boston Symphony was then fortunate in securing his services.

Mr. Schroeder, who sits by Mr. Malkin, and was in former years first 'cellist of the orchestra left the orchestra in 1903, as 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet, rejoined it in 1910, left again in 1912, and has returned this season, greeted cordially by old patrons of the orchestra.

Sylvain Noack, the second concertmaster, is a Hollander, who has now been with the Boston Symphony eight years. He is a first prize graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and before he came to America was concertmaster of the Symphony Orchestra at Aix and famous as a player of chamber music. A musician of parts, an able leader, Mr. Noack has won distinction as a leading member of the orchestra and as soloist. Albert Sand, first clarinet, is a Russian who came to Boston in the fall of 1914 as successor to Gorges Grisez, the latter having been called to military duty in France. Mr. Sand, a gifted player on his instrument, is a graduate of the Moscow Conservatory.

Of S. [illegible]mann, the excellent tympanist of the orchestra, Arturo Toscanini, one of the foremost conductors of the world, said: "He has in his drumsticks the spirit of a genius." One could gossip for columns of these and other representative figures of the orchestra, did space permit.

Old faces and new, the Boston orchestra remains in spirit and in performance the body which it has been for many years. The new blood has freshened the organization without depriving it, as some feared it would, of its tonal excellences and its "esprit de corps." It also retained its public and bids fair to add to it from season to season. And that is the test of the vitality and importance of a public institution: the manner in which it survives periods of upheaval, and changing standards. The orchestra looks to [illegible] on new horizons, the richer for its recent ex[illegible]ces.

Symphony

(The personnel is sho[illegible]

1—A. Ribarsch, 1st violin.
2—W. Traupe, 1st violin.
3—A. Bak, 1st violin.
4—E. Pak, 1st violin.
5—F. Mahn, 1st violin.
6—J. Di Natale, 1st violin.
7—A. Holy, harp.
8—H. Sauvlet, 1st violin.
9—K. Rissland, 1st violin.
10—J. Theodorowicz, 1st violin.
11—M. Grunberg, 1st violin.
12—T. Cella, harp.
13—A. Villani, bass.
14—H. Goldstein, 1st violin.
15—O. Roth, 1st violin.
16—A. Snow, organist.
17—B. Fabrizio, 'cello.
18—M. Belinski, 'cello.
19—A. Gerardi, 1st violin.
20—J. Hoffmann, 1st violin.
21—G. Gerhardt, bass.
22—C. Stockbridge, 'cello.
23—C. Barth, 'cello.
24—P. Fradkin, [illegible] master.
25—G. Miquelle, [illegible]
26—S. Noack, 1[illegible]
27—E. Mingels, [illegible]
28—K. Agnosy, [illegible]
29—L. Nast, 'cel[illegible]
30—R. Nagel, 'c[illegible]
31—G. Wendler, [illegible]
32—[illegible]
33—F. Mueller, [illegible]
34—J. Malkin, [illegible]
35—T. Seydel, b[illegible]
36—H. Lorbeer, [illegible]
37—B. Piller, b[illegible]
38—[illegible]
39—C. DeMailly, [illegible]
40—A. Schroede[illegible]
41—E. Huber, b[illegible]
42—P. Hain, F[illegible]
43—E. Mueller, [illegible]
44—G. Lenz, [illegible]
45—A. Brooke, [illegible]
46—[illegible] Italia[illegible]
47—O. Ludwig, [illegible]

PHOTOGRAPHE FOR THE FIRST TIME

Especially for the Boston Sunday Post

ete des Concerts du Conservatoire. He has s a soloist in France and Belgium.

M. Tatas, born at The Hague, studied the ith Spoor and became a member of the Re rchestra before he came to America. Di N talian by birth, has been since his childhoo merica, was a pupil of Loeffler and Fiumara, as formerly a member of the orchestra of the on Opera House.

Americans of Talent

Americans of talent who add fresh blood nds with the other new members, bring invaluable new material into the orchestra are
M. Bryant, one of the youngest members of the rchestra, being 23 years of age. He was with he orchestra last season and has had experience as a conductor in leading the concerts of the People's Orchestra in the absence of Mr. Hoffmann.

S. Diamond, a native of Boston, studied with Felix Winternitz, and travelled as concert master with the Victor Herbert operetta companies.
He has been a member and soloist of the Boston Sextet Club.

C. Deane, born at Saco, Me., was a member for years of the Boston Festival Orchestra, directed by Emil Mollenhauer, who was himself a member of the Boston Symphony from 1884 to 1889.

C. Stockbridge is a pupil of Mr. Loeffler and a member of the Boston Sextet Club and the Boston Festival Orchestra.

N. Forlani, formerly a member of the St.
Louis Orchestra, was drafted for one year at Camp Devens, and then enrolled in the Boston
Symphony.

R. Henkle has played with the Boston Opera Orchestra and the Imperial Russian ballet, from which came Mr. Fradkin, concertmaster.

The new concertmaster, Mr. Fradkin, rethe facts of his career and of his solo perform-nces have been told many times in the last few ays. Among the oldest members of the band e Messrs. Gerhardt, double-bass (1885); S. oldstein, violin (1885-); F. Mueller, English
orn (1885) and Otto Roth (1887).

Later arrivals are Josef Malkin, the brilliant rst 'cellist, who came here in 1914 just after e outbreak of the war. He is a Russian, and as offered the chance, in Germany, of getting ut of the country or joining the prison camp r civilians at Ruhleben. The Boston Symphony as then fortunate in securing his services.

Mr. Schroeder, who sits by Mr. Malkin, and as in former years first 'cellist of the orchesa, left the orchestra in 1903, as 'cellist of the neisel Quartet, rejoined it in 1910, left again 1912, and has returned this season, greeted rdially by old patrons of the orchestra.

Sylvain Noack, the second concertmaster, is Hollander, who has now been with the Bos-Symphony eight years. He is a first prize duate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and e he came to America was concertmaster of Symphony Orchestra at Aix and famous as player of chamber music. A musician of tinct n able leader, Mr. Noack has won disand as a leading member of the orchestra
Russia soloist, Albert Sand, first clarinet, is a as succ who came to Boston in the fall of 1914 been ca r to Gorges Grisez, the latter having Sand, a to military duty in France. Mr.
graduate ed player on his instrument, is a
Of S. the Moscow Conservatory.

orchestra, mann, the excellent tympanist of the conductors ro Toscanini, one of the foremost drumsticks the world, said: "He has in his sip for colum irit of a genius." One could gosfigures of the f these and other representative

Old faces a estra, did space permit.
in spirit and in w, the Boston orchestra remains been for many yormance the body which it has the organization The new blood has freshened feared it would, out depriving it, as some "esprit de corps," its tonal excellences and its bids fair to add to also retained its public and that is the test of thom season to season. And public institution: the ality and importance of a periods of upheaval, ner in which it survives
The orchestra looks and changing standards.
richer for its recent ex on new horizons, the ces.

Symphony Orchestra of Today

(The personnel is shown by the above diagram and following ulation.)

1—A. Ribarsch, 1st violin.
2—W. Traupe, 1st violin.
3—A. Bak, 1st violin.
4—E. Tak, 1st violin.
5—F. Mahn, 1st violin.
6—J. Di Natale, 1st violin.
7—A. Holy, harp.
8—H. Sauvlet, 1st violin.
9—K. Rissland, 1st violin.
10—J. Theodorowicz, 1st violin.
11—M. Grunberg, 1st violin.
12—T. Cella, harp.
13—A. Villani, bass.
14—H. Goldstein, 1st violin.
15—O. Roth, 1st violin.
16—A. Snow, organist.
17—E. Fabrizio, 'cello.
18—M. Belinski, 'cello.
19—A. Gerardi, 1st violin.
20—J. Hoffmann, 1st violin.
21—G. Gerhardt, bass.
22—C. Stockbridge, 'cello.
23—C. Barth, 'cello.
24—F. Fradkin, 1st violin, concert-master.
25—G. Miquelle, 'cello.
26—S. Noack, 1st violin.
27—E. Mingels, 'cello.
28—K. Agnesy, bass.
29—L. Nast, 'cello.
30—R. Nagel, 'cello.
31—G. Wendler, French horn.
32—A. Fuchsmann, contra bassoon.
33—F. Mueller, English horn.
34—J. Malkin, 'cello.
35—F. Seydel, bass.
36—H. Lorbeer, French horn.
37—B. Piller, bassoon.
38—[illegible], oboe.
39—C. DeMailly, flute.
40—A. Schroeder, 'cello.
41—E. Huber, bass.
42—F. Hain, French horn.
43—E. Mueller, bassoon.
44—G. Longy, oboe.
45—A. Brooke, flute.
46—Pierre Rabaud, conductor.
47—O. Ludwig, bass.
48—W. Gebhardt, French
49—A. Laus, bassoon.
50—A. Sand, clarinet.
51—W. Knight, flute.
52—R. Schurig, bass.
53—H. Hubner, French hor
54—H. Stanislaus, oboe.
55—A. Mattles, piccolo.
56—F. Wittmann, viola.
57—A. Vanaud, clarinet.
58—C. [illegible], viol
59—A. Resch, French horn
60—[illegible] Stoverud, bass cl 61—A. Berlin, viola.
62—S. Neumann, tympani.
63—P. Schwerley, viola.
64—M. Hess, French horn.
65—C. Van Wynbergen, vi
66—H. Werner, viola.
67—B. Friedler, violin.
68—C. Gardner, tympani.
69—L. Kloepfel, trumpet.
70—H. v. Veen, viola.
71—M. Tartas, viola.
72—F. Thillois, 2d violin.
73—G. Nappi, trumpet.
74—H. Burkhardt, percussion.
75—P. Mattersteig, tuba.
76—J. Mann, trumpet, also librarian.
77—A. Langley, viola.
78—R. Ringwall, 2d violin.
79—F. Zahn, percussion.
80—L. Kenfield, trombone.
81—G. Helm, trumpet.
82—A. Fielder, viola.
83—S. Spoor, 2d violin.
84—C. Ludwig, percussion.
85—G. Fielder, 2d violin.
86—R. Henkle, 2d violin.
87—A. Manseduch, trombone.
88—F. Sordillo, trombone.
89—R. Kurth, 2d violin.
90—S. Goldstein, 2d violin.
91—L. Zsiga, 2d violin.
92—S. Diamond, 2d violin.
93—M. Bryant, 2d violin.
94—R. Gunderson, 2d violin.
95—J. Balas, 2d violin.
96—C. Deane, 2d violin.
97—A. Jaeger, bass.

Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1882-83

Under Georg Henschel in Its Second Season of Organization

(Pictured below with diagram of personnel above.)

1—A. Goldstein, bass, D.
2—Wilhelm Mueller, cello, D.
3—H. A. Greene, bass, D.
4—Alex. Heindl, cello.
5—L. Jennewein, bass, D.
6—Ernst Jonas, cello, D.
7—G. Dannreuther, 1st violin, D.
8—L. E. Manoly, bass.
9—A. P. F. Suck, cello.
10—L. Lichtenberg, 1st violin.
11—Louis Schmidt, Jr., 1st violin.
12—J. W. Dehn, 1st violin.
13—F. Listemann, 1st violin.
14—Daniel Kuntz, 1st violin.
15—Paul Eltz, bassoon, D.
16—Charles Higgins, 1st violin.
17—John Behr, 1st violin.
18—B. Listemann, concert master.
19—A. B. Stockbridge, cello, D.
20—Carl Schumann, horn.
21—C. Diessch, bassoon.
22—Edward Beyer, viola.
23—C. M. Loeffler, 1st violin.
24—Julius Akeroyd, 1st violin.
25—Louis Lippoldt, horn, D.
26—A. Messerschmidt, bass, D.
27—A. Hackerbarth, horn.
28—P. Metzger, clarinet.
29—Theo. Human, 1st violin.
30—G. A. Patz, viola.
31—Edward Schormann, horn.
32—E. Strasser, clarinet.
33—H. Heindl, viola.
34—C. J. Weitz, viola, D.
35—Georg Henschel, conductor.
36—B. Bowren, trumpet.
37—Wilhelm Ross, oboe.
38—W. Rietzel, viola.
39—E. von Ette, viola, D.
40—H. D. Simpson, tympani, D.
41—E. M. Bagley, trumpet, D.
42—Paul Fox, flute.
43—Louis Post, viola.
44—Alex. Freygang, harp, D.
45—David Moore, trombone.
46—Hugo Hemman, oboe.
47—R. E. Tower, viola.
48—F. A. Oliver, 2d violin.
49—W. C. Nichols, tuba, also librarian, D.
50—Albert Rigg, trombone, D.
51—George Stewart, trombone.
52—E. M. Heindl, flute, D.
53—H. Haldemann, 2d violin, D.
54—C. Trautmann, 2d violin, D.
55—J. Eichler, 2d violin, D.
56—C. Eichler, 2d violin, D.
57—J. B. Procter, 2d violin.
58—E. Marble, 2d violin.
59—Erich Loeffler, 'cello, D.
60—H. J. Butler, bass.
61—W. W. Swornsbourne, 2d violin.
62—Vincent Akeroyd, 2d violin.
63—Adolph Grethen, 2d violin.
64—Max Korth, 'cello, D.
65—J. Bletterman, bass.
66—August Stein, bass, D.
67—Ernst Schmidt, 'cello, D.
68—Frank Schuchmann, 2d violin.
69—Ernst Jonas, 'cello, D.
70—Carl Behr, 'cello.
71—George Barcklier, bass.

D indicates deceased.

he Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1882-1883, the second season of its organization.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
4.5 mm 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Edited by KATHARINE LYONS

REAL MUSIC LOVERS—RAIN OR SHINE

Rachmaninoff With Symphony

Sergei Rachmaninoff, a commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday. The soloist originally announced, Arthur Rubinstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement.

Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto, which he played with the Boston Symphony in 1909. The preliminary number at this concert will be the entr'acte of the opera "Messidor," which Mr. Rabaud's contemporary, Alfred Bruneau, wrote to the words of Zola. Brahms' second symphony in D major will comprise the last section of the programme.

Rachmaninoff Soloist at Week's Symphony Concerts

By the inability of Arthur Rubinstein, the pianist, to reach this country from South America in time to appear with the orchestra here on Friday and Saturday, the Boston public gains probably a rarer pleasure in the promised appearance in his place of Mr Rachmaninoff.

The question was naturally raised in many minds immediately after his sensational first Sunday afternoon concert of his possible appearance at the Symphony concerts this season. Contracts were made and there seemed little likelihood of it, except in the event of just such an emergency as this. That the great Russian will be heard with the liveliest interest may naturally follow the overwhelming impression left by his recitals.

He will play his own concerto in C minor. It was the same which the pianist played nine seasons ago here with the orchestra, the day he made doubly memorable by his masterful conducting of his tone poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The concerto will be preceded by an entr'acte to Alfred Bruneau's opera "Messidor." Bruneau, the critic of Le Matin, had his ballet "Les Bacchantes" produced at the Opera, Paris, late in October, 1912, which was considered the equal of his operas, "Le Reve," "L'Attague du Moulin" (produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company) and "Messidor." Mr Rachmaninoff's concerto will be followed by Brahm's second symphony.

RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST WITH OUR ORCHESTRA

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, will appear as soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming week. Arthur Rubenstein, the pianist, who was to have appeared with the orchestra, having been unable to reach this country, canceled his engagement.

The substitution of Mr. Rachmaninoff will add lustre to the Symphony's season. The Russian is the outstanding figure of the musical season. His two recital appearances have revealed him as one of the most interesting pianist of the hour.

Mr. Rachmaninoff will play his own C minor concerto, which he played with the orchestra in 1909. On the program will also stand Brahms' Second Symphony in D major and Bruneau's Entr-acte of his opera, "Messidor," composed to the words of Zola.

Waiting for the Coveted "Rush Seats" at Symphony

Here are the Real Music Lovers of Boston! Their love of music is so deep and sincere that they are willing to stand in line for hours in any kind of weather in order to obtain the coveted "rush" seats at the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concerts.

This is a musical club which has neither president or treasurer, with a membership strictly limited to 505 seats which, from time immemorial in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been reserved for them. When this number is sold no more are admitted from the waiting line. After that you could not buy your way into this select company at any price. The membership for the afternoon is complete.

There are all sorts and conditions of people to be found among the Real Music Lovers of Boston, who assemble on Symphony Hall steps. In age they range all the way from the young Conservatory student to the gray-haired man who remembers the orchestra before Symphony Hall was built. You will find men and women from almost every walk in life and even boys and girls waiting patiently in rain or sunshine—all animated by one desire—to hear good music. Nowadays every Friday sees quite a number of returned soldiers and sailors among the company.

The line begins to form as early as 11:30. Many bring their lunch, often their knitting; almost always something to read to while away the time. By 1 o'clock the steps of Symphony Hall are filled with the long line doubling back and forth. When all this space is taken the line extends along Huntington avenue to Gainsboro street. When it is long enough to reach around the corner into Gainsboro street experienced music lovers know that the number has been reached and that all possibility of securing a "rush seat" is over for that day.

It's an exceedingly interesting, as well as interested crowd, these Real Music Lovers of Boston. Every one is good natured, everyone waits patiently, everyone knows the "rules of the club" and the line forms and moves with quiet orderliness. Promptly at 1:30 the great doors are open and in 10 minutes more the long line has disappeared, filing slowly past a table where each one places his 28 cents (25 cents plus the war tax) and receives a card of admission. Every seat is filled and the Real Music Lovers of Boston settle down contentedly to another hour's wait before the concert begins.

Rachmaninoff Symphony Soloist

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF, commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts this week. Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto, which he played with the Boston Symphony in 1909.

The preliminary number at this concert will be the entr'acte of the opera "Messidor," which Mr. Rabaud's contemporary, Alfred Bruneau, wrote to the words of Zola. Brahms' second symphony in D major will comprise the last section of the program.

HOFMANN RECITAL.

PART TWO

Concerts

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BRINGING BACK WAGNER TO OUR CONCERTS

Conditions in Boston and Precedent in Other Cities Where His Music Is Already Restored—"The Flonzaleys" and a Quartet by d'Indy—Again No Opera for This Town—Mr. Gabrilowitsch Impresses Chicago as Conductor—Mr. Kreisler's Return to the Stage

BEFORE long the trustees or the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, or, more probably, both in conference, must decide whether or not the music of Wagner is to be heard anew at the Symphony Concerts. The Philharmonic Society and Mr. Stransky, the Symphony Society and Mr. Damrosch in New York have already restored it to usual place in their programmes. Their audiences have heard it gladly, applausively; the reviewers, for the most part, have listened to it in tranquil or pleasured routine; the only sign of objection in the concert-hall has been the somewhat ostentatious departure from it, when a Wagnerian number was at hand, of a few affronted or aggrieved spirits. In spite of rumor to the contrary, not a word of protest has come from without. None of the guardians of the public virtue from Teutonic taint have recorded condemnatory resolutions, and none, by testimony of their spokesmen, is likely to do so. Nobody has "manifested," as the French say, in or out of the concert-room. Even indignant or applauding "letters to the editor" have been few in the newspaper-offices. Almost in routine Wagner's music has returned to the active concert repertory in New York; while it passes for open secret that two or three of his operas will be restored to the stage of the Metropolitan next season, probably with an Italian text. If word from Philadelphia runs truly, Mr. Stokowski is soon to reestablish Wagner in the concerts of his orchestra, while sundry conductors in cities of the Middle West are like-minded. Here in Boston, moreover, fragments of Wagner's operas were heard last summer at the Pop Concerts with intent interest and hearty applause, without a sign of objection from any quarter. And so it goes.

From the days of Henschel through the days of Muck, the public of the Symphony Concerts has heard the music of Wagner often and gladly. His overtures and preludes, transferable fragments from his operas, his miscellaneous pieces like the "Siegfried Idyl" have been part of the staple repertory of the Boston Orchestra. Among the present audiences on Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, it is easy to find those eager to hear Wagner's music again and also those who are still in a fury against all things that they judge "modern German." The detached inquirer may not assuredly say which view preponderates; while the advocates of either may readily find the desired aid and comfort. Certainly, Mr. Rabaud would be good to hear in the music of Wagner; certainly his programmes would be the richer for the inclusion of it. He excelled in it in his days at the Opéra in Paris; in Boston he has given proof of his mettle with it in music so obviously written under Wagnerian influence and example as d'Indy's "Wallenstein," his own "Procession Nocturne," Lalo's recent Rhapsody. Through the more conservative French music of the last quarter of the nineteenth century, to which the conductor inclines, almost always runs the Wagnerian trail. He and his orchestra warm to such pieces; his audience applauds them; yet the Wagner who murmurs through them we may not hear in his own full voice.

If Mr. Rabaud were to set a symphony of Brahms on a programme, as Mr. Monteux proposed to do, his hearers would probably welcome it; yet the "banned" Wagner was Brahms's contemporary. It is hard to believe that a composer who died in 1883 had much hand in a war thirty years afterward; it is well to remember that copyright and royalty upon every measure of Wagner's music has long since expired; that each and every one of his operas, except "Parsifal," is forty or fifty or sixty years old; that the power and the beauty of his music are as unquestioned the world around as those of Beethoven's own. But Wagner, who was not by nature a man of taste and poise, wrote a silly skit upon the downfall of Paris in the Franco-Prussian war called "Ein Kapitulation," which then nobody read and now nobody recalls except as a weapon of controversy. Which of us, moreover, in four years of war has not at moments spoken or written folly?

H. T. P.

REAL MUSIC LOVERS—RAIN OR SHINE

Waiting for the Coveted "Rush Seats" at Symphony

Here are the Real Music Lovers of Boston! Their love of music is so deep and sincere that they are willing to stand in line for hours in any kind of weather in order to obtain the coveted "rush" seats at the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concerts.

This is a musical club which has neither president or treasurer, with a membership strictly limited to 55 seats which, from time immemorial in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been reserved for them. When this number is sold no more are admitted from the waiting line. After that you could not buy your way into this select company at any price. The membership for the afternoon is complete.

There are all sorts and conditions of people to be found among the Real Music Lovers of Boston, who assemble on Symphony Hall steps. In age they range all the way from the young Conservatory student to the gray-haired man who remembers the orchestra before Symphony Hall was built. You will find men and women from almost every walk in life and even boys and girls waiting patiently in rain or sunshine—all animated by one desire—to hear good music. Nowadays every Friday sees quite a number of returned soldiers and sailors among the company.

The line begins to form as early as 11:30. Many bring their lunch, others their knitting; almost always something to read to while away the time. By 1 o'clock the steps of Symphony Hall are filled with the long line doubling back and forth. When all this space is taken the line extends along Huntington avenue to Gainsboro street. When it is long enough to reach around the corner into Gainsboro street experienced music lovers know that the number has been reached and that all possibility of [illegible] for that day.

[illegible] Lovers of Boston. [illegible] and the [illegible] open [illegible] great doors are open and the [illegible] rushing [illegible] the place [illegible] war has [illegible] Music [illegible] contendings [illegible]

RACHMANINOFF SOLOIST WITH OUR ORCHESTRA

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, will appear as soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming week. Arthur Rubinstein, the pianist, who was to have appeared with the orchestra, having been unable to reach this country, cancelled his engagement.

The substitution of Mr. Rachmaninoff will add lustre to the Symphony's season. The Russian is the outstanding figure of the musical season. His two recital appearances have revealed him as one of the most interesting pianist of the hour.

Mr. Rachmaninoff will play his own C minor concerto, which he played with the orchestra in 1909. On the program will also stand Brahms' Second Symphony in D major and Bruneau's Entr'acte of his opera, "Messidor," composed to the words of Zola.

Rachmaninoff Symphony Soloist

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF, commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts this week. Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto, which he played with the Boston Symphony in 1909.

The preliminary number at this concert will be the entr'acte of the opera "Messidor," which Mr. Rabaud's contemporary, Alfred Bruneau, wrote to the words of Zola. Brahms' second symphony in D major will comprise the last section of the program.

HOFMANN RECITAL

PART TWO

Concerts

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BRINGING BACK WAGNER TO OUR CONCERTS

Conditions in Boston and Precedent in Other Cities Where His Music Is Already Restored—"The Flonzaleys" and a Quartet by d'Indy—Again No Opera for This Town—Mr. Gabrilowitsch Impresses Chicago as Conductor—Mr. Kreisler's Return to the Stage

BEFORE long the trustees or the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, or, more probably, both in conference, must decide whether or not the music of Wagner is to be heard anew at the Symphony Concerts. The Philharmonic Society and Mr. Stransky, the Symphony Society and Mr. Damrosch in New York have already restored it to usual place in their programmes. Their audiences have heard it gladly, applausively; the reviewers, for the most part, have listened to it in tranquil or pleasured routine; the only sign of objection in the concert-hall has been the somewhat ostentatious departure from it, when a Wagnerian number was at hand, of a few affronted or aggrieved spirits. In spite of rumor to the contrary, not a word of protest has come from without. None of the guardians of the public virtue from Teutonic taint have recorded condemnatory resolutions, and none, by testimony of their spokesmen, is likely to do so. Nobody has "manifested," as the French say, in or out of the concert-room. Even indignant or applauding "letters to the editor" have been few in the newspaper-offices. Almost in routine Wagner's music has returned to the active concert repertory in New York; while it passes for open secret that two or three of his operas will be restored to the stage of the Metropolitan next season, probably with an Italian text. If word from Philadelphia runs true, Mr. Stokowski is soon to reestablish Wagner in the concerts of his orchestra, while sundry conductors in cities of the Middle West are like-minded. Here in Boston, moreover, fragments of Wagner's operas were heard last summer at the Pop Concerts with intent interest and hearty applause, without a sign of objection from any quarter. And so it [illegible]

From the days of Henschel through the days of Muck, the public of the Symphony Concerts has heard the music of Wagner often and gladly. His overtures and preludes, transferable fragments from his operas, his miscellaneous pieces like the "Siegfried Idyl" have been part of the regular repertory of the Boston Orchestra. Among the present audiences on Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, it is easy to find those eager to hear Wagner's music [illegible] also those who are still in a fury against all things that they judge "Western German." The detached inquirer [illegible] assuredly say which view predominates; while the advocates of either may readily find the desired aid and comfort. Certainly, Mr. Rabaud would be good to hear in the music of Wagner; certainly his programmes would be the richer for the inclusion of it. He excelled in it in his days at the Opéra in Paris; in Boston he has given proof of his mettle with it in music so obviously written under Wagnerian influence and example as d'Indy's "Wallenstein," his own "Procession Nocturne," Lalo's recent Rhapsody. Through the more conservative French music of the last quarter of the nineteenth century, to which the conductor inclines, almost always runs the Wagnerian trail. He and his orchestra warm to such pieces; his audience applands them; yet the Wagner who murmurs through them we may not hear in his own full voice.

If Mr. Rabaud were to set a symphony of Brahms on a programme, as Mr. Monteux proposed to do, his hearers would probably welcome it; yet the "banned" Wagner was Brahms's contemporary. It is hard to believe that a composer who died in 1883 had much hand in a war thirty years afterward; it is well to remember that copyright and royalty upon every measure of Wagner's music has long since expired; that each and every one of his operas, except "Parsifal," is forty or fifty or sixty years old; that the power and the beauty of his music are as unquestioned the world around as those of Beethoven's own. But Wagner, who was not by nature a man of taste and poise, wrote a silly skit upon the downfall of Paris in the Franco-Prussian war called "Ein Kapitulation," which then nobody read and now nobody recalls except as a weapon of controversy. Which of us, moreover, in four years of war has not at moments spoken or written folly?

H. T. P.

Rachmaninoff With Symphony

Sergei Rachmaninoff, a commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday. The soloist originally announced, Arthur Rubinstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement.

Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto, which he played with the Boston Symphony in 1909. The preliminary number at this concert will be the entr'acte of the opera "Messidor," which Mr. Rabaud's contemporary, Alfred Bruneau, wrote to the words of Zola. Brahms' second symphony in D major will comprise the last section of the program.

Rachmaninoff Soloist at Week's Symphony Concerts

By the inability of Arthur Rubinstein, the pianist, to reach this country from South America in time to appear with the orchestra here on Friday and Saturday, the Boston public gains probably a rarer pleasure in the promised appearance in his place of Mr. Rachmaninoff.

The question was naturally raised in many minds immediately after his sensational first Sunday afternoon concert of his possible appearance at the Symphony concerts this season. Contracts were made and there seemed little likelihood of it, except in the event of just such an emergency as this. That the great Russian will be heard with the liveliest interest may naturally follow the overwhelming impression left by his recitals.

He will play his own concerto in C minor. It was the same which the pianist played nine seasons ago here with the orchestra, the day he made doubly memorable by his masterful conducting of his tone poem, "The Isle of the Dead." The concerto will be preceded by an entr'acte to Alfred Bruneau's opera "Messidor." Bruneau, the critic of Le Matin and his ballet "Les Bacchantes" produced at the Opera, Paris, late in October, 1912, which was considered the equal of his operas, "Le Reve," "L'Attaque du Moulin" produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company and "Messidor." Mr. Rachmaninoff's concerto will be followed by Brahms's second symphony.

REDUCTION RATIO

13x

2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

RUSSIA CONTRIBUTES THE TWO SENSATIONS OF THE MUSICAL WORLD

(Photographs Copyright by Mishkin.)

SERGE RACHMANINOFF, THE PIANIST

JASCHA HEIFETZ, THE VIOLINIST

MORNING TELEGRAPH
dress: New York City
te

Jan 29. WORCESTER DAILY TELEGRAM

SYMPNONY ORCHESTRA AND MISS ALCOCK DELIGHT 1500

Last night's concert in Mechanics hall, the third in the Ellis series, proved an occasion of exceptional delight to lovers of music in Worcester, fully 1500 of whom turned out to welcome the Boston symphony orchestra on its first and only appearance of the season in Worcester.

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the orchestra, made a strong impression on those who witnessed his directing of the symphony for the first time. Tall, thin, almost cadaverous, he carries himself well and with an imposing dignity. And when he leads the orchestra he does so from the tip of his baton, and with every inch of his six feet and over.

The personnel of the orchestra is changed to a considerable extent, but there were many familiar faces in the ranks of the musicians. The quality of the symphony is all there, however, and improved, if improvement is possible. At least, it may be said that the effect was different under a new conductor, and it was all most thoroly enjoyed by music lovers present.

Assisting artist with the orchestra was Merle Alcock, contralto. This was Miss Alcock's second formal appearance in Worcester, altho she confesses also to one previous visit that was made, however, before her name had become one that is familiar to lovers of music in every section of the country. Those who heard Miss Alcock as soloist in the 1915 Worcester music festival, commented upon the marvelous growth and improvement of her voice in these three short years. She was good then, but now she is superb.

Miss Alcock has acquired wonderful breadth and timbre of voice. Her tones are absolutely pleasing thruout her wide register, and she sings with true artistry. In addition to her lovely voice she is possessed of a charming personality and she completely won her listeners last night.

Miss Alcock's numbers, with the orchestra, included the recitative and aria, "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," and the aria, "O don fatale," from Verdis opera, "Don Carlos."

Beethoven's lengthy and grand "Symphony number 3, in E flat major," better known as his "Eroica" symphony, was the first offering of the orchestra. In noble music, it tells the life and death of a noble man. The symphony consists of four parts: Allegro con brio, marcia funebre and adagio assai; scherzo, allegro vivace and trio, and the finale, allegro molto. Possibly the most notable change, with the exception of the conductor, was the presence of F. Fradkin, as concertmaster, in place of Anton Witek, who has played first violin here so many years.

The symphony requires a full hour for performance. It was followed by a 10-minute intermission, and then came Miss Alcock with the Handel air. She returned again and again, to smile and bow her acknowledgments of the generous plaudits accorded her both at the close of this and her next number. Before the Italian aria, the orchestra played the prelude to the second act of the opera, "Gwendoline," by Chabrier. This prelude is dreamy, romantic music, presenting two prominent themes which are worked out alternately.

The closing number of the program was the overture, "Le carnival Romain," Berlioz, a brilliant composition that formed a fitting close to a brilliant concert.

The next concert, the fifth and last in the Ellis series for the season 1918-1919, will present John McCormack, noted tenor, and one of the biggest attractions of the American concert stage. This will take place in Mechanics hall, the night of Feb. 18.

Boston Symphony Next Week.

At the next Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 6, Mr. Rabaud will conduct Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. As to his ability with Beethoven, Boston considered this a more exacting test than the "Eroica" or the "Eighth," which he has already presented, and a triumphant affirmation. Philip Hale wrote in the Herald:

"Mr. Rabaud gave a remarkably impressive interpretation of the Fifth Symphony. We do not remember one that has equalled it in dramatic intensity and in nobility. Believing that this symphony is the 'summit of music,' to quote his own words—he did not have to depart from Beethoven's text or inject foreign spirit into the symphony to gain magnificent effects. Again he revealed himself as a born and accomplished musician among conductors, as a skilful and imaginative conductor among musicians. His reverence for Beethoven was not obsequious. He did not turn the concert hall into a theatre. . . . It would not be easy to say which movement, as played yesterday, moved most the soul of the audience; yet the Scherzo had a new meaning; the wonderful transition to the tumultuous joy of the finale was managed in masterly manner, and—oh crowning triumph!—the interest in the finale never flagged after the first glorious outburst."

A notable revival on the same program will be four orchestral movements which Franck arranged from his choral symphonic poem "Psyche." The other two numbers are also French—Chabrier's prelude to the second act of his opera "Gwendoline," and Lalo's riotous rhapsody in A major, built from Norwegian themes.

The program for Saturday afternoon is headed by Brahms's Second Symphony in D major. The second part, as on Thursday's program, will be exclusively French—the incidental music which Faure wrote for Harancourt's "Shylock," Saint-Saens's second symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carneval Romain."

the heart, iift it is playing that satisfies the musicians and, if all signs are true, the layman

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony concerts for Feb. 14 and 15 (this week the orchestra will travel) abound in special events. Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master, will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto in E minor, announced for an earlier date and postponed. When he played this concerto on the last southern trip, each city received him with warm enthusiasm. His tone, his ease, vitality—all made their mark.

There will be another soloist, Arthur Hackett, who will sing the tenor solo parts in a Suite of Faure written to Harancourt's "Shylock," recently obtained from France through our government. A noteworthy revival will be Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," in four movements—a work of large proportions and high aspirations; as well considered in France as it has been neglected in this country. There will also be two shorter French pieces—the prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and Berlioz's overture, "The Ro...

RACHMANINOFF IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Rachmaninoff dominated the concert by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The audience could think of little else until the great Russian pianist appeared, was thrilled by his playing of his own second concerto, and then rejoiced at its good fortune, once he had left the stage. Rachmaninoff, however, has been heard to better advantage alone.

Mr. Rabaud gave a beautiful reading of the Brahms second symphony, in many respects the best Boston has enjoyed. It was a good start for his initial placing of Brahms on his programs.

There will be no concerts the coming week as the orchestra makes a southern

RUSSIA CONTRIBUTES THE TWO SENSATIONS OF THE MUSICAL WORLD

(Photographs Copyright by Mishkin.)

SERGE RACHMANINOFF, THE PIANIST

JASCHA HEIFETZ, THE VIOLINIST

MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

WORCESTER DAILY TELEGRAM

SYMPNONY ORCHESTRA AND MISS ALCOCK DELIGHT 1500

Last night's concert in Mechanics hall, the third in the Ellis series, proved an occasion of exceptional delight to lovers of music in Worcester, fully 1500 of whom turned out to welcome the Boston symphony orchestra on its first and only appearance of the season in Worcester.

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the orchestra, made a strong impression on those who witnessed his directing of the symphony for the first time. Tall, thin, almost cadaverous, he carries himself well and with an imposing dignity. And when he leads the orchestra he does so from the tip of his baton, and with every inch of his six feet and over.

The personnel of the orchestra is changed to a considerable extent, but there were many familiar faces in the ranks of the musicians. The quality of the symphony is all there, however, and improved, if improvement is possible. At least, it may be said that the effect was different under a new conductor, and it was all most thoroly enjoyed by music lovers present.

Assisting artist with the orchestra was Merle Alcock, contralto. This was Miss Alcock's second formal appearance in Worcester, altho she confesses also to one previous visit that was made, however, before her name had become one that is familiar to lovers of music in every section of the country. Those who heard Miss Alcock as soloist in the 1915 Worcester music festival, commented upon the marvelous growth and improvement of her voice in these three short years. She was good then, but now she is superb.

Miss Alcock has acquired wonderful breadth and timbre of voice. Her tones are absolutely pleasing thruout her wide register, and she sings with true artistry. In addition to her lovely voice she is possessed of a charming personality and she completely won her listeners last night.

Miss Alcock's numbers, with the orchestra, included the recitative and aria, "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," and the aria, "O don fatale,' from Verdis opera, "Don Carlos."

Beethoven's lengthy and grand "Symphony number 3, in E flat major," better known as his "Eroica" symphony, was the first offering of the orchestra. In noble music, it tells the life and death of a noble man. The symphony consists of four parts: Allegro con brio, marcia funebre and adagio assai; scherzo, allegro vivace and trio, and the finale, allegro molto. Possibly the most notable change, with the exception of the conductor, was the presence of F. Fradkin, as concertmaster, in place of Anton Witek, who has played first violin here so many years.

The symphony requires a full hour for performance. It was followed by a 10-minute intermission, and then came Miss Alcock with the Handel air. She returned again and again, to smile and bow her acknowledgments of the generous plaudits accorded her both at the close of this and her next number. Before the Italian aria, the orchestra played the prelude to the second act of the opera, "Gwendoline," by Chabrier. This prelude is dreamy, romantic music, presenting two prominent themes which are worked out alternately.

The closing number of the program was the overture, "Le carnival Romain," Berlioz, a brilliant composition that formed a fitting close to a brilliant concert.

The next concert, the fifth and last in the Ellis series for the season 1918-1919, will present John McCormack, noted tenor, and one of the biggest attractions of the American concert stage. This will take place in Mechanics hall, the night of Feb. 18.

Boston Symphony Next Week.

At the next Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 6, Mr. Rabaud will conduct Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. As to his ability with Beethoven, Boston considered this a more exacting test than the "Eroica" or the "Eighth," which he has already presented, and a triumphant affirmation. Philip Hale wrote in the Herald:

"Mr. Rabaud gave a remarkably impressive interpretation of that fifth symphony. We do not remember one that has equalled it in dramatic intensity and in nobility. Believing that this symphony is the 'summit of music,' to quote his own words, he did not hesitate to depart from Beethoven's text or inject foreign spirit into the symphony to gain magnificent effects. Again he revealed himself as a born and accomplished musician among conductors, as a skillful and imaginative conductor among musicians. His reverence for Beethoven was not obsequious. He did not turn the concert hall into a theatre. . . . How would not be easy to say which movement, as played yesterday, moved most the soul of the audience; yet the Scherzo had a new meaning; the wonderful transition to the tumultuous joy of the finale was managed in masterly manner, and—oh crowning triumph! the interest in the finale never flagged after the first glorious outburst."

A notable revival on the same program will be four orchestral movements which Franck arranged from his choral symphonic poem "Psyche." The other two numbers are also French—Chabrier's prelude to the second act of his opera "Gwendoline," and Lalo's glorious rhapsody in A major, built from Norwegian themes.

The program for Saturday afternoon is headed by Brahms's Second Symphony in D major. The second part, as on Thursday's program, will be exclusively French—the incidental music which Faure wrote for Harancourt's "Shylock," Saint-Saens's second symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carneval Romain."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

RACHMANINOFF IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Rachmaninoff dominated the concert by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The audience could think of little else until the great Russian pianist appeared, was thrilled by his playing of his own second concerto, and then rejoiced at its good fortune, once he had left the stage. Rachmaninoff, however, has been heard to better advantage alone.

Mr. Rabaud gave a beautiful reading of the Brahms second symphony, in many respects the best Boston has enjoyed. It was a good start for his initial placing of Brahms on his programs.

There will be no concerts the coming [illegible] as the orchestra makes a southern

Feb. 1

92

SPRING AND THE NE
CLOTHES TO OUR SA

MILADY'S THOUGHTS LIGHTLY TURN TO CLOTHES. MIDNIGHT BLUE CHIFFON VELVET COMBINED WITH GEORGETTE CREPE EMBROIDERED IN PLUM-COLORED BEADS AND SILK FORM A CHARMING AFTERNOON GOWN.

RABAUD GIVES FIRST BRAHMS AT SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff the Soloist In His Own Concerto

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Henri Rabaud, conductor; Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, soloist. Thirteenth concert of the season. The program:—

Bruneau—Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor."
Rachmaninoff—Concerto, No. 2, C minor.
Brahms—Symphony, No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.

With the D major symphony Mr. Rabaud conducted his first Brahms in Boston. Of course he chose the second symphony, the one that all music lovers enjoy whether they enjoy all Brahms or not. How can anyone help enjoying this tender, delicate, melodious work? Writing of the work, Brahms himself said, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony." "Pretty symphony" is a decidedly offensive combination of words, yet in its tenderness, the charm of the minuet tempo in the scherzo and in its general serenity it almost gives the impression of prettiness. We say, "Who can help enjoying this symphony?" Some can. Mr. Hale reminds us that Joncières said it was full of brushwood and that Pougin found it childish. To most of us there are few bars of the brushwood that ought to be spared and the childishness is delightful, golden beauty. Mr. Weingartner thinks that in no other Brahms work the stream of invention flows so fresh and spontaneous and nowhere else has he colored his orchestration so successfully. Mr. Rabaud gave a singing performance of the symphony, never aiming to make big effects or painting too high colors.

Mr. Rachmaninoff stands in the popular fancy this season somewhere between Mme. Galli-Curci and Mr. Heifetz. He is a "hit." From the suburbs and from the country the music lovers and curiosity seekers, who go to the concert hall only when the artist who is featured in the news columns and the Sunday supplements performs are coming to town to hear Mr. Rachmaninoff. He is a great artist as well as a popular artist. His qualities as a pianist have been somewhat lengthily discussed here.

Yesterday he played the C minor concerto, which he played here with the orchestra when he debuted in Boston in 1909. It was rather regretable that he did not choose one of his concertos unfamiliar to Bostonians, the F-sharp minor or the D minor, but his second concerto yesterday again, impressed one as a beautifully written, beautifully played work. Unlike so many of Mr. Rachmininoff's compositions for the piano it impresses one as lacking in emotional appeal. First, last and always as composer and as pianist, he is an intellectual rather than a sentimentalist. This makes his enormous popular appeal rather had to analyse. When Mr. Rachmaninoff plays there is no opportunity for the matinee recital girls to work themselves into emotional fits. The playing is of the head, not the heart, but it is playing that satisfies the musicians and, if all signs are true, the layman

Jan 29. WORCESTER DAILY TELEGRAM

SYMPNONY ORCHESTRA AND MISS ALCOCK DELIGHT 1500

Last night's concert in Mechanics hall, the third in the Ellis series, proved an occasion of exceptional delight to lovers of music in Worcester, fully 1500 of whom turned out to welcome the Boston symphony orchestra on its first and only appearance of the season in Worcester.

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the orchestra, made a strong impression on those who witnessed his directing of the symphony for the first time. Tall, thin, almost cadaverous, he carries himself well and with an imposing dignity. And when he leads the orchestra he does so from the tip of his baton, and with every inch of his six feet and over.

The personnel of the orchestra is changed to a considerable extent, but there were many familiar faces in the ranks of the musicians. The quality of the symphony is all there, however, and improved, if improvement is possible. At least, it may be said that the effect was different under a new conductor, and it was all most thoroly enjoyed by music lovers present.

Assisting artist with the orchestra was Merle Alcock, contralto. This was Miss Alcock's second formal appearance in Worcester, altho she confesses also to one previous visit that was made, however, before her name had become one that is familiar to lovers of music in every section of the country. Those who heard Miss Alcock as soloist in the 1915 Worcester music festival, commented upon the marvelous growth and improvement of her voice in these three short years. She was good then, but now she is superb.

Miss Alcock has acquired wonderful breadth and timbre of voice. Her tones are absolutely pleasing thruout her wide register, and she sings with true artistry. In addition to her lovely voice she is possessed of a charming personality and she completely won her listeners last night.

Miss Alcock's numbers, with the orchestra, included the recitative and aria, "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," and the aria, "O don fatale," from Verdis opera, "Don Carlos."

Beethoven's lengthy and grand "Symphony number 3, in E flat major," better known as his "Eroica" symphony, was the first offering of the orchestra. In noble music, it tells the life and death of a noble man. The symphony consists of four parts: Allegro con brio, marcia funebre and adagio assai; scherzo, allegro vivace and trio, and the finale, allegro molto. Possibly the most notable change, with the exception of the conductor, was the presence of F. Fradkin, as concertmaster, in place of Anton Witek, who has played first violin here so many years.

The symphony requires a full hour for performance. It was followed by a 10-minute intermission, and then came Miss Alcock with the Handel air. She returned again and again, to smile and bow her acknowledgments of the generous plaudits accorded her both at the close of this and her next number. Before the Italian aria, the orchestra played the prelude to the second act of the opera, "Gwendoline," by Chabrier. This prelude is dreamy, romantic music, presenting two prominent themes which are worked out alternately.

The closing number of the program was the overture, "Le carnival Romain," Berlioz, a brilliant composition that formed a fitting close to a brilliant concert.

The next concert, the fifth and last in the Ellis series for the season 1918-1919, will present John McCormack, noted tenor, and one of the biggest attractions of the American concert stage. This will take place in Mechanics hall, the night of Feb. 18.

Boston Symphony Next Week.

At the next Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 6, Mr. Rabaud will conduct Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. As to his ability with Beethoven, Boston considered this a more exacting test than the "Eroica" or the "Eighth," which he has already presented, and a triumphant affirmation. Philip Hale wrote in the Herald:

"Mr. Rabaud gave a remarkably impressive interpretation of the Fifth Symphony. We do not remember one that has equalled it in dramatic intensity and in nobility. Believing that this symphony is the 'summit of music,' to quote his own words—he did not have to depart from Beethoven's text or inject a foreign spirit into the symphony to gain magnificent effects. Again he revealed himself as a born and accomplished musician among conductors, as a skilful and imaginative conductor among musicians. His reverence for Beethoven was not obsequious. He did not turn the concert hall into a theatre. . . . It would not be easy to say which movement, as played yesterday, moved most the soul of the audience; yet the Scherzo had a new meaning; the wonderful transition to the tumultuous joy of the finale was managed in masterly manner, and—oh crowning triumph!—the interest in the finale never flagged after the first glorious outburst."

A notable revival on the same program will be four orchestral movements which Franck arranged from his choral symphonic poem "Psyche." The other two numbers are also French—Chabrier's prelude to the second act of his opera "Gwendoline," and Lalo's riotous rhapsody in A major, built from Norwegian themes.

The program for Saturday afternoon is headed by Brahms's Second Symphony in D major. The second part, as on Thursday's program, will be exclusively French—the incidental music which Faure wrote for Harancourt's "Shylock," Saint-Saens's second symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony concerts for Feb. 14 and 15 (this week the orchestra will travel) abound in special events. Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master, will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto in E minor, announced for an earlier date and postponed. When he played this concerto on the last southern trip, each city received him with warm enthusiasm. His tone, his ease, vitality—all made their mark.

There will be another soloist, Arthur Hackett, who will sing the tenor solo parts in a Suite of Faure written to Harancourt's "Shylock," recently obtained from France through our government. A noteworthy revival will be Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," in four movements—a work of large proportions and high aspirations; as well considered in France as it has been neglected in this country. There will also be two shorter French pieces—the prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and Berlioz's overture, "The Ro

RACHMANINOFF IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Rachmaninoff dominated the concert by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The audience could think of little else until the great Russian pianist appeared, was thrilled by his playing of his own second concerto, and then rejoiced at ts good fortune, once he had left the stage. Rachmaninoff, however, has been heard to better advantage alone.

Mr. Rabaud gave a beautiful reading of the Brahms second symphony, in many respects the best Boston has enjoyed. It was a good start for his initial placing of Brahms on his programs.

There will be no concerts the coming w as the orchestra makes a southern

SPRING AND THE NE
CLOTHES TO OUR SA

MILADY'S THOUGHTS LIGHTLY TURN TO CLOTHES. MIDNIGHT BLUE CHIFFON VELVET COMBINED WITH GEORGETTE CREPE EMBROIDERED IN PLUM-COLORED BEADS AND SILK FORM A CHARMING AFTERNOON GOWN.

WORCESTER DAILY TELEGRAM

SYMPNONY ORCHESTRA AND MISS ALCOCK DELIGHT 1500

Last night's concert in Mechanics hall, the third in the Ellis series, proved an occasion of exceptional delight to lovers of music in Worcester, fully 1500 of whom turned out to welcome the Boston symphony orchestra on its first and only appearance of the season in Worcester.

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the orchestra, made a strong impression on those who witnessed his directing of the symphony for the first time. Tall, thin, almost cadaverous, he carries himself well and with an imposing dignity. And when he leads the orchestra he does so from the tip of his baton, and with every inch of his six feet and over.

The personnel of the orchestra is changed to a considerable extent, but there were many familiar faces in the ranks of the musicians. The quality of the symphony is all there, however, and improved, if improvement is possible. At least, it may be said that the effect was different under a new conductor, and it was all most thoroly enjoyed by music lovers present.

Assisting artist with the orchestra was Merle Alcock, contralto. This was Miss Alcock's second formal appearance in Worcester, altho she confesses also to one previous visit that was made, however, before her name had become one that is familiar to lovers of music in every section of the country. Those who heard Miss Alcock as soloist in the 1915 Worcester music festival, commented upon the marvelous growth and improvement of her voice in these three short years. She was good then, but now she is superb.

Miss Alcock has acquired wonderful breadth and timbre of voice. Her tones are absolutely pleasing thruout her wide register, and she sings with true artistry. In addition to her lovely voice she is possessed of a charming personality and she completely won her listeners last night.

Miss Alcock's numbers, with the orchestra, included the recitative and aria, "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," and the aria, "O don fatale," from Verdis opera, "Don Carlos."

Beethoven's lengthy and grand "Symphony number 3, in E flat major," better known as his "Eroica" symphony, was the first offering of the orchestra. In noble music, it tells the life and death of a noble man. The symphony consists of four parts: Allegro con brio, marcia funebre and adagio assai; scherzo, allegro vivace and trio, and the finale, allegro molto. Possibly the most notable change, with the exception of the conductor, was the presence of F. Fradkin, as concertmaster, in place of Anton Witek, who has played first violin here so many years.

The symphony requires a full hour for performance. It was followed by a 10-minute intermission, and then came Miss Alcock with the Handel air. She returned again and again, to smile and bow her acknowledgments of the generous plaudits accorded her both at the close of this and her next number. Before the Italian aria, the orchestra played the prelude to the second act of the opera, "Gwendoline," by Chabrier. This prelude is dreamy, romantic music, presenting two prominent themes which are worked out alternately.

The closing number of the program was the overture, "Le carnival Romain," Berlioz, a brilliant composition that formed a fitting close to a brilliant concert.

The next concert, the fifth and last in the Ellis series for the season 1918-1919, will present John McCormack, noted tenor, and one of the biggest attractions of the American concert stage. This will take place in Mechanics hall, the night of Feb. 18.

Boston Symphony Next Week.

At the next Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 6, Mr. Rabaud will conduct Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. As to his ability with Beethoven, Boston considered this a more exacting test than the "Eroica" or the "Eighth" which he has already presented, and a triumphant affirmation. Philip Hale wrote in the Herald:

"Mr. Rabaud gave a remarkably impressive interpretation of the Fifth Symphony. We do not remember one that has equalled it in dramatic intensity and in nobility. Believing that this symphony is the 'summit of music,' to quote his own words, he did not have to depart from Beethoven's text or inject some foreign spirit into the symphony to obtain magnificent effects. Again he revealed himself as a born and accomplished musician among conductors, as a skilful and imaginative conductor among musicians. His reverence for Beethoven was not obsequious. He did not turn the concert hall into a theatre. . . . It would not be easy to say which movement, as played yesterday, moved most the soul of the audience; yet the Scherzo had a new meaning; the wonderful transition to the tumultuous jog of the finale was managed in masterly manner, and—oh crowning triumph! the interest in the finale never flagged after the first glorious outburst."

A notable revival on the same program will be four orchestral movements which Franck arranged from his choral symphonic poem "Psyche." The other two numbers are also French—Chabrier's prelude to the second act of his opera "Gwendoline," and Lalo's riotous rhapsody in A major, built from Norwegian themes.

The program for Saturday afternoon is headed by Brahms's Second Symphony in D major. The second part, as on Thursday's program, will be exclusively French—the incidental music which Faure wrote for Harancourt's "Shylock," Saint-Saens's second symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Berlioz's overture, "Le Carneval Romain."

Del. 1

RABAUD GIVES FIRST BRAHMS AT SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff the Soloist In His Own Concerto

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Henri Rabaud, conductor; Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, soloist. Thirteenth concert of the season. The program:—

Bruneau Entr'acts Symphonique from "Messidor."
Rachmaninoff Concerto, No. 2, C minor.
Brahms Symphony, No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.

With the D major symphony Mr. Rabaud conducted his first Brahms in Boston. Of course he chose the second symphony, the one that all music lovers enjoy whether they enjoy all Brahms or not. How can anyone help enjoying this tender, delicate, melodious work? Writing of the work, Brahms himself said, "I do not know whether I have a pretty symphony." "Pretty symphony" is a decidedly offensive combination of words, yet in its tenderness, the charm of the minuet tempo in the scherzo and in its general serenity it almost gives the impression of prettiness. We say, "Who can help enjoying this symphony?" Some can. Mr. Hale reminds us that Jonas Lee said it was full of brushwood and that Porzan found it childish. To most of us there are few bars of the brushwood that ought to be pared and the childishness is delightful golden beams. Mr. Weingartner thinks that in no other Brahms work the stream of invention flows so fresh and spontaneous and nowhere else has he colored his orchestration so successfully. Mr. Rabaud gave a shining performance of the symphony, never seeking to make big effects or painting too big in colors.

Mr. Rachmaninoff made it the popular fancy this season some high between Mme. Gadski and Mr. Heifetz. He is a "hit." From the subway and from the country the music lovers and curiosity seekers, who go to the concert hall only when the artist who is featured in the next column of the Sunday amusement performs are coming to town to hear Mr. Rachmaninoff. He is a great artist as well as a popular one. His qualities as a pianist have been so often and lengthily discussed here.

Yesterday he played his C minor concerto, which he played when he first appeared with the orchestra when he debuted in Boston in 1909. It was rather regrettable that he did not choose one of his concertos unfamiliar to Bostonians, the C sharp minor or the D minor, but his second concerto, yesterday again, impressed one as a beautifully written, beautifully played work. Unlike so many of Mr. Rachmaninoff's compositions, for the piano it takes on one's looking its personal aspect. First last and always it is composer and pianist, he is an intellectual rather than a sentimentalist. This probably is a premature period, rather hard to analyze. When Mr. Rachmaninoff plays there is no opportunity for the mating to read right to work the music, uncomplicated by the playing. The playing is of the head, not of heart, but it is playing that rather like the music itself. All signs are for the [illegible]

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

[illegible]

RACHMANINOFF IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Rachmaninoff dominated the concert by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The audience could think of little else until the great Russian pianist appeared, was thrilled by his playing of his own second concerto, and then rejoiced at its good fortune, once he had left the stage. Rachmaninoff, however, has been heard to better advantage alone.

Mr. Rabaud gave a beautiful reading of the Brahms second symphony, in many respects the best Boston has enjoyed. It was a good start for his initial placing of Brahms on his programs.

There will be no concerts the coming [illegible] as the orchestra makes a southern

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

Herald. Feb. 1st Feb. 1st & 3rd Transcript Feb. 1st Globe

SYMPHONY HAS 13TH CONCERT

Excellent Program Well Received by Many Lovers of Music

ORCHESTRA WILL LEAVE NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Bruneau, Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor"; Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2 for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

The opera "Messidor" was produced in Paris in 1897. Did Charpentier and Puccini ever study the score? During the first measures of the Entr'acte played yesterday we expected to see the mother bringing in the plates of onion soup, the father declaiming about parental rights and the wrongs of the working man; Louise, sulky longing to be with her lover. Later we were reminded of "The Girl of the Golden West," the dashing and amorous Mr. Johnson; the sheriff with his elaborate chain and remarkable plug hat; the frenzied girl that cheated at cards. The moods in each instance, even tricks of instrumentation, were singularly alike. The ingenious Etienne Destranges is almost as fortunate in bagging typical themes as was that perfervid Wagnerite. Hans von Wolzogen. Destranges has identified 26 in "Messidor." No doubt he can tell them even in the dark. He finds five of them in the Entr'acte. When it is played in a concert hall, these themes are interesting only as musical sentences. The hearer not knowing the plot of the opera, indifferent to it, listens to the music; nor does he label one theme "Toil," another "Water," a third "Spring." He likes the music, thinks it melodious and euphonious, with the pleasing thematic material not over-developed. He is stirred by the crescendo that leads to the imposing climax, and is gently let down to a normal state of nerves by the soothing final measures.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played his second concerto with this orchestra when he visited Boston late in 1909. The concerto was played here a little over two years ago by Mr. Gabrilowitsch. None but a Russian need apply. For although the concerto is not free from Germanisms, and the influence of Chopin is noticeable here and there there are pages that are demonical Russian, certain themes that have Russian folk-song character. Perhaps the first movement is too carefully constructed. Surely in 1919 the Adagio and the Finale sound fresher and have more decided physiognomy. There are touches of orchestration in the Finale that are delightfully exotic, verging on the fascinatingly barbaric. One welcomes these pages more than those that were purely scholastic. The concerto is an interesting work, especially when it is played by the composer with the freedom in phrasing and rythm that tax the skill of the conductor and the orchestra. Mr. Rachmaninoff has played here with more technical brilliance, with a greater variety of tone color, but there were moments yesterday when he carried all before him. He was enthusiastically applauded.

The name of Brahms appeared for the first time on the program this season. Mr. Rabaud chose the second symphony, the most lyrical of the four. The performance was conspicuous for its clearness, its fine balance, its vitality, yet even Mr. Rabaud could not make the second movement endurable, for the themes are commonplace and the development is complex and dry. We have never heard so beautiful a performance of the charming Scherzo as that of yesterday. This movement and the first repay one for the boredom induced by the second and the fourth. In this symphony, as in the other three there are pages in which Brahms is seen as one treading water, sparring for wind, writing in orthodox fashion respectable and dull measures, filling a quoted space, until a fresh idea comes to him.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be away on its fourth trip.

The program for Feb. 14 and 15, is one of unusual interest: Franck, Orchestral Suite from the Symphonic poem "Psyche"; Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); Chabrier, Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline"; G. Faure, Suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's "Shylock" (after Shakespeare), including two songs to be sung by Arthur Hackett, tenor; Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival."

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

CONDUCTORS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

A Fact or Two Underlying Present Uncertainties — The Unwisdom of Change for the Sake of Change—The Advantages of a "Genius," If a "Genius" Can Be Found—The Orchestra, the Public and Mr. Rabaud—Miss Hempel to Be Heard in Boston — Mr. Gabrilowitsch Re-engaged in Detroit—Mr. Kneisel as Conductor—Items and Incidents

As "pigs is pigs," so facts is facts, even in a matter of such stubborn and divergent opinion as the proper conductor for the Symphony Orchestra next year. Oone of those facts, moreover, standing high and clear, is the unwisdom of change for the sake of change. If the trustees of the band can secure a conductor of larger abilities, more impressive personality, more vivid reputation than Mr. Rabaud, then, by all means, the audiences at the Symphony Concerts here and elsewhere deserve to have him and for a term of years. If, on the other hand, none such is obtainable, there is sound reason for the continuance of Mr. Rabaud in his present post. Individual by individual, choir by choir, the quality of the orchestra is as high as it ever was, probably higher. By so much the trustees and the management have indeed wrought well. Being, however, a recently constituted band, it needs to be assimilated, unified, polished into a sure and sensitive instrument to the conductor's hand. The hundred men within it must come, likewise, to know and feel themselves in a common work. Not in weeks or in months are these desirable ends gained, but in season upon season of association, mutual understanding and ambition. Already the orchestra is more responsive to Mr. Rabaud because it is becoming familiar with him, while he better measures and adjusts its powers because he has become better acquainted with it. Were he to continue as conductor with as few changes in the band as there are likely to be for a season or two, the advantage on this score is plain; whereas a new conductor, say next autumn, must begin almost at the beginning. If he much excelled Mr. Rabaud, either in fact or in the faith of the public, the gain in prestige might offset the loss in continuity. Otherwise, change would be change for the sake of change and, in the present estate of the orchestra hardly advisable.

Similarly the public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston is becoming accustomed to Mr. Rabaud and so the more ready by habit to accept him without demur. True, the numbers of that public do not appreciably increase unless a Heifetz or a Rakhmaninov as "assisting artist" swells the audience; but in disposition, it clearly warms to the conductor when he and the orchestra acquit themselves notably well as in d'Indy's symphony "on a mountain air" of last week, as in Beethoven's fifth symphony of a fortnight ago. Always, moreover, whatever individual judgment of the conductor's abilities may be, it shows a kindly, a receptive mind toward him. Only the exceptional "genius," not easy to descry in the offing, is likely, for example, to better the relatively sparse audiences of Saturday evenings. Comparatively new habits of life as well as degree of musical curiosity and satisfaction have altered them, perhaps permanently. Indeed, the whole subscription to the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra both at home and abroad, was made last autumn under exceptional conditions that give little or no clue to the response of the public next year when war-time economies and preoccupations have receded into a dimmer distance, when the quality of the orchestra and the quality of the conductor—should Mr. Rabaud continue—are better and more widely understood. Such condition is difficult for trustees and guarantors who would discern the future, but there is no altering it or the risk of it. Perhaps, therefore, the keener the search for the "genius."

So, also, habit is making Mr. Rabaud's programmes seem the regular thing in the regular way—German classics and French pieces in nearly equal proportion, an occasional Russian, an occasional American number, a concerto of Grieg or of Chopin, if a pianist happens to impose it. So far, Mr. Rabaud has eschewed Italian music, shows no inclination toward Scandinavian or other composers of the North; while, whoever the conductor, hardly a piece by an English composer, except the cosmopolitan Delius, has been heard for many years at the Symphony Concerts. Some will say that Mr. Rabaud does not "overdo" the ultra-modern Parisians; others will regret that he does not oftener play their music. Some wonder that he chose, say, Mr. Hadley from American composers, when many another has quite as fair title to hearing. And so opinions go. As a matter of fact, it is too early to say what direction Mr. Rabaud's programmes would take in the long run. For the present they move in a Franco-German groove, comfortable to most in his audiences; while within that groove they tend to be "classic." An ardent modernist, like Mr. Monteux or Mr. Rhené-Baton, would more please the youngsters—and distinctively overtax the elders. As for the "genius," sought in the offing, he could probably make his programmes what he chose and satisfy his hearers. For good or ill, he would count with them above both orchestra and music.

In a word, if an earnest, faithful, personable man of talent is to lead the Symphony Orchestra for another year or two, Mr. Rabaud, if he is disposed to remain in Boston, would probably yield as much satisfaction to the public, as well maintain the standard of the concerts, as well serve the treasury as any other; while change from him would largely be change for the sake of change and on the chance of betterment. On the other hand, if the trustees and the guarantors believe they can lay hand on a conductor of superlative ability of outstanding personality, of an-

Boston: Four fragments of Franck's "Psyche," originally written for chorus as well as orchestra; the introduction to the second act of Chabrier's Wagnerian opera, "Gwendoline," and a suite of Fauré's drawn from his incidental music to a Parisian version of "The Merchant of Venice." Presumably Boston will later hear these numbers.

Miss Frieda Hempel of the Metropolitan Opera House, still in the flower of the powers that make her a notable singer of ornate and lyrical music, will try her fortunes anew in Boston at a concert in Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 8. If Boston may not have opera from the Metropolitan or the Chicago Company or both (as it did last season), it is its privilege, like any other city "of the provinces," to hear wandering singers from them.

The projected choral concert by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus at which Beethoven's mighty mass was to be heard, has been abandoned as a task of too large magnitude and of too precarious fortunes to be wisely undertaken at present. Neither the forces concerned nor the anticipated public could be well prepared for it.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

NEW SUPPORT FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Private Subscription Lifts the Deficit for the Current Season and Assures the Immediate Future of the Orchestra—Exceptional Conditions as Occasion for Increased Expenditure and Diminished Income—Speculation About Conductors for Next Year—The Need of Speedy Decision—Mr. Hofmann's Concert of American Pieces—Programmes at Hand

For many weeks it has been an open secret that the expenditures of the Symphony Orchestra for the current year would considerably exceed its income. The cost of the reorganization of the band, begun last summer and completed for the time a fortnight ago, has been considerable—an exceptional charge, indeed, but one that has no less to be met. In the reconstitution of the orchestra, the trustees, the management, and all concerned, have sought for many posts musicians of signal ability. Inevitably they expect and receive high salaries. Similarly, the cost of travel has mounted, not only when the band makes its monthly journey to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, but, in proportion, when it goes no farther away than Providence or New Bedford. As in every household and in every business, almost all the fixed charges to which the orchestra is subject have increased in the ratio of the hour. On the other hand, in this year of transition from an old order to a new, its receipts have appreciably diminished—more from the concerts in Boston than from those undertaken in several other cities. The unescapable, the foreseen outcome was a considerable deficit, estimated by those informed of it at, say, $120,000.

To meet this deficit and to assure the future, the trustees recently assembled a few friends of the orchestra and to them set forth the financial and the general situation in its affairs and prospects. From these friends and from their own members, they received subscriptions sufficient to pay the deficit for the current season along with pledges that secure any similar deficits arising within the next two years. In the judgment of the trustees, it was wiser to ask for private aid in this fashion than to appeal to the town in general, as did the Philadelphia Orchestra a few years ago, when it was in need of like relief and guarantee. The trustees in their wisdom have also preferred to keep these matters from the public, but as was inevitable, where so many persons were concerned more or less authentic versions of them have run from tongue to tongue, the best accredited of which is here written. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has many enemies, especially in other cities; whenever opportunity offers, they abound in malevolent gossip; the simple facts of the present situation—the more if the trustees had themselves disclosed them—may avert recurrence of it.

With the continuance of the orchestra in its present estate and policies thus assured, there is hope and even expectation that the public of the Symphony Concerts here and elsewhere (which, after all, is the chief source of revenue) may soon learn who is to be the conductor for next year. For the time being surmise and speculation, which is plenty, may run whither it chooses. It is impossible to say with any show of authority whether Mr. Rabaud is disposed to remain for another season with the orchestra, as many of his hearers would gladly see him do, or whether the trustees are disposed to continue him in his present post. In a single intermission at Symphony Hall it is easy to hear that Mr. Toscanini will succeed him and that Mr. Toscanini is resolved to remain in Milan until, next winter, he has set on the stage Boito's posthumous opera, "Nero." Similarly, the fitness for the post of M. Chévillard, of Mr. Rhené-Baton, of Mr. Mengelberg of Amsterdam is variously canvassed, though neither the elder Parisian nor the Hollander seems a conductor likely to please the public of "these concerts." There is questioning as well about Mr. Bodanzky of the Metropolitan Opera House, now an American citizen, about Mr. Gabrilowitsch of Detroit, about Mr. Stokowski of Philadelphia and of new laurels in New York. Yet each of these three, whatever his qualifications or desires, seems tied to his present work, while to Mr. Bodanzky and Mr. Gabrilowitsch dissenters on war-time scores readily raise objection. As some say again, out of this cloudy background may suddenly spring a new conductor as relatively unknown hereabouts as was Mr. Rabaud last October. Doubtless in their own good

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL JANUARY 22.

RACHMANINOFF IN HIS OWN CONCERTO

Mr Rachmaninoff played with the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon through the inability of the scheduled soloist to arrive from South America in time. The Russian pianist had played his second concerto in C minor when first heard in Boston with the orchestra, nine years ago last month. Mr Gabrilowitsch has played it once since.

Yesterday Mr Rabaud and the composer did much for it. There are superb passages which speak for themselves, passages which one other than a Russian hardly could have written, those which hardly could be considered indigenous to any other soil, for Mr Rachmaninoff, as a composer, at times shows Germanic influences.

But the introduction to the first movement for piano alone, the expanding scheme of majestic chords with the descending bass dropping a plumb line into the cosmos, the sullen turbulence of the first theme following, as the piano supplements orchestra in a manner characteristic to itself, the poignant first theme of the second movement; the curious, rhythmic passage of detached chords with the suppressed but gorgeous color of brass and cymbals, a passage of smoldering, yet barbaric splendor; the sweeping dynamic energy liberated in the rhythmic introduction to the last movement, an idea which the hearer wishes were developed to greater length. These have unmistakably a Slavic character. Their rugged virality was sharply set off from the suave and urbane sonorities, for example, of the prelude to the fourth act of Bruneau's opera "Messidor," which preceded it, music in the ingratiating vein of Massenet, but with less charatcer—music in which it apparently would be difficult to find more than sketches of the operatic personages.

Each of the three parts of Mr Rachmaninoff's concerto begins with material which is commanding, distinctive. The impression is that other and greater thoughts are to follow. Is it because the composer grows fascinated by this, then that, derivative of his fundamental idea, or because he does not always sense the extent or vim of appropriate development, that the work as a whole is episodic, that it asks the listener to understand in abbreviation thoughts which the author has dreamed in an expanded form?

The overwhelming force of Mr Rachmaninoff's individuality, as creator and recreator of his own music, made measures significant and moving which might have passed by for less under the hand of another.

The burning brilliance of the final pages was of something more than the piano or virtuoso piano playing. A super-interpreter, Rachmaninoff thinks in long lines which are first built upon architectural principles of proportion. That is why the great mass of people, many of whom look upon the piano dispassionately, even with aversion, will yet hear him with an ear which grows fresh rather than jaded.

Mr Robaud, of a race known always, now above all, for its gallantry, will not be assailed for bias or national partisanship. If there were reason for the exclusion temporarily of Brahms, the armistice has been signed nearly these three months. It is idle to inquire if Brahms had been alive whether his name would have appeared upon an infamous document with those of Strauss, Humperdinck, Max Bruch, Nikisch and Weingartner. His four symphonies live and for some are the choicest wine of the orchestral vintage.

Not all may agree again with Mr Weingartner when he subordinates the first, a noble score, to this second in D, with its slow movement more gray than a coludy Winter's morning.

Mr Rabaud dissected the score with fine accuracy and taste. He did more. He found new dramatic possibilities in the first movement, and led the last to a brilliant conclusion, which brought an outburst of applause. The orchestra played gloriously. Its part in the concerto made it and conductor artists sharing alike with the soloist, for Mr Rachmaninoff, a conductor who happens to prefer to play the piano, has committed beauty in equal shares to the orchestra as to his instrument. It was understood yesterday, as in bits to be recalled from Mr Laurent's flute, Mr Jaenicke's horn, Mr Longy and the whole choir of first violins. The concert will be repeated tonight.

EVENING SUN

New York City

A notable revival stands on the programme of the next Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 6—four orchestral movements which Franck arranged from his choral symphonic poem of large design, "Psyche." The symphony proper will be Beethoven's Fifth, which Boston has adjudged a strikingly noble reading and a triumphant test of Mr. Rabaud's ability with Beethoven. The other numbers on the same programme will be the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's orchestral rhapsody in two parts built upon riotous Norwegian themes.

The symphony for the Saturday afternoon concert (Feb. 8) will be the second of Brahms in D major, and the other half of the programme, Faure's incidental music for Harancourt's play "Shylock," the score secured from France by our Government at Mr. Rabaud's request; Saint-Saens's symphonic poem "Phaeton" and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS GIVEN OVATION

Orchestra Under Conductor Rabaud in Fine Concert.

ARTHUR HACKETT SOLOIST

Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D-Minor and Symphonic Poem, "La Procession Nocturne," Features of Programme.—Players and Tenor Win Many Recalls.

Henri Rabaud and the splendid band of musicians under his leadership were given an ovation last evening at the Boston Symphony's third concert here this season in Infantry Hall. After both Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D-minor and M. Rabaud's own symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," the audience gave vent to its feelings in tremendous outbursts of applause. At the first demonstration which came after the symphony, M. Rabaud returned again and again, finally requiring his men to rise and share in the appreciation shown.

Arthur Hackett, the assisting soloist, was equally well received, his singing showing him to be in the front rank of American tenors. It was an evening of unalloyed pleasure, the orchestra playing with an enthusiasm that has been a marked characteristic of its work this season.

This spirit so plainly shown by the players is in noticeable contrast to that displayed by the men before the orchestra's reorganization. Their alertness and life are a direct response to the splendid qualities of their leader and the results obtained so far this season show that in many respects the orchestra is better than ever before. And let it be said once and for all, that Providence audiences are not cold and unappreciative gatherings, as claimed by Dame Rumor in former years. That myth is dead and will not be resurrected so long as the enthusiasm shown by audiences at this season's Symphony Concerts is maintained.

Last evening's programme was as follows:

Schumann, Symphony No. 4, in D-minor, Op. 120.
Andante, Allegro.
Romanza.
Scherzo.
Largo, Finale.
Played without pause.

Handel, Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and Aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephtah."

Rabaud.....La Procession Nocturne. Symphonic Poem (after Renan).

Delussy.....Azael's Recitative, "Those Joyous Airs," and Aria, "O, Time Take Is No More," from the Lyric Scene, "The Prodigal Son."

Lalo.....Rhapsody in A for Orchestra.

Schumann's Symphony No. 4, one of his finest works, has appeared many times on Boston symphony programmes in this city. It is a work justly admired for its beauty, its easy flow of melodic ideas and its richness of instrumentation. The four movements are played without pauses between, thus giving the whole an effect of delightful unity. In its reading M. Rabaud brought out a full measure of its grandeur and beauty. Its movements unfolded with majestic breadth and with decisive rhythm. The finale was given with a sweep and abandon that was startling in effect.

M. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" is a modern musical poet's expression of Renan's imaginative poem. It is a fascinating work and takes the hearer away from familiar paths into a world of strange musical fancies. Its haunting dissonances, strange, ever-changing musical tints and mysterious instrumental solo voices tell the story of the nocturnal event. Sombre and subdued in character, it was faultlessly played and made a deep impression.

Arthur Hackett sang twice and proved himself an artist of the first rank. His last appearance in this city two or three seasons ago showed him to be the possessor of a fine voice and considerable talent. Since then his improvement has been truly astonishing. His Handel number last evening is one calculated to severely test the singer. It was sung magnificently. His diction in the recitative was perfect and it was delivered with a dramatic style that was impressive. The aria which followed was a beautiful piece of sustained singing. In phrasing, in the case of delivery and vocal beauty it was a notable performance. His second aria, sung in French, was also admirably sung and confirmed the fine impression made by his first solo.

Mr. Hackett scored a bigger success than any vocalist who has appeared here with the orchestra in many a day. Lalo's "Rhapsody in A" provided a pleasing

SYMPHONY TO GIVE SUITE BY FAURE

When the Symphony orchestra returns from its southern trip Mr. Rabaud proposes to put on for the concerts of Friday afternoon, Feb. 14, and Saturday evening, Feb. 15, Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; Faure's suite, written as incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock"; Chabrier's "Gwendoline" prelude and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. Arthur Hackett, tenor, will sing the solos in the Faure number. Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will make his debut here as soloist, playing the Mendelssohn concerto.

Post Feb 1-

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff Plays His Own Second Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

The lion, or let us rather say the Russian bear, of the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was Sergei Rachmaninoff, the famous pianist and composer, who recently arrived on these shores fresh from stirring experiences in the territories of the late Czar.

He strode prehistorically—I say prehistorically, since his length of limb and the span of his shoulders reminds one irresistibly of skeletons of the stone age which they dig now and then from the rocks—this man emerged from a doorway which his head almost scraped, sat at the piano, over which he leaned like some huge anaconda about to devour its prey, and performed his own C minor concerto.

SOMBRE AND MELANCHOLY

The first movement of this concerto is true to form and Slavic tradition. It opens with a growl which grows to a roar, after which a gloomy and puissant theme stalks out of the orchestra. And the whole movement, which is uncommonly well knit, is sombre, powerful, melancholy, with that pervading Slavic melancholy that we know and love so well. The instrumentation, too, is dark and rather thick, all in the lower registers of strings, with now and then shrill or brilliant outcries of brass and wind.

There is some of Tschaikowsky, in sentiment if not in theme, in this music. It is moreover made, and very well made, for a pianist of broad conceptions and the powerful and expressive style of Mr. Rachmaninoff. Weaklings, or those incapable of the concentrated fury and the melting sentiment of this music, need not apply. Mr. Rachmaninoff loomed over the piano, and taking it and the orchestra, so to speak, in his teeth, overwhelmed the audience with the grip and virility of his performance.

Too Long Toward Close

It is unfortunate that the two last movements of the concerto are so inferior to the first. They are too long. One feels the composer saying something like this: "Let's see. My first movement is 34 pages. I must have at least 30 in the second movement and 36 or 38 in the last." There are good themes, such as the second theme of the last movement, first played, if memory serves, by the violas, and apotheosized at the end of the movement. There are pretty thoughts. There is also, in the slow movement, unblushing sentimentality of the most obvious kind, and the finale, barring the theme just mentioned, some instrumental effects and a passage of extended development of a fragment of a certain motive, is very scant in its material.

After four hearings of this concerto by the writer the first movement gains and the last two continue to lose substance or individuality. The wonder of it was that Mr. Rachmaninoff, who must doubtless know himself how unrepresentative this music is of the heights of his creative powers, should have believed in it again as he played and imposed irresistibly his belief on the audience. A big man must have so much heart that he will warm to what is sincere, whether it is sentimental or not, whether it is his own poor workmanship or another's. When Mr. Rachmaninoff wrote the concerto he was unquestionably sincere, as he was when he played it, and passages of the poorest twaddle were given renewed life and significance by him. A concerto which is one-third worth while was most convincingly and impressively played by a great creative musician.

Bruneau's entracte from "Messidor" opened the programme. It is richly colored and scored, and a simple theme is well handled. The music has little distinction, but it has this which German music, for instance, of an equal value and rank would not have, it has style, proportion and the good taste of a composer who knows what he wishes to say and when it is time to stop.

Mr. Rabaud was particularly fortunate in his interpretation of the slow movement of Brahms' 2d symphony. The whole performance was sympathetic and brilliant, though we personally differ with Mr. Rabaud's treatment of certain details of the first and last movements. These differences concern matters of taste and individual conception, not of musical efficiency or the reverse. "A" feels a piece of music this way, "B" feels it a little differently. Provided both "A" and "B" are good musicians, the one conception is as legitimate and interesting as the other. Mr. Rabaud is never less than an admirable musician of the broadest appreciations and understanding. He gave an effective and highly artistic performance of a beautiful work.

GLOBE—FEBRUARY

Paragraphs About Musical Matters Here and Elsewhere

Mr Fradkin, the young concert master of the Orchestra, who already in incidental solos has shown promising glimpses of his skill and art, finds another responsibility of his office to be the marking of the bowing on the parts for the 16 stands of first violins, labor requiring at times three hours daily. Incident to such musical editing, Mr Fradkin has some things to say concerning "method" which should be of lively interest, certainly to violinists.

"That is hard for me," says the violinist, "because I am not used to doing my musical thinking in terms of the blue pencil. You will not find a mark in my own music. I have never believed in technical dogma. Bowing and fingering must come naturally, without laborious argument. There is no 'right' or 'wrong.' For example, my third position—absolutely unorthodox. But it has become my own way, and for the sole reason that it brings me the best results. Results are everything.

"Only look at my master, Ysaye. He is gloriously careless of method. And his results are magic itself. Nobody can question how, because Ysaye knows no answer but the answer of his music. To Remy, who taught me, I owe an immeasureable amount. But Ysaye is my ideal. I believe in relaxation, nothing taut. Do you know a great secret of Ysaye's full tone? His violin rests free on his collar bone. It is not jammed into his neck, and there is no pad to despoil the vibrations. Starched linen is an encumbrance. The ideal dress is the silk blouse-tunic of the Russians. Free arm—free neck."

Herald — 2

RUSH SEATS AT SYMPHONY HALL

To the Editor of the Herald:

Your illustrated article on the weather beaten heroes waiting for "rush seats" at the Symphony, in Sunday morning's Herald, while describing all the gruesome details of the martyrdom of these music lovers might well have devoted some attention to the antiquate methods that impose such picturesque conditions. Is there perchance a notion that if the real "music lovers" were not compelled to exhibit themselves to an edified public from 11:30 A. M. to 1:30 P. M. each Friday and then to wait an hour in the hall, they would cease to appreciate the crowning blessing of their vigil? Or does it stimulate our civic pride to say: "See what Boston people will go through to hear our symphonies?" Or is this phenomenon purely a sanctified tradition? If not why are real music lovers penalized and subjected to physical strain and climatic conditions, which forbid their properly enjoying their eventual musical fare when the issuance of 505 tickets in advance would at least allow them an inconspicuous, uneventful, and comfortable withal, entry to the concert itself?

It has yet to be recognized that art cuts across all differences based on wealth; its aristocracy and proletariat are not rated according to customary social grades; far otherwise; and while we recognize the Providence that invariably places the cheapest symphony seats in the most agreeable quarter, in point of view of acoustics; yet the provision of good music for the multitudes of intelligent hearers who have not the wherewithal to meet the substantial prices demanded for it, is a problem that has yet to be solved by an enterprising democracy.

In saying this I imply no reflection upon occupants of the higher priced seats, to whose liberal support the symphony owes its very existence, and we continue to do so until the municipality will develop a proper conception of its duties in the artistic way and bring music within the financial limits of the music lovers. I would merely suggest that the "rush seat" system makes a preposterous demand upon the time and physical strength of 505 and more intelligent citizens each concert day, and I hope our thoughtful municipal leaders will think the same every time they pass the shivering crowd coralled on the Symphony Hall steps every Friday noon.

HENRY J. SOWERBY.

50 Peterborough street, Jan. 26.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

THE case of the Philadelphia Orchestra is a very curious one. For many reasons, too numerous to keep mentioning again and again, it is the most interesting band that plays in Baltimore these days. Consisting as it does of an admirably trained body of young and enthusiastic musicians who are directed by the most vivid and magnetic "star" conductor the country now boasts, it nevertheless continues to attract little attention in Baltimore and plays to comparatively empty benches every time it comes here. The elusive reason for this is, I fancy, not so far to seek. The Philadelphia Orchestra, very naturally, as a distinguished organization and one that is entirely cognizant of its own high value and completeness, is making the grave mistake of thinking that Baltimore's general public is sufficiently discriminating, musically, to sense its particular caste among the greater orchestras that visit us. It is depending entirely upon itself to win a public. But, sad to relate, our patronage cannot be won so easily or so academically. People here demand the "extra added attraction." If you hold exhibitions, you must serve tea to lure the unwary. If you play orchestral music, you must have spectacular soloists to catch the public. For, after all, it is only the highly trained section of the public that loves orchestral music for its own sake. Even so recently as two years ago, before the Boston Orchestra was reorganized and while it still proudly carried its reputation of being an "absolutely perfect instrument," its manager told me that nowhere could they maintain their list of subscribers "on the road" unless they provided the most expensive soloists available as bait. Yet the Boston Orchestra was the fashion in those days, and to miss one of its concerts was to argue yourself a perfect Philistine. Yet the public was largely won for them through the importance of the assisting artists. Whatever his faults, it cannot be said that Dr. Muck was lacking in business acumen. He firmly maintained that soloists, so called, had no place at symphony concerts, but he was penetrating enough to realize that if orchestras wanted audiences they must needs catch their public fancy with golden bait.

The Boston Orchestra, with the turning wheel of fortune, has lost its value as a fashionable drawing card. That it can still play stirringly was evidenced by its fine presentment of the Ravel "Rapsodie Espagnol," a memorable musical incident of the current musical season. But the crowds no longer surge to the Boston Orchestra. Instead they are turning their attention to the concerts given here by the Symphony Society of New York. Now it is to be immediately noted that never in its history has the Damrosch orchestra played with the finesse, the suavity and the beauty of tone that marks its performances at this time. Some of the finest musicians in New York are members of this organization, which now is richly endowed and which plays as it never has played before.

But do you suppose that the general public realizes this change, this shifting of values, the fine evolution of this historic organization? You may be sure it does not. The public is now giving its allegiance to the Symphony Society of New York because Mr. Damrosch is clever enough to provide the most sensational, the most-talked-of "assisting artists" of the day. Not half the people at the December concert went to the Lyric to hear the "New World" symphony of Dvorak. They flocked there to hear Joseph Hofmann play. The Symphony Society of New York is fast becoming established here as the fashionable visiting orchestra. If the Stokowski orchestra wishes "a place in the sun" it must now reckon with a very formidable rival, which is establishing itself through modern business methods.

It is all very well for the Philadelphia Orchestra to say that it is for those of us who appreciate its artistic splendor to point out that it is a wonderful band; to tell people that it exists for the purpose of disseminating a high knowledge of orchestra music; that it presents interesting programs in which the solo work is a mere incident and is relegated to its proper and historic place in concerts of this type; to persuade our friends that, because of its finesse and the inspiration of its young conductor, it needs no "extra added attraction" to win a public!

One may say such things until doomsday. It is an excellent theory. But it doesn't work out. If the management of the Philadelphia Orchestra is disgruntled, as it very evidently is, that it has failed in the past seasons to corral a greater public, it has only itself to blame. A thesis that has worked out elsewhere, no doubt, very evidently has not led to results in Baltimore, for the people who love orchestral music for its own sake are relatively few here.

It is only the highly specialized audience that is interested in unadulterated and unmitigated orchestral music. The organization that presents the most brilliant constellation of musical stars in a season is the organization that is going to win the public. After the public has been won the time will be ripe for educational work. You need a very heavy subscription, indeed, before you can take liberties with an unsympathetic public. But having won your public, it might even be possible to give two symphonies on one program, with never a "soloist" to enliven the evening. Dr. Muck had planned to do that. He probably could have "gotten away with it" under the old regime. But at this critical stage of Baltimore's musical history the orchestra that brings us the most celebrated artists will be the one that is building its foundations on a rock. If you are asked, as you doubtless will be a thousand times before the season is over, why the audiences are so small at the Philadelphia concerts, you may tell your interlocutor that it is because there is no "extra added attraction." Assisting artists with orchestras, like tea with exhibitions, are necessities in Baltimore.

HERALD, FEBRUARY 5,

SAVES $20,000 'CELLO AT FIRE

Hoseman Refuses Soloist Malkin's Proffer of $100 Reward

FIREMAN BREAKS LEG AT HOTEL ILKLEY

Eight doctors, their families and visiting patients, and other prominent residents of the Hotel Ilkley, were forced into the street, yesterday noon, by a fire which damaged the building to the extent of $15,000, and netted Hoseman Thomas J. Kilduff of engine 26, a broken leg.

Kilduff, who was overcome by smoke during the Crawford House fire, on Monday, had just returned to duty. He was at work on the roof of the building when the flames burned through, dropping him to the floor below. An ambulance from Station 16 removed the injured fire fighter to the City Hospital.

The blaze, discovered by Janitor Bernard Ryan, developed many interesting features, such as the saving of a 'cello, valued at $20,000, owned by Joseph Malkin, 'cello soloist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the rescue of many residents by Thomas Haverly, elevator boy, and the carrying of a parrot to safety, after it had called attention to its predicament.

"Poll," owned by Holman F. Day, the writer, was hanging in his cage when the apartment began to fill with smoke. Alice Stokes, a maid employed by Mr. Holman, started to escape, but was halted by the cries of the family's pet, who called out: "Alice, where are you?" The girl returned and carried the bird to the street.

Malkin was so pleased when Fireman Twiss of Engine 22 bore forth his treasured 'cello in triumph, that he wanted to reward him with $100. Twiss refused to accept the gift. The greatest damage occurred in Mr. Malkin's apartment. The blaze worked from the cellar to the roof by way of the dumb waiter. Dense clouds of smoke poured from this open vent, permeating the various apartments and offices. Upon reaching the roof it spread through the Malkin suite on the top floor.

Among the occupants of the building who sustained loss by smoke or water were: Dr. Thomas M. Strong, Dr. James F. Quest, Dr. H. P. Allen, Dr. H. V. Dunsmoor, Dr. Carl Watson, Dr. Corcoran, Dr. G. M. Katsainos, Holman F. Day, Joseph Malkin, Anton Witek, former concert master of the Boston Symphony, and a family named Weldeth.

The property, a double apartment, located at 176-178 Huntington avenue, is six stories high and owned by the J. B. Thomas estate.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 4,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Mr. Kneisel Reappears as Conductor with the Chicago Orchestra and Stirs a Reviewer to Entertaining Reminiscence—Mr. Campanini for Four Years More—Percy Grainger in Concerts Again—Items and Incidents

WHEN Mr. Kneisel, emerging from retirement alike as violinist and conductor, led the Chicago Orchestra in its concerts of last Friday and Saturday, he gave Mr. Karleton Hackett of The Evening Post occasion for an amusing article, abounding in side-glances at the Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the days of Mr. Gericke and Mr. Nikisch. "Long residence," begins the reviewer, "and also, probably, natural affinity, have given to Mr. Kneisel a quite distinctive Bostonese quality, and his reading of Mendelssohn's overture 'Fingal's Cave' and of Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony' brought back to me memories of the old Boston Music Hall. I know very little, unfortunately, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its later manifestations, but the playing of the organization in the days of my youth was very vividly suggested by the manner in which our orchestra played under Mr. Kneisel's baton. It was clear and cool, with a certain deliberation, which was characteristic of the bygone years, when a symphony concert was an event over which everybody took his time. Things were not keyed up to so high a pitch in our lives, the music was the main consideration, the orchestra the medium of expression, while the 'prima donna' conductor was still in the making and not the all-essential factor.

"I remember Gericke's back, the most impassive back that ever turned itself to an audience, and Kneisel sat so long under Gericke's baton that he appears to have absorbed something of that same static quality. Whether his face assumed the satanic character which Gericke's always took on when the brasses got out of hand and blew too loud I cannot tell, but in one way or another he held the men down all through the overture and the symphony to a calm placidity which was quite refreshing. After all, there are moods to music which have a quiet charm even more lovely than the emotional intensity of our hectic modern life, and Mr. Kneisel brought some of them out of the pieces. He was classic in the sense that classicism means the beauty of balance and proportion—the quiet assertion of a finality in art without the striving of the individual for personal expression.

"Such was the interpretative goal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the early days, and into that solemn environment flamed the modern spirit incarnated in Arthur Nikisch, burning a place for itself to which Boston never could become entirely adjusted, yet in after days was sorely put to it in explaining its lack of appreciation for a man whom all Europe proclaimed as the virtuoso conductor par excellence. But he never fitted into Boston and despite his great reputation Boston always felt deep down within its heart that there was something abnormal and unhealthy about such startling exhibitions. Now the bolder spirits are doubtless whispering to one another: 'I told you so.' Kneisel gave us nothing of the Nikisch mode of personal interpretation but the serene, impersonal setting forth of the music as he conceived that Schubert intended. It was excellently done, and the orchestra followed his lead with fine understanding of his purpose.

"When it came to Sousa's 'Wedding March' you felt that Mr. Kneisel was a little at sea. His back was as far removed by nature from Sousa's as the North Pole from the Equator, and the emotional elasticity of Sousa's back is an integral ingredient of his interpretation. Mr. Kneisel's vertebrae simply were not constructed on any such principle, as he knew full well, and he did not propose to indulge in any unnatural gyrations, even though Sousa be the March King and a lieutenant in the American Navy. However, he turned on the brasses full power, perhaps with a glimmer of a twinkle in his eye as he thought how Gericke would have cringed at the sound, and speeded it all up in vigorous style. But somehow it had not quite the Sousa lilt. Can you imagine a staid matron of Boston taking a whirl at a fox trot from a stern sense of duty? Possibly Mr. Kneisel's inner feelings were not dissimilar."

REDUCTION RATIO

19x

Music Versus the Piano

Celebrated Artist Who Did Not Play but "Only Made Music"—The Question of Next Season's Conductor of the B. S. O.—Concert Notes

Some genius of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when Alfred Cortot, the pianist, played there a week ago yesterday evening remarked of his superb performance, "That isn't piano playing." We do not know the name of this unfortunate man. We would not wish to hold him up as an example to posterity if we did. What we wish to record is the admirable rejoinder of a better musician, "No, that isn't piano playing. That's only music."

Mr. Cortot made music. He was not intent on calisthenics at the keyboard, or concerned in any way with self display or glorification. He was absorbed in the interpretation of music by Franck and d'Indy, and his performance of their works will long be remembered in this city. His performance of this music showed a conception which did not originate at the keyboard, but from a masterly analysis and a complete understanding of the orchestral score. This was particularly true, as it should have been, in the interpretation of the tone part of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." There are pianists who publicly prate of "tone-color" and "writers who talk about it in a vague and general way on this topic. Those who are serious and intelligent interest in this subject opened their eyes at Mr. Cortot's performance, at the manner in which the piano tone assumed a dozen different qualities and nuances, according not only to the nature of the passage performed, but with relation to the tonalities and balances of the other orchestral instruments. For in this symphony the piano, although not robbed of any of its individual capacities, is an orchestral instrument.

For those who make a special study of the piano, nothing could have been more instructive than the appearance of Mr. Cortot. We do not recall any soloist at these concerts in recent years who so completely inerged the virtuoso in the master interpreter. Now mastery of the piano is only one element of Mr. Cortot's equipment as a musician, and not the foremost. He can play as he does only for the reason that his musical comprehension is far in advance of his playing.

Entering the Paris Conservatoire when very young, he went through the musical apprenticeship, which is more thorough and more artistic in France today than in any other country. Like most progressive musicians, he fell, in due course, under the spell and the wonder of Wagner, and was a "repitateur" at a performance of Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" at Bayreuth. He founded a choral society which bears his name, which, as its conductor, gave yearly a concert production of "Parsifal," but performances of important choral works of Brahms, Liszt, Beethoven and others. He became conductor of the Soirees Nationale. Born of French parents at Noyon, Switzerland, he is now in his 40 years; that is to say, far from the prime and the sum of his career.

In doing these things, Mr. Cortot is only doing what practically all good musicians, according to the extent of their talents, have done. His activities have been so intense and varied that they developed all his talent. Neither energy or any part of his health, we take it, goes to waste, or lies fallow, and what he does in one field of his arts strengthens and stimulates him in all the others.

The lesson of it all is this: The student or teacher of music works as a rule narrowly, and with far too remote aims. The cause of the endless failures in music is the cause of failures in any field of activity, a lack of sufficiently definite and at the same time broad and vital purposes. A pupil gets mortal sick of "playing scales" a teacher with no more sense tells the pupil she can do nothing more and go no farther until she knows her "scales." But if pupil or teacher had enough imagination, while the hand was forming the proper execution of "scales," to look out and around, and read about music, and study other aspects more fundamental, and far more fascinating than the scales, how different the upshot would be. It would be different economically, too. Where there are 50 piano teachers and 1000 pianists, fiddlers and what not at large and without work, there would be original musical research; choral, orchestral, chamber music organizations which are mainly impossible by their absence in this country, and many other kinds of fruitful musical activity now generally lacking. There would follow a far more general public knowledge and appreciation of music. There would result from all this more appreciative and interested audiences, and, to and behold, virtuoso performers who would play like great musicians, and reflect on the national effort in music the credit that a musician such as Mr. Cortot, and the innumerable composers and executants which graduate each year from such an institution as the Paris Conservatoire, reflect on their country.

It will be answered by some people that we have no Conservatoire, and no government or public interested in music seriously or intelligently enough found a real one, if we decided that we wanted such an institution. But suppose that in the meanwhile teachers and students and all music lovers good and true in this country, undertake some real study, some real preparation, to acquire some real knowledge of the art they profess to love?

As to music versus playing: Has the reader who attends the Boston Symphony concerts observed the mysteriously restored tonal balances and refinement of effect which the performances have under Mr. Rabaud's baton, and which are more often missed than observed under Dr. Muck? The fundamental reason for this, dear reader, if you do not know as much about the matter as we know, is that Mr. Rabaud is rather scrupulous about preserving the original instrumental values of the composer, while Dr. Muck was not. That is, Dr. Muck was never content to leave a score as found it. He not only felt at liberty to mute a trumpet when it was unmuted, or unmute it when there were directions for the player to use the mute, or tamper with a new work by Strauss or Sibelius by doubling the number of the wind instruments, even writing in notes which were not a part of the original harmony, as the writer can personally testify, but he would even meddle with the instrumentation of a Beethoven in a manner which, while novel, was seldom artistic. Witness the barbarism of the six horns in place of three in the trio of the scherzo of the "Eroica" symphony. Witness the effect which Mr. Rabaud obtains with two horns in the finale of the fifth symphony, in place of the redoubled of brass artillery which Dr. Muck thought necessary for effect in this passage. Rabaud's performance of a noted German composition, as a matter of fact, was consistently nobler and more eloquent than Muck's. To some the statement will be unbelievable, but there will always be in the world those who fit facts to preconceptions, instead of preconceptions to facts.

Now these things are worth pondering, especially in view of the prevailing discussion of Mr. Rabaud's successor, if Mr. Rabaud is not retained, next season.

New players seldom improve the ensemble of an orchestra, as they did center in Rabaud. Rather the contrary. The tone-quality of the Boston orchestra, as a discriminating music critic pointed out in performance, is primarily the result of the individuality of the conductor, the present brilliancy and finish of the Boston Symphony concerts has been caused, first, by the personality and the superb practical ability with which Mr. Pierre Monteux rehearsed the orchestra in the last weeks of its present season, and secondly, because of the fine musical sense of Mr. Rabaud, and, we have said, his scrupulous regard for the original instrumentation of the composer.

It will not be easy to find a conductor more competent to fulfill all the duties of the post and more fitted to the duties more and more musical in the qualities of refinement and superiority of the conducting class of the Symphony, as it is today, appear to be warming up to Mr. Rabaud's qualities. Even the most strong partisans, his wishes, and giving opinions certain and expressively to their individual [illegible] the collective all is felt by every one.

It is not a question of whether Mr. Rabaud measures up to the level of the concerts under Muck. No open-eared and unprejudiced person would deny the evidence of his superiority of the conductor with as now. It is a question of whether it is possible or desirable to improve on Rabaud.

In the list of new players who have joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, published in the Post of last Sunday, there was unintentional omission of the name of H. Stanislaski, the new cello player. He is an Englishman, born in Kidderminster, England, in 1882. He won the wood-wind scholarship for British subjects offered by the Royal Academy of Music in 1898. Competing then as a student, he won the Ross scholarship, the most valuable offered by the Royal Academy, in 1900. In 1904 he graduated with full honors from the Royal Academy and was in the same year engaged by Sir Henry Wood as English horn and first oboe of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. During that time he has played under most of the distinguished conductors of the day, among them Elgar, Debussy, Elgar, Grieg, Loewe, Monteaux, Muck, Mundelberg, Nikisch, Rabaud, Sibelius, Strauss, Wood and Weingartner. In 1912 he was awarded the honorary degree of Associate of the Royal Academy of Music for his success in his profession.

There are still many admirers of Mr. Muck in Boston—admirers apparently so fascinated by the personality of the man, and so imposed upon by the adulation which he was held as a musician who could do no wrong, that they try to minimize the enormous impression as a musician and conductor which Mr. Rabaud, unpretentious as he is, is making in this city. Therefore, and if only to conceal the fact that they obviously overrated a German conductor, while in total ignorance of the qualities of a French conductor, these adherents of a fallen idol endeavor to bolster their cause by the following inference: "Mr. Rabaud is a very competent conductor. But we need a great conductor. Who will be his successor?"

Mr. Toscanini is mentioned as the great possibility. He is perhaps the greatest "genius," to use an abused term, of the day, at least in opera. We do not know him as a concert conductor, but we know the marvels of certain of his operatic performances. Undoubtedly, however, from Boston's standpoint, he would draw, for at least a few months, packed houses, and that is a very important consideration for a Boston musical institution. The salary Mr. Toscanini would probably demand and his capability to the enormous labor of a singing routine of a Boston Symphony season are matters not for prophecy. But they are matters of the most vital importance to the future of the Boston Symphony and its public. Some conductors are risky, if certain experiments led for a trip during the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play on the following Friday and Saturday (Feb. 11 and 12) an eventful programme. There will be two soloists—Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster of 28, who will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor. Mr. Hackett will sing the solo parts of a suite of Faure from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," the score of which Mr. Rabaud has obtained from France through our government. A notable revival will be Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," a work of large proportions and apparently of great beauty, which has been studiously neglected in this country, only one or another of its four movements having been heard.

The thing to be realized by everyone concerned, as it appears to us, is this: That we now have at the head of the Boston Symphony, a conductor of performances maintain the most brilliant traditions of that body, a conductor not only equal in many respects superior to Muck. We should value him as such. The performances of the concerts are so good, without any possibility of reasonable disputation, better as regards tone-quality, improved in interpretation and of programmes than they have been for many years. Not in the improvement in tone quality, always a basic consideration with an orchestra, due merely or particularly to the new members.

GLOBE—FEBRUARY 9,

Two Soloists This Week at the Symphony Concerts

The program for the Boston Symphony concert of the coming Friday and Saturday is conspicuous for three apparently important French works, two of which, and two young American soloists, Mr Fradkin, the new concertmaster, who will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Mr Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo parts in a Suite by Faure (Roberto Malatesta) written as incidental music to Haraucourt's Comedy, "Shylock." A revival will be the Prelude to Act II of Chabrier's opera "Swendoline," and another, of presumably great beauty and importance, Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," in four movements, depicting "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche borne aloft by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros" and "Psyche and Eros." Finally, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz'

Our new concertmaster, Mr Frederic Fradkin, possesses two instruments of which he is extremely proud. One is his "Strad," heavily insured, which he uses for solo playing. The other is also a fine instrument, presented to him by the French Government when he took the first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a fine cello which a great cellist can violinist has attained. Mr Fradkin has had an unusually wide experience as soloist for his 26 years. He played widely in Europe as soloist and concertmaster both. In 1911 he came to this country, played, and, playing with the New York Philharmonic, was the last soloist under Gustav Mahler before the latter's death. Again he crossed the seas to America in 1913 as concertmaster of the Russian Ballet.

SUN, BALTIMORE, FEBRUARY 2,

THE HISTORY AND PROGRESS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

What Changes Time Has Brought To The Personnel Of The Famous Musical Body Since Its Inception In 1881.

THE Boston Post recently published a particularly interesting historical account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by Olin Downes, which is reprinted in part below:

The changes in personnel have been gradual, at least until recently. Some changes—usually those in which a new conductor made his advent—saw more changes than others. But the practical realism, the unflinching devotion to the highest standards, which characterized the existence of this famous organization, have remained, and are with it still, in spite of the upheavals of public feeling and the results of recent managements, misunderstanding with the public, the orchestra remains today firmly on its feet, worthy in the artistic qualities in its performance of its most brilliant traditions and secure in the esteem of its patrons.

Forty-eight years have gone by since George Henschel first raised the baton in the old Music Hall. During 37 of those years the orchestra was the faithful recipient of the energy and generosity of Major Higginson, and a testimony to the enduring faith which made it possible for him, with the help of his right-hand man, Charles A. Ellis, and the distinguished musicians they brought to Boston, to realize an ambition which to so many in 1881 so impracticable as to be as the stars in the heavens. There were questions of a kind [illegible] demands on the foresight of the management, abilities of the conductors and of the founder, but there was, [illegible] a great public to be brought to [illegible] the things the orchestra was to love great music and support [illegible] organization and its growing [illegible] more warmly through years.

There was when the performance of [illegible] and revolutionary score saw more people on the stage than in the audience, [illegible] part of that audience having [illegible] its disapproval by quietly upping and getting out. This occurred when Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was played by Mr. Gericke in [illegible] Today Strauss, Debussy, d'Indy, Ravel find an eager and intelligent welcome at the concerts.

A National Influence.

The influence of the orchestra, not merely on local musical conditions, but over wide tracts of the United States, is today one of its most notable distinctions. This influence has been felt directly in its many tours, of which the last to the San Francisco Exposition of 1915 was the most notable; in the famous conductors it has presented the American public; in the unrivaled artistic quality of its performances; and indirectly in the number of significant smaller organizations which have developed from its ranks.

First of these was the celebrated Kneisel Quartet, recently and regretfully disbanded. Franz Kneisel came to America as concertmaster under Wilhelm Gericke in 1885. With him, among other men Mr. Gericke had engaged, were Louis Svecenski, for many years a member of "the Kneisels"; Emmanuel Fiedler, violinist, whose son, Arthur Fiedler, is one of the youngest members of the orchestra today; Max Zach, since 1907 concertmaster of the St. Louis Orchestra; A. Moldauer, for many years a member of the Adamowski Quartet, as was Mr. Zach. "All the new musicians," says Mr. Gericke, in a letter which has been made public, "were very young and the concertmaster one of the youngest; so young, that he did not even know how to smoke. On our trip over, it my duty to teach him this art, which he has certainly been a past master ever since."

Kneisel resigned from the Symphony Orchestra in 1903 to devote himself to his quartet of the work, the other members of the quartet, which included Kneisel, Julius Theodorowitz, Svecenski and Alvin Schroeder, with him. In the same year [illegible]

Music Versus the Piano

Celebrated Artist Who Did Not Play but "Only Made Music"—The Question of Next Season's Conductor of the B. S. O.—Concert Notes

Some genius of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when Alfred Cortot, the pianist, played there a week ago Saturday evening remarked of his surprising performances. "That isn't piano playing. We do not know the name of this unfortunate man. We would not wish to hold him up as an example to posterity if we did. What we wish to record is the admirable rejoinder of a better musician, 'No, that isn't piano playing that's only music.'

Mr. Cortot made music. He was not patient on calisthenics at the keyboard, or concerned in any way with self display or glorification. He was absorbed in the interpretation of music by Franck and d'Indy, and his performances of their works will long be remembered in this city. His performance of Franck showed a conception which did not originate at the keyboard, but from a masterly analysis and an understanding of the orchestral score. This was particularly the case, he it should have been, in the interpretation of the piano part of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." There are pianists who publicly prate of "tone-color" and writers who expatiate in a vague and general way on this topic. Those with a serious and intelligent interest in this subject opened their eyes at Mr. Cortot's performance, at the manner in which the piano tone assumed a dozen different qualities and shades, according not only to the nature of the passage performed, but with relation to the tone-qualities and balances of the other orchestral instruments. For in this symphony the piano, although not robbed of any of its individual capacities, is an orchestral instrument.

For those who make a special study of the piano, nothing could have been more instructive than the appearance of Mr. Cortot. We do not recall any soloist at these concerts in recent years who so completely merged the virtuoso in the master interpreter. Now music of the piano is only one element of Mr. Cortot's equipment as a musician, and not the foremost. He can play as he does only for the reason that his musical comprehension is far in advance of his playing.

Entering the Paris Conservatoire when very young, he went through the musical apprenticeship, which is more thorough and more artistic in France today than in any other country. Like most progressive musicians, he fell, in due course, under the spell and the wonder of Wagner, and was a "repitateur" in a performance of Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" at Bayreuth. He founded a choral society which bears his name, and, as its conductor, gave not only a concert production of "Tarsifal," but performances of important choral works by Brahms, Liszt, Beethoven and others. He became conductor of the Société Nationale. Born of French parents in Noyon, Switzerland, he is now in his 41 year; that is to say, far from the prime and the sum of his career.

In doing these things, Mr. Cortot is only doing what practically all good musicians, according to the extent of their talent, have done. His activities have been so intense and varied that they developed all his talent. Neither energy or any part of his talent can take it, goes to waste, or lie fallow; and what he does in one field of talent strengthens and stimulates him in all the others.

The lesson of it all is clear. The student or teacher of music works as a rule narrowly, and with far too robust an aim. The cause of the endless failures in music is the cause of failures in any field of activity, a lack of sufficiently definite and at the same time broad and vital purpose. A pupil gets mortal sick of "plugging" with his teacher with no more sense tells the pupil he can do nothing more and go no farther until she knows her own mind. For a pupil or teacher had enough intuition to see that while hand was fortunate for the proper execution of "scales," to look out and around, and read about music, and study other aspects more fundamental and far more fascinating than the scales, how different the result would be. It would be different, economically, too. Where there are 100 piano teachers and 100 piano students and what not at large and without work, there would be original musical research, church, orchestral, chamber music organizations which are mainly conspicuous by their absence in this country, and many other kinds of fruitful musical activity now generally lacking. There would follow a far more general public knowledge and appreciation of music. There would result from all this more appreciative and interested audiences, and, lo and behold, virtuoso performers who would play like great musicians, and reflect on the national effort in music the credit that a musician such as Mr. Cortot, and the innumerable composers and executants which graduate each year from such institutions as the Paris Conservatoire, reflect on their country.

It will be answered by some people that we have no Conservatoire, and no government or public interested in music seriously or intelligently enough to found a real one, if we decided that we wanted such an institution. But suppose that in the meagerness therefore and students and all music lovers good and true in this country, endeavor, some real study, some real appreciation, acquire some real knowledge of the art they profess to love?

As to music versus playing. He is a reader who attends the Boston Symphony concerts observed the mysteriously restored tonal balances and refinement of effect which the performances have under Mr. Rabaud's baton, and which were more often missed than observed under Dr. Muck. The fundamental reason for this, dear reader, if you do not know as much about the matter as we know, is that Mr. Rabaud is rather scrupulous about preserving the original instrumental values of the composer, while Dr. Muck was not. That is, Dr. Muck was never content to leave a score as found it. His not only felt at liberty to make a change when it was mounted, or assume in them there were directions for the player to use the mute, or tamper with a new work by Strauss or Sibelius by doubling the number of wind instruments or even writing in notes which were not a part of the original harmony, as the writer can personally testify, but he would even meddle with the instrumentation of a Beethoven in a manner which, judge gently, was seldom artistic. Witness the barbarism of the six horns in place of three in the finale of the Ninth Symphony, for instance. Witness the effect which Mr. Rabaud obtained with two horns in the finale of the fifth symphony, in place of the regiment of horn artillery which Dr. Muck and his predecessors used in this passage. That only performance of a noted German composition, as a rule, is the best one is consistently insisted and some element than Muck's. To some the contrast will be unbelievable. Those who are fond of preconceptions, especially in matters of art, will be shocked. But the truth is under the surface, especially in the matter of the performance of German music. Mr. Rabaud is not retained next season.

New orchestras are like cities, and are made by the first conductor. Boston owes much to the individuality of the late Henry Lee Higginson, as Paris owes much to its Lamoureux and Colonne, and Berlin to its Nikisch. The mere existence of such a man as Mr. Rabaud and his retention for a number of years, is a guarantee of the growth in order, and of the permanent place of the orchestra among the great orchestras of the world. The ability which Mr. Rabaud has shown in the matter of the selection of his first lieutenant, Mr. Pierné, and of his engagement of the principal players of the orchestra, is a guarantee of the growth in efficiency and expressiveness of the orchestra under his direction.

All of this is clear to every one.

There are still many admirers of Dr. Muck in Boston—admirers apparently as fascinated by the personality of the man, and so imposed upon by the adulation in which he was held as a musician who could do no wrong, that they try to minimize the enormous impression as a musician and conductor which Mr. Rabaud, unpretentious as he is, is making in this city. Therefore, and if only to convince the fact that there was lonely overrated a German conductor while to the ignorance of the capacities of a French conductor, these observers offer a fallen but endeavor to belittle the achievements of Mr. Rabaud. Well, conductor Mr. Rabaud is a very competent conductor. But we need a great conductor. Who will be the man? Mr. Tassanini is mentioned as the great possibility. He is perhaps the greatest "genius" to appear on the platform of the day, at least in opera. We would like to see him as a concert conductor. We would like to see him at the opening of operatic performances. Impossible! Impossible! Impossible!

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

Music Versus the Piano

Celebrated Artist Who Did Not Play but "Only Made Music"—The Question of Next Season's Conductor of the B. S. O.—Concert Notes

Some genius of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when Alfred Cortot, the pianist, played there a week ago yesterday evening remarked of his superb performance. "That isn't piano playing." We do not know the name of this unfortunate man. We would not wish to hold him up as an example to posterity if we did. What we wish to record is the admirable rejoinder of a better musician, "No, that isn't piano playing. That's only music."

Mr. Cortot made music. He was not intent on calisthenics at the keyboard, or concerned in any way with self display or glorification. He was absorbed in the interpretation of music by Franck and d'Indy, and his performance of their works will long be remembered in this city. His performance of this music showed a conception which did not originate at the keyboard, but from a masterly analysis and a complete understanding of the orchestral score. This was particularly the case, is it should have been, in the interpretation of the piano part of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." There are pianists who publicly prate of "tone-color" and writers who expatiate in a vague and general way on this topic. Those with a serious and intelligent interest in this subject opened their eyes at Mr. Cortot's performance, at the manner in which the piano tone assumed a dozen different qualities and nuances, according not only to the nature of the passage performed, but with relation to the tone-qualities and balances of the other orchestral instruments. For in this symphony the piano, although not robbed of any of its individual capacities, is an orchestral instrument.

For those who make a special study of the piano, nothing could have been more instructive than the appearance of Mr. Cortot. We do not recall any soloist at these concerts in recent years who so completely merged the virtuoso in the master interpreter. Now mastery of the piano is only one element of Mr. Cortot's equipment as a musician, and not the foremost. He can play as he does only for the reason that his musical comprehension is far in advance of his playing.

Entering the Paris Conservatoire when very young, he went through the musical apprenticeship, which is more thorough and more artistic in France today than in any other country. Like most progressive musicians, he fell, in due course, under the spell and the wonder of Wagner, and was a "repitateur" in a performance of Wagner's "Gotterdamerung" at Bayreuth. He founded a choral society which bears his name, and, as its conductor, gave not only a concert production of "Parsifal," but performances of important choral works by Brahms, Liszt, Beethoven and others. He became conductor of the Société Nationale. Born of French parents at Noyon, Switzerland, he is now in his [illegible]d year; that is to say, far from the [illegible]nd and the sum of his career.

In doing these things, Mr. Cortot is only doing what practically all good musicians, according to the extent of their talent, have done. His activities have been so intense and varied that they developed all his talent. Neither energy or any part of his brain, we take it, goes to waste, or lies fallow, and what he does in one field of his art strengthens and stimulates him in all the others.

The lesson of it all is this: The student or teacher of music works as a rule narrowly, and with far too restricted aims. The cause of the endless failures in music is the cause of failures in any field of activity, a lack of sufficiently definite and at the same time broad and vital purposes. A pupil gets mortal sick of "playing scales"; a teacher with no more sense tells the pupil she can do nothing more and go no farther until she knows her "scales." But if pupil or teacher had enough initiative, while the hand was forming for the proper execution of "scales," to look out and around, and read about music, and study other aspects more fundamental and far more fascinating than the scales, how different the result would be. It would be different economically, too. Where there are 100 piano teachers and 1000 pianists, fiddlers and what not at large and without work, there would be original musical research; choral, orchestral, chamber music organizations which are mainly conspicuous by their absence in this country, and many other kinds of fruitful musical activity now generally lacking. There would follow a far more general public knowledge and appreciation of music. There would result from all this more appreciative and interested audiences, and, lo and behold, virtuoso performers who would play like great musicians, and reflect on the national effort in music the credit that a musician such as Mr. Cortot, and the innumerable composers and executants which graduate each year from such an institution as the Paris Conservatoire, reflect on their country.

It will be answered by some people that we have no Conservatoire, and no government or public interested in music seriously or intelligently enough to found a real one, if we decided that we wanted such an institution. But suppose that in the meanwhile teachers and students and all music lovers good and true in this country, undertake some real study, some real preparation, to acquire some real knowledge of the art they profess to love?

As to music versus playing: Has the reader who attends the Boston Symphony concerts observed the mysteriously restored tonal balances and refinement of effect which the performances have under Mr. Rabaud's baton, and which were more often missed than observed under Dr. Muck? The fundamental reason for this, dear reader, if you do not know as much about the matter as we know, is that Mr. Rabaud is rather scrupulous about preserving the original instrumental values of the composer, while Dr. Muck was not. That is, Dr. Muck was never content to leave a score as found it. He not only felt at liberty to mute a trumpet when it was unmuted, or unmute it when there were directions for the player to use the mute, or tamper with a new work by Strauss or Sibelius by doubling the number of brass instruments or even writing in notes which were not a part of the original harmony, as the writer can personally testify, but he would even meddle with the instrumentation of a Beethoven in a manner which, while novel, was seldom artistic. Witness the barbarism of the six horns in place of three in the trio of the scherzo of the "Eroica" symphony. Witness the effect which Mr. Rabaud obtained with two horns in the finale of the fifth symphony, in place of the regiment of brass artillery which Dr. Muck was accustomed to employ in this passage. Rabaud's performance of a noted German composition, as a matter of fact, was consistently nobler and more eloquent than Muck's. To some the statement will be unbelievable, but there will always be in the world those who fit facts to preconceptions, instead of preconceptions to facts.

Now these things are worth pondering, especially in view of the present-day discussion of Mr. Rabaud's successor, if Mr. Rabaud is not retained, next season.

New players seldom improve the ensemble of an orchestra when they first enter it. Rather the contrary. The tone-quality of the Boston orchestra, as everything else which pertains to its performances, is primarily the result of the abilities of the conductor. The present brilliancy and finish of the Boston Symphony concerts has been caused, first, by the energy and the superb practical ability with which Mr. Pierre Monteux rehearsed the orchestra in the early weeks of its present season, and secondly because of the fine musical sense of Mr. Rabaud and, as we have said, his scrupulous regard for the original instrumentation of the composer.

It will not be easy to find a conductor more competent to fulfill all the duties of his post and make the orchestra more and more musical in the qualities of its performances. Even the most stodgy players of the Symphony, as it is today, appear to be warming up to Mr. Rabaud, responding more and more sensitively to his wishes, and giving added warmth and expressiveness to their individual tasks—and the collective result is felt by every one.

It is not a question of whether Mr. Rabaud sustains the level of the concerts under Muck. No open-eared and unprejudiced person would deny the evident and considerable superiority of the conductor with us now. It is a question of whether it is possible or desirable to improve on Rabaud.

In the list of new players who have joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, published in the Post of last Sunday, there was unintentional omission of the name of H. Stanislaus, the new oboe player. He is an Englishman, born in Kidderminster, England, in 1882. He won the wood-wind scholarship for British subjects offered by the Royal Academy of Music in 1898. Competing then as a student, he won the Ross scholarship, the most valuable offered by the Royal Academy, in 1900. In 1904 he graduated with full honors from the Royal Academy and was in the same year engaged by Sir Henry Wood as English horn and first oboe of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Since that time he has played under most of the distinguished conductors of the day, among them Colonne, Debussy, Elgar, Grieg, Loewe, Monteaux, Muck, Mundelberg, Nikisch, Rabaud, Sibelius, Strauss, Wood and Weingartner. In 1912 he was awarded the honorary degree of Associate of the Royal Academy of Music for his success in his profession.

There are still many admirers of Muck in Boston—admirers apparently so fascinated by the personality of the man, and so imposed upon by the adulation in which he was held as a musician who could do no wrong, that they try to minimize the enormous impression as a musician and conductor which Mr. Rabaud, unpretentious as he is, is making in this city. Therefore, and if only to conceal the fact that they obviously overrated a German conductor while in total ignorance of the capacities of a French conductor, these adherents of a fallen idol endeavor to bolster up their cause by the following inference: "Mr. Rabaud is a very competent conductor. But we need a great conductor. Who will be his successor?"

Mr. Toscanini is mentioned as the great possibility. He is perhaps the greatest "genius," to use an abused term, of the day, at least in opera. We do not know him as a concert conductor, but we know the marvels of certain of his operatic performances. Undoubtedly, however, from boxoffice standards he would draw, for at least a few months, packed houses, and that is a very important consideration for a big musical institution. The salary Mr. Toscanini would probably demand and his adaptability to the enormous labor and fatiguing routine of a long symphony season are matters not for prophets. But they are matters of the most serious importance to the future of the Boston Symphony and its public. "Star" conductors are risky, if tempting experiments.

The thing to be realized by everyone concerned, as it appears to us, is this: That we now have at the head of the Boston Symphony, a conductor whose performances maintain the most brilliant traditions of that body, a conductor not only equal, but in several respects superior to Muck. We should value him as such. The performances of the orchestra are today, without any possibility of reasonable disputation, better as regards tone-quality, interest of interpretation and of programmes than they have been for many long years. Nor is the improvement in tone-quality, always a basic consideration with an orchestra, due merely or particularly to the new members.

[illegible]led for a trip during the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play on the following Friday and Saturday (Feb. 14 and 15) an eventful programme. There will be two soloists—Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster of 26, who will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor. Mr. Hacket will sing the solo parts of a suite of Faure from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," the score of which Mr. Rabaud has obtained from France through our government. A notable revival will be Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," a work of large proportions and apparently of great beauty, which has been unduly neglected in this country—only one or another of its four movements having been played here.

GLOBE—FEBRUARY 9,

Two Soloists This Week at the Symphony Concerts

The program for the Boston Symphony concert of the coming Friday and Saturday is conspicuous for three apparently important French numbers resurrected, and two young American soloists. Mr Fradkin, the new concertmaster, will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Mr Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo parts in a Suite by Faure (hitherto unknown here) written as incidental music to Haraucourt's Comedy "Shylock." A revival will be the Prelude to Act II or Chabrier's Opera "Gwendoline," and another, of presumably great beauty and importance, Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," in four movements, depicting—"Psyche's Sleep, "Psyche borne aloft by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros" and "Psyche and Eros." Finally, the more familiar overture of Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival."

Our new concertmaster, Mr Frederic Fradkin, possesses two instruments of which he is extremely proud. One is his "Strad." heavily insured, which he uses for solo playing. The other is also a fine instrument, presented to him by the French Government when he took the first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and the only one which an American violinist has attained. Mr Fradkin has had an unusually wide experience as soloist for his 26 years. He played widely in Europe as soloist and concertmaster both. In 1911 he came to this his native country, and, playing with the New York Philharmonic, was the last soloist under Mahler before the latter's death. Again he crossed the seas to America in 1915 as concertmaster of the Russian Ballet.

SUN, BALTIMORE, FEBRUARY 2,

THE HISTORY AND PROGRESS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

What Changes Time Has Brought To The Personnel Of The Famous Musical Body Since Its Inception In 1881.

THE Boston Post recently published a particularly interesting historical account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by Olin Downes, which is reprinted in part below:

The changes in personnel have been gradual, at least until recently. Some seasons—usually those in which a new conductor made his advent—saw more changes than others. But the practical idealism, the unflinching devotion to the highest standards, which inaugurated the existence of this famous organization, have remained, and are with it still.

In spite of the upheavals of public feeling and the results of recent managerial misunderstanding with the public, the orchestra remains today firmly on its feet, worthy in the artistic qualities of its performance of its most brilliant traditions and secure in the esteem of its patrons.

Thirty-eight years have gone by since George Henschel first raised the baton in the old Music Hall. During 37 of those years the orchestra was the faithful reflection of the energy and generosity of Major Higginson, and a testimony to the enduring faith which made it possible for him, with the help of his right-hand man, Charles A. Ellis, and the distinguished musicians they brought to America, to realize an ambition which to many in 1881 as impracticable as the stars in the heavens. There were there questions of a kind [illegible] the most [illegible] demands on [illegible]ess foresight of the management, abilities of the conductors and [illegible]et of the founder, but there was, [illegible]l, a great public to be brought to [illegible]ate the things the orchestra was [illegible] to love great music and support [illegible]wing organization and its growing [illegible] more and more warmly through [illegible] years.

Time was when the performance of [illegible]ew and revolutionary score saw more [illegible]ople on the stage than in the audience, [illegible]he larger part of that audience having [illegible]signified its disapproval by quietly up[illegible]sing and getting out. This occurred [illegible]hen Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was played by Mr. Gericke in [illegible]887. Today Strauss, Debussy, d'Indy, Ravel find an eager and intelligent welcome at the concerts.

A National Influence.

The influence of the orchestra, not merely on local musical conditions, but [illegible]ver wide tracts of the United States, is today one of its most notable distinctions. This influence has been felt directly in its many tours, of which the [illegible] to the San Francisco Exposition of [illegible] was the most notable; in the famous conductors it has presented the American public; in the unrivaled artistic quality of its performances; and indirectly in the number of significant smaller organizations which have developed from its ranks.

[illegible] of these was the celebrated [illegible] Quartet, recently and regrettably [illegible]. Franz Kneisel came to America [illegible] concertmaster under Wilhelm [illegible] 1885. With him, among other activities, and give, as of old, concerts in many of the principal cities of the United States. The broad educational work which his string quartet accomplished and his activities as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are not the only directions in which Mr. Hoffmann has done public service. He was for many years concertmaster of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, and has frequently appeared as soloist at these concerts and also at the subscription Symphony concerts of the winter season. His activities as a teacher have been extensive. He has been for six years conductor of the People's Orchestra of the Boston Music School Settlement. Mr. Hoffmann's son, Ernst H. Hoffmann, a graduate cum laude of Harvard University, is a violinist and pianist of uncommon attainments, who is soon to appear in public, and was successively concertmaster, soloist and conductor of the orchestra of the Perian Sodality of Harvard.

An admirable string quartet led by Richard Czerwonky, second concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, appeared in the season of 1907-08. Next season Czerwonky was concertmaster of another orchestra, and Boston knew his quartet no more. It was missed, for it played with uncommon fire and musical feeling.

Ranking with the Kneisel Quartet in its artistic standards and in its distinctive accomplishment is the Longy Club of players on wind instruments. Georges Longry, of world fame as an artist on his instrument, the oboe, came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as first oboist in the season of 1898-99. He founded the Longy Club in the season of 1900-01. It quickly became known as a body of virtuosi and musicians of the highest rank, whose performances were revelations of the capacity of a wind ensemble and of the character of much valuable modern music, particularly modern music by French composers.

No member of the Boston Symphony has rendered more service to his art while in the orchestra than Mr. Longy. He remains the leader of the wood-wind section of the Boston Symphony, and his solo passages alone would reflect distinction on these concerts. He was leader of Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral club from 1890 to 1913, and in this position showed his capacities as a brilliant conductor, though almost all of his players were amateurs. The programs were of the most exceptional interest, introducing many modern orchestral works in Boston years before they were played by the Boston Symphony. In 1915 Mr. Longy became conductor of the MacDowell Club, of this city, in which capacity he directs both the orchestra, which is now a substantial body capable of brilliant performances, and the chorus founded more recently by the officers of this organization.

This season Mr. Longy is also conductor of the Cecilia, while his school of music, founded several seasons ago, has become a flourishing and important musical institution. It is good to know that the Longy Club, which, like the Kneisel Quartet and other of the organizations which radiated from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was assisted for years by the generosity of Major Higginson, is reorganized this season, after a winter when the exigencies of wartime scattered its personnel and made impossible its customary series of concerts, and will soon commence to make public appearances. By Mr. Longy sits Clement Lenom, second oboist, a member of the orchestra since 1901, a conductor at the Pops, teacher of solfege, oboe and wood-wind at the New England Conservatory, a sterling musician, active in many capacities in this city.

The Changes Of Today.

Today the conditions which govern the policies of the Boston Symphony are changed in many important respects from those of the years intervening between 1881 and 1917. The orchestra in those years had character and the poli[illegible]

ods of Dr. Muck and Mr. Rabaud is interesting and typical of two different schools of music and morals. The writer of these words came over with Mr. Rabaud from New York. Noting the extreme sensitiveness of feature, the kindliness of glance, the simplicity, sincerity and, in the highest sense of the word, gentleness which characterized the man, one thought, "What a fine nature. But how will he control the orchestra?"

For an orchestra of the dimensions and the makeup of the Boston Symphony is not an easy thing to control. Dr. Muck made the men fear him. He had ears and eyes all around his head and an extremely caustic tongue. He knew how to be brutal. One does not easily think of Mr. Rabaud in connection with these characteristics.

This is the way in which a member of the orchestra summarized the difference between the two: "With Muck—well, you have a general. He is a very good general. You may not love him, but if he says 'Charge. You will be killed,' you obey. You charge. You are killed. But Monsieur Rabaud—we love him. We give him gladly all there is in us. Also, he has great tact and is very practical. If a little thing goes wrong in rehearsal, he says to himself, 'This man is a musician. He knows he has done wrong. I do not have to tell him so. Next time he will do right.' And we do! We think of the music—the big things in the music, not merely the details of technic. We like to play—for him."

"This musician," said Philip Hale in a recent review of a performance by Rabaud, "of broad sympathies, kindly authority and a spirit which blazes when the music makes demand."

The story of many of the French who have joined the orchestra this season is a romance of war.

Ferdinand Thillois, the new first violin, has served at the front in the Ninety-first Infantry. He fought at the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and Chemin des Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital playing for wounded comrades. He came to Boston last spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville, in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890; was a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied with Lefort, the teacher of Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Thillois was a member of the Colonne and Lamoureaux orchestras.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, FEBRUARY 9,

Two Soloists a Symphony Feature

TWO young American soloists will grace the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday. Fredric Fradkin, the new concert master, will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo parts in a suite by Faure, which was written as incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock."

There will be two revivals, the prelude of Act II of Chambrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture is the final number.

CONCERTMASTER FREDRIC FRADKIN, soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.

Music Versus the Piano

Celebrated Artist Who Did Not Play but "Only Made Music"—The Question of Next Season's Conductor of the B. S. O.—Concert Notes

Some genius of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when Alfred Cortot, the pianist, played there a week ago yesterday evening remarked of his superb performance. "That isn't piano playing." We do not know the name of this unfortunate man. We would not wish to hold him up as an example to posterity if we did. What we wish to record is the admirable rejoinder of a better musician, "No, that isn't piano playing. That's only music."

Mr. Cortot made music. He was not intent on calisthenics at the keyboard, or concerned in any way with self display or glorification. He was absorbed in the interpretation of music by Franck and d'Indy, and his performance of their works will long be remembered in this city. His performance of this music showed a conception which did not originate at the keyboard, but from a masterly analysis and a complete understanding of the orchestral score. This was particularly the case, is it should have been, in the interpretation of the piano part of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." There are pianists who publicly prate of "tone-color" and writers who expatiate in a vague and general way on this topic. Those with a serious and intelligent interest in this subject opened their eyes at Mr. Cortot's performance, at the manner in which the piano tone assumed a dozen different qualities and nuances, according not only to the nature of the passage performed, but with relation to the tone-qualities and balances of the other orchestral instruments. For in this symphony the piano, although not robbed of any of its individual capacities, is an orchestral instrument.

For those who make a special study of the piano, nothing could have been more instructive than the appearance of Mr. Cortot. We do not recall any soloist at these concerts in recent years who so completely merged the virtuoso in the master interpreter. Now mastery of the piano is only one element of Mr. Cortot's equipment as a musician, and not the foremost. He can play as he does only for the reason that his musical comprehension is far in advance of his playing.

Entering the Paris Conservatoire when very young, he went through the musical apprenticeship, which is more thorough and more artistic in France today than in any other country. Like most progressive musicians, he fell, in due course, under the spell and the wonder of Wagner, and was a "repitateur" in a performance of Wagner's "Gotterdamerung" at Bayreuth. He founded a choral society which bears his name, and, as its conductor, gave not only a concert production of "Parsifal," but performances of important choral works by Brahms, Liszt, Beethoven and others. He became conductor of the Societe Nationale. Born of French parents at Noyon, Switzerland, he is now in his 3d year; that is to say, far from the end and the sum of his career.

In doing these things, Mr. Cortot is only doing what practically all good musicians, according to the extent of their talent, have done. His activities have been so intense and varied that they developed all his talent. Neither energy or any part of his brain, we take it, goes to waste, or lies fallow, and what he does in one field of his arts strengthens and stimulates him in all the others.

The lesson of it all is this: The student or teacher of music works as a rule narrowly, and with far too restricted aims. The cause of the endless failures in music is the cause of failures in any field of activity, a lack of sufficiently definite and at the same time broad and vital purposes. A pupil gets mortal sick of "playing scales"; a teacher with no more sense tells the pupil she can do nothing more and go no farther until she knows her "scales." But if pupil or teacher had enough initiative, while the hand was forming for the proper execution of "scales," to look out and around, and read about music, and study other aspects more fundamental and far more fascinating than the scales, how different the result would be. It would be different economically, too. Where there are 100 piano teachers and 1000 pianists, fiddlers and what not at large and without work, there would be original musical research; choral, orchestral, chamber music organizations which are mainly conspicuous by their absence in this country, and many other kinds of fruitful musical activity now generally lacking. There would follow a far more general public knowledge and appreciation of music. There would result from all this more appreciative and interested audiences, and, lo and behold, virtuoso performers who would play like great musicians, and reflect on the national effort in music the credit that a musician such as Mr. Cortot, and the innumerable composers and executants which graduate each year from such an institution as the Paris Conservatoire, reflect on their country.

It will be answered by some people that we have no Conservatoire, and no government or public interested in music seriously or intelligently enough to found a real one, if we decided that we wanted such an institution. But suppose that in the meanwhile teachers and students and all music lovers good and true in this country, undertake some real study, some real preparation, to acquire some real knowledge of the art they profess to love?

As to music versus playing: Has the reader who attends the Boston Symphony concerts observed the mysteriously restored tonal balances and refinement of effect which the performances have under Mr. Rabaud's baton, and which were more often missed than observed under Dr. Muck? The fundamental reason for this, dear reader, if you do not know as much about the matter as we know, is that Mr. Rabaud is rather scrupulous about preserving the original instrumental values of the composer, while Dr. Muck was not. That is, Dr. Muck was never content to leave a score as found it. He not only felt at liberty to mute a trumpet when it was unmuted, or unmute it when there were directions for the player to use the mute, or tamper with a new work by Strauss or Sibelius by doubling the number of brass instruments or even writing in notes which were not a part of the original harmony, as the writer can personally testify, but he would even meddle with the instrumentation of a Beethoven in a manner which, while novel, was seldom artistic. Witness the barbarism of the six horns in place of three in the trio of the scherzo of the "Eroica" symphony. Witness the effect which Mr. Rabaud obtained with two horns in the finale of the fifth symphony, in place of the regiment of brass artillery which Dr. Muck was accustomed to employ in this passage. Rabaud's performance of a noted German composition, as a matter of fact, was consistently nobler and more eloquent than Muck's. To some the statement will be unbelievable, but there will always be in the world those who fit facts to preconceptions, instead of preconceptions to facts.

Now these things are worth pondering, especially in view of the present-day discussion of Mr. Rabaud's successor, if Mr. Rabaud is not retained, next season.

There are still many admirers of Muck in Boston—admirers apparently so fascinated by the personality of the man, and so imposed upon by the adulation in which he was held as a musician who could do no wrong, that they try to minimize the enormous impression as a musician and conductor which Mr. Rabaud, unpretentious as he is, is making in this city. Therefore, and if only to conceal the fact that they obviously overrated a German conductor while in total ignorance of the capacities of a French conductor, these adherents of a fallen idol endeavor to bolster up their cause by the following inference: "Mr. Rabaud is a very competent conductor. But we need a great conductor. Who will be his successor?"

Mr. Toscanini is mentioned as the great possibility. He is perhaps the greatest "genius," to use an abused term, of the day, at least in opera. We do not know him as a concert conductor, but we know the marvels of certain of his operatic performances. Undoubtedly, however, from boxoffice standards he would draw, for at least a few months, packed houses, and that is a very important consideration for a big musical institution. The salary Mr. Toscanini would probably demand and his adaptability to the enormous labor and fatiguing routine of a long symphony season are matters not for prophets. But they are matters of the most serious importance to the future of the Boston Symphony and its public. "Star" conductors are risky, if tempting experiments.

The thing to be realized by everyone concerned, as it appears to us, is this: That we now have at the head of the Boston Symphony, a conductor whose performances maintain the most brilliant traditions of that body, a conductor not only equal, but in several respects superior to Muck. We should value him as such. The performances of the orchestra are today, without any possibility of reasonable disputation, better as regards tone-quality, interest of interpretation and of programmes than they have been for many long years. Nor is the improvement in tone-quality, always a basic consideration with an orchestra, due merely or particularly to the new members.

New players seldom improve the ensemble of an orchestra when they first enter it. Rather the contrary. The tone-quality of the Boston orchestra, as everything else which pertains to its performances, is primarily the result of the abilities of the conductor. The present brilliancy and finish of the Boston Symphony concerts has been caused, first, by the energy and the superb practical ability with which Mr. Pierre Monteux rehearsed the orchestra in the early weeks of its present season, and secondly because of the fine musical sense of Mr. Rabaud and, as we have said, his scrupulous regard for the original instrumentation of the composer.

It will not be easy to find a conductor more competent to fulfill all the duties of his post and make the orchestra more and more musical in the qualities of its performances. Even the most sleepy players of the Symphony, as it is today, appear to be warming up to Mr. Rabaud, responding more and more sensitively to his wishes, and giving added warmth and expressiveness to their individual tasks [illegible] the collective result is felt by every one.

It is not a question of whether Mr. Rabaud sustains the level of the concerts under Muck. No open-eared and unprejudiced person would deny the evident and considerable superiority of the conductor with us now. It is a question of whether it is possible or desirable to improve on Rabaud.

In the list of new players who have joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, published in the Post of last Sunday, there was unintentional omission of the name of H. Stanislaus, the new oboe player. He is an Englishman, born in Kidderminster, England, in 1882. He won the wood-wind scholarship for British subjects offered by the Royal Academy of Music in 1898. Competing then as a student, he won the Ross scholarship, the most valuable offered by the Royal Academy, in 1900. In 1904 he graduated with full honors from the Royal Academy and was in the same year engaged by Sir Henry Wood as English horn and first oboe of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Since that time he has played under most of the distinguished conductors of the day, among them Colonne, Debussy, Elgar, Grieg, Loewe, Monteaux, Muck, Mundelberg, Nikisch, Rabaud, Sibelius, Strauss, Wood and Weingartner. In 1912 he was awarded the honorary degree of Associate of the Royal Academy of Music for his success in his profession.

CON[illegible]

GLOBE—FEBRUARY 9,

Two Soloists This Week at the Symphony Concerts

The program for the Boston Symphony concert of the coming Friday and Saturday is conspicuous for three apparently important French numbers resurrected, and two young American soloists. Mr Fradkin, the new concertmaster, will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Mr Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo parts in a Suite by Faure (hitherto unknown here) written as incidental music to Haraucourt's Comedy "Shylock." A revival will be the Prelude to Act II or Chabrier's Opera "Gwendoline," and another, of presumably great beauty and importance, Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," in four movements, depicting—"Psyche's Sleep, "Psyche borne aloft by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros" and "Psyche and Eros." Finally, the more familiar overture of Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival."

Our new concertmaster, Mr Frederic Fradkin, possesses two instruments of which he is extremely proud. One is his "Strad," heavily insured, which he uses for solo playing. The other is also a fine instrument, presented to him by the French Government when he took the first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and the only one which an American violinist has attained. Mr Fradkin has had an unusually wide experience as soloist for his 26 years. He played widely in Europe as soloist and concertmaster both. In 1911 he came to this, his native country, and, playing with the New York Philharmonic, was the last soloist under Mahler before the latter's death. Again he crossed the seas to America in 1915 as concertmaster of the Russian Ballet.

led for a trip during the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play on the following Friday and Saturday (Feb. 14 and 15) an eventful programme. There will be two soloists—Mr. Fradkin the new concertmaster of [illegible] who will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor. Mr. Hacket will sing the solo parts of a suite of Faure from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," the score of which Mr. Rabaud has obtained from France through our government. A notable revival will be Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," a work of large proportions and apparently of great beauty, which has been unduly neglected in this country—only one or another of its four movements having been played here.

SUN, BALTIMORE, FEBRUARY 2,

THE HISTORY AND PROGRESS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

What Changes Time Has Brought To The Personnel Of The Famous Musical Body Since Its Inception In 1881.

THE Boston Post recently published a particularly interesting historical account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by Olin Downes, which is reprinted in part below:

The changes in personnel have been gradual, at least until recently. Some seasons—usually those in which a new conductor made his advent—saw more changes than others. But the practical idealism, the unflinching devotion to the highest standards, which inaugurated the existence of this famous organization, have remained, and are with it still.

In spite of the upheavals of public feeling and the results of recent managerial misunderstanding with the public, the orchestra remains today firmly on its feet, worthy in the artistic qualities of its performance of its most brilliant traditions and secure in the esteem of its patrons.

Thirty-eight years have gone by since George Henschel first raised the baton in the old Music Hall. During 37 of those years the orchestra was the faithful reflection of the energy and generosity of Major Higginson, and a testimony to enduring faith which made it possi- for him, with the help of his right- man, Charles A. Ellis, and the dis- shed musicians they brought to a, to realize an ambition which o many in 1881 as impracticable te as the stars in the heavens. were there questions of a kind [illegible] the most st[illegible] demands on ess foresight of [illegible]e manage- abilities of the con[illegible]ctors and et of the founder, but [illegible]here was, l, a great public to be brought to ate the things the orchestra was to love great music and support wing organization and its growing more and more warmly through years.

Time was when the performance of new and revolutionary score saw more ople on the stage than in the audience, he larger part of that audience having ignified its disapproval by quietly upsing and getting out. This occurred hen Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was played by Mr. Gericke in 1887. Today Strauss, Debussy, d'Indy, Ravel find an eager and intelligent welcome at the concerts.

A National Influence.

The influence of the orchestra, not merely on local musical conditions, but over wide tracts of the United States, is today one of its most notable distinctions. This influence has been felt directly in its many tours, of which the [illegible] to the San Francisco Exposition of 1915 was the most notable; in the famous conductors it has presented the American public; in the unrivaled artistic quality of its performances; and indirectly in the number of significant smaller organizations which have developed from its ranks.

First of these was the celebrated Kneisel Quartet, recently and regrettably disbanded. Franz Kneisel came to America as concertmaster under Wilhelm Gericke in 1885. With him, among other activities, and give, as of old, concerts in many of the principal cities of the United States. The broad educational work which his string quartet accomplished and his activities as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are not the only directions in which Mr. Hoffmann has done public service. He was for many years concertmaster of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, and has frequently appeared as soloist at these concerts and also at the subscription Symphony concerts of the winter season. His activities as a teacher have been extensive. He has been for six years conductor of the People's Orchestra of the Boston Music School Settlement. Mr. Hoffmann's son, Ernst H. Hoffmann, a graduate cum laude of Harvard University, is a violinist and pianist of uncommon attainments, who is soon to appear in public, and was successively concertmaster, soloist and conductor of the orchestra of the Perian Sodality of Harvard.

An admirable string quartet led by Richard Czerwonky, second concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, appeared in the season of 1907-08. Next season Czerwonky was concertmaster of another orchestra, and Boston knew his quartet no more. It was missed, for it played with uncommon fire and musical feeling.

Ranking with the Kneisel Quartet in its artistic standards and in its distinctive accomplishment is the Longy Club of players on wind instruments. Georges Longry, of world fame as an artist on his instrument, the oboe, came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as first oboist in the season of 1898-99. He founded the Longy Club in the season of 1900-01. It quickly became known as a body of virtuosi and musicians of the highest rank, whose performances were revelations of the capacity of a wind ensemble and of the character of much valuable modern music, particularly modern music by French composers.

No member of the Boston Symphony has rendered more service to his art while in the orchestra than Mr. Longy. He remains the leader of the wood-wind section of the Boston Symphony, and his solo passages alone would reflect distinction on these concerts. He was leader of Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral club from 1899 to 1913, and in this position showed his capacities as a brilliant conductor, though almost all of his players were amateurs. The programs were of the most exceptional interest, introducing many modern orchestral works in Boston years before they were played by the Boston Symphony. In 1915 Mr. Longy became conductor of the MacDowell Club, of this city, in which capacity he directs both the orchestra, which is now a substantial body capable of brilliant performances, and the chorus founded more recently by the officers of this organization.

This season Mr. Longy is also conductor of the Cecilia, while his school of music, founded several seasons ago, has become a flourishing and important musical institution. It is good to know that the Longy Club, which, like the Kneisel Quartet and other of the organizations which radiated from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was assisted for years by the generosity of Major Higginson, is reorganized this season, after a winter when the exigencies of wartime scattered its personnel and made impossible its customary series of concerts, and will soon commence to make public appearances. By Mr. Longy sits Clement Lenom, second oboist, a member of the orchestra since 1901, a conductor at the Pops, teacher of solfege, oboe and wood-wind at the New England Conservatory, a sterling musician, active in many capacities in this city.

The Changes Of Today.

Today the conditions which govern the policies of the Boston Symphony are changed in many important respects from those of the years intervening between 1881 and 1917. The orchestra in those years had character and the poli-

ods of Dr. Muck and Mr. Rabaud is interesting and typical of two different schools of music and morals. The writer of these words came over with Mr. Rabaud from New York. Noting the extreme sensitiveness of feature, the kindliness of glance, the simplicity, sincerity and, in the highest sense of the word, gentleness which characterized the man, one thought, "What a fine nature. But how will he control the orchestra?"

For an orchestra of the dimensions and the makeup of the Boston Symphony is not an easy thing to control. Dr. Muck made the men fear him. He had ears and eyes all around his head and an extremely caustic tongue. He knew how to be brutal. One does not easily think of Mr. Rabaud in connection with these characteristics.

This is the way in which a member of the orchestra summarized the difference between the two: "With Muck—well, you have a general. He is a very good general. You may not love him, but if he says 'Charge. You will be killed,' you obey. You charge. You are killed. But Monsieur Rabaud—we love him. We give him gladly all there is in us. Also, he has great tact and is very practical. If a little thing goes wrong in rehearsal, he says to himself, 'This man is a musician. He knows he has done wrong. I do not have to tell him so. Next time he will do right.' And we do! We think of the music—the big things in the music, not merely the details of technic. We like to play—for him."

"This musician," said Philip Hale in a recent review of a performance by Rabaud, "of broad sympathies, kindly authority and a spirit which blazes when the music makes demand."

The story of many of the French who have joined the orchestra this season is a romance of war.

Ferdinand Thillois, the new first violin, has served at the front in the Ninety-first Infantry. He fought at the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and Chemin des Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital playing for wounded comrades. He came to Boston last spring with the French band. He was born at Charleville, in the Department of Arden, July 19, 1890; was a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied with Lefort, the teacher of Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Thillois was a member of the Colonne and Lamoureaux orchestras.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, FEBRUARY 9,

Two Soloists a Symphony Feature

TWO young American soloists will grace the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday. Fredric Fradkin, the new concert master, will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo parts in a suite by Faure, which was written as incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock."

There will be two revivals, the prelude of Act II of Chambrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture is the final number.

CONCERTMASTER FREDRIC FRADKIN, soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.

...no playing. We do not know the name of this unfortunate man. We would not wish to hold him up as an example to posterity if we did. What we wish to record is the admirable rejoinder of a better musician, "No, that isn't piano playing. That's only music."

Mr. Cortot made music. He was not intent on calisthenics at the keyboard, or concerned in any way with self display or glorification. He was absorbed in the interpretation of music by Franck and d'Indy, and his performance of their works will long be remembered in this city. His performance of this music showed a conception which did not originate at the keyboard, but from a masterly analysis and a complete understanding of the orchestral score. This was particularly the case, is it should have been, in the interpretation of the piano part of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." There are pianists who publicly prate of "tone-color" and writers who expatiate in a vague and general way on this topic. Those with a serious and intelligent interest in this subject opened their eyes at Mr. Cortot's performance, at the manner in which the piano tone assumed a dozen different qualities and nuances, according not only to the nature of the passage performed, but with relation to the tone-qualities and balances of the other orchestral instruments. For in this symphony the piano, although not robbed of any of its individual capacities, is an orchestral instrument.

For those who make a special study of the piano, nothing could have been more instructive than the appearance of Mr. Cortot. We do not recall any soloist at these concerts in recent years who so completely merged the virtuoso in the master interpreter. Now mastery of the piano is only one element of Mr. Cortot's equipment as a musician, and not the foremost. He can play as he does only for the reason that his musical comprehension is far in advance of his playing.

Entering the Paris Conservatoire when very young, he went through the musical apprenticeship, which is more thorough and more artistic in France today than in any other country. Like most progressive musicians, he fell, in due course, under the spell and the wonder of Wagner, and was a "repitateur" in a performance of Wagner's "Gotterdamerung" at Bayreuth. He founded a choral society which bears his name, and, as its conductor, gave not only a concert production of "Parsifal," but performances of important choral works by Brahms, Liszt, Beethoven and others. He became conductor of the Societe Nationale. Born of French parents at Noyon, Switzerland, he is now in his 3d year; that is to say, far from the end and the sum of his career.

In doing these things, Mr. Cortot is only doing what practically all good musicians, according to the extent of their talent, have done. His activities have been so intense and varied that strengthens and stimulates him in the others.

The lesson of it all is this: The student or teacher of music works as a rule narrowly, and with far too restricted aims. The cause of the endless failures in music is the cause of failures in any field of activity, a lack of sufficiently definite and at the same time broad and vital purposes. A pupil gets mortal sick of "playing scales"; a teacher with no more sense tells the pupil she can do nothing more and go no farther until she knows her "scales." But if pupil or teacher had enough initiative, while the hand was forming for the proper execution of "scales," to look out and around, and read about music, and study other aspects more fundamental and far more fascinating than the scales, how different the result would be. It would be different economically, too. Where there are 100 piano teachers and 1000 pianists, fiddlers and what not at large and without work, there would be original musical research; choral, orchestral, chamber music organizations which are mainly conspicuous by their absence in this country, and many other kinds of fruitful musical activity now generally lacking. There would follow a far more general public knowledge and appreciation of music. There would result from all this more appreciative and interested audiences, and, lo and behold, virtuoso performers who would play like great musicians, and reflect on the national effort in music the credit that a musician such as Mr. Cortot, and the innumerable composers and executants which graduate each year from such an institution as the Paris Conservatoire, reflect on their country.

It will be answered by some people that we have no Conservatoire, and no government or public interested in music seriously or intelligently enough to found a real one, if we decided that we wanted such an institution. But suppose that in the meanwhile teachers and students and all music lovers good and true in this country, undertake some real study, some real preparation, to acquire some real knowledge of the art they profess to love?

As to music versus playing: Has the reader who attends the Boston Symphony concerts observed the mysteriously restored tonal balances and refinement of effect which the performances have under Mr. Rabaud's baton, and which were more often missed than observed under Dr. Muck? The fundamental reason for this, dear reader, if you do not know as much about the matter as we know, is that Mr. Rabaud is rather scrupulous about preserving the original instrumental values of the composer, while Dr. Muck was not. That is, Dr. Muck was never content to leave a score as found it. He not only felt at liberty to mute a trumpet when it was unmuted, or unmute it when there were directions for the player to use the mute, or tamper with and more eloquent than Muck's. To some the statement will be unbelievable, but there will always be in the world those who fit facts to preconceptions, instead of preconceptions to facts.

Now these things are worth pondering, especially in view of the present-day discussion of Mr. Rabaud's successor, if Mr. Rabaud is not retained, next season.

New players seldom improve the ensemble of an orchestra when they first enter it. Rather the contrary. The tone-quality of the Boston orchestra, as everything else which pertains to its performances, is primarily the result of the abilities of the conductor. The present brilliancy and finish of the Boston Symphony concerts has been caused, first, by the energy and the superb practical ability with which Mr. Pierre Monteux rehearsed the orchestra in the early weeks of its present season, and secondly because of the fine musical sense of Mr. Rabaud and, as we have said, his scrupulous regard for the original instrumentation of the composer.

It will not be easy to find a conductor more competent to fulfill all the duties of his post and make the orchestra more and more musical in the qualities of its performances. Even the most stodgy players of the Symphony, as it is today, appear to be warming up to Mr. Rabaud, responding more and more sensitively to his wishes, and giving added warmth and expressiveness to their individual tasks—and the collective ult is felt by every one.

It is not a question of whether Mr. Rabaud sustains the level of the concerts under Muck. No open-eared and unprejudiced person would deny the evident and considerable superiority of the conductor with us now. It is a question of whether it is possible or desirable to improve on Rabaud.

In the list of new players who have joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, published in the Post of last Sunday, there was unintentional omission of the name of H. Stanislaus, the new oboe player. He is an Englishman, born in Kidderminster, England, in 1882. He won the wood-wind scholarship for British subjects offered by the Royal Academy of Music in 1898. Competing then as a student, he won the Ross scholarship, the most valuable offered by the Royal Academy, in 1900. In 1904 he graduated with full honors from the Royal Academy and was in the same year engaged by Sir Henry Wood as English horn and first oboe of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Since that time he has played under most of the distinguished conductors of the day, among them Colonne, Debussy, Elgar, Grieg, Loewe, Monteaux, Muck, Mundelberg, Nikisch, Rabaud, Sibelius, Strauss, Wood and Weingartner. In 1912 he was awarded the honorary degree of Associate of the Royal Academy of Music for his success in his profession.

CON

Mr. Toscanini is mentioned as the great possibility. He is perhaps the greatest "genius," to use an abused term, of the day, at least in opera. We do not know him as a concert conductor, but we know the marvels of certain of his operatic performances. Undoubtedly, however, from boxoffice standards he would draw, for at least a few months, packed houses, and that is a very important consideration for a big musical institution. The salary Mr. Toscanini would probably demand and his adaptability to the enormous labor and fatiguing routine of a long symphony season are matters not for prophets. But they are matters of the most serious importance to the future of the Boston Symphony and its public. "Star" conductors are risky, if tempting experiments.

The thing to be realized by everyone concerned, as it appears to us, is this: That we now have at the head of the Boston Symphony, a conductor whose performances maintain the most brilliant traditions of that body, a conductor not only equal, but in several respects superior to Muck. We should value him as such. The performances of the orchestra are today, without any possibility of reasonable disputation, better as regards tone-quality, interest of interpretation and of programmes than they have been for many long years. Nor is the improvement in tone-quality, always a basic consideration with an orchestra, due merely or particularly to the new members.

led for a trip during the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play on the following Friday and Saturday (Feb. 14 and 15) an eventful programme. There will be two soloists—Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster of 26, who will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor. Mr. Hacket will sing the solo parts of a suite of Faure from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," the score of which Mr. Rabaud has obtained from France through our government. A notable revival will be Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," a work of large proportions and apparently of great beauty, which has been unduly neglected in this country—only one or another of its four movements having been played here.

...symphonic poem "Psyche," in four movements, depicting—"Psyche's Sleep, "Psyche borne aloft by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros" and "Psyche and Eros." Finally, the more familiar overture of Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival."

Our new concertmaster, Mr Frederic Fradkin, possesses two instruments of which he is extremely proud. One is his "Strad," heavily insured, which he uses for solo playing. The other is also a fine instrument, presented to him by the French Government when he took the first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and the only one which an American violinist has attained. Mr Fradkin has had an unusually wide experience as soloist for his 26 years. He played widely in Europe as soloist and concertmaster both. In 1911 he came to this, his native country, and, playing with the New York Philharmonic, was the last soloist under Mahler before the latter's death. Again he crossed the seas to America in 1915 as concertmaster of the Russian Ballet.

SUN, BALTIMORE, FEBRUARY 2,

THE HISTORY AND PROGRESS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

What ...e the most s... demands on ...ess foresight of ...e management ...abilities of the con...ctors and ...et of the founder, but there was ...ll, a great public to be brought to ...ate the things the orchestra was ... to love great music and support ...wing organization and its growing ... more and more warmly through ... years.

Has

Per

m

Time was when the performance of ...new and revolutionary score saw more ...eople on the stage than in the audience, ...he larger part of that audience having ...signified its disapproval by quietly up...sing and getting out. This occurred ...when Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was played by Mr. Gericke in 1887. Today Strauss, Debussy, d'Indy, Ravel find an eager and intelligent welcome at the concerts.

A National Influence.

The influence of the orchestra, not merely on local musical conditions, but over wide tracts of the United States, is today one of its most notable distinctions. This influence has been felt directly in its many tours, of which the ...ne to the San Francisco Exposition of ...915 was the most notable; in the ...mous conductors it has presented the ...merican public; in the unrivaled ar...stic quality of its performances; and ...directly in the number of significant ...maller organizations which have de...loped from its ranks.

First of these was the celebrated ...neisel Quartet, recently and regrettably ...sbanded. Franz Kneisel came to Amer... as concertmaster under Wilhelm ...ericke in 1885. With him, among other ...w men Mr. Gericke had engaged, were ...uis Svecenski, for many years a mem... of "the Kneisels"; Emmanuel Fied..., violinist, whose son, Arthur Fiedler, ...one of the youngest members of the ...hestra today; Max Zach, since 1907 ...ductor of the St. Louis Orchestra, ...A. Moldauer, for many years a mem... of the Adamowski Quartet, as was ... Mr. Zach. "All the new musicians," ...e Mr. Gericke, in a letter which has ...been made public, "were very young ... and the concertmaster one of the ...gest; so young, that he did not even ...how to smoke. On our trip over, ...t it my duty to teach him this art, ...which he has certainly been a past ...er ever since!"

...neisel resigned from the Symphony ...estra in 1903 to devote himself ...ly to his quartet work, the other ...bers of the quartet, which included ...z Kneisel, Julius Theodorowitz, ...s Svecenski and Alvin Schroeder, ... with him. In the same year Mr. ...sel's deskmate in the orchestra, ...les Martin Loeffler, resigned to de... himself to composition. His scores ...today among the most significant ... of the Boston Symphony library; ...here is a Mecca, which volinists, ...sers and all serious musicians visit ...gh artistic privilege, at Medfield. ...andez Arbos, the concertmaster ...ceeded Kneisel for a brief period, ...ed in the season of 1903-04 the ... Quartet, Arbos was succeeded by ... Hess, and the Hess-Schroder ...et came into being, performing ...h the seasons of 1904-05 to ...7.

...n Witek, following Hess as con...ster, developed the Witek-Malkin ...onsisting of Mr. and Mrs. Witek, ...ter pianist, and Josef Malkin, now ...ellist of the orchestra.

...he meantime there had been formed ...amowski Quartet, in 1888, and ...mowski Trio, which enlisted, in ... to the services of Timothee and ...damowski, violinist and 'cellist, ... Mme. Szumowska, pianist.

...ts That Won Fame.

...the string quartets composed of ...ymphony players, the Hoffmann ...Quartet founded and headed by ... Hoffmann, violinist, remained ...thful to its original member... ...s now in its seventeenth sea... ...n conditions caused its con... ...suspended last season. These ...ere also mainly responsible ...es in the membership ... to resume its public conductor, though almost all of his players were amateurs. The programs were of the most exceptional interest, introducing many modern orchestral works in Boston years before they were played by the Boston Symphony. In 1915 Mr. Longy became conductor of the MacDowell Club, of this city, in which capacity he directs both the orchestra, which is now a substantial body capable of brilliant performances, and the chorus founded more recently by the officers of this organization.

This season Mr. Longy is also conductor of the Cecilia, while his school of music, founded several seasons ago, has become a flourishing and important musical institution. It is good to know that the Longy Club, which, like the Kneisel Quartet and other of the organizations which radiated from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was assisted for years by the generosity of Major Higginson, is reorganized this season, after a winter when the exigencies of war-time scattered its personnel and made impossible its customary series of concerts, and will soon commence to make public appearances. By Mr. Longy sits Clement Lenom, second oboist, a member of the orchestra since 1901, a conductor at the Pops, teacher of solfege, oboe and wood-wind at the New England Conservatory, a sterling musician, active in many capacities in this city.

The Changes Of Today.

Today the conditions which govern the policies of the Boston Symphony are changed in many important respects from those of the years intervening between 1881 and 1917. The orchestra in those years had character and the policies of a privately owned and directed institution, supported by an enthusiastic public. Its existence was due first of all to Major Higginson's initiative, energy and generosity; secondly, to the foresight and efficiency of the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis, whose policies were not merely those of a trained and exceptionally able business man, but of one who was keenly and intelligently interested in the musical future of the organization, and finally to the distinguished European conductors who were given absolute control of all that pertained to the artistic quality of the performances.

Recently Major Higginson, full of years and weary of the personal responsibilities entailed on him, gave up his personal share in the development of the orchestra and intrusted it to a body of trustees who are fully aware of the fact that the future of the Boston Symphony must be the future of an organization which belongs essentially to the public and ministers to the public need. Mr. Ellis has resigned his position in favor of his previous assistant business manager, William H. Brennan, who joined the managerial staff of the orchestra in 1909, following the death of Fred R. Comee.

As a result of all this, and in response to legitimate and inevitable public sentiment, extensive changes in the personnel of the orchestra have taken place. Principal among these is the replacement of German musicians by French and Americans.

A German conductor of distinguished gifts, false to his trust and the confidence reposed in him by the management in a most delicate situation, has been replaced by two Frenchmen, the first Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who conducted the early concerts of the present season until the present conductor of the Boston Symphony, Henri Rabaud, recently made a member of the French Institute, arrived. Both men have added to the prestige of the orchestra. Both have proved conductors of individuality and exceptional talent. The changes made have been invaluable, if only for the fact that they have shown the fallacy of the superstition that great conductors are born only in Germany.

French The New Spirit.

It is not too much to say that the predominant foreign musical influence in Boston for some time to come will be French, following the long German regime. The difference between the meth-

...ds of Dr. Muck and Mr. Rabaud is interesting and typical of two different ...ools of music and morals. The writer ... these words came over with Mr. ...baud from New York. Noting the ex...ne sensitiveness of feature, the kindli...s of glance, the simplicity, sincerity ..., in the highest sense of the word, ...itleness which characterized the man, ... thought, "What a fine nature. But ...w will he control the orchestra?"

For an orchestra of the dimensions ...d the makeup of the Boston Symphony ...not an easy thing to control. Dr. ...ck made the men fear him. He had ...s and eyes all around his head and ... extremely caustic tongue. He knew ...w to be brutal. One does not easily ...nk of Mr. Rabaud in connection with ...ese characteristics.

This is the way in which a member ... the orchestra summarized the differ...ce between the two: "With Muck—...ll, you have a general. He is a very ...od general. You may not love him, ...t if he says 'Charge. You will be ...lled,' you obey. You charge. You are ...lled. But Monsieur Rabaud—we love ...m. We give him gladly all there is ... us. Also, he has great tact and is very ...actical. If a little thing goes wrong ... rehearsal, he says to himself, 'This ...an is a musician. He knows he has ...one wrong. I do not have to tell him .... Next time he will do right.' And we ...! We think of the music—the big ...ings in the music, not merely the de...ils of technic. We like to play—for ...im."

"This musician," said Philip Hale in ... recent review of a performance by ...abaud, "of broad sympathies, kindly ...uthority and a spirit which blazes when ...e music makes demand."

The story of many of the French who ...ave joined the orchestra this season ... a romance of war.

Ferdinand Thillois, the new first violin, ...as served at the front in the Ninety...irst Infantry. He fought at the battles ...f the Marne, the Argonne and Chemin ...es Dames. In the last battle he was ...ounded and spent 11 months in the ...ospital at Nantes. During the latter ...rt of his convalescence he went from ...ospital to hospital playing for wounded ...mrades. He came to Boston last spring ...ith the French band. He was born at ...harleville, in the Department of Arden, ...uly 19, 1890; was a graduate of the ...aris Conservatoire, where he studied ...ith Lefort, the teacher of Mr. Fradkin, ...he new concertmaster of the orchestra. ...Mr. Thillois was a member of the ...olonne and Lamoureaux orchestras.

ADVERTISER AMERICAN, FEBRUARY 9,

Two Soloists a Symphony Feature

TWO young American soloists will grace the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday. Fredric Fradkin, the new concert master, will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo parts in a suite by Faure, which was written as incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock."

There will be two revivals, the prelude of Act II of Chambrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture is the final number.

CONCERTMASTER FREDRIC FRADKIN, soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.

RECORD, FEBRUARY 12,

WAGNER STILL UNDER BAN AT SYMPHONY HALL

HENRI RABAUD

Who differs with the Boston music reviewers concerning the American music he has played and who does not hesitate to say so.

By J. V. CLARK

How much longer before the music of Richard Wagner is heard in the opera houses and concert halls of the country? The question is heard on all sides. In some places the orchestral leaders are answering now with Wagnerian excerpts. In New York one of the large orchestras played music from "Das Reingold" recently. There are hints of an entire Wagnerian opera to be sung, of course, in English. Here in Boston within the week we have heard a theatre orchestra play "Tannhauser." France still stands firm against Wagner, the "modern German. London by popular vote decided that Wagner should not be tabooed, and all through the war the Wagnerian music dramas have been sung by London companies and provincial English opera companies. But what of Boston? Shall there be a continued ban on Wagner or shall the ban be lifted? The question has been put up to Mr. Rabaud, the orchestra's conductor. There is no questioning his admiration for Wagner; there is no questioning his patriotism, he is a Frenchman of Frenchmen. Probably he is itching to conduct Wagner; undoubtedly he would cut off his right hand rather than do a thing that could be construed as not entirely patriotic. To set all doubts, expectations, etc., at rest Mr. Rabaud has given an interview in which he states that he will not play Wagner at the present time because it is against the public opinion of this country, and he does not wish to run counter to public opinion. Very tactfully he presented his view, speaking of the unanimous admiration for Wagner in France and America and the decision not to play Wagner, a decision which he says may be the subject of discussion.

"When I arrived in the United States I could see that the general sentiment, as in France, had accepted the tacit decision not to play Wagnerian music during the war, in spite of the unanimous admiration for this music to the two countries. This decision, in itself, may be subject to discussion," he says, "but, in my opinion, he should not blame those who, having accepted the same, await the end of the war to change their attitude. Let us not forget that this enemy only obtained an armistice. Peace is not signed—the claims of the Allies will find, perhaps, in Germany resistance which could only be reasoned with by force.

"For my part, I desire to conform myself here to the sentiment of many Americans who agree with the French opinion. And, of course, if some day I would think it right to act against the public opinion of my country, I would do so in France, and not abroad."

Although Mr. Rabaud's decision may bring a pang to many musicians who yearn for their Wagner and see no possible harm in playing his music there is no denying that Mr. Rabaud has handled a difficult situation with Gallic tact. Mr. Rabaud does not pander to any one, although he may use tact when tact is needed. For instance, he differs with the musical reviewers of almost all the newspapers which review his concerts on the subject of American music. Now Mr. Rabaud has played considerable American music since he took the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music of Charles Martin Loeffler, an American, has received from the press the admiration it deserves. There is no question concerning Mr. Loeffler's high place in the world of musical composition. But music by other Americans has not been treated kindly by the critics. Their position is simply this: Do not play American music just because it is American music if it is inferior, play music because it is worthwhile regardless of the nationality of the composer. Much of the American music played by Mr. Rabaud has not seemed of sufficient interest to be included in American symphony programs in the reviewers' opinions. And the reviewers have criticized them in no uncertain terms. Now Mr. Rabaud retorts to the critics with the suggestion that they have a fixed idea that America cannot possibly produce as good music as Europe.

"American composers must be encouraged; that is the way to develop a distinctive American school of music," he says. "We have played this season works of Loeffler, Chadwick, Converse, Stillman-Kelly, Hadley and Gilbert. More, we are not through. There will be other American compositions given public hearings before the season has closed. I find much talent among American composers. I must like them, otherwise I would not play their numbers. Very frequently comes the call for rendition of American numbers. When you play them the critics—he brought one slim fist down on the other—'smash the works on the head.'"

Continuing Mr. Rabaud said that although these American works met with critical disapprobation, they met with favor from the rank and file of the audiences. He finds American audiences very responsive, in fact, he has little but praise for the concert-goers of this country.

LESTER J. ROGERS, erstwhile librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and since June sergeant of the Headquarters Company, 73d Infantry, 12th Division, at Camp Devens, has returned to Symphony Hall, whereby a ready hand and an accurate memory will serve up any score from the long rows of shelves, parts perfect for instant use. Even when Rogers had transferred his services from the B. S. O. to the U. S. A., music could not be kept from him. He played viola in a soldiers' string quartet which faltered not once before Beethoven's most difficult "last" quartets.

BULLETIN—PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 6,

Boston Symphony

Rachmaninoff Piano Soloist at Fourth Concert of Season

As the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert of the season, and the third to be conducted in this city by Henri Rabaud, at the Academy of Music last evening, Sergei Rachmaninoff appeared as soloist, in his own Concerto No. 2, in C minor, for piano and orchestra. The audience was the largest that has attended any of the recent concerts of the organization here, the crowd which filled practically every seat evidently being especially attracted by the presence of the distinguished Russian pianist-composer.

It was not distinctly a soloist-program that was presented, however, for the orchestra had four numbers of its own, and Mr. Rabaud again received the attention and the applause due him as a fine as well as a celebrated conductor. First was played Cesar Franck's orchestral suite from the symphonic poem of "Psyche," a descriptive work of much melody, written in the elegant and polished style of the French composer. A sort of rhapsody of love, true in sentiment to the suggestion of its title, with the gentle influence of Eros felt in its melodious sway, this excerpt from a work that was written for orchestra and chorus proved interesting and impressive. Of especial beauty is the second movement, "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," which was played with the utmost delicacy and grace.

Interest centred, naturally, in the appearance of the famous Russian, whose recent piano recital here brought him much acclaim as a soloist, though his fame probably rests principally upon his ability as a composer. His C minor concerto is a work of large scope and tremendous power, which none but a great pianist could be expected to accomplish successfully. Having set even himself a severe task in realizing all its possibilities, Rachmaninoff, in his superb interpretation, wins a double triumph. Again he impressed by means of his dignified personality and by the serious manner of complete absorption in the task at hand—though task to him it may not appear to be.

The work begins with a mighty combination of piano and orchestra, in which the full-sweeping band seems to make endeavor to deluge the one contending instrument, but is compelled to acknowledge the triumph of its rival when so great a master is the pilot. There is splendid strength and brilliancy, as well as remarkable technical command, in Rachmaninoff's playing, and a momentary yielding to more gentle sway in the adagio movement. But the music is notable for power and grandeur more than for any prevailing allurement of melodious beauty, and what there is in it of the true Russian spirit is brought to the front and emphasized in the interpretation of its native composer.

The other numbers on the altogether notable program were Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, No. 2, Op. 39, "Phaeton;" suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," Faure, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 12,

NEWS OF MUSIC

NO WAGNER AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mr. Rabaud Decides Against Present Restoration of the Composer's Pieces—His Own Words About His Point of View—American Composers as He Sees Them—A Notable Programme for Semi-Private Performance by the Cecilia—Mr. Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea" to Be Heard Here

When the Symphony Orchestra visited Philadelphia last week Mr. Rabaud, who is as honest as the day is long, confided to a reporter of The Public Ledger his view of the reëstablishment of Wagner's music in the active repertory of symphony concerts in America. The Ledger quotes him:

When I arrived in the United States I could see that the general sentiment, as in France, had accepted the tacit decision not to play Wagnerian music during the war, in spite of the unanimous admiration for this music in the two countries. This decision, in itself, may be subject to discussion. But, in my opinion, we should not blame those, who, having accepted the same, await the end of the war to change their attitude. Let us not forget that this enemy only obtained an armistice. Peace is not signed—the claims of the Allies will find, perhaps, in Germany resistance which could only be reasoned with by force. For my part, I desire to conform myself here to the sentiment of many Americans who agree with the French opinion. And, of course, if some day I should think it right to act against the public opinion of my country, I should do so in France, and not abroad.

Like Mr. Higginson before them, the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra wisely leave the conductor a free hand in the making of programmes. According, then, to these sayings of Mr. Rabaud, none of Wagner's preludes or overtures and no fragments of his music-dramas will be heard at the Symphony Concerts until the Peace of Paris has been signed and sealed. In all probability, also, none will be played there so long as Mr. Rabaud remains the conductor. Evidently, he is disposed to follow Parisian opinion in the matter, to take his cue from the Ministry of the Fine Arts, from his fellow-conductors, Messrs. Chevillard, Pierné, and Messager, from the whole official hierarchy of French music. In measure there is reason for such "solidarity" with them. While Mr. Rabaud happens to be conductor of an orchestra heard in American cities, ministering to an American public and maintained by American funds, he came to his present post—as credible report runs—through the good offices of the Ministry of the Fine Arts. For the trustees of the orchestra, in their wisdom and doubtless in part from necessity, often dealt with governments rather than individuals in their search for a conductor last summer. In a sense, therefore, Mr. Rabaud is semi-official apostle to the Bostonian Gentiles. He is conscientiously and often interestingly fulfilling that mission, and his loyalties to his sponsors and to public opinion at home in Paris do him credit.

On the other hand, here in America orchestra after orchestra is fast restoring Wagner's music to the active repertory—Mr. Damrosch's and Mr. Stransky's in New York, Mr. Stokowski's in Philadelphia, Mr. Zach's in St. Louis and so onward. With like unanimity, audiences everywhere and of all degrees are hearing it gladly, heartily, even in that city of "one hundred per cent" and turbulent "Americanism" which is Baltimore. Nowhere as yet has the voice of protest been raised publicly in print or speech and nowhere is it likely to be; while so far as amusing records go, few have stalked indignant from the hall. By these signs, a considerable part of the public for symphonic music in the United States welcomes the return of Wagner to the concert-room. Another part of it, with which Mr. Rabaud comes most in contact and which naturally seems to him to represent "general sentiment," is contrary minded. To it, to the Parisian view and to his own promptings he defers. He is well within his rights to do so, even if he so deprives many in his audiences at home and abroad, of music that of old they heard eagerly. If it pleases Mr. Rabaud, as it does many others, to believe that the war still continues, he has, again, his right to his point of view. Yet, to many, it seems as strange as would to him and to the like-minded the notion that war or armistice or peace bears any relation to the beauty, the power, the passion or the splendor of Wagner's music, or the pleasure it has given the world these fifty years. It is the contemplation of these differences of opinion, usually called "general sentiment" on both sides, that helps to make life the amusing, ironic and generally delightful thing that it is. Meanwhile in Boston, and in Paris also, as letters say, Wagner will continue to be heard upon the piano, the phonographs—and in echo in the music of many a French or American composer.

The Conductor and Americans

In the same interview, according to The Ledger, Mr. Rabaud "spoke feelingly" of the music of American composers, of his own mood, the mood of audiences and the mood of reviewers toward it. He said:

American composers must be encouraged; that is the way to develop a distinctive American school of music. We have played this season pieces by Loeffler, Converse, Stillman-Kelly, Hadley and Gilbert. More: we are not through. There will be other American compositions given public hearings before the season has closed. I find much talent among American composers. I must like them, otherwise I would not play their pieces. Very frequently comes the call for the performance of American numbers. When you play them the critics—he brought one slim fist down on the other—smash the works on the head.

Are the reviewers in Boston [illegible] unkind to music from American pen as Mr. Rabaud would have his hearers believe? If memory does not slip, they agreed in welcoming praise for Mr. Converse's tone-poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," when Mr. Rabaud restored it to the active repertory; while they were warmer still over Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem "La Bonne Chauson," when Mr. Monteux included it in a pair of concerts last November. Nor, if memory again serves, was either piece unkindly traversed by the newspapers in New York. As for Mr. Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" and Mr. Kelley's show-piece for a singer, "A California Idyl," which were not well received, few reviewers are likely to suffer many qualms of conscience over such intrinsically mediocre music. As Mr. Krehbiel truthfully and pointedly remarked last Sunday in The Tribune: "The American genius in music will come, but we are not likely to speed his coming by lying about mediocrity simply because it is American"—or for that matter because it is of any other race that breeds composers. Per contra, Mr. Rabaud is clear-minded when he hints that American composers need the "encouragement" of public performance of ther orchestral music. He might better have said the "instruction" of it. For only by the hearing of their music in concert hall and opera house can many of them advance toward the command of the saliency, the projection, the effectiveness of musical speech which are essential to communicaton of their ideas and their workmanship.

HERALD, FEBRUARY 9,

FRADKIN AND PHILA.

When Fredric Fradkin played Mendelssohn's concerto on the last southern trip of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he delighted every city. Here is a sample criticism from the Philadelphia Record: "Fredric Fradkin made a great impression, and one that was rather a surprise. Occupying his chair during the symphony and doing some notably beautiful rhythmic work in the scherzo, he stepped forth a stranger and ended a friend of all who enjoy really fine violin playing coupled with an entire absence of pose. He was delightfully ingenuous and engaging, and revealed himself, artistically, as the peer of any of the well known players. The great charm of his playing lies in a rather delicate, sweet tone, fine style, and a technique that can grow to such speed that it fairly flies. The final movement of the concerto, with its intricate staccato passages, was a dream of light, fairy-like playing. Fradkin was given an overwhelming reception, and he will always be sure of an eager audience in Philadelphia."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Two young American soloists will take part in the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday. Fredric Fradkin, concert master, will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo parts in a Suite by G. Faure, apparently hitherto unheard in this country, which was written as incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock." There will be two revivals (also French)—the Prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," and Cesar Franck's large-proportioned Symphonic Poem, "Psyche," depicting "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros," and "Psyche and Eros." Finally, the more familiar overture of Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival."

NEW YORK TIMES, FEBRUARY 9,

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

Boston Symphony Matinee.

He would not be Henri Rabaud and the composer of "Marouf" if his program selections were uniformly colorless. Yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall color predominated in the scheme of music-making by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Brahms, his second symphony, did begin the program, but Fauré, Saint-Saëns, and Berlioz atoned for the so-called "drab" quality of that singularly charming and eloquent composition. Perhaps it was a Gallic reading; it certainly sounded euphonious, and the transparency of the orchestral voices was so marked that we could not always hear the original Brahms. His spirit filtered through the open bars and was lost; the allegretto was a solitary exception. It may be confessed, however, that even if not always Brahms, it was interesting. This does not apply to the first movement, which we missed. Delicacy and clarity were the chief characteristics of Mr. Rabaud's reading. But the scale of dynamics was a narrow one. This also means emotional dynamics.

Fauré's incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," proved innocuous. The play with the "Jew that Shakespeare drew" was hardly Shakespearan. We recall Haraucourt as a clever writer and a deviser of exotic forms of spectacle, a perfume concert among the rest, which doubtless suggested the odorous concert in this hall years ago, which Sadakichi Hartmann directed. At the time the Paris boulevard press irreverently referred to him as "Monsieur Haricot," in a word, the precious bean dear to New England. Well-scored, vapid music is that of Fauré. The symphonic poem "Phaeton," by Saint-Saëns, was the high-water mark of the matinée. Both band and conductor met in happiest confluence. The "Carnival Romain" was a brilliant exposition of Berlioz at his brilliant best. There was a large audience and plenty of applause. We are still hoping to hear Rimski-Korsakoff's symphonic poem "Antar," which Brooklyn enjoyed last month, but which Mr. Rabaud has not yet vouchsafed the greatest part of Greater New York.

TIMES, FEBRUARY 9,

NEW YORK, New York—At Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Feb. 8 two long-standing cases of rivalry between the cities of New York and Boston found significant illustration, the one commercial, and the other artistic. The outcome may be expressed in the slang phrase, "Fifty-fifty," with the business contest going in favor of New York and the artistic contest going in favor of Boston. The inhabitants of both cities are, of course, well aware that the struggle for leadership is going on between them today just as energetically as it was in the times when the island of New York was a Dutch settlement and when the peninsula of Boston was an English one. Everybody knows that apprehension exists as strongly at this moment lest the metropolis of the Empire State may lose a jot of its supremacy to that of New England, as when, 75 years or so ago, a group of adventurous men had the audacity to lay down a railroad from Massachusetts Bay to the Hudson River, and so divert from here a certain amount of continental traffic.

Well, the matters in competition at Carnegie Hall were as follows: A set of concert programs, in the form of a cream-colored folder, prepared and printed in New York, enjoyed the privilege of distribution inside the building; while a certain other set, in the form of a pink-covered pamphlet, got up in Boston, had to submit to the ignominy of being distributed out-of-doors and across the street. In this case, obviously involving a commercial point, New York won. Again, a group of instrumental performers, hailing from Boston, presented the music outlined on the cream-colored and pink-covered documents, and placed itself in comparison with all the New York instrumental groups which give concerts in that auditorium. In this case, which involved artistic issues, there can be no question that Boston was handsomely the winner.

Yes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing on Saturday afternoon under the baton of Henri Rabaud, firmly established itself in its former rank, as the most important institution of its kind that appears here. The orchestra which last spring, upon discarding its German artistic policies, seemed to many persons to be on the point of disintegration, and which, last fall, upon its resuming work with a much changed membership, seemed likely never to get back its homogeneity, is now completely rehabilitated in tone balance, in style and in general interpretative authority. Indeed, it must strike the very persons who were lately in doubt about it, as a better orchestra than it has been at any time in the past 15 years.

New Yorkers, taken as a whole, assuredly like to see terms of competition fair; and accordingly they are willing enough to concede the preeminence to Bostonians orchestrally, knowing that their own strength in the hearing of the world is in opera; and they are undoubtedly glad of the triumphant solution which has been found for the Boston Symphony Orchestra problem. Furthermore, they cannot be otherwise than glad that the Boston public has given up the cultivation of the colossal and the exaltation of the insolent in music, exchanging a German for a French theory of esthetics, and discarding its old orchestral organization with as good a grace as at an earlier time it discarded its Music Hall organ. New Yorkers ought to regret, perhaps, that the Boston public has not taken advantage of the moment of a century and boldly adopted an American theory. But no. They themselves are committed by habit to musical classicism. With their opera, they go back to the past and stay there, just as Bostonians do with their orchestra. They regard their Metropolitan Opera House as a museum for the exhibition of the works of the old tone masters, precisely as Bostonians regard their Symphony Hall.

There may be those who object to the scheme of dynamics employed in the orchestra under the French dispensation, holding that the players never let themselves go full force. That was the cry in the early years of the last decade, before the German modernization began. But they must admit that the values are all present in the interpretation, even if big sonority is no longer admitted as a factor. Not alone exquisitely, but impressively also, the numbers of the program of Saturday were given. The second symphony of Brahms was presented in all clearness of inside and outside melodic line. The "Shylock" suite of Fauré was presented with a subdued volume of sound appropriate to music which is intended to be incidental to the action of a play. The St. Saëns "Phaëton" symphonic poem was presented with the restraint suitable to a composition which is but moderately pictorial in purpose. The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, instead of being mocked at and distorted as it has been at concerts of other days, was presented in the straightforward spirit of Romanticism in which it was written.

RECORD, FEBRUARY 12,

WAGNER STILL UNDER BAN AT SYMPHONY HALL

HENRI RABAUD

Who differs with the Boston music reviewers concerning the American music he has played and who does not hesitate to say so.

By J. V. CLARK

How much longer before the music of Richard Wagner is heard in the opera houses and concert halls of the country? The question is heard on all sides. In some places the orchestral leaders are answering now with Wagnerian excerpts. In New York one of the large orchestras played music from "Das Reingold" recently. There are hints of an entire Wagnerian opera to be sung, of course, in English. Here in Boston within the week we have heard a theatre orchestra play "Tannhauser." France still stands firm against Wagner, the "modern German. London by popular vote decided that Wagner should not be tabooed, and all through the war the Wagnerian music dramas have been sung by London companies and provincial English opera companies. But what of Boston? Shall there be a continued ban on Wagner or shall the ban be lifted? The question has been put up to Mr. Rabaud, the orchestra's conductor. There is no questioning his admiration for Wagner; there is no questioning his patriotism, he is a Frenchman of Frenchmen. Probably he is itching to conduct Wagner; undoubtedly he would cut off his right hand rather than do a thing that could be construed as not entirely patriotic. To set all doubts, expectations, etc., at rest Mr. Rabaud has given an interview in which he states that he will not play Wagner at the present time because it is against the public opinion of this country, and he does not wish to run counter to public opinion. Very tactfully he presented his view, speaking of the unanimous admiration for Wagner in France and America and the decision not to play Wagner, a decision which he says may be the subject of discussion.

"When I arrived in the United States I could see that the general sentiment, as in France, had accepted the tacit decision not to play Wagnerian music during the war, in spite of the unanimous admiration for this music in the two countries. This decision, in itself, may be subject to discussion," he says, "but, in my opinion, he should not blame those who, having accepted the same, await the end of the war to change their attitude. Let us not forget that this enemy only obtained an armistice. Peace is not signed—the claims of the Allies will find, perhaps, in Germany resistance which could only be reasoned with by force.

"For my part, I desire to conform myself here to the sentiment of many Americans who agree with the French opinion. And, of course, if some day I would think it right to act against the public opinion of my country, I would do so in France, and not abroad."

Although Mr. Rabaud's decision may bring a pang to many musicians who yearn for their Wagner and see no possible harm in playing his music there is no denying that Mr. Rabaud has handled a difficult situation with Gallic tact. Mr. Rabaud does not pander to any one, although he may use tact when tact is needed. For instance, he differs with the musical reviewers of almost all the newspapers which review his concerts on the subject of American music. Now Mr. Rabaud has played considerable American music since he took the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music of Charles Martin Loeffler, an American, has received from the press the admiration it deserves. There is no question concerning Mr. Loeffler's high place in the world of musical composition. But music by other Americans has not been treated kindly by the critics. Their position is simply this: Do not play American music just because it is American music if it is inferior, play music because it is worth while regardless of the nationality of the composer. Much of the American music played by Mr. Rabaud has not seemed of sufficient interest to be included in American symphony programs in the reviewers' opinions. And the reviewers have criticized them in no uncertain terms. Now Mr. Rabaud retorts to the critics with the suggestion that they have a fixed idea that America cannot possibly produce as good music as Europe.

"American composers must be encouraged; that is the way to develop a distinctive American school of music," he says. "We have played this season works of Loeffler, Chadwick, Converse, Stillman-Kelly, Hadley and Gilbert. More, we are not through. There will be other American compositions given public hearings before the season has closed. I find much talent among American composers. I must like them, otherwise I would not play their numbers. Very frequently comes the call for rendition of American numbers. When you play them the critics—he brought one slim fist down on the other—'smash the works on the head.'"

Continuing Mr. Rabaud said that although these American works met with critical disapprobation, they met with favor from the rank and file of the audiences. He finds American audiences very responsive, in fact, he has little but praise for the concert-goers of this country.

LESTER J. ROGERS, erstwhile librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and since June sergeant of the Headquarters Company, 73d Infantry, 12th Division, at Camp Devens, has returned to Symphony Hall, whereby a ready hand and an accurate memory will serve up any score from the long rows of shelves, parts perfect for instant use. Even when Rogers had transferred his services from the B. S. O. to the U. S. A., music could not be kept from him. He played viola in a soldiers' string quartet which faltered not once before Beethoven's most difficult "last" quartets.

BULLETIN—PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 6,

Boston Symphony

Rachmaninoff Piano Soloist at Fourth Concert of Season

AS the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert of the season, and the third to be conducted in this city by Henri Rabaud, at the Academy of Music last evening, Sergei Rachmaninoff appeared as soloist, in his own Concerto No. 2, in C minor, for piano and orchestra. The audience was the largest that has attended any of the recent concerts of the organization here, the crowd which filled practically every seat evidently being especially attracted by the presence of the distinguished Russian pianist-composer.

It was not distinctly a soloist-program that was presented, however, for the orchestra had four numbers of its own, and Mr. Rabaud again received the attention and the applause due him as a time as well as a celebrated conductor. First was played Cesar Franck's orchestral suite from the symphonic poem of "Psyche," a descriptive work of much melody, written in the elegant and polished style of the French composer. A sort of rhapsody of love, true in sentiment to the suggestion of its title, with the gentle influence of Eros felt in its melodious sway, this excerpt from a work that was written for orchestra and chorus proved interesting and impressive. Of special beauty is the second movement, "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," which was played with the utmost delicacy and grace.

Interest centred, naturally, in the appearance of the famous Russian, whose recent piano recital here brought him much acclaim as a soloist, though his fame probably rests principally upon his ability as a composer. His C minor concerto is a work of large scope and tremendous power, which none but a great pianist could be expected to accomplish successfully. Having set even himself a severe task in realizing all its possibilities, Rachmaninoff, in his superb interpretation, wins a double triumph. Again he impressed by means of his dignified personality and by the serious manner of complete absorption in the task at hand—though task to him it may not appear to be.

The work begins with a mighty combination of piano and orchestra, in which the full-sweeping band seems to make endeavor to deluge the one contending instrument, but is compelled to acknowledge the triumph of its rival when so great a master is the pilot. There is splendid strength and brilliancy, as well as remarkable technical command, in Rachmaninoff's playing, and a momentary yielding to more gentle sway in the adagio movement. But the music is notable for power and grandeur more than for any prevailing allurement of melodious beauty, and what there is in it of the true Russian spirit is brought to the front and emphasized in the interpretation of its native composer.

The other numbers on the altogether notable program were Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, No. 2, Op. 39, "Phaeton;" suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," Faure, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 12,

NEWS OF MUSIC

NO WAGNER AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mr. Rabaud Decides Against Present Restoration of the Composer's Pieces—His Own Words About His Point of View—American Composers as He Sees Them—A Notable Programme for Semi-Private Performance by the Cecilia—Mr. Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea" to Be Heard Here

WHEN the Symphony Orchestra visited Philadelphia last week, Mr. Rabaud, who is as honest as the day is long, confided to a reporter of The Public Ledger his view of the reëstablishment of Wagner's music in the active repertory of symphony concerts in America. The Ledger quotes him:

When I arrived in the United States I could see that the general sentiment, as in France, had accepted the tacit decision not to play Wagnerian music during the war, in spite of the unanimous admiration for this music in the two countries. This decision, in itself, may be subject to discussion. But, in my opinion, we should not blame those, who, having accepted the same, await the end of the war to change their attitude. Let us not forget that this enemy only obtained an armistice. Peace is not signed—the claims of the Allies will find, perhaps, in Germany resistance which could only be reasoned with by force. For my part, I desire to conform myself here to the sentiment of many Americans who agree with the French opinion. And, of course, if some day I should think it right to act against the public opinion of my country, I should do so in France, and not abroad.

Like Mr. Higginson before them, the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra wisely leave the conductor a free hand in the making of programmes. According, then, to these sayings of Mr. Rabaud, none of Wagner's preludes or overtures and no fragments of his music-dramas will be heard at the Symphony Concerts until the Peace of Paris has been signed and sealed. In all probability, also, none will be played there so long as Mr. Rabaud remains the conductor. Evidently, he is disposed to follow Parisian opinion in the matter, to take his cue from the Ministry of the Fine Arts, from his fellow-conductors, Messrs. Chevillard, Pierné, and Messager, from the whole official hierarchy of French music. In measure there is reason for such "solidarity" with them. While Mr. Rabaud happens to be conductor of an orchestra heard in American cities, ministering to an American public and maintained by American funds, he came to his present post—as credible report runs—through the good offices of the Ministry of the Fine Arts. For the trustees of the orchestra, in their wisdom and doubtless in part from necessity, often dealt with governments rather than individuals in their search for a conductor last summer. In a sense, therefore, Mr. Rabaud is semi-official apostle to the Bostonian Gentiles. He is conscientiously and often interestingly fulfilling that mission, and his loyalties to his sponsors and to public opinion at home in Paris do him credit.

On the other hand, here in America orchestra after orchestra is fast restoring Wagner's music to the active repertory—Mr. Damrosch's and Mr. Stransky's in New York, Mr. Stokowski's in Philadelphia, Mr. Zach's in St. Louis and so onward. With like unanimity, audiences everywhere and of all degrees are hearing it gladly, heartily, even in that city of "one hundred per cent" and turbulent "Americanism" which is Baltimore. Nowhere as yet has the voice of protest been raised publicly in print or speech and nowhere is it likely to be; while so far as amusing records go, few have stalked indignant from the hall. By these signs, a considerable part of the public for symphonic music in the United States welcomes the return of Wagner to the concert-room. Another part of it, with which Mr. Rabaud comes most in contact and which naturally seems to him to represent "general sentiment," is contrary minded. To it, to the Parisian view and to his own promptings he defers. He is well within his rights to do so, even if he so deprives many in his audiences at home and abroad, of music that of old they heard eagerly. If it pleases Mr. Rabaud, as it does many others, to believe that the war still continues, he has, again, his right to his point of view. Yet, to many, it seems as strange as would to him and to the like-minded the notion that war or armistice or peace bears any relation to the beauty, the power, the passion or the splendor of Wagner's music, or the pleasure it has given the world these fifty years. It is the contemplation of these differences of opinion, usually called "general sentiment" on both sides, that helps to make life the amusing, ironic and generally delightful thing that it is. Meanwhile in Boston, and in Paris also, as letters say, Wagner will continue to be heard upon the piano, the phonographs—and in echo in the music of many a French or American composer.

The Conductor and Americans

In the same interview, according to The Ledger, Mr. Rabaud "spoke feelingly" of the music of American composers, of his own mood, the mood of audiences and the mood of reviewers toward it. He said:

American composers must be encouraged; that is the way to develop a distinctive American school of music. We have played this season pieces by Loeffler, Converse, Stillman-Kelly, Hadley and Gilbert. More; we are not through. There will be other American compositions given public hearings before the season has closed. I find much talent among American composers. I must like them, otherwise I would not play their pieces. Very frequently comes the call for the performance of American numbers. When you play them the critics—he brought one slim fist down on the other—smash the works on the head.

Are the reviewers in Boston so sour and unkind to music from American pen as Mr. Rabaud would have his hearers believe? If memory does not slip, they agreed in welcoming praise for Mr. Converse's tone-poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," when Mr. Rabaud restored it to the active repertory; while they were warmer still over Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem "La Bonne Chauson," when Mr. Monteux included it in a pair of concerts last November. Nor, if memory again serves, was either piece unkindly traversed by the newspapers in New York. As for Mr. Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" and Mr. Kelley's show-piece for a singer, "A California Idyl," which were not well received, few reviewers are likely to suffer many qualms of conscience over such intrinsically mediocre music. As Mr. Krehbiel truthfully and pointedly remarked last Sunday in The Tribune: "The American genius in music will come, but we are not likely to speed his coming by lying about mediocrity simply because it is American"—or for that matter because it is of any other race that breeds composers. Per contra, Mr. Rabaud is clear-minded when he hints that American composers need the "encouragement" of public performance of ther orchestral music. He might better have said the "instruction" of it. For only by the hearing of their music in concert hall and opera house can many of them advance toward the command of the saliency, the projection, the effectiveness of musical speech which are essential to communicaton of their ideas and their workmanship.

HERALD, FEBRUARY 9,

FRADKIN AND PHILA.

When Fredric Fradkin played Mendelssohn's concerto on the last southern trip of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he delighted every city. Here is a sample criticism from the Philadelphia Record: "Fredric Fradkin made a great impression, and one that was rather a surprise. Occupying his chair during the symphony and doing some notably beautiful rhythmic work in the scherzo, he stepped forth a stranger and ended a friend of all who enjoy really fine violin playing coupled with an entire absence of pose. He was delightfully ingenuous and engaging, and revealed himself, artistically, as the peer of any of the well known players. The great charm of his playing lies in a rather delicate, sweet tone, fine style, and a technique that can grow to such speed that it fairly flies. The final movement of the concerto, with its intricate staccato passages, was a dream of light, fairy-like playing. Fradkin was given an overwhelming reception, and he will always be sure of an eager audience in Philadelphia."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Two young American soloists will take part in the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday. Fredric Fradkin, concert master, will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Arthur Hackett will sing the tenor solo parts in a Suite by G. Faure, apparently hitherto unheard in this country, which was written as incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock." There will be two revivals (also French)—the Prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," and Cesar Franck's large-proportioned Symphonic Poem, "Psyche," depicting "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros," and "Psyche and Eros." Finally, the more familiar overture of Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival."

NEW YORK TIMES, FEBRUARY 9,

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

Boston Symphony Matinee.

He would not be Henri Rabaud and the composer of "Marouf" if his program selections were uniformly colorless. Yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall color predominated in the scheme of music-making by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Brahms, his second symphony, did begin the program, but Fauré, Saint-Saëns, and Berlioz atoned for the so-called "drab" quality of that singularly charming and eloquent composition. Perhaps it was a Gallic reading; it certainly sounded euphonious, and the transparency of the orchestral voices was so marked that we could not always hear the original Brahms. His spirit filtered through the open bars and was lost; the allegretto was a solitary exception. It may be confessed, however, that even if not always Brahms, it was interesting. This does not apply to the first movement, which we missed. Delicacy and clarity were the chief characteristics of Mr. Rabaud's reading. But the scale of dynamics was a narrow one. This also means emotional dynamics.

Fauré's incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," proved innocuous. The play with the "Jew that Shakespeare drew" was hardly Shakespearan. We recall Haraucourt as a clever writer and a deviser of exotic forms of spectacle, a perfume concert among the rest, which doubtless suggested the odorous concert in this hall years ago, which Sadakichi Hartmann directed. At the time the Paris boulevard press irreverently referred to him as "Monsieur Haricot," in a word, the precious bean dear to New England. Well-scored, vapid music is that of Fauré. The symphonic poem "Phaeton," by Saint-Saëns, was the high-water mark of the matinée. Both band and conductor met in happiest confluence. The "Carnival Romain" was a brilliant exposition of Berlioz at his brilliant best. There was a large audience and plenty of applause. We are still hoping to hear Rimski-Korsakoff's symphonic poem "Antar," which Brooklyn enjoyed last month, but which Mr. Rabaud has not yet vouchsafed the greatest part of Greater New York.

MONITOR, FEBRUARY 10

NEW YORK, New York—At Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Feb. 8 two long-standing cases of rivalry between the cities of New York and Boston found significant illustration, the one commercial, and the other artistic. The outcome may be expressed in the slang phrase, "Fifty-fifty," with the business contest going in favor of New York and the artistic contest going in favor of Boston. The inhabitants of both cities are, of course, well aware that the struggle for leadership is going on between them today just as energetically as it was in the times when the island of New York was a Dutch settlement and when the peninsula of Boston was an English one. Everybody knows that apprehension exists as strongly at this moment lest the metropolis of the Empire State may lose a jot of its supremacy to that of New England, as when, 75 years or so ago, a group of adventurous men had the audacity to lay down a railroad from Massachusetts Bay to the Hudson River, and so divert from here a certain amount of continental traffic.

Well, the matters in competition at Carnegie Hall were as follows: A set of concert programs, in the form of a cream-colored folder, prepared and printed in New York, enjoyed the privilege of distribution inside the building; while a certain other set, in the form of a pink-covered pamphlet, got up in Boston, had to submit to the ignominy of being distributed out-of-doors and across the street. In this case, obviously involving a commercial point, New York won. Again, a group of instrumental performers, hailing from Boston, presented the music outlined on the cream-colored and pink-covered documents, and placed itself in comparison with all the New York instrumental groups which give concerts in that auditorium. In this case, which involved artistic issues, there can be no question that Boston was handsomely the winner.

Yes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing on Saturday afternoon under the baton of Henri Rabaud, firmly established itself in its former rank, as the most important institution of its kind that appears here. The orchestra which last spring, upon discarding its German artistic policies, seemed to many persons to be on the point of disintegration, and which, last fall, upon its resuming work with a much changed membership, seemed likely never to get back its homogeneity, is now completely rehabilitated in tone balance, in style and in general interpretative authority. Indeed, it must strike the very persons who were lately in doubt about it, as a better orchestra than it has been at any time in the past 15 years.

New Yorkers, taken as a whole, assuredly like to see terms of competition fair; and accordingly they are willing enough to concede the preeminence to Bostonians orchestrally, knowing that their own strength in the hearing of the world is in opera; and they are undoubtedly glad of the triumphant solution which has been found for the Boston Symphony Orchestra problem. Furthermore, they cannot be otherwise than glad that the Boston public has given up the cultivation of the colossal and the exaltation of the insolent in music, exchanging a German for a French theory of esthetics, and discarding its old orchestral organization with as good a grace as at an earlier time it discarded its Music Hall organ. New Yorkers ought to regret, perhaps, that the Boston public has not taken advantage of the moment of a century and boldly adopted an American theory. But no. They themselves are committed by habit to musical classicism. With their opera, they go back to the past and stay there, just as Bostonians do with their orchestra. They regard their Metropolitan Opera House as a museum for the exhibition of the works of the old tone masters, precisely as Bostonians regard their Symphony Hall.

There may be those who object to the scheme of dynamics employed in the orchestra under the French dispensation, holding that the players never let themselves go full force. That was the cry in the early years of the last decade, before the German modernization began. But they must admit that the values are all present in the interpretation, even if big sonority is no longer admitted as a factor. Not alone exquisitely, but impressively also, the numbers of the program of Saturday were given. The second symphony of Brahms was presented in all clearness of inside and outside melodic line. The "Shylock" suite of Fauré was presented with a subdued volume of sound appropriate to music which is intended to be incidental to the action of a play. The St. Saëns "Phaëton" symphonic poem was presented with the restraint suitable to a composition which is but moderately pictorial in purpose. The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, instead of being mocked at and distorted as it has been at concerts of other days, was presented in the straightforward spirit of Romanticism in which it was written.

NOVEL MUSIC AT HAND

Franck's Suite, "Psyche," to Be Played for the First Times in Boston in Entirety at the Symphony Concerts of This Week—A New Suite by Faure, Suggested by "The Merchant of Venice," Also to Be Heard.

AT the Symphony Concerts of this week, the suite, "Psyche," drawn by Franck from his like-named symphony for orchestra and chorus will be played for the first times in Boston in entirety. When Mr. d'Indy led the orchestra for a fortnight in the autumn of 1905, he put a single division of the suite—"Psyche and Eros"—upon one of his programmes. A few months later, Mr. Wallace Goodrich included a second division—"The Slumber of Psyche"—in an orchestral concert in Jordan Hall. Finally, in April of 1906, Mr. Gericke and the Symphony Orchestra repeated "Psyche and Eros" and prefaced it with the "tone-picture," "The Gardens of Eros." After this vogue of a season, "Psyche" vanished from the active repertory of Symphony Hall. Now, after thirteen years, Mr. Rabaud brings back the suite "in entirety."—He and the orchestra so played it in Philadelphia and New York last week and will so play at home next Friday and Saturday. In order, the four divisions are: "The Slumber of Psyche"; "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," the movement as yet unheard in Boston; "The Gardens of Eros," and "Psyche and Eros." All four are written for the usual concert orchestra of Franck's day. He composed the original "symphony" in 1887-1888; in 1888 it was heard in Paris; subsequently there and elsewhere, it has kept occasional place on conductor's lists.

According to the programme-book of the Boston Orchestra, for Mr. d'Indy's performance of "Psyche and Eros," Franck's text, obscurely attributed to various hands, "does not follow closely" the Greek legend of the loves of Eros and Psyche as recounted by Apuleius. "In the French poem, Psyche, asleep, is borne by the zephyrs—her pure aspirations—to the gardens of Eros, to the long-desired paradise. There her celestial bridegroom awaits her. She wishes, however, to tear aside the veil of mystery that enwraps him. The vision disappears. Again on earth, wandering and lamenting, she pours out her sorrow. Eros pardons her ambition, which he, after all, had inspired, and the two ascend to the light. 'It is the apotheosis,' says Dr. Gustave Derepas, in his study of Franck, 'it is the triumph of love which is no longer forced to believe: it sees and possesses; it is a veritable redemption.'

"'Eros and Psyche,' continues Derepas, 'do not appear as individuals. The orchestra interprets their feelings, and for this reason: the two are in this poem not individuals. Franck, forgetting the legendary personages, looks on them as symbols of the human soul and supreme love. Music, absolute music without words, because its notes do not have a definite meaning, is of all the forms of art the most adequate expression of these immaterial realities. There are no solos in this oratorio. The orchestra has the most important part: it translates the longings, the regrets, the final joy of Psyche. The chorus, an anonymous, impersonal body, sings now and then and in few words the peripetelas of the drama. It is to be easily seen that the whole work is charged with the spirit of Christian mysticism.'"

"From the first pages to the last," wrote the Parisian reviewer, Hugues Imbert, about the music, "the hearer is impressed by the mastery of the writing and the nobility of the ideas. He will admire 'The Slumber of Psyche,' a prelude full of a mysterious language and a piece that will remind him of Wagner, not in actual material, but in the theories and style. He will recognize the composer's talent in translating the strange sounds that precede the scene in which Psyche is carried by the zephyrs into the gardens of Eros; he will find an exquisite tenderness in the third theme of Psyche reposing among the flowers and saluted by the powers of nature; he will detect a certain relationship between the phrase sung to Psyche to the words, 'Souviens-toi que tu ne dois jamais de ton mystique époux connaitre le visage' and the phrase uttered by Lohengrin to Elsa in a situation exactly parallel; and he will welcome and retain many other pages of the score. But he will regret the lack of variety and the length which robs the music of a part of its charm."

More particularly, Franck develops the music from various "typical motives," disclosed, combined, contrasted and variously and significantly manipulated throughout the suite—the motive of Eros, the motive of Psyche, the motive of love, the motive of longing, the motive of sleep, the zephyrs' motive and so forth. In the second division—"Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," it is possible to hear echoes of his earlier symphonic poem, "The Daughters of Aeolus." Before the third division, "The Gardens of Eros," may be read this programme note: "Psyche, more beautiful than beauty itself, sleeps in the midst of flowers, hailed as a queen by Nature rejoicing as on a holiday. Voices murmur in her ear the power of love. Gently agitated, she awakes. The voices sing again, and tell of the invisible spouse who will come to her. She listens, delighted, and she waits. And now the voices, singing alway, say to her solemnly: 'Remember that you should never know the face of your mystic lover. Bear this in mind.' The spirits are silent. Another voice is heard, gentle but penetrating. It is that of Eros himself. Psyche answers, but with hesitation. Soon their souls are blended. Passion, light, and there would be eternal happiness if Psyche only knew how to remember her vow." As originally written, music for the chorus here warned Psyche against the peril of curiosity about her mystic lover. Then ensues the final division of the suite, "portraying the happiness of the lovers. Love at first hesitant, grows bold; it has its passionate flights, its returns to calmness, its torrents of passion, then its moments of ecstacy. The themes are so blended or enchained that they are nearly all of like importance, and often one is the conclusion of the other. They are charged with a penetrating solemnity which touches the heart." By these tokens the Greek legend of the loves of Eros and Psyche is quite as serviceable a background to Franck music as "Christian mysticism" and all that sort of thing. When expression in the arts is in question, there is curious kinship between erotic and mystical moods.

The other novel piece to be heard at the Symphony Concerts of this week is a suite drawn by Fauré from his incidental music to "Shylock," a short-lived Parisian version by d'Haraucourt of "The Merchant of Venice," evidently much altered and dizened according to the taste and fancy of the adapting poetaster. Paris saw the piece and heard the music for a few evenings at the Odéon in 1889. As transferred to the concert hall, the suite runs in six divisions—two, a "Chanson" and a Madrigal" for tenor voice; and four, an Entr'acte," an "Epithalamium," a Nocturne and a "Finale" for orchestra. Here in Boston Mr. Arthur Hackett, the tenor, will sing the songs. In New York last Saturday, as in Philadelphia, a few days before, the orchestra played the rest of the suite and Mr Krehbiel wrote of it in The Tribune as follows:

"If 'Shylock' has in it any of the elements of Shakspeare's comedy the fact was not divulged by the music composed by Fauré to illustrate it 'The Merchant of Venice,' like every other Shakspearian play, no matter what its subject or its people, is Elizabethan English in spirit. M. Rabaud made a handsome recognition of that fact in his own music to the play which he produced on his previous visit. It was all constructed out of music familiar to Shakspeare's countrymen in Shakspeare's time. Fauré's music began with a march movement which a perhaps too whimsical fancy might have associated with Falstaff's motley army, but which could not be identified by any stretch of the imagination with any of the dramatic elements to be found in the story of the usurious but much-abused Jew.

"Evidently there is a merry wedding in the French comedy, for the second number was a pretty epithalamium and the final number suggested that possibly the fairy folk of 'A Mid-Summer Night's Dream' had also gotten into it. There was no just reason, of course, why anybody should have expected to hear Shakspearian echoes in any part of the suite, but since imagination does not always wait upon reason it was agreeable to note that the nocturne invoked the sweeter melody of the lines

Here we will sit and let the sounds of mus
Creep in our ears; soft stillness and the nig
Become the touches of sweet harmony.

It also invited recollection of the scen under the moon in which Lorenzo an Jessica display their classical learning an bandy allusions to the nocturnal adventur of Cressid, Thisbe, Dido and Medea. B perhaps all these fancies are irrelevan though they are instanced to show that, our opinion, there is some charming, if n profoundly beautiful music in Fauré com position."

---

om WORLD
ddress: New York City
FEB 9
ate

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER REVEALS SKILL

Original Reading of Brahms Symphony Heard at Concert Yesterday at Carnegie Hall.

Quite a few persons are discoverin two things with respect to the Bosto Symphony Orchestra: Henri Rabaud i an able conductor, whose readings re flect distinction; the orchestra, as such is still a splendid institution. Th changes made this season have not de tracted from its efficiency to the exten many at first thought. These matter were rather conclusively demonstrate in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoo when the visiting New England organi zation gave its eighth New York pro gramme of the season.

M. Rabaud began with the No. 2 Brahms Symphony in the key of D major. He doubtless shocked some hidebound traditionists who prefer the sort of readings most Boston Symphony conductors of the past have offered. But the discerning and unprejudiced hearer recognized many beauties in the score as the orchestra played it under M. Rabaud. He made the adagio a movement of color in lovely tone and the allegretto teem with life and grace. The final allegro had all the free swing and authority and satisfying substance which one desires.

Faure's suite to the Haraucourt "Shylock"—four movements of it—opened the second part of the programme. The nocturne and the entr'acte sections received the most consistently fine treatment. Such smoothness among the choirs of an orchestra and such plasticity are not often heard. These things were likewise to be observed in the playing of Saint-Saens's pictorially descriptive "Phaeton." The concert ended with the Berlioz "Carnival Romain" overture.

---

n HERALD
ess: New York City
1919

Boston Orchestra Excels in Playing of Brahm's Music

Heard at Its Best in Performance of Second Symphony—Other Works on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has given no finer performance in Carnegie Hall, under the baton of Henri Rabaud, than that of the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major yesterday afternoon, which is saying much. One might have expected the strings to lack brilliancy, owing to the damp weather, but that was not the case, although the violine did not play with absolute unanimity in the final movement of the symphony. But, apart from this minor lapse, which would scarcely be noticeable in another orchestra, they gave a finished performance of a rarely beautiful work, one which places Brahms very high in the hierarchy of symphonists.

It is sometimes maintained that the music of Brahms is deficient inemotional sensibility, that it is too sober, too self-controlled, too intellectual to be really artistic. But although that may occasionally be true, it certainly does not apply to his Second Symphony, and there are few things of its kind more beautiful than the closing pages of the first movement and the final scherzo. Mr. Rabaud conducted the work with fine insight, and added to the respect in which he is already regarded.

Fauré's Suite from the music which h composed for Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock", is exquisite and imaginative, but i not suited for a large orchestra and concert room. It needs a stage backgroun and the voice part, which was missing yes terday, although it was given in the cir cumstances with all possible effect. Saint Saëns' brilliant symphonic poem "Phaëton," which was recently heard in th same hall, and Berlioz's somewhat empt overture "Le Carnaval Romain" wer played with all possible effect, and th programme was greatly enjoyed by a ver large audience.

Serge Rachmaninoff, leader of the Russian school, and commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the next Boston symphony concert in the Academy of Music, which is to take place Wednesday evening, February 5, instead of the usual Monday. The soloist originally announced for this concert, Arthur Rubinstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement.

Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto, and the event should remind those who are in the way of exalting Rachmaninoff, the pianist, above [illegible] that this great genius who has subjugated both orchestra and pianoforte so completely to his will, is not of the sort who may docilely be tied to a box of strings. Russia considers him a conductor of the first importance. But the conductor and the pianist are but servants to the composer, and Rachmaninoff will surely be longest remembered by his splendid symphony, his "Ilse of the Dead," his opera, his numerous songs and piano pieces, and perhaps best of all—his concerto in C minor. In such works his rare and riotous imagination was let loose, and in the concerto, wherein two completely mastered mediums are blended, there will be opportunity to hear the authority of the composer's reading.

A notable revival will also figure upon this program—four orchestral excerpts which Franck made from his choral symphonic poem, "Psyche." The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton;" Faure's incidental music to Harancourt's "Shylock," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

* * *

---

m PUBLIC LEDGER
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 26

Sergei Rachmaninoff, leader of the Russian school and commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, which is to take place Wednesday evening, February 6, instead of the usual Monday. The soloist originally announced for this concert, Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement. Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto. Russia considers him a conductor of the first importance. But the conductor and the pianist are but servants to the composer, and Rachmaninoff will surely be longest remembered by his splendid symphony, his "Isle of the Dead," his opera, his numerous songs and piano pieces, and perhaps best of all, his concerto in C minor.

A notable revival will also figure upon this program—four orchestral excerpts which Franck made from his choral symphonic poem, "Psyche." The other numbers will be Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton," Faure's incidental music to Harancourt's "Shylock," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

---

m
ress Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 18 1919
e

The Third of the Traditional "Philharmonics."

If it was apparent at the beginning of the season that the deteutonizing of the Boston Symphony was better for its soul than for its body, is now quite as apparent that this time-honored organization is getting to be itself again. Certainly Rabaud's forces were in admirable form at the third in the series of Philharmonic concerts at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of last week. And generally speaking it found sincere appreciation. The exceptions were inconsiderate persons here and there who persisted in talking and thus seriously marred the pleasure of those who wanted to keep their mind on something more musical than mere chatter. Of the three numbers on the program, which stretched all the way across Europe and through enemy country, the "Antar" symphony of Rimsky-Korsakoff was given a fine interpretation, leaving the large audience keen to go on with the remainder of the program. Then came Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master of this organization, who did the Mendelssohn "Concerto in E minor for Violin" with the orchestra in a manner which places him high in the ranks of the violinists. Finally there was the fascinating "Rapsodie Espagnole" of Ravel, with its vivid night picture, its malaguena, its habañera and its féria in quick succession. Here is a breath of real Spain as the tourist does not see it unless he lingers on the peninsula long enough really to know Spain. Whether its subtle qualities were understood or not, it sent every one home in good humor—even those who had been sorely tried by the wicked talkative folk.

Tennes
m dress Nashville, Ten ate JAN 26 1919

FAMED MUSICIAN ONE OF "FORTY IMMORTALS"

BOSTON.—Henri Rabaud, famous French musician, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has become one of the "forty immortals" of France.

News has just been received of his election to membership in L'Institute de France. Under the institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers of the various fine arts. The membership of the academy is fixed at forty and is for life—thus the name "forty immortals." Of these there are only six musical composers. Rabaud takes the place of Widor, who in turn has become secretaire perpetuelle. The others are Sainte-Saens, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure and Carpentier. Rabaud is the only conductor to hold the honor, although he was elected on his merits as a composer.

---

n AMERICAN
ress: Baltimore, Md.
JAN 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, leader of the Russian school and commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theater, which is to take place Tuesday evening, February 4, instead of the usual Wednesday. The soloist originally announced for this concert, Mr. Arthur Rubenstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement.

---

om NEWS
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
JAN 19
ate

About The Boston Symphony.

A well-known Baltimore musician said to me at the last Boston Symphony concert, indicating the size of the audience, which, indeed, was disgracefully small, "Look at that, and then talk about the 'German change of heart.'

"Where are the many representatives of the German element that used to patronize the Boston Symphony during Muckian days? Are they here? Do they come to the concerts now? Oh, no.

"We have a new French director—and a very fine and distinguished one at that—and the old Hun material has been weeded out of the orchestra.

"Reinstate Muck and his colleagues and you'll see them all come trooping back—these loyal 'civilized' Germans, who love music so devotedly for itself and who proclaim so loudly when Beethoven, Wagner and Strauss are in question that the arts are above nationality."

In truth, there is something in the charge that the German "element's" lack of patronage is in a measure responsible for the small attendance at the Boston Symphony concerts.

I could sit down and tick off a long list of people of German birth who were always present at the Symphony concerts in the past, but who are never seen at them nowadays. These are people, many of them well known, who before the United States got into the war were most violent and disgusting in their pro-Hun utterances, but who later became very discreetly silent.

Maybe some of these fine days I shall mention a few of their names.

I think that most of the discriminating people who attended the two concerts M. Rabaud has so far directed in Baltimore are very well assured that the Boston Symphony was put into capable hands when he was made its conductor, and that there is every reason to believe that under his leadership the future achievements of the organization will outshine that of the past.

Happily he has no inclination whatever toward creating a spectacular effect. His directing is characterized by sincerity.

It was natural that for a time [illegible]

---

rom SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
EVENING
JAN 29
ate

CELEBRATED COMPOSER COMING AS SOLOIST

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF.

This very celebrated Russ com poser, who is also a pianist, will be the soloist at the concert to be given next Tuesday (note the day) [illegible] at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will replace Arthur Rubinstein, who is unable to reach this country from South America.

TRANSCRIPT FEBRUARY 10,

NOVEL MUSIC AT HAND

Franck's Suite, "Psyche," to Be Played for the First Times in Boston in Entirety at the Symphony Concerts of This Week—A New Suite by Faure, Suggested by "The Merchant of Venice," Also to Be Heard

AT the Symphony Concerts of this week, the suite, "Psyche," drawn by Franck from his like-named symphony for orchestra and chorus will be played for the first times in Boston in entirety. When Mr. d'Indy led the orchestra for a fortnight in the autumn of 1905, he put a single division of the suite—"Psyche and Eros"—upon one of his programmes. A few months later, Mr. Wallace Goodrich included a second division—"The Slumber of Psyche"—in an orchestral concert in Jordan Hall. Finally, in April of 1906, Mr. Gericke and the Symphony Orchestra repeated "Psyche and Eros" and prefaced it with the "tone-picture," "The Gardens of Eros." After this vogue of a season, "Psyche" vanished from the active repertory of Symphony Hall. Now, after thirteen years, Mr. Rabaud brings back the suite "in entirety." He and the orchestra so played it in Philadelphia and New York last week and will so play at home next Friday and Saturday. In order, the four divisions are: "The Slumber of Psyche": "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," the movement as yet unheard in Boston; "The Gardens of Eros," and "Psyche and Eros." All four are written for the usual concert orchestra of Franck's day. He composed the original "symphony" in 1887-1888; in 1888 it was heard in Paris; subsequently there and elsewhere, it has kept occasional place on conductor's lists.

According to the programme-book of the Boston Orchestra, for Mr. d'Indy's performance of "Psyche and Eros," Franck's text, obscurely attributed to various hands, "does not follow closely" the Greek legend of the loves of Eros and Psyche as recounted by Apuleius. "In the French poem, Psyche, asleep, is borne by the zephyrs—her pure aspirations—to the gardens of Eros, to the long-desired paradise. There her celestial bridegroom awaits her. She wishes, however, to tear aside the veil of mystery that enwraps him. The vision disappears. Again on earth, wandering and lamenting, she pours out her sorrow. Eros pardons her ambition, which he, after all, had inspired, and the two ascend to the light. 'It is the apotheosis,' says Dr. Gustave Derepas, in his study of Franck, 'it is the triumph of love which is no longer forced to believe: it sees and possesses; it is a veritable redemption.'

"'Eros and Psyche,' continues Derepas, 'do not appear as individuals. The orchestra interprets their feelings, and for this reason: the two are in this poem not individuals. Franck, forgetting the legendary personages, looks on them as symbols of the human soul and supreme love. Music, absolute music without words, because its notes do not have a definite meaning, is of all the forms of art the most adequate expression of these immaterial realities. There are no solos in this oratorio. The orchestra has the most important part; it translates the longings, the regrets, the final joy of Psyche. The chorus, an anonymous, impersonal body, sings now and then and in few words the peripeteias of the drama. It is to be easily seen that the whole work is charged with the spirit of Christian mysticism.'"

"From the first pages to the last," wrote the Parisian reviewer, Hugues Imbert, about the music, "the hearer is impressed by the mastery of the writing and the nobility of the ideas. He will admire 'The Slumber of Psyche,' a prelude full of a mysterious language and a piece that will remind him of Wagner, not in actual material, but in the theories and style. He will recognize the composer's talent in translating the strange sounds that precede the scene in which Psyche is carried by the zephyrs into the gardens of Eros; he will find an exquisite tenderness in the third theme of Psyche reposing among the flowers and saluted by the powers of nature; he will detect a certain relationship between the phrase sung to Psyche to the words, 'Souviens-toi que tu ne dois jamais de ton mystique époux connaître le visage' and the phrase uttered by Lohengrin to Elsa in a situation exactly parallel; and he will welcome and retain many other pages of the score. But he will regret the lack of variety and the length which robs the music of a part of its charm."

More particularly, Franck develops the music from various "typical motives," disclosed, combined, contrasted and variously and significantly manipulated throughout the suite—the motive of Eros, the motive of Psyche, the motive of love, the motive of longing, the motive of sleep, the zephyrs' motive and so forth. In the second division—"Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," it is possible to hear echoes of his earlier symphonic poem, "The Daughters of Aeolus." Before the third division, "The Gardens of Eros," may be read this programme note: "Psyche, more beautiful than beauty itself, sleeps in the midst of flowers, hailed as a queen by Nature rejoicing as on a holiday. Voices murmur in her ear the power of love. Gently agitated, she awakes. The voices sing again, and tell of the invisible spouse who will come to her. She listens, delighted, and she waits. And now the voices, singing alway, say to her solemnly: 'Remember that you should never know the face of your mystic lover. Bear this in mind.' The spirits are silent. Another voice is heard, gentle but penetrating. It is that of Eros himself. Psyche answers, but with hesitation. Soon their souls are blended. Passion, light, and there would be eternal happiness if Psyche only knew how to remember her vow." As originally written, music for the chorus here warned Psyche against the peril of curiosity about her mystic lover. Then ensues the final division of the suite, "portraying the happiness of the lovers. Love at first hesitant, grows bold; it has its passionate flights, its returns to calmness, its torrents of passion, then its moments of ecstacy. The themes are so blended or enchained that they are nearly all of like importance, and often one is the conclusion of the other. They are charged with a penetrating solemnity which touches the heart." By these tokens the Greek legend of the loves of Eros and Psyche is quite as serviceable a background to Franck music as "Christian mysticism" and all that sort of thing. When expression in the arts is in question, there is curious kinship between erotic and mystical moods.

The other novel piece to be heard at the Symphony Concerts of this week is a suite drawn by Fauré from his incidental music to "Shylock," a short-lived Parisian version by d'Haraucourt of "The Merchant of Venice," evidently much altered and dizened according to the taste and fancy of the adapting poetaster. Paris saw the piece and heard the music for a few evenings at the Odéon in 1889. As transferred to the concert hall, the suite runs in six divisions—two, a "Chanson" and a Madrigal" for tenor voice; and four, an Entr'acte," an "Epithalamium," a Nocturne and a "Finale" for orchestra. Here in Boston Mr. Arthur Hackett, the tenor, will sing the songs. In New York last Saturday, as in Philadelphia, a few days before, the orchestra played the rest of the suite and Mr Krehbiel wrote of it in The Tribune as follows:

"If 'Shylock' has in it any of the elements of Shakspeare's comedy the fact was not divulged by the music composed by Fauré to illustrate it 'The Merchant of Venice,' like every other Shakspearian play, no matter what its subject or its people, is Elizabethan English in spirit. M. Rabaud made a handsome recognition of that fact in his own music to the play which he produced on his previous visit. It was all constructed out of music familiar to Shakspeare's countrymen in Shakspeare's time. Fauré's music began with a march movement which a perhaps too whimsical fancy might have associated with Falstaff's motley army, but which could not be identified by any stretch of the imagination with any of the dramatic elements to be found in the story of the usurious but much-abused Jew.

"Evidently there is a merry wedding in the French comedy, for the second number was a pretty epithalamium and the final number suggested that possibly the fairy folk of 'A Mid-Summer Night's Dream' had also gotten into it. There was no just reason, of course, why anybody should have expected to hear Shakspearian echoes in any part of the suite, but since imagination does not always wait upon reason it was agreeable to note that the nocturne invoked the sweeter melody of the lines:

Here we will sit and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears; soft stillness and the night
Become the touches of sweet harmony.

It also invited recollection of the scene under the moon in which Lorenzo and Jessica display their classical learning and bandy allusions to the nocturnal adventures of Cressid, Thisbe, Dido and Medea. But perhaps all these fancies are irrelevant though they are instanced to show that, in our opinion, there is some charming, if not profoundly beautiful music in Fauré composition."

om PRESS
ddress Philadelphia, Pa.
ate

LIFE
m
Brooklyn, N. Y.
lress
JAN 18 1919
e

The Third of the Traditional "Philharmonics."

If it was apparent at the beginning of the season that the deteutonizing of the Boston Symphony was better for its soul than for its body, is now quite as apparent that this time-honored organization is getting to be itself again. Certainly Rabaud's forces were in admirable form at the third in the series of Philharmonic concerts at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of last week. And generally speaking it found sincere appreciation. The exceptions were inconsiderate persons here and there who persisted in talking and thus seriously marred the pleasure of those who wanted to keep their mind on something more musical than mere chatter. Of the three numbers on the program, which stretched all the way across Europe and through enemy country, the "Antar" symphony of Rimsky-Korsakoff was given a fine interpretation, leaving the large audience keen to go on with the remainder of the program. Then came Frederic Fradkin, the new concert master of this organization, who did the Mendelssohn "Concerto in E minor for Violin" with the orchestra in a manner which places him high in the ranks of the violinists. Finally there was the fascinating "Rapsodie Espagnole" of Ravel, with its vivid night picture, its malaguena, its habanera and its feria in quick succession. Here is a breath of real Spain as the tourist does not see it unless he lingers on the peninsula long enough really to know Spain. Whether its subtle qualities were understood or not, it sent every one ome in good humor—even those who had been sorely tried by the wicked talkative folk.

Tenness
m dress Nashville, Ten
ate

FAMED MUSICIAN ONE OF "FORTY IMMORTALS"

BOSTON.—Henri Rabaud, famous French musician, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has become one of the "forty immortals" of France.

News has just been received of his election to membership in L'Institute de France. Under the institute is the Academie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers of the various fine arts. The membership of the academy is fixed at forty and is for life—thus the name "forty immortals." Of these there are only six musical composers. Rabaud takes the place of Widor, who in turn has become secretaire perpetuelle. The others are Sainte-Saens, Dubois, Paladilhe, Faure and Carpentier. Rabaud is the only conductor to hold the honor, although he was elected on his merits as a composer.

WORLD
om
ddress: New York City
ate

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER REVEALS SKILL

Original Reading of Brahms Symphony Heard at Concert Yesterday at Carnegie Hall.

Quite a few persons are discovering two things with respect to the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Henri Rabaud is an able conductor, whose readings reflect distinction; the orchestra, as such, is still a splendid institution. The changes made this season have not detracted from its efficiency to the extent many at first thought. These matters were rather conclusively demonstrated in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon when the visiting New England organization gave its eighth New York programme of the season.

M. Rabaud began with the No. 2 Brahms Symphony in the key of D major. He doubtless shocked some hidebound traditionists who prefer the sort of readings most Boston Symphony conductors of the past have offered. But the discerning and unprejudiced hearer recognized many beauties in the score as the orchestra played it under M. Rabaud. He made the adagio a movement of color in lovely tone and the allegretto teem with life and grace. The final allegro had all the free swing and authority and satisfying substance which one desires.

Faure's suite to the Haraucourt "Shylock"—four movements of it—opened the second part of the programme. The nocturne and the entr'acte sections received the most consistently fine treatment. Such smoothness among the choirs of an orchestra and such plasticity are not often heard. These things were likewise to be observed in the playing of Saint-Saens's pictorially descriptive "Phaeton." The concert ended with the Berlioz "Carnival Romain" overture.

HERALD
ess: New York City

Boston Orchestra Excels in Playing of Brahm's Music

Heard at Its Best in Performance of Second Symphony—Other Works on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has given no finer performance in Carnegie Hall, under the baton of Henri Rabaud, than that of the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major yesterday afternoon, which is saying much. One might have expected the strings to lack brilliancy, owing to the damp weather, but that was not the case, although the violine did not play with absolute unanimity in the final movement of the symphony. But, apart from this minor lapse, which would scarcely be noticeable in another orchestra, they gave a finished performance of a rarely beautiful work, one which places Brahms very high in the hierarchy of symphonists.

It is sometimes maintained that the music of Brahms is deficient inemotional sensibility, that it is too sober, too seif-controlled, too intellectual to be really artistic. But although that may occasionally be true, it certainly does not apply to his Second Symphony, and there are few things of its kind more beautiful than the closing pages of the first movement and the final scherzo. Mr. Rabaud conducted the work with fine insight, and added to the respect in which he is already regarded.

Fauré's Suite from the music which he composed for Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock" is exquisite and imaginative, but is not suited for a large orchestra and concert room. It needs a stage background and the voice part, which was missing yesterday, although it was given in the circumstances with all possible effect. Saint Saëns' brilliant symphonic poem "Phaëton," which was recently heard in the same hall, and Berlioz's somewhat empty overture "Le Carnaval Romain" were played with all possible effect, and the programme was greatly enjoyed by a very large audience.

Serge Rachmaninoff, leader of the Russian school, and commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the next Boston symphony concert in the Academy of Music, which is to take place Wednesday evening, February 5, instead of the usual Monday. The soloist originally announced for this concert, Arthur Rubinstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement.

Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto, and the event should [illegible] those who are in the way of exalting Rachmaninoff, the pianist, above [illegible] this great genius who has subjugated both orchestra and pianoforte so completely to his will, is not of the sort who may docilely be tied to a box of strings. Russia considers him a conductor of the first importance. But the conductor and the pianist are but servants to the composer, and Rachmaninoff will surely be longest remembered by his splendid symphony, his "Ilse of the Dead," his opera, his numerous songs and piano pieces, and perhaps best of all—his concerto in C minor. In such works his rare and riotous imagination was let loose, and in the concerto, wherein two completely mastered mediums are blended, there will be opportunity to hear the authority of the composer's reading.

A notable revival will also figure upon this program—four orchestral excerpts which Franck made from his choral symphonic poem, "Psyche." The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton;" Faure's incidental music to Harancourt's "Shylock," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

* * *

n PUBLIC LEDGER
dress Philadelphia, Pa.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, leader of the Russian school and commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, which is to take place Wednesday evening, February 6, instead of the usual Monday. The soloist originally announced for this concert, Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement. Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto. Russia considers him a conductor of the first importance. But the conductor and the pianist are but servants to the composer, and Rachmaninoff will surely be longest remembered by his splendid symphony, his "Isle of the Dead," his opera, his numerous songs and piano pieces, and perhaps best of all, his concerto in C minor.

A notable revival will also figure upon this program—four orchestral excerpts which Franck made from his choral symphonic poem, "Psyche." The other numbers will be Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton," Faure's incidental music to Harancourt's "Shylock," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

AMERICAN
ress: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, leader of the Russian school and commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theater, which is to take place Tuesday evening, February 4, instead of the usual Wednesday. The soloist originally announced for this concert, Mr. Arthur Rubenstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement.

om NEWS
ddress: Baltimore, Md.

SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
ate

About The Boston Symphony.

A well-known Baltimore musician said to me at the last Boston Symphony concert, indicating the size of the audience, which, indeed, was disgracefully small, 'Look at that, and then talk about the German change of heart.'

"Where are the many representatives of the German element that used to patronize the Boston Symphony during Muckian days? Are they here? Do they come to the concerts now? Oh, no!

"We have a new French director—and a very fine and distinguished one at that—and the old Hun material has been weeded out of the orchestra.

"Reinstate Muck and his colleagues and you'll see them all come trooping back—these loyal 'civilized' Germans, who love music so devotedly for itself and who proclaim so loudly when Beethoven, Wagner and Strauss are in question that the arts are above nationality."

In truth, there is something in the charge that the German "element's" lack of patronage is in a measure responsible for the small attendance at the Boston Symphony concerts.

I could sit down and tick off a long list of people of German birth who were always present at the Symphony concerts in the past, but who are never seen at them nowadays. These are people, many of them well known, who before the United States got into the war were most violent and disgusting in their pro-Hun utterances, but who later became very discreetly silent.

Maybe some of these fine days I shall mention a few of their names.

I think that most of the discriminating people who attended the two concerts M. Rabaud has so far directed in Baltimore are very well assured that the Boston Symphony was put into capable hands when he was made its conductor, and that there is every reason to believe that under his leadership the future achievements of the organization will outshine that of the past.

Happily he has no inclination whatever toward creating a spectacular effect. His directing is characterized by [illegible] savoir faire and sincerity.

It was natural that for a time after he assumed the baton a certain roughness should obtain, especially in the ensembles, but that condition is rapidly disappearing.

The Program On February 4.

The principal feature of the Boston Symphony's next Lyric concert will be the appearance of Serge Rachmaninoff, who will be heard in his own beautiful C minor concerto for piano and orchestra.

The numbers, unfortunately, include Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which will add to a plethora of this master's works that is really becoming burdensome. Other numbers will be the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's rhapsodie in A major.

CELEBRATED COMPOSER COMING AS SOLOIST

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF.

This very celebrated Russian composer, who is also a pianist, is to be the soloist at the concert to be given next Tuesday (note the day) evening at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will replace Arthur Rubinstein, who is unable to reach this country from South America in time.

REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.

CONCERT PLEASES 4200

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

200 TICKETS ARE USELESS

Some Holders Are Grieved, but Secretary Robbie Says He Has to Issue More Tickets Than There Are Seats

The Boston symphony orchestra, directed by Henri Rabaud, charmed 4200 people filling every seat in the Auditorium yesterday afternoon in the Young Men's Christian association series of Sunday afternoon meetings. The concert was less pleasing, however, to 200 people with tickets which the association had handed out free all week who were turned away from the doors at 3.20. These, with about 300 others, were at the end of the throng which massed all over the municipal plaza waiting almost two hours for entrance. There was some petulant grumbling in that little disappointed crowd, as there has been on previous occasions when the same thing has happened.

"Well," explained Secretary Kenneth Robbie of the association, "it is simply impossible to estimate how many are going to attend. We always want every seat full, for we depend upon the collections to pay expenses. For this concert we gave out 200 more tickets than there were seats, thinking of course some of them wouldn't be used. Invariably on previous occasions there are some which are not used. In this case it may have been some people without tickets were admitted in the rush, too. I'm not sure about that. It's hard to get doormen who can do the job right, and then you know there are always some people without tickets right up next to the doors when the rush starts so that it is difficult to keep them out. The association certainly tries to do this thing right."

The collection yesterday brought in $1299.07, Mr Robbie said, which was several hundred dollars less than the concert cost the association.

Splendid Concert

The concert for which the city is indebted to the enterprise and courage of the association, was one of the finest of the 25 which the Boston symphony orchestra has given here. It would have been notable, if for no other reason, for being given with the full orchestral forces, whereas most of the concerts here have been given by the somewhat reduced forces commonly used on tour. This point should not be unduly stressed, for the numbers required depend largely on the program, and the excellence of a concert is not to be measured by the number of performers. Sixty-five or so suffice perfectly for most occasions. Yet it is of interest from time to time to have the full strength of one of the world's greatest orchestras and the auditorium, fortunately, is equally adapted for a concert of either sort. The smaller force sounds full and brilliant, and the tone of the largest orchestra, is not cramped or harsh. Not a little of the thrilling effect of yesterday's concert was due to the extra volume of tone given by a band including 16 first violins, eight basses and the other instruments in proportion. The program, too, was well fitted to make good use of these great tonal resources.

Even more notable, however, was the appearance, for the first time in this city, of the orchestra under its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, and with a personnel very considerably changed in consequence of recent events. Of the changes in the orchestra it is not necessary to speak in detail; collectively they affect the orchestra materially, and some time will have to be allowed for the reconstruction to be completed before undertaking to compare its work with that of previous years. Technically it is perhaps not quite so perfect a machine as the one laboriously built up by a succession of noted conductors under the patronage of Maj Higginson, but it is too soon to look for this flawless technic after so considerable a reorganization. On the other hand, the orchestra has seldom given so inspiring a concert here as that of yesterday; its new conductor is happy in his programs and his interpretations are full of life. Under former conductors there have been complaints that a superb instrument was used for much dull second-rate music, and that refinements of execution counted for more than the spirit. These criticisms were sometimes unjust, but they were made; they could not possibly be made in connection with yesterday's concert.

Selections Well Chosen

The program, for example, was all that it should be for an audience which has to make one orchestral concert last a long time. Neither Mr Gericke or Dr Muck ever quite comprehended that a program which did very well for the regular Boston audience, attending the weekly concerts, might not meet the needs of the smaller cities. An audience which hears only a few such concerts in a year wants only "worth while" music—a big classic and some stirring modern music. Mr Rabaud met both needs with a concert of but three numbers. First came the favorite among all symphonies, Beethoven's fifth, and the second half was given to two colorful and attractive modern compositions, "The Youth of Hercules" by Saint Saens, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," opus 34. Neither of these is a great work, but the Saint Saens tone poem is in its way a masterpiece, and the Russian translation of Spanish music makes an extraordinarily vivid effect; both are works that appeal quickly and strongly to a general audience and they were heard with eager attention.

The favorite work, however, was the great C minor symphony, which most people know in one way or another, but seldom have a chance to hear so splendidly given. There were no mannerisms or exaggerations in Mr Rabaud's reading, no overemphasis, for example, on opening theme in which fate is supposed to knock at the door. But the symphony was developed in a masterly way, the variations of the andante were played with grace and feeling, and the triumphant outburst with which the strenuous scherzo breaks into the jubilant finale was as thrilling as can be imagined. Those who have heard the same orchestra play the same symphony under several conductors will probably agree that while each had points of distinctive merit the interpretation given yesterday by Mr Rabaud surpassed them all in energy and in the power of the climax reached.

EVENING POST
New York City
FEB 1 19

Boston Symphony Programme.

"Psyche," the symphonic poem of Franck, has been placed by Mr. Rabaud on the Boston Symphony programme for next Thursday in Carnegie Hall. In spite of the fact that d'Indy (to whom it is dedicated) conducted the last of its four movements when he visited America, spoke superlatively of it in his biography, and was enthusiastically seconded by Derepas, it has never been given in this country, except in one movement or another. It depicts "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche Borne Aloft by Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros," "Psyche and Eros," and, despite the pagan subject, its spirit is wholly Christian. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will also figure on Thursday's programme, besides the Prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's orchestral Rhapsody in A.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud will first essay Brahms with the Second Symphony in D major. The other numbers will be a suite written by Fauré from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock," Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "Phaëton," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date FEB

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

Without doubt the most important s loist to appear so far with the Bost Symphony Orchestra will be Rachma noff, who is to play his own C min concerto at the regular Philharmonic co cert at the Academy of Music next F day evening. When the gaunt Russ came to this country nine seasons a and played the same concerto wth same orchestra, he made a more vivid pression as composer than as pianist. T overwhelming impression he has made recitals this season brings a new lig upon the development of his genius.

On the same programme Mr. Raba will have his first essay at Brahms, co ducting the Second Symphony in D m jor. The closing number will be Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival."

n WORLD
ress: New York City
FEB 2 1919

Boston Symphony.

In Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," which stands upon the programme of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Mr. Rabaud will make known a work which, from all appearances, has been unduly neglected. Only one or another of the four movements has been played in this country, notably when d'Indy conducted them. To Franck, the erotic, imbued with ancient Italy, Psyche represented the soul of humanity; Eros, divine love. Psyche, uplifted by inspiration, seeks to pierce the mystery and falls, broken, to the earth. But she is finally redeemed in a glorious union.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will also figure on Thursday's programme, besides the prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's Orchestral Rhapsody in A.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud will first play Brahm's Second Symphony in D minor. The other numbers will be a suite written by Faure from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock," Saint-Saens's symphonic poem "Phaeton," and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

om MORNING TELEGRAP
ldress: New York City
ate

Boston Symphony Thursday.

In Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," which stands upon the program of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Mr. Rabaud will make known a work which from all appearances has been unduly neglected. Even with the omission of the choral portions (which are not important) it remains a large subject, largely treated. Only one or another of the four movements has been played in this country, notably when d'Indy conducted them.

Both d'Indy (to whom it was dedicated) and Derepas praise it in the highest terms, and both stress the fundamentally Christian spirit of the Pagan theme. To Franck the erotic, imbued with ancient Italy, Psyche represented the soul of humanity; Eros, divine love. Psyche, uplifted by inspiration, seeks to pierce the mystery and falls broken to the earth. But she is finally redeemed in a glorious union.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will also figure on Thursday's program, besides the prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's orchestral rhapsody in A.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud will first essay Brahms with the Second Symphony in D major. The other numbers will be a suite written by Faure from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock," Saint-Saen's symphonic poem "Phaeton" and Berlioz's overture "The Roman Carnival."

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 2- 1919

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF IS BOTH COMPOSER AND PIANIST

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF, the indomitable Russian composer and pianist who has made such an overwhelming impression in this his latest visit to our country, will at last be heard in Baltimore when he plays his own C-Minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Born in the Government of Novgorod in 1873, and studying music as a boy at the conservatories of Moscow and Petrograd, Rachmaninoff repeated the old story of the prodigy. Tancieff and Arensky were his masters. Early he began to compose and to play in recitals throughout Europe. He made a distinguished name as a conductor, but, being a composer, he never took up regularly that time-absorbing task except for two years as first conductor of the Moscow Imperial Opera.

He grew up a cosmopolitan—that is to say, a follower of Tschaikowsky, a disciple of western musical tradition, culture and form, as distinct from the Russian nationalists, such as Mossorgsky, Borodin and Rimsky Korsakoff, who shut their eyes resolutely to foreign influence and struggled with an embryonic technique. This accounts for Rachmaninoff's great versatility and his marvelous technical fecundity which liberated his unbridled imagination into the rare eloquence of his songs and piano pieces, his daring and somber-hued "Isle of the Dead," his poignant E-Minor Symphony ,and his great C-Minor Concerto, which has always been a favorite. The creator of these foremost works of modern music is no dry traditionalist—he was an early champion of the revolutionary Scriabin.

The score of a new symphony on the theme of Poe's "Bells" he was unable to bring with him from Russia, for, being an aristocrat, he became the victim of the Bolsheviki. His large estate was plundered and requisitioned. He fled to Scandinavia. His whereabouts were for some time unknown to us until he suddenly appeared in New York. His recitals in this country have had a tremendous and hypnotic effect on every audience.

When the gaunt and angular figure first comes upon the stage (he must stoop for some doorways) there is the electric feeling of the presence of genius. Bowed, dark and intent over his instrument, his striking profile is almost a tragic mask. Playing his concerto, Rachmaninoff, the composer, and Rachmaninoff, the pianist, are blended in his utter mastery, his resourcefulness of free inspiration running a riotous course, his rhythms—whiplike, biting, and his tremendous chords colorful and resilient, which explore the whole piano and orchestra. Small wonder that, playing with the Russian Symphony in New York last week, his compatriots from stage and audience rose in excitement and cheered him repeatedly. For with Strawinsky Rachmaninoff is surely the greatest living Russian composer. And no more than two in the world, or at most three, can dispute his eminent genius.

n CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

RACHMANINOFF WILL PLAY HERE

Announced as Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Without doubt the most important soloist to appear so far with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Rachmaninoff, who is to play his own C minor concerto at the regular Fourth Philharmonic concert at the Academy of Music Friday evening. When the gaunt Russian came to this country nine seasons ago and played the same concerto with the same orchestra, he made a more vivid impression as a composer than as a pianist. The overwhelming impression he has made in recitals this season brings a new light upon the development of his genius and his all-conquering will power.

Upon the same programme Mr. Rabaud will have his first essay at Brahms, conducting the Second Symphony, in D major. The closing number will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

When Rachmaninoff plays his own C minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening some will recall that the same indomitable Russian played his same Concerto in the same hall with the same orchestra during his visit to this country in 1909. If that was an event in our musical life, this will be a far greater, for in the ten years intervening the coterie who then championed the vivid and sombre-hued composer has grown to be the entire musical world; and the then promising pianist has since become surely the most vivid, intense, imaginative, hypnotic performer of the day. On Wednesday there will be the rarer opportunity of hearing the foremost among the world's composers and pianists in both roles.

A notable revival will also figure upon this program—four orchestral excerpts which Franck made from his choral symphonic poem, "Psyche." The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton;" Faure's incidental music to Harancourt's "Shylock," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

★

RACHMANINOFF AND BOSTONIANS THRIL

Famous Russian and Symphon Play Movingly; Orchestra Growth Notable.

AUDIENCE ALSO GROW

A most remarkable elevation spirit was caused by the combinatic at the Lyric Theater last night Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninof composer and pianist, the Bostc Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabau conductor, and their performance Mr. Rachmaninoff's concerto No. in C minor. At conclusion of t work Mr. Rachmaninoff was giv one of the most extended periods applause ever accorded in Baltimo which caused him to return to t stage six or seven times in acknow edgment. The concert was t fourth of the orchestra's series five in this city. The audience pro ably was the largest so far this se son at these concerts.

Such a stirring of soul throu musical art has been rare in Balt more, and one will think of it wi emotion far in the future. The co certo is anything except radica judged by ultra-modern standard but its harmonies, construction a progressions are surpassingly ric and when these were vitalized by M Rachmaninoff's smooth, adequa unconstrained, dignified, magnifice piano playing and by the orchestra commensurate co-operation under M Raband, the result was moving b yond description. Factors also, i this achievement were the physical personality and aspect of Mr. Rachmaninoff, the rich tone of the piano he played and the individually rich tone of the orchestra.

Performance by the orchestra of Beethoven's fifth symphony also caused prolonged applause, and Chabrier's prelude to Act II. of the opera Gwendoline and Lalo's rhapsody in A major were well received.

At the previous concert the orchestra showed great growth of achievement, but last night's concert showed still more, so that it may be said at once that—although more remains to be done—under Mr. Rabaud's guidance has become already a notable musical instrument.

J. N. H.

SUN
ess: Baltimore, Md.
FEB 2- 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

OF far greater importance soloist of the season with the Boston Symphony will be the appear of Sergei Rachmaninoff, foremost amo the world's composers, as well as among pianists, at its concert in the Lyric Theatre Tuesday evening (instead of the usual Wednesday). The occasion will recall to some that he played here with the same orchestra during his visit to this country in 1909. That was an event in our musical life; this will be a greater, for in the 10 years intervening have come universal recognition and the perfection of pianism.

After unexpectedly "turning up" in New York last autumn, a fugitive from his native Russia, Rachmaninoff played there and in a few other Eastern cities. Stooping, gaunt, and intent over his keyboard, he completely dominated both his instrument and his audience by his sheer power of concentration, his keen composer's imagination which prompted his long fingers, swift and electric in response.

On Tuesday there will be the rarer opportunity of hearing him as pianist and composer both, for he is to play his own C minor concerto. Also upon the program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, adjudged one of Mr. Rabaud's finest attainments; the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," and Lalo's riotous orchestra rhapsody in A major.

Feb. 4-5

MORE NEWS

RACHMANINOFF GETS AN OVATION AT LYRIC

Russian Pianist Is Soloist At The Fourth Concert Of Boston Orchestra.

It is seldom, indeed, that a city is visited on two successive evenings by such imposing orchestras as those of the Philadelphia and Boston, and the occurrence afforded an excellent opportuuity for comparison of the two organizations, but anything of the kind would be altogether unfair and unjust under the present circumstances. Suffice it to say that the concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was by far the most successful yet given under the leadership of Henri Rabaud. He has a quiet, unassuming personality, one which does not immediately impress itself, so that it takes time before the hearer has any definite realization of this conductor's really lofty aims and ideals. These are now, however, beginning to make themselves felt, for last night the readings of all the numbers were marked by strong conviction, incisiveness and at times subtle insight.

The critic, like many, probably, of the audience, was dreading yet another repetition of Beethoven's C minor symphony, with which the concert of last night opened, but at the conclusion one and all felt that, played in the right way, this work can remain forever fresh and immortal. The first movement in particular was played with a titanic energy and forcefulness that made one realize for the first time in many years the tremendous significance of this portrayel of the struggle between humanity and destiny. Less appealing, however, were Mons. Rabaud's readings of the Andante and Scherzo of the symphony, for in both these two numbers that absolute "pianissimo" essential to the atmosphere of mystery and prescience called for in certain moments was never attained.

The audience was unanimously roused to tumultuous enthusiasm by the performance of the soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, who was heard last night in his own Concerto in C minor. His playing was distinguished by an immense virility, consummate technique and great brilliancy of execution, especially in the last movement of the composition, so that at the close one felt in no doubt that we had with us one of the biggest of modern pianists. The Concerto itself, though delightfully sane and at moments beautiful and noble in sentiment, is, on the other hand, somewhat reactionary in type and might have been written before the time of Brahms. The other numbers on the program were the Prelude to Act 2 of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," a work of genuine, healthy beauty, and Lalo's Rhapsody in A minor, with which the concert concluded.

H. D. P.

REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.

CONCERT PLEASES 4200

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

200 TICKETS ARE USELESS

Some Holders Are Grieved, but Secretary Robbie Says He Has to Issue More Tickets Than There Are Seats

The Boston symphony orchestra, directed by Henri Rabaud, charmed 4200 people filling every seat in the Auditorium yesterday afternoon in the Young Men's Christian association series of Sunday afternoon meetings. The concert was less pleasing, however, to 200 people with tickets which the association had handed out free all week who were turned away from the doors at 3.20. These, with about 300 others, were at the end of the throng which massed all over the municipal plaza waiting almost two hours for entrance. There was some petulant grumbling in that little disappointed crowd, as there has been on previous occasions when the same thing has happened

"Well," explained Secretary Kenneth Robbie of the association, "it is simply impossible to estimate how many are going to attend. We always want every seat full, for we depend upon the collections to pay expenses. For this concert we gave out 200 more tickets than there were seats, thinking of course some of them wouldn't be used. Invariably on previous occasions there are some which are not used. In this case it may have been some people without tickets were admitted in the rush, too. I'm not sure about that. It's hard to get doormen who can do the job right, and then you know there are always some people without tickets right up next to the doors when the rush starts so that it is difficult to keep them out. The association certainly tries to do this thing right."

The collection yesterday brought in $1299.07, Mr Robbie said, which was several hundred dollars less than the concert cost the association.

Splendid Concert

The concert for which the city is indebted to the enterprise and courage of the association, was one of the finest of the 25 which the Boston symphony orchestra has given here. It would have been notable, if for no other reason, for being given with the full orchestral forces, whereas most of the concerts here have been given by the somewhat reduced forces commonly used on tour. This point should not be unduly stressed, for the numbers required depend largely on the program, and the excellence of a concert is not to be measured by the number of performers. Sixty-five or so suffice perfectly for most occasions. Yet it is of interest from time to time to have the full strength of one of the world's greatest orchestras and the auditorium, fortunately, is equally adapted for a concert of either sort. The smaller force sounds full and brilliant, and the tone of the largest orchestra, is not cramped or harsh. Not a little of the thrilling effect of yesterday's concert was due to the extra volume of tone given by a band including 16 first violins, eight basses and the other instruments in proportion. The program, too, was well fitted to make good use of these great tonal resources.

Even more notable, however, was the appearance, for the first time in this city, of the orchestra under its new conductor, Henri Rabaud, and with a personnel very considerably changed in consequence of recent events. Of the changes in the orchestra it is not necessary to speak in detail; collectively they affect the orchestra materially, and some time will have to be allowed for the reconstruction to be completed before undertaking to compare its work with that of previous years. Technically it is perhaps not quite so perfect a machine as the one laboriously built up by a succession of noted conductors under the patronage of Maj Higginson, but it is too soon to look for this flawless technic after so considerable a reorganization. On the other hand, the orchestra has seldom given so inspiring a concert here as that of yesterday; its new conductor is happy in his programs and his interpretations are full of life. Under former conductors there have been complaints that a superb instrument was used for much dull second-rate music, and that refinements of execution counted for more than the spirit. These criticisms were sometimes unjust, but they were made; they could not possibly be made in connection with yesterday's concert.

Selections Well Chosen

The program, for example, was all that it should be for an audience which has to make one orchestral concert last a long time. Neither Mr Gericke or Dr Muck ever quite comprehended that a program which did very well for the regular Boston audience, attending the weekly concerts, might not meet the needs of the smaller cities. An audience which hears only a few such concerts in a year wants only "worth while" music—a big classic and some stirring modern music. Mr Rabaud met both needs with a concert of but three numbers. First came the favorite among all symphonies, Beethoven's fifth, and the second half was given to two colorful and attractive modern [illegible] "The Youth and the Witch" by Saint Saens, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," opus 34. Neither of these is a great work, but the Saint Saens tone poem is in its way a masterpiece, and the Russian translation of Spanish music makes an extraordinarily vivid effect; both are works that appeal quickly and strongly to a general audience and they were heard with eager attention.

The favorite work, however, was the great C minor symphony, which most people know in one way or another, but seldom have a chance to hear so splendidly given. There were no mannerisms or exaggerations in Mr Rabaud's reading, no overemphasis, for example, on opening theme in which fate is supposed to knock at the door. But the symphony was developed in a masterly way, the variations of the andante were played with grace and feeling, and the triumphant outburst with which the strenuous scherzo breaks into the jubilant finale was as thrilling as can be imagined. Those who have heard the same orchestra play the same symphony under several conductors will probably agree that while each had points of distinctive merit the interpretation given yesterday by Mr Rabaud surpassed them all in energy and in the power of the climax reached.

EVENING POST
New York City
FEB 1 19

Boston Symphony Programme.

"Psyche," the symphonic poem of Franck, has been placed by Mr. Rabaud on the Boston Symphony programme for next Thursday in Carnegie Hall. In spite of the fact that d'Indy (to whom it is dedicated) conducted the last of its four movements when he visited America, spoke superlatively of it in his biography, and was enthusiastically seconded by Derepas, it has never been given in this country, except in one movement or another. It depicts "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche Borne Aloft by Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros," "Psyche and Eros," and, despite the pagan subject, its spirit is wholly Christian. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will also figure on Thursday's programme, besides the Prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's orchestral Rhapsody in A.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud will first essay Brahms with the Second Symphony in D major. The other numbers will be a suite written by Fauré from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock," Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "Phaëton," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date FEB

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

Without doubt the most important s loist to appear so far with the Bost Symphony Orchestra will be Rachmai noff, who is to play his own C min concerto at the regular Philharmonic co cert at the Academy of Music next F day evening. When the gaunt Russi came to this country nine seasons a and played the same concerto wth same orchestra, he made a more vivid pression as composer than as pianist. T overwhelming impression he has made recitals this season brings a new lig upon the development of his genius.

On the same programme Mr. Raba will have his first essay at Brahms, co ducting the Second Symphony in D m jor. The closing number will be Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival."

n WORLD
ress: New York City
FEB 2 1919

Boston Symphony.

In Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," which stands upon the programme of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Mr. Rabaud will make known a work which, from all appearances, has been unduly neglected. Only one or another of the four movements has been played in this country, notably when d'Indy conducted them. To Franck, the erotic, imbued with ancient Italy, Psyche represented the soul of humanity; Eros, divine love. Psyche, uplifted by inspiration, seeks to pierce the mystery and falls, broken, to the earth. But she is finally redeemed in a glorious union.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will also figure on Thursday's programme, besides the prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's Orchestral Rhapsody in A.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud will first play Brahm's Second Symphony in D minor. The other numbers will be a suite written by Faure from the incidental music to Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock," Saint-Saens's symphonic poem "Phaeton," and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

om MORNING TELEGRAP
ldress: New York City
ate

Boston Symphony Thursday.

In Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," which stands upon the program of the Boston Symphony concert in Carneg Hall next Thursday evening. Mr. Rabau will make known a work which from a appearances has been unduly neglecte Even with the omission of the choral portions (which are not important) remains a large subject, largely treated Only one or another of the four movements has been played in this country notably when d'Indy conducted them.

Both d'Indy (to whom it was dedicated) and Derepas praise it in the highest terms, and both stress the fundamentally Christian spirit of the Pagan theme. To Franck the erotic, imbued with ancient Italy, Psyche represented the soul of humanity; Eros, divine love. Psyche, uplifted by inspiration, seeks to pierce the mystery and falls broken to the earth. But she is finally redeemed in a glorious union.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will also figure on Thursday's program, besides the prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's orchestral rhapsody in A.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud will first essay Brahms with the Second Symphony in D major. The other numbers will be a suite written by Faure from the incidental music to Harau-court's comedy "Shylock," Saint-Saen's symphonic poem "Phaeton" and Berlioz's overture "The Roman Carnival."

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 2- 1919

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF IS BOTH COMPOSER AND PIANIST

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF, the indomitable Russian composer and pianist who has made such an overwhelming impression in this his latest visit to our country, will at last be heard in Baltimore when he plays his own C-Minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Born in the Government of Novgorod in 1873, and studying music as a boy at the conservatories of Moscow and Petrograd, Rachmaninoff repeated the old story of the prodigy. Tancieff and Arensky were his masters. Early he began to compose and to play in recitals throughout Europe. He made distinguished name as a conductor, but, being a composer, he never took up regularly that time-absorbing task except for two years as first conductor of the Moscow Imperial Opera.

He grew up a cosmopolitan—that is to say, a follower of Tschaikowsky, a disciple of western musical tradition, culture and form, as distinct from the Russian nationalists, such as Mossorgsky, Borodin and Rimsky Korsakoff, who shut their eyes resolutely to foreign influence and struggled with an embryonic technique. This accounts for Rachmaninoff's great versatility and his marvelous technical fecundity which liberated his unbridled imagination into the rare eloquence of his songs and piano pieces, his daring and somber-hued "Isle of the Dead," his poignant E-Minor Symphony ,and his great C-Minor Concerto, which has always been a favorite. The creator of these foremost works of modern music is no dry traditionalist—he was an early champion of the revolutionary Scriabin.

The score of a new symphony on the theme of Poe's "Bells" he was unable to bring with him from Russia, for, being an aristocrat, he became the victim of the Bolsheviki. His large estate was plundered and requisitioned. He fled to Scandinavia. His whereabouts were for some time unknown to us until he suddenly appeared in New York. His recitals in this country have had a tremendous and hypnotic effect on every audience.

When the gaunt and angular figure first comes upon the stage (he must stoop for some doorways) there is the electric feeling of the presence of genius. Bowed, dark and intent over his instrument, his striking profile is almost a tragic mask. Playing his concerto, Rachmaninoff, the composer, and Rachmaninoff, the pianist, are blended in his utter mastery, his resourcefulness of free inspiration running a riotous course, his rhythms—whiplike, biting, and his tremendous chords colorful and resilient, which explore the whole piano and orchestra. Small wonder that, playing with the Russian Symphony in New York last week, his compatriots from stage and audience rose in excitement and cheered him repeatedly. For with Strawinsky Rachmaninoff is surely the greatest living Russian composer. And no more than two in the world, or at most three, can dispute his eminent genius.

n CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

RACHMANINOFF WILL PLAY HERE

Announced as Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Without doubt the most important soloist to appear so far with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Rachmaninoff, who is to play his own C minor concerto at the regular Fourth Philharmonic concert at the Academy of Music Friday evening. When the gaunt Russian came to this country nine seasons ago and played the same concerto with the same orchestra, he made a more vivid impression as a composer than as a pianist. The overwhelming impression he has made in recitals this season brings a new light upon the development of his genius and his all-conquering will power.

Upon the same programme Mr. Rabaud will have his first essay at Brahms, conducting the Second Symphony, in D major. The closing number will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

When Rachmaninoff plays his own C minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening some will recall that the same indomitable Russian played his same Concerto in the same hall with the same orchestra during his visit to this country in 1909. If that was an event in our musical life, this will be a far greater, for in the ten years intervening the coterie who then championed the vivid and sombre-hued composer has grown to be the entire musical world; and the then promising pianist has since become surely the most vivid, intense, imaginative, hypnotic performer of the day. On Wednesday there will be the rarer opportunity of hearing the foremost among the world's composers and pianists in both roles.

A notable revival will also figure upon this program—four orchestral excerpts which Franck made from his choral symphonic poem, "Psyche." The other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton;" Faure's incidental music to Harancourt's "Shylock," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

RACHMANINOFF AND BOSTONIANS THRIL

Famous Russian and Symphon Play Movingly; Orchestra Growth Notable.

AUDIENCE ALSO GROW

A most remarkable elevation spirit was caused by the combinatic at the Lyric Theater last night Sergei Vassilievich Rachmanino composer and pianist, the Bost Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabau conductor, and their performance Mr. Rachmaninoff's concerto No. in C minor. At conclusion of t work Mr. Rachmaninoff was giv one of the most extended periods applause ever accorded in Baltimo which caused him to return to t stage six or seven times in acknow edgment. The concert was t fourth of the orchestra's series five in this city. The audience pro ably was the largest so far this se son at these concerts.

Such a stirring of soul throu musical art has been rare in Balt more, and one will think of it wi emotion far in the future. The co certo is anything except radica sane and at moments beautiful and no judged by ultra-modern standard but its harmonies, construction a progressions are surpassingly ric and when these were vitalized by M Rachmaninoff's smooth, adequa unconstrained, dignified, magnifice piano playing and by the orchestra commensurate co-operation under M Raband, the result was moving b yond description. Factors also, i this achievement were the physical personality and aspect of Mr. Rachmaninoff, the rich tone of the piano he played and the individually rich tone of the orchestra.

Performance by the orchestra of Beethoven's fifth symphony also caused prolonged applause, and Chabrier's prelude to Act II. of the opera Gwendoline and Lalo's rhapsody in A major were well received.

At the previous concert the orchestra showed great growth of achievement, but last night's concert showed still more, so that it may be said at once that—although more remains to be done—under Mr. Rabaud's guidance has become already a notable musical instrument. J. N. H.

SUN
ess: Baltimore, Md.
FEB 2- 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

OF far greater importance than any soloist of the season with the Boston Symphony will be the appearance of Sergei Rachmaninoff, foremost among the world's composers, as well as among pianists, at its concert in the Lyric Theatre Tuesday evening (instead of the usual Wednesday). The occasion will recall to some that he played here with the same orchestra during his visit to this country in 1909. That was an event in our musical life; this will be a greater, for in the 10 years intervening have come universal recognition and the perfection of pianism.

After unexpectedly "turning up" in New York last autumn, a fugitive from his native Russia, Rachmaninoff played there and in a few other Eastern cities. Stooping, gaunt, and intent over his keyboard, he completely dominated both his instrument and his audience by his sheer power of concentration, his keen composer's imagination which prompted his long fingers, swift and electric in response.

On Tuesday there will be the rarer opportunity of hearing him as pianist and composer both, for he is to play his own C minor concerto. Also upon the program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, adjudged one of Mr. Rabaud's finest attainments; the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," and Lalo's riotous orchestra rhapsody in A major.

Feb. 11-5

MORE NEWS

RACHMANINOFF GETS AN OVATION AT LYRIC

Russian Pianist Is Soloist At The Fourth Concert Of Boston Orchestra.

It is seldom, indeed, that a city is visited on two successive evenings by such imposing orchestras as those of the Philadelphia and Boston, and the occurrence afforded an excellent opportuuity for comparison of the two organizations, but anything of the kind would be altogether unfair and unjust under the present circumstances. Suffice it to say that the concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was by far the most successful yet given under the leadership of Henri Rabaud. He has a quiet, unassuming personality, one which does not immediately impress itself, so that it takes time before the hearer has any definite realization of this conductor's really lofty aims and ideals. These are now, however, beginning to make themselves felt, for last night the readings of all the numbers were marked by strong conviction, incisiveness and at times subtle insight.

The critic, like many, probably, of the audience, was dreading yet another repetition of Beethoven's C minor symphony, with which the concert of last night opened, but at the conclusion one and all felt that, played in the right way, this work can remain forever fresh and immortal. The first movement in particular was played with a titanic energy and forcefulness that made one realize for the first time in many years the tremendous significance of this portrayel of the struggle between humanity and destiny. Less appealing, however, were Mons. Rabaud's readings of the Andante and Scherzo of the symphony, for in both these two numbers that absolute "pianissimo" essential to the atmosphere of mystery and prescience called for in certain moments was never attained.

The audience was unanimously roused to tumultuous enthusiasm by the performance of the soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, who was heard last night in his own Concerto in C minor. His playing was distinguished by an immense virility, consummate technique and great brilliancy of execution, especially in the last movement of the composition, so that at the close one felt in no doubt that we had with us one of the biggest of modern pianists. The Concerto itself, though delightfully sane and at moments beautiful and noble in sentiment, is, on the other hand, somewhat reactionary in type and might have been written before the time of Brahms. The other numbers on the program were the Prelude to Act 2 of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," a work of genuine, healthy beauty, and Lalo's Rhapsody in A minor, with which the concert concluded.

H. D. P.

RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 2 1919

When Rachmaninoff plays his own C minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening some will recall that he played the same concerto in the same hall with the same orchestra during his visit to this country in 1909. In the 10 years intervening the then promising pianist has become one of the most vivid, intense, imaginative, hypnotic performers of the day. Also upon the program will be Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche;" Faure's suite written for Harancourt's play, "Shylock;" Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

Mischa Heifetz at his recital in the Academy of Music on Tuesday evening will play the following compositions:

* * *

Tartini.....Sonata in G minor
Paganini.....Concerto in D major
Beethoven.....Romanze in F major
Beethoven.....Minuet
Henri Grasse.....Waves at Play
Wieniawski.....Guitarre
Tschaikowsky-Auer.....Andante Cantabile
Wieniawski.....Polonaise in D major

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia. Pa.
FEB 2 1919

When Rachmaninoff plays his own C minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening (instead of the usual Monday) some will recall that the same indomitable Russian played his same concerto in the same hall with the same orchestra during his visit to this country in 1909. If that was an event in our musical life, this will be a far greater, for in the ten years intervening the coterie who then championed the vivid and somber-hued composer have grown to be the entire musical world, and the then promising pianist ranks with the most vivid, intense, imaginative, hypnotic performers of the day.

On Wednesday there will be the rarer opportunity of hearing the foremost among the world's composers and pianists in both roles. Also upon the program will be one of Franck's most important and most neglected works—the symphonic poem "Psyche." For the rest, Faure's Suite written for Harancourt's play, "Shylock"; Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

The monthly recital will be given by the pupils of the E. K. Peall Conservatory of Music and Art on Friday evening, February 7, at the Masonic Home, Broad and Ontario streets. All are welcome.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 1919

FINE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rachmaninoff Plays His Second Concerto With Boston Organization

For the first time in its thirty-four years of visits to Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony appeared on other than a Monday night. The change was due to complications elsewhere and is not to be a precedent. The Academy of Music was crowded in every part last night, the special interest being Rachmaninoff in his own Concerto No. 2, in C minor. In a rather long programme this was by far the most notable number. It is nearly ten years since the composer gave the same concerto here with the Boston Orchestra, and a second hearing only added to the appreciation of a singularly beautiful work containing many musical novelties.

The composer was in poetic mood last night and played the romantic themes with delightful charm. So much has happened in Russia since he last played the number here that one was able to read into it much more of the Russian life than was possible at the first hearing. Beneath the melody one could get more clearly the note of Russian melancholy while the drastic conclusion with its singular thematic treatment seemed almost like news from Petrograd. A heartier reception and one more deserved has seldom been accorded an artist at the Academy.

The rest of the program consisted of Franck's "Psyche" played with academic nicety; Saint-Saen's familiar "Phaeton" with its florid ebullitions of color; Faure's "Skylock" suite in which the delicacy of the organization was shown at its best and, lastly, Weber's Overture to Euryanthe, inserted for no particular reason at the end of a program already long enough.

Director Ribaud conducted as usual with precision and musical intelligence, and the orchestra showed the benefit of the month's training since its last appearance.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 1919

BOSTONSYMPHONYPLAYS WITH RACHMTNINOFF

Concert of a High Order Brings Forward the Gifted Russian in His Own Composition

PROGRAM

Franck—Orchestral Suite from "Psyche."
Rachmaninoff—"Second Concerto, C minor.
Saint-Saens—"Phaeton," Symphonic Poem.
Faure—Suite from music for "Shylock."
Weber—"Euryanthe" Overture.

It was indeed a generous measure that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the guiding hand of Henri Rabaud, dealt at the Academy last evening. It was a splendid audience. Scarcely a seat was left untaken. The enthusiasm was maintained for two hours, but the concert was almost half an hour too long. No one could have worked harder than M. Rabaud and the soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, and their associates to engage the deepest interest of their hearers, and in this effort they were entirely successful. Rarely has there been in the Academy a heartier demonstration of favor than that which followed Rachmaninoff's extraordinarily fine performance of his extraordinarily fine concerto.

The use of the English language in Boston is beyond cavil; otherwise one might rise to a point of order and ask why the program book said of Rachmaninoff, "Born in the Government of Novgorod, April 1, 1873; now living." Was it necessary to inform the audience that he was alive when he walked out upon the stage in his own person?

The second concerto by Rachmaninoff was played here by its composer with the same orchestra nine years ago. Gabrilowitsch has played it with the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York and on tour in the West. Mr. Stokowski, Doc or Rich, Anton Homer and other members of the Philadelphia Orchestra were present to appraise and praise last night.

The piano begins and closes this "glorious work of fine intelligence." There is exhilarating vitality and virility of a fiber unquestionably Russian in the scoring. The soloist read his own inner meaning profoundly. The adagio was pure, clear song for the piano, the last part surpassingly lovely with the assertive cantilena of the right hand over the rolling arpeggios of the left. It is all music on the most elevated and elevating plane; the appeal is to the feelings and to the intellect at once. The final allegro brought in the latter part a rapturous outsoaring of inspired song from all the instruments. Applause was tremendous; recalls were numerous. Any outward expression of approval after such a performance is inadequate. There are giants in our day, and the unassuming, undecorative Rachmaninoff is one of them.

The rest of the program nowhere presented somber of solid argument to consider. Cesar Franck's mystic spirituality is devoted in this instance to the love of Psyche and Eros, at first a zephyr and at last a flame. In the main the music seemed the flowing continuity of a love whose course ran smooth, with but transient turbulence. The disastrous career of Phaeton's chariot was prolonged with skill. The refined and sweet but not powerful violin of Concert master Fradkin spoke prominently in the music of Faure. Weber's beautiful overture at a brisk pace made a suitable conclusion. At all times M. Rabaud made his presence felt for a scholarly urbanity and a real and reverent musicianship.

F. L. W.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 19

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Sergei Rachmaninoff, Soloist, in His Own Concerto.

The crowded house which greeted the fourth concert of the Boston Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night was indicative of a growing appreciation of the fine conductorship of Henri Rabaud, as well as a desire to again welcome that brilliant pianist and composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening. The upheaval in management and conductorship of the orchestra was bound to affect the attendance temporarily. Rabaud, however, is a musician of such fine attainment and is making so great an impression on American audiences that another season will doubtless find him with the capacity houses formerly accorded the Boston aggregation.

Rachmaninoff, playing his own C minor concerto, literally swept the audience before him. The big vital style of the work suited him perfectly, his brilliant technique and impressive manner finding an unusually suitable medium. The concerto is eminently orchestral, seeming more a part of the ensemble than an individual expression. It has some really great moments, the Adagio, for instance, being a veritable nocturne, big in style, but full of poetic appeal and of moving beauty. This was played with eloquent expression, sustained by an exquisite, ever-shifting orchestral background. The finale of the third movement, taken at a whirlwind pace, was another impressive performance. Its conclusion was greeted with tremendous applause, the pianist being compelled to return again and again to acknowledge the reception. Rachmaninoff is blessed with a compelling personality. He has only to appear to cause enthusiasm. On his first appearance here years ago he was accorded one of the greatest ovations ever given a pianist, and this despite the fact that he played a new work, the same concerto he did last night. It would be interesting to hear him in the beautiful concerto of his gifted countryman, Tschaikowsky.

Orchestrally, the evening was rich in novelty and interest. The Orchestral Suite from the Ceasar Franck symphonic poem, "Psyche"; Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; the Faure Suite from the music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Sylock," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" forming a combination that brought undoubted enjoyment.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM OF COMMANDING INTEREST

Rabaud Pleases with Selected Parts of Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem "Pysche"—Rachmanninov, Distinguished Russian Pianist, Plays His Own Composition.

In the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, another opportunity was given to amplify our impressions of Henri Rabaud as a conductor and of Sergei Rachmanninov as a pianist. Perhaps it is yet too early to permanently appraise Rabaud as a symphony conductor, as we know too little of him in this capacity and are apt to be influenced by his success as a composer. All eminent composers, however, do not attain equal heights as conductors, principally because they are often too individualistic. This quality, which marks a man of genius in original composition, may mitigate against his universality in interpreting another individual's concepts. We will find that the greatest conductors are men whose egos are plastic; men who can show us the personality of Haydn when directing a Haydn symphony, who can create a Beethoven atmosphere at the proper time, and who can be passionate or chaste with Richard Strauss and sybaritic or hazily impressionistic with the modern French and Russian. In other words, the great conductor must be a cosmopolis of mood and philosophy.

After hearing Mr. Rabaud for the fourth time one cannot but feel that he is affable, rational and erudite, but we sense the fear that were he an actor, his Hamlet and Dromio would be quite similar. Let us wait, however, for a few more concerts before we crystallize our opinions, keeping in mind the old French proverb that "to know a man, you must have eaten a bushel of salt with him."

The program last night was of commanding interest. In place of a symphony Mr. Rebaud selected parts of Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." The Boston Orchestra had never before played this work in Philadelphia and we don't often hear it with the Philadelphia Orchestra, so that it is still somewhat of a novelty to Philadelphians. The four orchestral excerpts from the symphony appear on the program as an orchestral suite and are given the titles, "The Sleep of Pysche," "Psyche upborne by the zephyrs," "The Garden of Eros," "Pysche and Eros."

This is the sort of theme that Franck revelled in, and his abstract, legendary music makes a perfect language in which to tell mythological tales such as Pysche and Eros. The first three of the excerpts are much alike, but the necessary contrast is contained in the fourth, this one being less Franckian than the others. Mr. Rabaud evidently experiences Cesar Franck, for he seemed very much in his element throughout the "Pysche" music.

After the symphonic suite came the concerto in C minor composed by Rachmanninov and played by the composer. The C minor concerto is one of four composed by the great Russian, and does not make its appeal by bombastic display or tantivy. It rests firmly upon a solid foundation of good music though not exactly surface music.

The piano playing of Sergei Rachmanninov is the playing of a great musician. It used to be said of Liszt that when he played, his hearers forgot the piano and Liszt and thought only of music. To me Rachmanninov achieves the same phenomena. Try to imagine standing before the Tagh Mahal—would it not seem trivial to comment upon the size, or the color, or this or that specific beauty? Would you not rather stand speechless—silenced by the overpowering grandeur of the ensemble. And it is just with this same feeling that I write of Rachmanninov. He makes me forget black and white keys, technique, pedaling, difference in tempo and phrasing. I forget whether he sits on a chair or bench, or whether he fingers according to Moscheler or Breithaupt. He will does me as a critic—he makes me an enraptured worshiper of the divine art. "Homage a Rachmanninov."

After the intermission following the concerto the orchestra played with full effect the "Phaeton" symphonic poem by Saint-Saens. This work of Saint-Saens continually grows in favor and already has practically become a classic, and Rabaud gave it a fine interpretation. The group of four pieces by Faure that followed the "Phaeton" were charming, spirited hits of neo-French spirit, vivacious and often sparkling. As a sort of conventional close to this rather unusual program, Mr. Rabaud played the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber and brought to a happy conclusion a most interesting concert.

C. K. J.

EVENING SUN
New York City
FEB 6 1919

What the Bostons Play.

"Psyche," the symphonic poem of Franck, which Mr. Rabaud has placed upon the Boston Symphony programme for this Thursday in Carnegie Hall, promises to be no less in size or aspiration than the Belgian master's much played symphony. In spite of the fact that D'Indy (to whom it was dedicated) conducted the last of its four movements when he visited America, spoke superlatively of it in his biography, and was enthusiastically seconded by Derepas, it has never been given in this country except in one movement or another. It depicts "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche borne aloft by Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros," "Psyche and Eros," and despite the pagan subject its spirit is (Boston assures us) wholly Christian. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will also figure on Thursday's programme, besides the Prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's orchestral Rhapsody in A.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud will first essay Brahms with the Second Symphony in D major. The other numbers will be [illegible]

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date FEB 7 1919

BOSTON SYPHONY.

The Boston Symphony appeared at Carnegie Hall last night in the first of two concerts they are giving this week. M. Rabaud continued his policy of making us acquainted with French music, Cesar Franck, Chabrier and Lalo being represented on a programme which was, however, completely dominated by Beethoven's Fifth symphony. The symphony began the progamme, and after it was over it was difficult to pay much attention to the rest.

The Franck work—the orchestral suite from the symphonic work "Psyche"—was the most interesting of the French compositions. It is melodius and has a fine, if somewhat limited, spiritual quality. It does not possess ecstacy as such a work should.

M. Rabaud's reading of the Fifth symphony was interesting. It was scholarly, but it lacked subtlety. It lacked majesty too, although the members of the orchestra gave of their very best. The tone was heavenly beyond words. But one kept sighing for the baton of Felix Weingartner.

Mr. Rabaud's Programs

What interesting programs Mr. Rabaud is arranging for the Symphony concert audiences! Take, for instance, the program for the concerts of Feb. 21, 22. The orchestral pieces will be Lalo's superb overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"; a symphonic poem, "The Riders to the Sea" (after Synge's grim tragedy), by Mr. Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge; a Suite of Ballet Airs from Rameau's opera, "Hippolyte et Aricie"; and Rimsky-Korsakoff's ever welcome "Scheherazade." Furthermore Mr. Emilio de Gogorza, who will sing for the first time here with this orchestra has chosen airs from Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide" and Massenets's "Roi de Lahore."

Program making is a difficult art. Theodore Thomas was a master in this respect. Mr. Henschel, who was learning his trade here as the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—"he was paid well for going a-fishing"—arranged excellent programs. Of his successors. Mr. Gericke came next, then the turbulent and perspiring Mr. Fiedler. The programs of Mr. Nikisch and Dr. Muck were of the hap-hazard order; as if the titles were drawn blind folded from a grab bag.

The concerts now are eagerly anticipated, on account of the programs, the supreme excellence of the orchestra, performance under Mr. Rabaud's direction, the technical ability of the orchestra vivified by the enthusiasm of the players, and the unusually high [illegible] of the soloists.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 7 1919

MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony gave the fourth of its Thursday series in Carnegie Hall last evening. For his program Mr. Rabaud sought no unfrodden paths, but instead relied upon compositions of the substantiality of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," the orchestral suite from Franck's "Psyche" and Lalo's Rhapsody in A. The Lalo work is a development of his earlier "Fantasie Norvegienne" for violin and orchestar. Throughout Mr. Rabaud gave the tasteful, musicianly readings that have distinguished his conducting at other concerts this season. In the Beethoven he discarded, as is his custom, the emendations and reassembling of the instruments begun by Wagner and, since his time, become a tradition and relied upon the original scoring. The result sounded just. The symphony was given with clarity and eloquence. The orchestra becomes with each succeeding visit under Mr. Rabaud a more coherent, more flexible instrument of expression. The band plays at the Academy of Music this evening, devoting its program to Brahms' Second Symphony, Berlioz's Overture "Le Carnaval Romain" and with the composer as soloist, Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 1919

RACHMANINOFF PLAYS UNDER RABAUD'S BATON

Great Russian Composer and Pianist Soloist With Boston Orchestra

IN HIS OWN 2D CONCERTO

By Linton P. Martin

Rachmaninoff, greatest of living Russian composers and pianists, was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert of the season here at the Academy last night.

The tall and severely undemonstrative Slav was heard in his own second concerto for piano and orchestra, as the second number on the interesting program, which began with four orchestral excerpts from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," and included Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; portions of Faure's orchestral setting for Haraucourt's "Shylock," and the melodiously romantic overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

This very cosmopolitan program, as played under Henri Rabaud's sincere and inspiring baton, showed conclusively that the Boston Orchestra has quite re-established its former enviable position as an organization in which virtuoso technique was enhanced by freshness of style and potent sympathy of interpretation.

The ardent poetry of the opening Franck number was read with enchanting effect by Mr. Rabaud, who maintained just the right key in all four sections. Thruout the suite the strings sang with passionate intensity of feeling, while the brasses revealed a mellowness of tone that was little short of a revelation. The "Psyche" music is tone-painting of ecstatic quality, and the Boston players wove its spell with unerring potency.

Rachmaninoff deliberately elected to subordinate himself as soloist to the orchestra in selecting his second concerto for performance. In this concerto, instinct with the heroic melancholy which is one of the dominant traits of the composer-pianist, the soloist is frequently overshadowed by the orchestra in interest and importance. Except in the powerful central section of the second movement his function is largely decorative for the orchestral scoring.

Rachmaninoff created a profound impression, as the thunderous applause eloquently testified. But he did not attain the soul-searching heights of which he is capable and which were revealed in his recital several weeks ago. He is above all else intellectual; but there are bursts of introspective anguish in his playing.

The Faure "Shylock" music is [illegible] colored, but it is simply pleasing descriptive music. The "Phaeton" tone-poem, the "Euryanthe" overture were given with infectious rhythm and the verve for which Mr. Rabaud is already noted.

entertainment.

C. Lum

LYRIC

Boston Symphony.

The interest which at such concerts as those given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra often centers in the symphony was transferred last night to the third number on the program, which introduced Sergei Rachmaninoff in the dual capacity of the soloist of the evening and the composer of the work which he had selected to show his virtuosity as a pianist not less than as the creator of music in its higher forms.

As a composer the Russian is known to Baltimoreans far better than as a pianist, and it was therefore with not a little curiosity that the large audience received him when he came on to take his seat at the instrument. The greeting, moreover, left nothing to be desired in point of warmth, so that he was assured of a most sympathetic hearing at the start. This attitude supplied all the conditions which should have enabled him to appear at his best. He had selected as the particular vehicle to display his attainments as a pianist the Concerto No. 2 in C minor, which won for him in 1904 the Glinka prize of 500 roubles, founded by the publisher Belaieff, and the audience was most generous in manifesting approbation at the end of each movement, with a prolonged outburst at the close. The predominating tone of the composition is distinctly Russian in that it reflects the moodiness and the sombre qualities characteristic of much of the Slav music. Its development, however, proceeds along rather regular lines, with close adherence to form and unity of ideas. It is a study not so much in contrasting colors as in subdued shades, with no great climacteric effects and with the working out of the several themes proceeding in a methodical way which has little of the massiveness of some other Rachmaninoff compositions, and would hardly be regarded as showing high inspiration. It is a work that would

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa
Date FEB 2 1919

—When Rachmaninoff plays his own minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Wednesday evening some will recall that he played the same concerto in the same hall with the same orchestra during his visit to this country in 1909. In the 10 years intervening the then promising pianist has become one of the most vivid, intense, imaginative, hypnotic performers of the day. Also upon the program will be Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche;" Faure's suite written for Harancourt's play, "Shylock;" Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

Jascha Heifetz at his recital in the Academy of Music on Tuesday evening will play the following compositions:

* * *

Tartini.....Sonata in G minor
Paganini.....Concerto in D major
Beethoven.....Romanze in F major
Beethoven.....Minuet
Ernst.....Waves at Play
Sarasate.....Guitarre
Tschaikowsky-Auer.....Andante Cantabile
Wieniawski.....Polonaise in D major

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia. Pa.
FEB 1919

When Rachmaninoff plays his own C minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening (instead of the usual Monday) some will recall that the same indomitable Russian played his same concerto in the same hall with the same orchestra during his visit to this country in 1909. If that was an event in our musical life, this will be a far greater, for in the ten years intervening the coterie who then championed the vivid and somber-hued composer have grown to be the entire musical world, and the then promising pianist ranks with the most vivid, intense, imaginative, hypnotic performers of the day.

On Wednesday there will be the rarer opportunity of hearing the foremost among the world's composers and pianists in both roles. Also upon the program will be one of Franck's most important and most neglected works—the symphonic poem "Psyche." For the rest, Faure's Suite written for Harancourt's play, "Shylock"; Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

The monthly recital will be given by the pupils of the E. K. Peall Conservatory of Music and Art on Friday evening, February 7, at the Masonic Home, Broad and Ontario streets. All are welcome.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 1919

FINE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rachmaninoff Plays His Second Concerto With Boston Organization

For the first time in its thirty-four years of visits to Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony appeared on other than a Monday night. The change was due to complications elsewhere and is not to be a precedent. The Academy of Music was crowded in every part last night, the special interest being Rachmaninoff in his own Concerto No. 2, in C minor. In a rather long programme this was by far the most notable number. It is nearly ten years since the composer gave the same concerto here with the Boston Orchestra, and a second hearing only added to the appreciation of a singularly beautiful work containing many musical novelties.

The composer was in poetic mood last night and played the romantic themes with delightful charm. So much has happened in Russia since he last played the number here that one was able to read into it much more of the Russian life than was possible at the first hearing. Beneath the melody one could get more clearly the note of Russian melancholy while the drastic conclusion with its singular thematic treatment seemed almost like news from Petrograd. A heartier reception and one more deserved has seldom been accorded an artist at the Academy.

The rest of the program consisted of Franck's "Psyche" played with academic nicety; Saint-Saen's familiar "Phaeton" with its florid ebullitions of color; Faure's "Skylock" suite in which the delicacy of the organization was shown at its best and, lastly, Weber's Overture to Euryanthe, inserted for no particular reason at the end of a program already long enough.

Director Ribaud conducted as usual with precision and musical intelligence, and the orchestra showed the benefit of the month's training since its last appearance.

om PUBLIC LEDGER
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te FEB 6 1919

BOSTONSYMPHONYPLAYS WITH RACHMTNINOFF

Concert of a High Order Brings Forward the Gifted Russian in His Own Composition

PROGRAM

Franck—Orchestral Suite from "Psyche."
Rachmaninoff—"Second Concerto, C minor.
Saint-Saens—"Phaeton," Symphonic Poem.
Faure—Suite from music for "Shylock."
Weber—"Euryanthe" Overture.

It was indeed a generous measure that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the guiding hand of Henri Rabaud, dealt at the Academy last evening. It was a splendid audience. Scarcely a seat was left untaken. The enthusiasm was maintained for two hours, but the concert was almost half an hour too long. No one could have worked harder than M. Rabaud and the soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff, and their associates to engage the deepest interest of their hearers, and in this effort they were entirely successful. Rarely has there been in the Academy a heartier demonstration of favor than that which followed Rachmaninoff's extraordinarily fine performance of his extraordinarily fine concerto.

The use of the English language in Boston is beyond cavil; otherwise one might rise to a point of order and ask why the program book said of Rachmaninoff, "Born in the Government of Novgorod, April 1, 1873; now living." Was it necessary to inform the audience that he was alive when he walked out upon the stage in his own person?

The second concerto by Rachmaninoff was played here by its composer with the same orchestra nine years ago. Gabrilowitsch has played it with the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York and on tour in the West. Mr. Stokowski, Doctor Rich, Anton Homer and other members of the Philadelphia Orchestra were present to appraise and praise last night.

The piano begins and closes this "glorious work of fine intelligence." There is exhilarating vitality and virility of a fiber unquestionably Russian in the scoring. The soloist read his own inner meaning profoundly. The adagio was pure, clear song for the piano, the last part surpassingly lovely with the assertive cantilena of the right hand over the rolling arpeggios of the left. It is all music on the most elevated and elevating plane; the appeal is to the feelings and to the intellect at once. The final allegro brought in the latter part a rapturous outsoaring of inspired song from all the instruments. Applause was tremendous; recalls were numerous. Any outward expression of approval after such a performance is inadequate. There are giants in our day and the unassuming, undecorative Rachmaninoff is one of them.

The rest of the program nowhere presented somber of solid argument to consider. Cesar Franck's mystic spirituality is devoted in this instance to the love of Psyche and Eros, at first a zephyr and at last a flame. In the main the music seemed the flowing continuity of a love whose course ran smooth, with but transient turbulence. The disastrous career of Phaeton's chariot was prolonged with skill. The refined and sweet but not powerful violin of Concertmaster Fradkin spoke prominently in the music of Faure. Weber's beautiful overture at a brisk pace made a suitable conclusion. At all times M. Rabaud made his presence felt for a scholarly urbanity and a [illegible]al and reverent musicianship.

F. L. W.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 19

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Sergei Rachmaninoff, Soloist, in His Own Concerto.

The crowded house which greeted the fourth concert of the Boston Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night was indicative of a growing appreciation of the fine conductorship of Henri Rabaud, as well as a desire to again welcome that brilliant pianist and composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening. The upheaval in management and conductorship of the orchestra was bound to affect the attendance temporarily. Rabaud, however, is a musician of such fine attainment and is making so great an impression on American audiences that another season will doubtless find him with the capacity houses formerly accorded the Boston aggregation.

Rachmaninoff, playing his own C minor concerto, literally swept the audience before him. The big vital style of the work suited him perfectly, his brilliant technique and impressive manner finding an unusually suitable medium. The concerto is eminently orchestral, seeming more a part of the ensemble than an individual expression. It has some really great moments, the Adagio, for instance, being a veritable nocturne, big in style, but full of poetic appeal and of moving beauty. This was played with eloquent expression, sustained by an exquisite, ever-shifting orchestral background. The finale of the third movement, taken at a whirlwind pace, was another impressive performance. Its conclusion was greeted with tremendous applause, the pianist being compelled to return again and again to acknowledge the reception. Rachmaninoff is blessed with a compelling personality. He has only to appear to cause enthusiasm. On his first appearance here years ago he was accorded one of the greatest ovations ever given a pianist, and this despite the fact that he played a new work, the same concerto he did last night. It would be interesting to hear him in the beautiful concerto of his gifted countryman, Tschaikowsky.

Orchestrally, the evening was rich in novelty and interest. The Orchestral Suite from the Ceasar Franck symphonic poem, "Psyche"; Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; the Faure Suite from the music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Sylock," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" forming a combination that brought undoubted enjoyment.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM OF COMMANDING INTEREST

Rabaud Pleases with Selected Parts of Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem "Pysche"—Rachmanninov, Distinguished Russian Pianist, Plays His Own Composition.

In the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, another opportunity was given to amplify our impressions of Henri Rabaud as a conductor and of Sergei Rachmanninov as a pianist. Perhaps it is yet too early to permanently appraise Rabaud as a symphony conductor, as we know too little of him in this capacity and are apt to be influenced by his success as a composer. All eminent composers, however, do not attain equal heights as conductors, principally because they are often too individualistic. This quality, which marks a man of genius in original composition, may mitigate against his universality in interpreting another individual's concepts. We will find that the greatest conductors are men whose egos are plastic; men who can show us the personality of Haydn when directing a Haydn symphony, who can create a Beethoven atmosphere at the proper time, and who can be passionate or chaste with Richard Strauss and sybaritic or hazily impressionistic with the modern French and Russian. In other words, the great conductor must be a cosmopolis of mood and philosophy.

After hearing Mr. Rabaud for the fourth time one cannot but feel that he is affable, rational and erudite, but we sense the fear that were he an actor, his Hamlet and Dromio would be quite similar. Let us wait, however, for a few more concerts before we crystallize our opinions, keeping in mind the old French proverb that "to know a man, you must have eaten a bushel of salt with him."

The program last night was of commanding interest. In place of a symphony Mr. Rebaud selected parts of Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." The Boston Orchestra had never before played this work in Philadelphia and we don't often hear it with the Philadelphia Orchestra, so that it is still somewhat of a novelty to Philadelphians. The four orchestral excerpts from the symphony appear on the program as an orchestral suite and are given the titles, "The Sleep of Pysche," "Psyche upborne by the zephyrs," "The Garden of Eros," "Pysche and Eros."

This is the sort of theme that Franck revelled in, and his abstract, legendary music makes a perfect language in which to tell mythological tales such as Pysche and Eros. The first three of the excerpts are much alike, but the necessary contrast is contained in the fourth, this one being less Franckian than the others. Mr. Rabaud evidently experiences Cesar Franck, for he seemed very much in his element throughout the "Pysche" music.

After the symphonic suite came the concerto in C minor composed by Rachmanninov and played by the composer. The C minor concerto is one of four composed by the great Russian, and does not make its appeal by bombastic display or tantivy. It rests firmly upon a solid foundation of good music though not exactly surface music.

The piano playing of Sergei Rachmanninov is the playing of a great musician. It used to be said of Liszt that when he played, his hearers forgot the piano and Liszt and thought only of music. To me Rachmanninov achieves the same phenomena. Try to imagine standing before the Tagh Mahal—would it not seem trivial to comment upon the size, or the color, or this or that specific beauty? Would you not rather stand speechless—silenced by the overpowering grandeur of the ensemble. And it is just with this same feeling that I write of Rachmanninov. He makes me forget black and white keys, technique, pedaling, difference in tempo and phrasing. I forget whether he sits on a chair or bench, or whether he fingers according to Moscheler or Breithaupt. He u[illegible] does me as a critic—he makes me [illegible] enraptured worshiper of the divine a[illegible] "Homage a Rachmanninov."

After the intermission following [illegible] concerto the orchestra played with f[illegible] effect the "Phaeton" symphonic poem [illegible] Saint-Saens. This work of Saint-Sa[illegible] continually grows in favor and alrea[illegible] has practically become a classic, a[illegible] Rabaud gave it a fine interpretati[illegible] The group of four pieces by Faure t[illegible] followed the "Phaeton" were cha[illegible]ing, spirited hits of neo-French spir[illegible] vivacious and often sparkling. As [illegible] sort of conventional close to this ra[illegible] unusual program, Mr. Rabaud pla[illegible] the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber [illegible] brought to a happy conclusion [illegible] most interesting concert.

C. K.

EVENING SUN
New York City

What the Bostons Play.

"Psyche," the symphonic poem of Franck, which Mr. Rabaud has placed upon the Boston Symphony programme for this Thursday in Carnegie Hall, promises to be no less in size or aspiration than the Belgian master's much played symphony. In spite of the fact that D'Indy (to whom it was dedicated) conducted the last of its four movements when he visited America, spoke superlatively of it in his biography, and was enthusiastically seconded by Derepas, it has never been given in this country except in one movement or another. It depicts "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche borne aloft by Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros," "Psyche and Eros," and despite the pagan subject its spirit is (Boston assures us) wholly Christian. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will also figure on Thursday's programme, besides the Prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Lalo's orchestral Rhapsody in A.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Rabaud will first essay Brahms with the Second Symphony in D major. The other numbers will be [illegible]

om EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date 1919

BOSTON SYPHONY.

The Boston Symphony appeared at Carnegie Hall last night in the first of two concerts they are giving this week. M. Rabaud continued his policy of making us acquainted with French music, Cesar Franck, Chabrier and Lalo being represented on a programme which was, however, completely dominated by Beethoven's Fifth symphony. The symphony began the progamme, and after it was over it was difficult to pay much attention to the rest.

The Franck work—the orchestral suite from the symphonic work "Psyche"—was the most interesting of the French compositions. It is melodius and has a fine, if somewhat limited, spiritual quality. It does not possess ecstacy as such a work should.

M. Rabaud's reading of the Fifth symphony was interesting. It was scholarly, but it lacked subtlety. It lacked majesty too, although the members of the orchestra gave of their very best. The tone was heavenly beyond words. But one kept sighing for the baton of Felix Weingartner.

Mr. Rabaud's Programs

What interesting programs Mr. Rabaud is arranging for the Symphony concert audiences! Take, for instance, the program for the concerts of Feb. 21, 22. The orchestral pieces will be Lalo's superb overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"; a symphonic poem, "The Riders to the Sea" (after Synge's grim tragedy), by Mr. Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge; a Suite of Ballet Airs from Rameau's opera, "Hippolyte et Aricie"; and Rimsky-Korsakoff's ever welcome "Scheherazade." Furthermore Mr. Emilio de Gogorza, who will sing for the first time here with this orchestra has chosen airs from Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide" and Massenets's "Roi de Lahore."

Program making is a difficult art. Theodore Thomas was a master in this respect. Mr. Henschel, who was learning his trade here as the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—"he was paid well for going a-fishing"—arranged excellent programs. Of his successors Mr. Gericke came next, then the turbulent and perspiring Mr. Fiedler. The programs of Mr. Nikisch and Dr. Muck were of the hap-hazard order; as if the titles were drawn blind folded from a grab bag.

The concerts now are eagerly anticipated, on account of the programs, the supreme excellence of the orchestra, performance under Mr. Rabaud's direction, the technical ability of the orchestra vivified by the enthusiasm of the players, and the unusually high [illegible] of the soloists.

m EAGLE
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te

MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony gave the fourth of its Thursday series in Carnegie Hall last evening. For his program Mr. Rabaud sought no unbrodden paths, but instead relied upon compositions of the substantiality of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," the orchestral suite from Franck's "Psyche" and Lalo's Rhapsody in A. The Lalo work is a development of his earlier "Fantasie Norvegienne" for violin and orchestar. Throughout Mr. Rabaud gave the tasteful, musicianly readings that have distinguished his conducting at other concerts this season. In the Beethoven he discarded, as is his custom, the emendations and reassembling of the instruments begun by Wagner and, since his time, become a tradition and relied upon the original scoring. The result sounded just. The symphony was given with clarity and eloquence. The orchestra becomes with each succeeding visit under Mr. Rabaud a more coherent, more flexible instrument of expression. The band plays at the Academy of Music this evening, devoting its program to Brahms' Second Symphony, Berlioz's Overture "Le Carnaval Romain" and with the composer as soloist, Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto.

NORTH AMERICAN
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 1919

RACHMANINOFF PLAYS UNDER RABAUD'S BATON

Great Russian Composer and Pianist Soloist With Boston Orchestra

IN HIS OWN 2D CONCERTO

By Linton P. Martin

Rachmaninoff, greatest of living Russian composers and pianists, was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert of the season here at the Academy last night.

The tall and severely undemonstrative Slav was heard in his own second concerto for piano and orchestra, as the second number on the interesting program, which began with four orchestral excerpts from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," and included Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; portions of Faure's orchestral setting for Haraucourt's "Shylock," and the melodiously romantic overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

This very cosmopolitan program, as played under Henri Rabaud's sincere and inspiring baton, showed conclusively that the Boston Orchestra has quite re-established its former enviable position as an organization in which virtuoso technique was enhanced by freshness of style and potent sympathy of interpretation.

The ardent poetry of the opening Franck number was read with enchanting effect by Mr. Rabaud, who maintained just the right key in all four sections. Thruout the suite the strings sang with passionate intensity of feeling, while the brasses revealed a mellowness of tone that was little short of a revelation. The "Psyche" music is tone-painting of ecstatic quality, and the Boston players wove its spell with unerring potency.

Rachmaninoff deliberately elected to subordinate himself as soloist to the orchestra in selecting his second concerto for performance. In this concerto, instinct with the heroic melancholy which is one of the dominant traits of the composer-pianist, the soloist is frequently overshadowed by the orchestra in interest and importance. Except in the powerful central section of the second movement his function is largely decorative for the orchestral scoring.

Rachmaninoff created a profound impression, as the thunderous applause eloquently testified. But he did not attain the soul-searching heights of which he is capable and which were revealed in his recital several weeks ago. He is above all else intellectual; but there are bursts of introspective anguish in his playing.

The Faure "Shylock" music is [illegible] colored, but it is simply pleasing descriptive music. The "Phaeton [illegible] the "Euryanthe" overture were given with infectious rhythm and the verve for which Mr. Rabaud is already noted.

entertainment.

LYRIC

Boston Symphony.

The interest which at such concerts as those given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra often centers in the symphony was transferred last night to the third number on the program, which introduced Sergei Rachmaninoff in the dual capacity of the soloist of the evening and the composer of the work which he had selected to show his virtuosity as a pianist not less than as the creator of music in its higher forms.

As a composer the Russian is known to Baltimoreans far better than as a pianist, and it was therefore with not a little curiosity that the large audience received him when he came on to take his seat at the instrument. The greeting, moreover, left nothing to be desired in point of warmth, so that he was assured of a most sympathetic hearing at the start. This attitude supplied all the conditions which should have enabled him to appear at his best. He had selected as the particular vehicle to display his attainments as a pianist the Concerto No. 2 in C minor, which won for him in 1904 the Glinka prize of 500 roubles, founded by the publisher Belaieff, and the audience was most generous in manifesting approbation at the end of each movement, with a prolonged outburst at the close. The predominating tone of the composition is distinctly Russian in that it reflects the moodiness and the sombre qualities characteristic of much of the Slav music. Its development, however, proceeds along rather regular lines, with close adherence to form and unity of ideas. It is a study not so much in contrasting colors as in subdued shades, with no great climacteric effects and with the working out of the several themes proceeding in a methodical way which has little of the massiveness of some other Rachmaninoff compositions, and would hardly be regarded as showing high inspiration. It is a work that would

ERICAN
hia, Pa.
FEB 6 v 1919

F PLAYS D'S BATON

omposer and
With Bosstra

CONCERTO

Martin

of living Rusanists, was the mphony Orches-
the season here
t.

undemonstrative
wn second con-
stra, as the sec-
esting program,
hestral excerpts
mphonic poem,
int-Saens' sym-
'; portions of
g for Harau-
he melodiously
eber's "Eury-

program, as d's sincere and nclusively that quite re-estab-
position as an uoso technique s of style and retation.

the opening ith enchanting no maintained
four sections.
ngs sang with ing, while the ss of tone that elation. The e-painting of Boston players
potency.
y elected to ist to the or-cond concerto
concerto, inncholy which s of the com-
s frequently ra in interest
the powerful d movement
tive for the

profound im-applause elo-
d not attain which he is ealed in his
He is above
e are bursts
is playing.

ing descrip-
were given e verve for noted.

ncerts as ymphony
ymphony
the third
h intro-
the dual evening which he sity as a eator of known an as a with not audience to take e greet-desired was asaring at d all the enabled had seto dis-ist the ich won of 500

her Begenerat the olonged dominatstinctly oodiness rstic of lopment, regular rm and much in shades,
d with themes which some
, and howing would ncerts as ymphony

ymphony
the third
h intro-
the dual evening
which he sity as a eator of

EVENING
dress Philadelphia, Pa. FEB 6
te

RACHMANINOFF FEATURE OF BOSTON CONCERT

Russian Pianist Scores a Triumph in His Own Concerto for Piano and Orchestra

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, was the feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music. He played his own concerto in C minor for piano and orchestra, and showed himself to be equally great as creator and as interpreter.

The composition is not a new one to Philadelphia, having been played here by the composer some ten years ago and by other pianists since, but it is doubtful if so impressive a performance of the work has ever been heard in this city, even by Mr. Rachmaninoff himself at his previous appearance. Its general tone is melancholic, despite the "scherzando" title of the finale, as indeed much of his music is apt to be, and it was played as it seems to have been composed, as an integral part of the nature of the man.

Of Mr. Rachmaninoff's pre-eminent qualifications as a pianist little need be said. The listener lost sight of the manifest technical difficulties of the concerto in the somber but satisfying message of its musical content. Its themes are noble and the development of them, both in the solo part and in the equally important orchestral parts, are consistent and dignified, as befits their character. The orchestra has much to do, both with the announcement and the development of the thematic material, and the piano is used largely as an obligato instrument, a matter which Mr. Rachmaninoff never for a moment lost sight of in his artistic and masterly interpretation.

The accompaniment of the concerto might have been better. The scoring of the orchestral parts is very heavy, the full modern orchestra being used, even to the tuba, bass drum and cymbals. Several times the accompaniment was so heavy as nearly to obscure entirely the solo part, and there was considerable "wobbling" in spots in several of the instruments, suggesting an insufficient number of rehearsals for a composition in which the relation of solo part and orchestra is so intimate. In spite of this, however, Mr. Rachmaninoff scored a deserved triumph for a masterly work artistically performed.

The remainder of the program was devoted to purely orchestral works. It began with an orchestral suite from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," followed (after the concerto) by Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and by Faure's suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," and concluding with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

The Franck number consists of the orchestral parts of a composition for chorus and orchestra entitled "Psyche." It is written to a program which must be all the more closely followed by the listener in the absence of the vocal parts. Though one of Franck's mature works, it can hardly be called one of his greatest ones, although the third movement is full of reminiscences both in rhythm and in orchestration of the finale of the great symphony in D minor. Mr. Rabaud read the work with sympathy, and it was fairly well played, although in places the orchestra did not seem to be so well in hand as might be desired, and there was occasional "wobbling" of leading parts noticed later in the concerto.

The best playing of the evening was done in the Saint-Saens's "Phaeton." Here the orchestra seemed to be under better control and played with more unity and better balance of the parts than in any other number. The Faure Suite consists of four short numbers, melodic and rational in composition. However, it is simply French stage music of the better sort, and its inclusion in a symphony program may well be questioned. They were well played, as, in a general way, was the Weber overture, although in places in the latter the sustained chords of the brass drowned out the melodic figurations of the strings and reed instruments.

While the orchestra played its program better than it performed its last concert, it still does not appear to be under that absolute control of the leader which is necessary to perfect orchestral performance, while there can be no doubt that the unity of playing, the accuracy of attack and release of notes in the various choirs, which the old Boston Orchestra had to so high a degree has not been regained. The lack of tonal balance may be due to an unfamiliarity with the Academy, but it was apparent in all the numbers except the Saint-Saens symphonic poem. It was especially noticeable in the fortissimos, while a notable feature of the concert was the beautiful pianissimo shown in the December concert, very soft but still maintaining the color of the various instruments revealed.

m AMERICAN

ddress: New York City.

ate FEB

Boston Symphony Heard at Carnegie

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Rabaud presented a programme of familiar work, though it must be confessed his readings were not altogether familiar. Or, to be more exact, his musicians occasionally got from under the influence of his baton. This was especially noticeable in the performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which opened the programme. The chief offenders were a member of the double basses, who in the finale anticipated his associates by a full beat, and a member of the small wood winds, who was equally hasty.

The rest of the programme was devoted to French works, and included the prelude to act 2 of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," Cesar Frank's "Psyche" and Lala's Rhapsody in A major.

---

rom TRIBUNE
ddress New York City
ate FEB 7 1919

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First of Two Concerts at Carnegie Hall

Mr. Rabaud will not incur the reproach of having been lax in the cause of French music during his sojourn in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The names of five French composers, Chabrier, Lalo, Fauré, Saint-Saens and Berlioz, appear on the programmes of this week's two concerts at Carnegie Hall.

Last evening a conspicuous number was César Franck's Orchestral Suite from the symphonic poem "Psyche." Dedicated to D'Indy, it was first heard in Paris in 1888. Written for orchestra and chorus, the work contains no solos. The portions for orchestra alone are the most important, for the chorus plays only the part allotted to it by antiquity—that of discreet narrator. The four numbers are entitled "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros" and "Psyche and Eros." The writers of the text do not refer to the envy of the sisters which goaded Psyche to break her vow, nor do they mention the tasks later imposed by Venus. In a happy ending Eros forgives the ambition he had himself inspired, and the two ascend into the light.

The work belongs to the third period of Franck's career, when he no longer feared as in the first, or aspired as in the second, but when he had found himself, and was at the height of his creative powers. Other compositions of the same period are the Quartet in D major, the Chorals, the Beatitudes, "Aeolides," and the Quintet in F minor.

Some have extolled Franck's spiritual treatment of a subject that might have suggested a more earthly touch. D'Indy compares the music to the frescoes in the Arena of Padua. But does this pervading and mystic purity leave the hearer satisfied? In spite of the undoubted beauty of its harmonies, the skill of its construction, the music does not compare in depth, in beauty or in significance with the Symphony in D minor, the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, or even with the spiritual exaltation of "La Procession."

The prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," was another number on the programme. After having been sung in Belgium and Germany, it was finally produced at the Paris Opera, but too late for the composer to reap the full enjoyment of the occasion. The mental paralysis from which he was to perish had already made serious inroads. Not until Catulle Mendes, the librettist, pushed him into the front of the box to acknowledge the applause of the audience did poor Chabrier realize what it was all about. And then he put his hand over his heart, bowed and wept. A year later he was dead. "Gwendoline" was regarded by him as a sketch rather than a finished product. As an opera it did not live, for the composer's nature was not equal to the exigencies of dramatic composition. But as the discoverer of many fascinating rhythms he was a beacon light for the modern French school.

Another Frenchman, Lalo, was represented last evening by his Rhapsody for Orchestra in A major.

All three compositions paled beside the grandeur of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, played at the beginning of the concert and of which Mr. Rabaud gave an impressive and striking performance. To-morrow afternoon Brahms's Second Symphony, Faure's Suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's Comedy "Shylock," Saint-Saens' Symphoni Poem "Phaëton" and Berlioz's Overture "Le Carnaval Romain" will be played.

1 MORNING TELEGRAPH

ess: New York City

19

RABAUD AGAIN LEADS BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

Conductor Warmly Applauded for Fine Reading of Beethoven at Carnegie Hall.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night was divided between Beethoven and three works by French composers. The audience was large—the "all seats sold" sign was in evidence in the lobby long before the concert began—and gave fitting recognition to Henri Rabaud.

Under Mr. Rabaud's directorship the orchestra is rapidly getting back to its old excellence. His playing of the C minor symphony was truly magnificent. He kept his reading on classic lines, but endowed it with dynamic force. He brought out fully the sonority and tonal beauties of this most popular of all symphonies.

For the French half of the program Mr. Rabaud played three compositions by Chabrier, Franck and Lalo that are seldom heard. A prelude to the opera "Gwnedoline," an orchestra suite, "Psyche," and a rhapsody in A major were the works that introduced some pleasant music to the audience.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address New York City
Date FEB 7 1919

Music.

Beethoven and Franck Played by Boston Band.

Henri Rabaud chose Beethoven's Fifth Symphony to begin the programme of the fourth Thursday concert in the Carnegie Hall series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. How often New York hears that symphony; how rarely as it was played yesterday! The reorganized orchestra has now completely found itself. In some respects—the second violins for one—it is even better than before the war.

Its infinite variety of color and nuance; the ravishing beauty of its tone, from the faintest whisper to the glorious fusion of the fortissimo; the ideal lightness and buoyancy of its delivery make it unique among the orchestras of the country. Played by this band, under the masterly leadership of Mr. Rabaud, the Fifth Symphony became as a new consecration of sound.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of the work was remarkable first of all for the fascinating treatment of detail in its relation to the big general design. It had the "continual slight novelty" which goes far to make a performance pulse with inexhaustible life, and the microscopic research of the conductor showed the mighty structure encrusted with gems in exquisite diversity of carving, as if Beethoven's name had been Aladdin.

The ghostly transition from the scherzo to the finale the conductor handled adroitly, building up an imposing climax to the glorious entrance of the triumphal theme. Throughout the finale he sustained the interest by means of an extremely skilful employment of nuance and contrast, and made the closing measures the real culmination of the whole work. Altogether it was at once the most musical and the most vital performance of the Fifth Symphony the present writer can recall. After it the large audience gave conductor and men an ovation.

The programme continued with the lovely prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline"—a work that ought to be in the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House. Then came what was, after Beethoven's symphony, the chief offering of the evening, the orchestral suite from César Franck's choral symphony "Psyche." What excuse can our conductors give, wallowing in the everlasting sob stuff of Tchaikovsky, steeped in the meerschaum and Pilsener aromas of Brahms, for neglecting this heavenly music—music of a rarefied and serene mysticism, of a lofty sensuousness? The present writer heard the last of the four sections, "Psyche and Eros," played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Vincent d'Indy thirteen years ago. Three years earlier "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche borne away by the Zephyrs" were played at a Philharmonic concert. Could the performance of "The Gardens of Eros" last evening have been the first in New York? If so our orchestral conductors to-day may well hang their diminished heads!

The boisterous and amusing A major rhapsody of Lalo (Norwegian) closed the concert. The conducting of Mr. Rabaud and the playing of the orchestra in all these pieces were such as to make praise unnecessary.

SUN PITTS SANBORN.

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD.

First of Fourth Pair of Concerts at Carnegie.

The first of the fourth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; the Prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and Lalo's Rhapsody in A Major for Orchestra.

Mr. Rabaud gave a fine reading of the Fifth Symphony. It was one clearly planned and admirably executed. Throughout the work there were excellent dynamics and exquisite nuance, and withal dignity and nobility in feeling.

Franck's poem, "Psyche," was almost a novelty. In its original form for chorus and orchestra, with words by Sicard and Fourcaud, it was first performed in Paris under Colome's direction, at the Concerte du Chatelet, on February 23, 1890. Somewhat influenced by Wagner's style, the work in its entirety may be said to abound in fine ideas and workmanship, though suffering through length and lack in variety. As heard last night it was in the form of a suite of four movements and as Franck had himself arranged them for orchestra from the whole symphony. They are entitled "Sommeil de Psyche," "Psyche enlevee par les Zephirs," "Les Jardins d'Eros," "Psyche et Eros." The first two movements in the suite were played in New York in the season of 1902 to 1903 at a Philharmonic concert, and the last one, "Psyche et Eros," at a concert here of the Boston Orchestra on December 9, 1905, with Vincent D'Indy as guest-conductor. The work is dedicated to Mr. D'Indy. Lalo's Rhapsody was also in the line of a novelty. Originally a "Norwegian" fantasy for violin the composer transformed it into the orchestral form of a rhapsody. It is brilliantly orchestrated.

EVENING
ess New York City
FEB 7 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth evening concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as at present constituted, was given last night at Carnegie Hall, under the baton of Henri Rabaud. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony opened the programme. Why do all three of the French conductors we have heard lately adhere to the letter rather than the spirit in interpreting Beethoven? For example: Beethoven's horns were imperfect, consequently he gave a certain important phrase to the bassoons the second time, as his horns had not time to "crook" in the new key. Most conductors now give it to horns, as the composer certainly would have if he had had the modern instruments. No one thinks of using the old flutes or horns in playing Beethoven; why play with the limitations of the old instruments, where there is no doubt as to the intention? Mr. Rabaud played the second movement as though "andante" meant "standing still" instead of "going"—and the performance of the whole symphony was in the same deliberate dragging manner.

The prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," César Franck's "Psyché" Suite, and Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody completed the programme—all three representing French music at almost its best. They are all interesting, melodically and harmonically, and are all three orchestrated by masters of instrumentation. The playing of the orchestra was sometimes rough, but was usually well balanced.

m TIMES

ddress New York City
FEB 7

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN.

Rabaud and His Men Delight in Works of Modern France.

One of America's artistic contributions to a League of Nations might be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which brightens as it takes its flight for the last time but one this season over cities south of its home town. Last night at Carnegie Hall, the old crush of waiting limousines, the new waiting list of subscribers, marked a milestone on Henri Rabaud's journey with the famous band. The 102 players, the calm, bearded leader, recalled the days of Gericke, as still more did the symphony, Beethoven's fifth, which was hugely applauded, a supreme opus in its kind.

Mr. Rabaud conducted con amore three works of modern France. A man of opera himself, he plainly delighted in Chabrier's prelude to Act 2 of "Gwendoline." A classicist, he reveled in Franck's curious "Psyche," not so much Elgin marble or Tanagra clay, as a kindly, converted Goth digging in the dust heaps of Rheims; yet much must later impressionists have borrowed from this music, in which virtuoso winds portrayed a "Psyché Enlevée par les Zéphirs."

Lalo's rhapsody in A, last of all, was the best liked after the symphony; here were giant fiddles and harps, as on a mountain top, casting shadows upon the clouds. Tonight the orchestra plays in Brooklyn, with Rachmaninoff, and tomorrow again in Carnegie Hall, the last till March.

HERALD

ess: New York City
FEB 7

Boston Orchestra Under Mr. Rabaud Plays Beethoven

Here for its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new French conductor, played last night before a large and enthusiastic audience.

It was the second appearance of Henri Rabaud as conductor of a Beethoven symphony. His selection was the fifth and greatest symphony of that writer, and the results, while satisfactory up to a certain point, did not meet the approval of all of his hearers. There were mistakes in the orchestra which were clearly caught by those who know the work.

Mr. Rauaud, to be sure, directs with authority, and sways his men with a sure hand. His best is well defined and, although his tempos in Beethoven's music are a little more lively and the spirit in which he directs a little more Gallic than the conventional readings familiar to concert goers in New York, he generally has given the impression of being a decidedly capable leader.

Other works heard last night were the prelude to act II. of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," César Franck's "Psyche" and Lalo's rhapsody in A major, all of them more or less novelties. The Boston orchestras is always interesting. It local concerts are among the real musical events of the season, and last night's performance was most enjoyable.

WORLD
ress New York City
103

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Applause Forces Orchestra to Stand After Opening Number.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is on its old footing here, for all seats were sold last evening for the fourth concert of this organization in Carnegie Hall.

Beethoven's fifth symphony opened the programme and, although the audience forced the band to stand in acknowledgment of the applause at the completion of the number, it cannot be said that the symphony was flawlessly done. Indeed it was quite uneven and, in some spots, a bit slovenly. Mr. Rabaud's beat seemed rigid, resulting in too little elasticity in his men's performance.

There was much better work in the succeeding numbers, Chabrier's prelude to Act II. of his opera "Gwendoline," Franck's orchestra suite from the symphonic poem, "Psyche," and Lalo's rhapsody for orchestra.

The Chabrier and Franck music, not often heard here, was of the dreamy, imaginative type and disclosed the individual virtuosity of the musicians. The strings were especially delicate and pure, and both numbers were carefully and effectively done.

STAR

ess: Baltimore, Md.

FEB 1 1919

RACHMANINOFF COMING

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the gaunt and angular Russian who is to play his own C minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater next Tuesday evening, stands well over six feet, and similarly towers as composer and pianist above the genius of the day. For since playing here the same concerto with the same orchestra in 1909 he has risen to a more eminent recognition as composer, and in the few Eastern cities in which he has recently played in recital he shows that he has attained an unbelievable pianistic perfection, whether by the keenest imagination, the most marvelous swiftness, color and resiliency.

EVENING SUN

ess: Baltimore, Md.

FEB 1 1919

The Boston Symphony.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, leader of the Russian school and commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, which is to take place in the Lyric on Tuesday evening, February 4, instead of on the usual Wednesday. The soloist originally announced for this concert, Arthur Rubinstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement.

When fleeing his own troublous country Rachamninoff suddenly appeared in New York last autumn, he was naturally thought of as the composer of innumerable songs, the splendid symphony, the "Isle of the Dead," the opera "Aleko," the C minor concerto and, of course, the eternal piano prelude, in C sharp minor. His recent appearances in several cities as a pianist have served to reveal the fact that he is a great virtuoso and as a result the orchestral Rachmaninoff is for the moment forgotten.

When he plays his great C minor concerto in Baltimore there will be opportunity to judge him in both capacities.

as well as to hear the authoritative reading of the composer himself.

The symphony at this concert will be Beethoven's Fifth and for the rest two shorter orchestral pieces from Mr. Rabaud's country, Chabrier's prelude to the second act of his opera "Gwendoline" and Lalo's riotous rhapsody, in A major.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

FEB 3 1919

Rachmaninoff And The Boston Symphony.

Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer pianist, will play one of his own great works—the C minor Concerto No. 2—at the Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday night.

M. Rabaud will be heard on this occasion, for the first time locally, as a Beethoven interpreter. He will present the greatest of all the Symphonies, the Fifth, the program further including the Prelude to the Second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline and Lalo's gorgeous Rhapsody in A major.

Rachmaninoff's playing, according to all accounts, has recently taken on great breadth and grandeur. As a matter of fact, the critics have been almost hysterical in praise of him this winter. Witness the following, which appeared a few weeks ago in the New York Times:

"Serge Rachmaninoff, giant of the Russians, gave a sensational performance—not so much a performance as an event—at his first reappearance with orchestra in a matinee of the Symphony Society yesterday at Aeolian Hall.

"His pianoforte Concerto No. 2, conceived in no academic mood, was thrilling as no other of its kind since the early triumphs of [illegible]

"Its soaring the[illegible] ing, its second [illegible] rhythms like into[illegible] Scherzando finale

ERICAN
hia, Pa.
FEB 6 v 1919

E PLAYS D'S BATON

omposer and
With Bos-
stra

CONCERTO

Martin

of living Rus-
anists, was the mphony Orches-
the season here
t.

undemonstrative
wn second con-
stra, as the sec-
esting program,
hestral excerpts
mphonic poem,
int-Saens' sym-
"; portions of
g for Harau-
he melodiously
eber's "Eury-

program, as d's sincere and nclusively that quite re-estab-
position as an uoso technique s of style and retation.

the opening ith enchanting
o maintained
four sections.
ngs sang with
ing, while the ss of tone that elation. The e-painting of Boston players
potency.

y elected to ist to the or-cond concerto
concerto, inncholy which
s of the com-
s frequently
ra in interest
the powerful
d movement
tive for the

profound im-
applause elo-
d not attain which he is ealed in his
He is above
e are bursts
is playing.

ing descrip-

were given e verve for noted.

oncerts as Symphony
ymphony
the third ch intro-the dual evening
which he sity as a reator of s known an as a with not audience

to take e greet-desired
was asaring at d all the enabled had seto disnist the ch won of 500
er Begener-
at the rolonged ominattinctly oodiness istic of lopment, regular rm and much in shades,
d with themes
which some
, and howing would

---

dress Philadelphia, Pa. FEB 6

RACHMANINOFF FEATURE OF BOSTON CONCERT

Russian Pianist Scores a Triumph in His Own Concerto for Piano and Orchestra

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, was the feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music. He played his own concerto in C minor for piano and orchestra, and showed himself to be equally great as creator and as interpreter.

The composition is not a new one to Philadelphia, having been played here by the composer some ten years ago and by other pianists since, but it is doubtful if so impressive a performance of the work has ever been heard in this city, even by Mr. Rachmaninoff himself at his previous appearance. Its general tone is melancholic, despite the "scherzando" title of the finale, as indeed much of his music is apt to be, and it was played as it seems to have been composed, as an integral part of the nature of the man.

Of Mr. Rachmaninoff's pre-eminent qualifications as a pianist little need be said. The listener lost sight of the manifest technical difficulties of the concerto in the somber but satisfying message of its musical content. Its themes are noble and the development of them, both in the solo part and in the equally important orchestral parts, are consistent and dignified, as befits their character. The orchestra has much to do, both with the announcement and the development of the thematic material, and the piano is used largely as an obligato instrument, a matter which Mr. Rachmaninoff never for a moment lost sight of in his artistic and masterly interpretation.

The accompaniment of the concerto might have been better. The scoring of the orchestral parts is very heavy, the full modern orchestra being used, even to the tuba, bass drum and cymbals. Several times the accompaniment was so heavy as nearly to obscure entirely the solo part, and there was considerable "wobbling" in spots in several of the instruments, suggesting an insufficient number of rehearsals for a composition in which the relation of solo part and orchestra is so intimate. In spite of this, however, Mr. Rachmaninoff scored a deserved triumph for a masterly work artistically performed.

The remainder of the program was devoted to purely orchestral works. It began with an orchestral suite from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," followed (after the concerto) by Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and by Faure's suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," and concluding with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

The Franck number consists of the orchestral parts of a composition for chorus and orchestra entitled "Psyche." It is written to a program which must be all the more closely followed by the listener in the absence of the vocal parts. Though one of Franck's mature works, it can hardly be called one of his greatest ones, although the third movement is full of reminiscences both in rhythm and in orchestration of the finale of the great symphony in D minor. Mr. Rabaud read the work with sympathy, and it was fairly well played, although in places the orchestra did not seem to be so well in hand as might be desired, and there was occasional "wobbling" of leading parts noticed later in the concerto.

The best playing of the evening was done in the Saint-Saens's "Phaeton." Here the orchestra seemed to be under better control and played with more unity and better balance of the parts than in any other number. The Faure Suite consists of four short numbers, melodic and rational in composition. However, it is simply French stage music of the better sort, and its inclusion in a symphony program may well be questioned. They were well played, as, in a general way, was the Weber overture, although in places in the latter the sustained chords of the brass drowned out the melodic figurations of the strings and reed instruments.

While the orchestra played its program better than it performed its last concert, it still does not appear to be under that absolute control of the leader which is necessary to perfect orchestral performance, while there can be no doubt that the unity of playing, the accuracy of attack and release of notes in the various choirs, which the old Boston Orchestra had to so high a degree has not been regained. The lack of balance may be due to an unfamiliarity with the Academy, but it was apparent in all the numbers except the Saint-Saens symphonic poem. It was especially noticeable at the fortissimos, while also lacking in the concert was the beautiful pianissimo shown in the December concert, very soft but still maintaining the color of the various instruments revealed.

m AMERICAN

ddress: New York City.

FEB

ate

Boston Symphony Heard at Carnegie

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Rabaud presented a programme of familiar work, though it must be confessed his readings were not altogether familiar. Or, to be more exact, his musicians occasionally got from under the influence of his baton. This was especially noticeable in the performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which opened the programme. The chief offenders were a member of the double basses, who in the finale anticipated his associates by a full beat, and a member of the small wood winds, who was equally hasty.

The rest of the programme was devoted to French works, and included the prelude to act 2 of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," Cesar Frank's "Psyche" and Lala's Rhapsody in A major.

---

from TRIBUNE
ddress New York City
Date FEB 7 1919

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First of Two Concerts at Carnegie Hall

Mr. Rabaud will not incur the reproach of having been lax in the cause of French music during his sojourn in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The names of five French composers, Chabrier, Lalo, Fauré, Saint-Saens and Berlioz, appear on the programmes of this week's two concerts at Carnegie Hall.

Last evening a conspicuous number was César Franck's Orchestral Suite from the symphonic poem "Psyche." Dedicated to D'Indy, it was first heard in Paris in 1888. Written for orchestra and chorus, the work contains no solos. The portions for orchestra alone are the most important, for the chorus plays only the part allotted to it by antiquity—that of discreet narrator. The four numbers are entitled "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros" and "Psyche and Eros." The writers of the text do not refer to the envy of the sisters which goaded Psyche to break her vow, nor do they mention the tasks later imposed by Venus. In a happy ending Eros forgives the ambition he had himself inspired, and the two ascend into the light.

The work belongs to the third period of Franck's career, when he no longer feared as in the first, or aspired as in the second, but when he had found himself, and was at the height of his creative powers. Other compositions of the same period are the Quartet in D major, the Chorals, the Beatitudes, "Aeolides," and the Quintet in F minor.

Some have extolled Franck's spiritual treatment of a subject that might have suggested a more earthly touch. D'Indy compares the music to the frescoes in the Arena of Padua. But does this pervading and mystic purity leave the hearer satisfied? In spite of the undoubted beauty of its harmonies, the skill of its construction, the music does not compare in depth, in beauty or in significance with the Symphony in D minor, the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, or even with the spiritual exaltation of "La Procession."

The prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," was another number on the programme. After having been sung in Belgium and Germany, it was finally produced at the Paris Opera, but too late for the composer to reap the full enjoyment of the occasion. The mental paralysis from which he was to perish had already made serious inroads. Not until Catulle Mendes, the librettist, pushed him into the front of the box to acknowledge the applause of the audience did poor Chabrier realize what it was all about. And then he put his hand over his heart, bowed and wept. A year later he was dead. "Gwendoline" was regarded by him as a sketch rather than a finished product. As an opera it did not live, for the composer's nature was not equal to the exigencies of dramatic composition. But as the discoverer of many fascinating rhythms he was a beacon light for the modern French school.

Another Frenchman, Lalo, was represented last evening by his Rhapsody for Orchestra in A major.

All three compositions paled beside the grandeur of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, played at the beginning of the concert and of which Mr. Rabaud gave an impressive and striking performance. To-morrow afternoon Brahms's Second Symphony, Faure's Suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's Comedy "Shylock," Saint-Saens' Symphoni Poem "Phæton" and Berlioz's Overture "Le Carnaval Romain" will be played.

1 MORNING TELEGRAPH

ess: New York City

19

RABAUD AGAIN LEADS BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

Conductor Warmly Applauded for Fine Reading of Beethoven at Carnegie Hall.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night was divided between Beethoven and three works by French composers. The audience was large—the "all seats sold" sign was in evidence in the lobby long before the concert began—and gave fitting recognition to Henri Rabaud.

Under Mr. Rabaud's directorship the orchestra is rapidly getting back to its old excellence. His playing of the C minor symphony was truly magnificent. He kept his reading on classic lines, but endowed it with dynamic force. He brought out fully the sonority and tonal beauties of this most popular of all symphonies.

For the French half of the program Mr. Rabaud played three compositions by Chabrier, Franck and Lalo that are seldom heard. A prelude to the opera "Gwnedoline," an orchestra suite, "Psyche," and a rhapsody in A major were the works that introduced some pleasant music to the audience.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address New York City
Date FEB 7 1919

Music.

Beethoven and Franck Played by Boston Band.

Henri Rabaud chose Beethoven's Fifth Symphony to begin the programme of the fourth Thursday concert in the Carnegie Hall series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. How often New York hears that symphony; how rarely as it was played yesterday! The reorganized orchestra has now completely found itself. In some respects—the second violins for one—it is even better than before the war.

Its infinite variety of color and nuance; the ravishing beauty of its tone, from the faintest whisper to the glorious fusion of the fortissimo; the ideal lightness and buoyancy of its delivery make it unique among the orchestras of the country. Played by this band, under the masterly leadership of Mr. Rabaud, the Fifth Symphony became as a new consecration of sound.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of the work was remarkable first of all for the fascinating treatment of detail in its relation to the big general design. It had the "continual slight novelty" which goes far to make a performance pulse with inexhaustible life, and the microscopic research of the conductor showed the mighty structure encrusted with gems in exquisite diversity of carving, as if Beethoven's name had been Aladdin.

The ghostly transition from the scherzo to the finale the conductor handled adroitly, building up an imposing climax to the glorious entrance of the triumphal theme. Throughout the finale he sustained the interest by means of an extremely skilful employment of nuance and contrast, and made the closing measures the real culmination of the whole work. Altogether it was at once the most musical and the most vital performance of the Fifth Symphony the present writer can recall. After it the large audience gave conductor and men an ovation.

The programme continued with the lovely prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline"—a work that ought to be in the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House. Then came what was, after Beethoven's symphony, the chief offering of the evening, the orchestral suite from César Franck's choral symphony "Psyche." What excuse can our conductors give, wallowing in the everlasting sob stuff of Tchaikovsky, steeped in the meerschaum and Pilsener aromas of Brahms, for neglecting this heavenly music—music of a rarefied and serene mysticism, of a lofty sensuousness? The present writer heard the last of the four sections, "Psyche and Eros," played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Vincent d'Indy thirteen years ago. Three years earlier "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche borne away by the Zephyrs" were played at a Philharmonic concert. Could the performance of "The Gardens of Eros" last evening have been the first in New York? If so our orchestral conductors to-day may well hang their diminished heads!

The boisterous and amusing A major rhapsody of Lalo (Norwegian) closed the concert. The conducting of Mr. Rabaud and the playing of the orchestra in all these pieces were such as to make praise unnecessary.

SUN DITTS SANBORN.

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD.

First of Fourth Pair of Concerts at Carnegie.

The first of the fourth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; the Prelude to Act II. of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and Lalo's Rhapsody in A Major for Orchestra.

Mr. Rabaud gave a fine reading of the Fifth Symphony. It was one clearly planned and admirably executed. Throughout the work there were excellent dynamics and exquisite nuance, and withal dignity and nobility in feeling.

Franck's poem, "Psyche," was almost a novelty. In its original form for chorus and orchestra, with words by Sicard and Fourcaud, it was first performed in Paris under Colome's direction, at the Concerte du Chatelet, on February 23, 1890. Somewhat influenced by Wagner's style, the work in its entirety may be said to abound in fine ideas and workmanship, though suffering through length and lack in variety. As heard last night it was in the form of a suite of four movements and as Franck had himself arranged them for orchestra from the whole symphony. They are entitled "Sommeil de Psyche," "Psyche enlevee par les Zephirs," "Les Jardins d'Eros," "Psyche et Eros." The first two movements in the suite were played in New York in the season of 1902 to 1903 at a Philharmonic concert, and the last one, "Psyche et Eros," at a concert here of the Boston Orchestra on December 9, 1905, with Vincent D'Indy as guest-conductor. The work is dedicated to Mr. D'Indy. Lalo's Rhapsody was also in the line of a novelty. Originally a "Norwegian" fantasy for violin the composer transformed it into the orchestral form of a rhapsody. It is brilliantly orchestrated.

EVENING
ess New York City
FEB 7 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth evening concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as at present constituted, was given last night at Carnegie Hall, under the baton of Henri Rabaud. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony opened the programme. Why do all three of the French conductors we have heard lately adhere to the letter rather than the spirit in interpreting Beethoven? For example: Beethoven's horns were imperfect, consequently he gave a certain important phrase to the bassoons the second time, as his horns had not time to "crook" in the new key. Most conductors now give it to horns, as the composer certainly would have if he had had the modern instruments. No one thinks of using the old flutes or horns in playing Beethoven; why play with the limitations of the old instruments, where there is no doubt as to the intention? Mr. Rabaud played the second movement as though "andante" meant "standing still" instead of "going"—and the performance of the whole symphony was in the same deliberate dragging manner.

The prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," César Franck's "Psyché" Suite, and Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody completed the programme—all three representing French music at almost its best. They are all interesting, melodically and harmonically, and are all three orchestrated by masters of instrumentation. The playing of the orchestra was sometimes rough, but was usually well balanced.

m TIMES

ddress New York City
FEB 7

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN.

Rabaud and His Men Delight in Works of Modern France.

One of America's artistic contributions to a League of Nations might be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which brightens as it takes its flight for the last time but one this season over cities south of its home town. Last night at Carnegie Hall, the old crush of waiting limousines, the new waiting list of subscribers, marked a milestone on Henri Rabaud's journey with the famous band. The 102 players, the calm, bearded leader, recalled the days of Gericke, as still more did the symphony, Beethoven's fifth, which was hugely applauded, a supreme opus in its kind.

Mr. Rabaud conducted con amore three works of modern France. A man of opera himself, he plainly delighted in Chabrier's prelude to Act 2 of "Gwendoline." A classicist, he reveled in Franck's curious "Psyche," not so much Elgin marble or Tanagra clay, as a kindly, converted Goth digging in the dust heaps of Rheims; yet much must later impressionists have borrowed from this music, in which virtuoso winds portrayed a "Psyché Enlevée par les Zéphirs."

Lalo's rhapsody in A, last of all, was the best liked after the symphony; here were giant fiddles and harps, as on a mountain top, casting shadows upon the clouds. Tonight the orchestra plays in Brooklyn, with Rachmaninoff, and tomorrow again in Carnegie Hall, the last till March.

HERALD

ess: New York City
FEB 7

Boston Orches[illegible] Under Mr. R[illegible] Plays Beethove[illegible]

Here for its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new French conductor, played last night before a large and enthusiastic audience.

It was the second appearance of Henri Rabaud as conductor of a Beethoven symphony. His selection was the fifth and greatest symphony of that writer, and the results, while satisfactory up to a certain point, did not meet the approval of all of his hearers. There were mistakes in the orchestra which were clearly caught by those who know the work.

Mr. Rauaud, to be sure, directs with authority, and sways his men with a sure hand. His best is well defined and, although his tempos in Beethoven's music are a little more lively and the spirit in which he directs a little more Gallic than the conventional readings familiar to concert goers in New York, he generally has given the impression of being a decidedly capable leader.

Other works heard last night were the prelude to act II. of Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," César Franck's "Psyche" and Lalo's rhapsody in A major, all of them more or less novelties. The Boston orchestras is always interesting. It local concerts are among the real musical events of the season, and last night's performance was most enjoyable.

WORLD
ress New York City
102

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Applause Forces Orchestra to Stand After Opening Number.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is on its old footing here, for all seats were sold last evening for the fourth concert of this organization in Carnegie Hall.

Beethoven's fifth symphony opened the programme and, although the audience forced the band to stand in acknowledgment of the applause at the completion of the number, it cannot be said that the symphony was flawlessly done. Indeed it was quite uneven and, in some spots, a bit slovenly. Mr. Rabaud's beat seemed rigid, resulting in too little elasticity in his men's performance.

There was much better work in the succeeding numbers, Chabrier's prelude to Act II. of his opera "Gwendoline," Franck's orchestra suite from the symphonic poem, "Psyche," and Lalo's rhapsody for orchestra.

The Chabrier and Franck music, not often heard here, was of the dreamy, imaginative type and disclosed the individual virtuosity of the musicians. The strings were especially delicate and pure, and both numbers were carefully and effectively done.

STAR

ess: Baltimore, Md.

FEB 1 1919

RACHMANINOFF COMING

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the gaunt and angular Russian who is to play his own C minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater next Tuesday evening, stands well over six feet, and similarly towers as composer and pianist above the genius of the day. For since playing here the same concerto with the same orchestra in 1909 he has risen to a more eminent recognition as composer, and in the few Eastern cities in which he has recently played in recital he shows that he has attained an unbelievable pianistic perfection, whether by the keenest imagination, the most marvelous swiftness, color and resiliency.

EVENING SUN

ess: Baltimore, Md.

FEB 1 1919

The Boston Symphony.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, leader of the Russian school and commanding figure in the world of music, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, which is to take place in the Lyric on Tuesday evening, February 4, instead of on the usual Wednesday. The soloist originally announced for this concert, Arthur Rubinstein, having been unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement.

When fleeing his own troublous country Rachamninoff suddenly appeared in New York last autumn, he was naturally thought of as the composer of innumerable songs, the splendid symphony, the "Isle of the Dead," the opera "Aleko," the C minor concerto and, of course, the eternal piano prelude, in C sharp minor. His recent appearances in several cities as a pianist have served to reveal the fact that he is a great virtuoso and as a result the orchestral Rachmaninoff is for the moment forgotten.

When he plays his great C minor concerto in Baltimore there will be opportunity to judge him in both capacities, as well as to hear the authoritative reading of the composer himself.

The symphony at this concert will be Beethoven's Fifth and for the rest two shorter orchestral pieces from Mr. Rabaud's country, Chabrier's prelude to the second act of his opera "Gwendoline" and Lalo's riotous rhapsody, in A major.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

FEB 3 1919

Rachmaninoff And The Bost[illegible] Symphony.

Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer pianist, will play one of his own great works—the C minor Concerto No. 2—at the Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday night.

M. Rabaud will be heard on this occasion, for the first time locally, as a Beethoven interpreter. He will present the greatest of all the Symphonies, the Fifth, the program further including the Prelude to the Second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline and Lalo's gorgeous Rhapsody in A major.

Rachmaninoff's playing, according to all accounts, has recently taken on great breadth and grandeur. As a matter of fact, the critics have been almost hysterical in praise of him this winter. Witness the following, which appeared a few weeks ago in the New York Times:

"Serge Rachmaninoff, giant of the Russians, gave a sensational performance—not so much a performance as event—at his first reappearance with orchestra in a matinee of the Symphony Society yesterday at Aeolian Hall.

"Hin pianoforte Concerto No. [illegible] received in no academic mood, was th[illegible] ing as no other of its kind since early triumphs of Tschaikovsky and [illegible]

"Its soaring the[illegible] ing, its second [illegible] rhythm like inte[illegible] Scherzando finale [illegible]

CITIZEN 1919

ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Rachmaninoff, distinguished Russian composer and pianist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night. The concert was the fourth in Brooklyn's annual series under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Mr. Rachmaninoff played his own concerto in masterly fashion, receiving an elegant accompaniment from his instrumental associates. M. Rabaud, conductor of the Neo-Bostonians, led them through the four movements of Brahms' D major symphony, and also Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. The audience was of accustomed large number and the soloist of the evening, together with the conductor and orchestra, received much of that sympathetic manifestation of sound which is designated as applause.

EVENING JOURNAL

ress New York City

FEB 1 1919

The Boston Orchestra gave an indifferent performance of Brahms's Second symphony. Mr. Rabaud also presented some unfamiliar French music specially imported in score through the co-operation of the United States Government, the French High Commission and the French Government. The mountain brought forth merely its mouse. All the diplomatic labor occurred to get here Gabriel Faure's incidental music to Edmond Haraucourt's miserable adaptation of Shakespeare's "Shylock." The music is better than the play, but, even so, is like pouring Shakespeare through the commencement exercises of a girl's boarding school. Mr. Rabaud played it like the head master. Saint-Saens's "Phaeton" sounded like genuine music besid Faure and Berlioz's "Roman Carn val" overture was.

Guiomar Novaes was the special attraction at the concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra. She played the Chopin F minor concerto with both illuminative stir and a wondrous legato delicacy. Mr. Stransky repeated music he had played previously this season.

EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City

Date

RABAUD'S PROGRAMME.

If Henri Rabaud has any intention of benefiting French music during his conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he is showing small skill in the making of his propaganda. Last Thursday he set up Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as a target for his countrymen to shoot at, and the only one who turned in a score was Cesar Franck. On Saturday he chose the Second symphony of Brahms as a standard, and under its scathing fire of invention and solid workmanship, Faure, Saint-Saens and Berlioz withered away into nothingness. If Mr. Rabaud wishes to help French music, he should give it a fair chance.

His Brahms was not up to Boston traditions, with a hurried first movement and too little variety in the rest. But Faure's incidental music to "Shylock," prettily monotonous, except for the finale, would have had difficulty in competing with "Zampa" or the "Poet and Peasant" overture, and "Phaeton" and the "Carneval Romaine" did little to improve the situation. So far as German music is concerned, Mr. Rabaud is either a very generous foe or strangely blind to hard facts.

ADVERTISER AMERICA

FEBRUARY 16,

De Gogorza to Be Symphony Soloist

THE soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday will be Emilio de Gorgorza, the much-favored baritone of American birth, Spanish aristocratic ancestry and cosmopolitan culture. He will sing two operatic excerpts of the old-time Paris stage, an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and an aria from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore." In place of a symphony Mr. Rabaud will conduct Rimsky-Korsakoff's Oriental masterpiece, "Scheherazade." Another event will be the first performance in Boston of the Symphonic Prologue which Henry F. Gilbert wrote to John Synge's drama, "The Riders to the Sea." Ballet airs from Rameau's opera "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" complete the program.

From EVENING POST

Address New York City

Date FEB 10

Saturday and Sunday Music.

While the last two days brought the usual amount of music—liberal though not excessive, for most of the audiences were large—there was nothing that calls for extended comment, wherefore a brief record of the principal happenings must suffice. Beginning with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday afternoon concert, it brought a pleasant surprise in a really interesting reading of Brahms's second symphony by Henri Rabaud; a surprise, because French musicians have—in striking contrast with the British—heretofore shown very little interest in that composer. The orchestra, too, played with more euphony and unanimity than at any time this season. Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem, "Phaëton," had a genuine Parisian performance, delightful to hear, although the thunderbolt at the moment when Jupiter strikes the rash pilot of the sun chariot—the crash resulting from the coöperation of kettledrums, big drum, cymbals, and tamtam—was only fortissimo, and not double fortissimo, as intended by the composer. The writer of these comments was present, many years ago, at a rehearsal of the Harvard Symphony Orchestra, at which Carl Zerrahn promised the cymbal player a new set if he smashed his at that thunderclap. He had the right idea. The suite from Gabriel Faurié's stage music to "Shylock," which preceded the "Phaëton" on Saturday, was agreeable music, but without a special message, except in the nocturne, a truly enchanting orchestral Chopin, languorous, expuisitely colored, and fragrant as the nocturnal wafts from a bed of nicotianas.

GLOBE—FEBRUARY

Gogorza the Week's Soloist at Symphony Concert

Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic prologue "The Riders of the Sea," to John Synge's folk-drama of the name, will be played this week at the Symphony concerts for the first time in Boston. It was first performed at one of the last MacDowell festivals given at Peterborough, N. H. several years ago by about 40 men of the Boston Festival Orchestra, and has been played in New York.

Emilio de Gogorza, the baritone, appearing soloist, will sing a classic and a modern air out of French opera—from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore."

For orchestral numbers Mr. Rabaud has chosen Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant "Scheherazade," a collection of ballet airs from Rameau's opera "Hippolyte and Aricie" and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

GLOBE FEBRUARY

ORCHESTRA PLAYS FRANCK'S "PSYCHE"

Until yesterday, Franck's suite from his symphonic poem, "Psyche," had not been played here in nearly 13 years. Mr Rabaud does well to revive and to play it with the beauty, imagination and understanding which rewarded him and the orchestra.

The subject of Psyche and her mystic lover was a more inspirational subject for Franck than those of the materialistic "Le Chasseur Maudit," and "Les Djinns," which had preceded it. Neither the sardonic nor the malevolent spoke the same language with him. And it is possible to imagine the more erotic vein in which others would have treated the maid borne by the zephyrs for the wooing of Eros. Imagine the plangent colors of the young Richard Strauss, or the echoing tonalities of Debussy in his days of his "Pelleas and Melisande."

Franck's impersonal treatment, in which he does not portray a likeness as literally as Liszt, in his Faust symphony, characterized a Gretchen, but rather develops a mood, escapes the limiting boundaries of all program music and gives it the universality of sheer beauty. From the calm of Psyche's sleep, through her flight with the zephyrs to the gardens of Eros and the dawning passion there is increasing glow and feeling, but with the broadly humanizing sense of the Franck of the symphony, which was to follow this poem within a year, and which it foreshadows in thought, as it does at times almost in identity of expression. And there are quotations from his "Les Eolides."

One whose perception is less poetic than Mr Rabaud's, one who becomes restive or embarrassed in the presence of tranquility or to whom the impassioned is turbulent or boisterous, would find little to reward in this music, for there is little here with which to exploit personality. It was received with marked appreciation.

Is it possible that an opera which interests by a detached excerpt as does the prelude to act 2 of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" is so lacking in dramatic verity, musical worth or other merit as to be passed by these 30 years. This prelude is one of bodeful, even ominous anticipation. The heroine passes before us and the hearer shares her dream, which was told to laughter and fulfilled in blood.

Mr Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, was soloist in various cities of last week's Southern trip. Yesterday he appeared as such for the first time at these concerts. His performance of Mendelssohn's concerto was followed by a reception of enthusiasm. He was recalled again and again. Mr Fradkin plays with a tone fine spun and sweet in quality, and with an intonation which was commendable in such harrowing condition of the air for strings. He has facility, a youthful facility which later may permit him to appear less flurried in style and sense of rhythmic proportion than in that of yesterday.

It is chiefly some incidental reason that would bring to concert performance Faure's suite from his stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," a French adaptation of Shakspere's "Merchant of Venice," which was produced in Paris 30 years ago. Accompanying or dividing their scenes in the comedy, these six numbers no doubt would well serve their purpose. Faure's gift was never more happily shown than in the charm, poetic beauty and wide emotional range of his songs. Arthur Hackett treated the incidental music for a tenor behind the scenes in 1, Chanson, and 3, Madrigal, with excellent taste, not making of it more than the fanciful sentiment of the texts warranted and giving voice with opulence where it was required, as in the one climax in the eighth line of the Chanson.

Followed a surpassingly brilliant performance of Berlioz' wildly fantastic "Roman Carnaval" overture, built out of material from his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," a performance distinguished by Mr Speyer's English horn in Benvenuto's song, by the verve and abandon of the ensemble, a performance which it is not easy to imagine any of the orchestras which have visited Boston doing in a manner to be compared with it.

FRODKIN'S ART IS IN TECHNIQUE

Symphony's New Concert Master the Soloist at the Concert

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Symphony Program.

Franck, Psyche Suite.
Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Fredric Fradkin.
Chabrier, Prelude to Act II., "Gwendoline."
Faure, Suite from "Shylock."
Tenor soloist, Mr. Arthur Hackett.
Berlioz, Overture, "Carnaval Romaine."

The above program seemed tepid and at times even dull, although it was well played. The suite made from the symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus, entitled "Eros and Psyche," is not one of Franck's great works. He was about as fitted to describe this passionate love theme in music as to guide a balloon. Therefore he "idealizes and symbolizes" it, according to the French commentators. Fancy Wagner symbolizing and philosophizing in the prelude, or the love-death, in "Tristan and Isolde!" The first two movements were Franckly dull, but in the last movement one found something of the great master and it made amends for preceding weakness.

Love a la Chabrier was much more intense and powerful and the prelude pictured something of the Viking's passion as well as the tender heroine who died with and for him.

MR FRADKIN AS A SOLOIST.

16, Fradkin, although sterling in the quality of work cannot be ranked with his great predecessors, Kneisel or Witek, nor is the Mendelssohn concerto anything to grow fiercely enthusiastic over. It displays technique in a gentlemanly manner and even in this display the composer was jealous enough of his interpreting artist to put the cadenza display in the middle of the first movement, instead of at the end, so that the player should not excite the audience at the expense of the creator of the work.

It was played rather as a carefully prepared lesson than as an artistic revelation. One demanded a broader tone, but in freedom of bowing, in

15, ty of execution, in work in positions and in double stopping, Mr. Fradkin proved himself an adept, especially in cadenza work. The Finale was taken at a rattling pace, yet was clear and correct. The audience applauded on Friday afternoon, as if it were Ysaye and Keisler and Heifetz done up in a single package, and Mr. Fradkin was recalled four times with an abundance of enthusiasm, wherefore he should be content—and the reviewer also.

AN UNEQUAL WORK.

Faure's Suite was an unequal work. Mr. Hackett had a self-abnegating task to perform, for the voice seems used here almost as an obligato instrument and the chief points are to be sought for in the orchestral work. But the singer acquitted himself excellently in the difficult task and certainly deserved the applause which he won.

Of special points in the new work we would note the harp effects against the voice, in the first movement; the fine processional effects and rhythmic touches of the second movement, the entr'acte, and the interweaving of voice and orchestra in the Madrigal. By the way, one might complain of the French misuse of this word. A Madrigal was properly a contrapuntal composition for several voices, without accompaniment, in which the melody was dispersed through all the parts. But there are many disputes about the meaning of the word. Not so about the "Epithalame" which followed. One might define that by the very intellectual Boston conundrum—why is a misogynist like an Epithalium? Because he is a verse to marriage. But the Epithalame was by no means as bright as the conundrum.

Here, then, is another of the numerous musical works inspired by our great poet, who has caused more music than any one else in the world, composer or not. But the "Merchant of Venice" has not been so often set as his other plays, wherefore we welcome Faure's addition to the repertoire. "Romeo and Juliet" has been the favorite always, and has been tonalized all the way from Gounod's opera to "Rhum et Eau en Juillet," a parody.

BERLIOZ'S OVERTURE.

At the end of the program came Berlioz's overture and at once proved that the older Frenchman had very much more to say and was very much surer in saying it, than all his modern successors. Yet we were sorry that Franck, the great master, had for once strayed out of his true field.

During the

BRALD, FEBRUARY 15, 1919

14TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Franck, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Faure, Chabrier on the Program

WILL BE REPEATED IN HALL TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Franck, Orchestral Suite from "Psyche," a symphonic poem; Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin; Chabrier, Prelude to Act II of "Gwendoline;" G. Faure, Suite from the Stage Music to Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock"—Chanson, Entr'acte, Madrigal, Epithalme, Nocturne, Final; Berlioz, Ouverture, "The Roman Carnival." Mr. Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, played the concerto. Arthur Hackett, tenor, sang the Chanson and Madrigal in the "Shylock" suite.

Cesar Franck's Suite was played in Boston as a Suite for the first time. "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche Borne away by the Zephyrs" were played for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Would the four movements gain in effect if they were heard in their proper place in the whole work, with the choral contrasts? Detached and arranged as movements of a symphony, they are beautiful, but there is hardly sufficient contrast between the first three to make each one of the movements stand out in bold relief. It is not necessary to follow closely the "explanation" of certain French commentators who insist that Franck's Psyche and Eros should not be regarded as the lovers in the old legend; that they were only symbols; that the whole work is "charged with the spirit of Christian mysticism." The music is sufficiently expressive, often enchanting, if the hearer has in mind only the familiar story told by Apuleius.

The Prelude to "Gwendoline" is also music that came from the heart. The love-music is more sensuous than that of Franck's, but not sensual after the manner of Massenet in his more pornographic operas, as "Esclarmonde," and "Thais." The death of Chabrier was a great loss to French art. Some of his successors have cunningly profited by his harmonic and orchestral audacity. What would they have done if Chabrier and Lalo had not blazed the way for them while they were thinking of following the beaten path! When this Prelude was played yesterday, the thought of the famous clarinet player that went down with the Bourgogne came to the mind. How eloquently he played the clarinet solo in this Prelude!

The stage music of Gabriel Faure is characteristic of that fastidious, ultra-refined composer. Especially noteworthy are the Entra'cte, Epithalme and Nocturne. The last suggests the moonlight scene in the fifth act of Shakespeare's comedy, but who knows what Haraucourt did to Shakespeare? "After Shakespeare," no doubt a long way after. And where are the songs, which are decidedly un-Shakespearian, inserted? In the scene of the caskets? or have they to do with Jessica? It is perhaps needless to say there is no music in the suite that can possibly be associated with Shylock. When Gabriel Faure wrote his Requiem, he omitted the Dies Irae, possibly from fear of shocking the sensibilities of the "petites dames" that frequent the Madeleine, probably because he knew that his musical strength did not lie in that direction. Mr. Hackett sang the two songs in a straightforward rather than subtle manner, and Faure's music demands subtlety, not merely honesty of purpose and frank expression; but the songs themselves are not among the best of the composer's melodies.

A brilliant performance of the "Roman Carnival" brought the end of an unusually interesting concert, admirably interpreted by Mr. Rabaud and admirably played. Noteworthy in the overture was the playing of the English horn by Mr Speyer.

Mr. Fradkin was loudly applauded for his performance of Mendelssohn's concerto. He took the first movement and the Finale at a very rapid pace, so rapid that some questioned it; but his performance was so clear and so musical that swiftness was welcome. Furthermore, the composer gave the indication Allegro molto vivace for the Finale. He marked the first "with great passion," but Mendelssohn in a passionate mood was an inherently amiable person—amiable except when other living composers were concerned—churning himself deliberately into frenzy. Taken at a conventionally allegro pace, the first movement soon becomes tiresome. In the second movement Mr. Fradkin happily avoided "sweetness" and sentimentalism. The music was sung, not sobbed. The hearty appreciation of the audience was justly deserved.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night is as follows: Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" Gilbert, Symphonic Prologue to Synge's tragedy, "Riders to the Sea"; Gluck, "Diane impitoyable," from "Iphigenie en Aulide"; Rameau, Ballet Airs from "Hippolyte and Aricie"; Massenet, "Promesse de mon Avenir," from "Le Roi de Lahore"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gogorza will be the singer.

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—From the majestic melodies of César Franck to the tunefulness of Mendelssohn is a long way, and the contrast, especially noticeable in these days of much modern music on our programs, makes very plain the fact that Mendelssohn undeniably sounds old-fashioned, and not only that, but empty and futile sometimes as well. Mr. Fradkin, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears as the soloist at the fourteenth pair of concerts of Feb. 14-15, playing the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor op. 64, which he has played elsewhere and which has already been noticed in these columns. The ebullient Mr. Fradkin plunged less precipitately into his concerted passages than on the occasion of his first appearance with the orchestra, thereby achieving a much smoother and more interesting performance. It was an interesting program that Mr. Rabaud put together. Besides the Mendelssohn concerto it included the orchestral suite from César Franck's Symphonic Poem "Psyché," the Prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9 and the suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," by Fauré. The program stated that Haraucourt's comedy was after Shakespeare, but the titles of the various divisions showed small correspondence with "The Merchant of Venice." Arthur Hackett sang the tenor solos in the Fauré work in full, free fashion.

On the evening of Thursday, Feb. 13, the orchestra gave its regular concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, in which respects were paid to the classics through Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, after which more romantic paths were followed. A second hearing of Mr. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" confirmed the impression produced on the presentation of the work in Boston that here is as fine, well knit, atmospheric, and effective a bit of program music as has appeared in recent years. Miss Ethel Frank, soprano, was the soloist. Her intonation was good, her voice fresh and pleasing but somewhat lacking in necessary volume.

Mr. Rabaud, in the course of an interview with a representative of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, set at rest any speculation as to his intention to include the music of Wagner on his programs, by remarking that he would defer to what he considered the wish of the country, namely, that Wagner be barred at least until the end of the war.

MERICAN

New York City.

RABAUD ESSAYS SYMPHONY BY BRAHMS

Conductor's Apparent Lack of Understanding of the Famous Composer's Music Disappoints Audience at Carnegie Hall

By MAX SMITH.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall, Henri Rabaud tackled Brahms' Second Symphony. His courage and his zeal, admirable in themselves, hardly made up, however, for the lack of understanding which he displayed for the German master's music.

A performance that showed such small appreciation for the spirit of this masterpiece the writer has never before had the misfortune to hear. The effect was much as if a singer were trying to interpret one of the composer's lieder without having the slightest conception of the meaning of the words. The formal outlines were fairly well exposed, though the details left something to be desired in technical clarity and precision. But underneath the shell one could discover little but empty phrases void of all emotional significance.

The contention that only a German can properly interpret so-called German music, only a Frenchman French music, only an Italian Italian music, has always seemed to me absurd. I can see absolutely no reason why Monsieur Rabaud's nationality should prevent him from understanding Brahms. Arturo Toscanini understands him, as a few privileged persons who heard the famous Italian conductor rehearsing the Second Symphony in the Metropolitan Opera House know full well. Even Mascagni grasps the inner meaning of this inspiring composition, if we may accept the opinion of that excellent composer and conductor, Adriano Ariani.

But Rabaud evidently had not saturated himself in Brahms' music; he had not made that composer's idiom part of his own equipment; he had not weighed corefully the emotional, the rhetorical, the gesticulatory, significance of the melodic phraseology and the metric prosidy. He seemed to have only a vague idea of where to place emphasis, of how to adjust the dynamics of the orchestra, of what subtle modulations in pace to adopt. He was even at sea in his tempi, taking the "Adagio," for example, at so slow and sentimental a pace that it almost seemed as if he had not noticed the "mon troppo" warning.

Happily the conductor somewhat counteracted the impression caused by his rigid, academical and tiresome performance of the Brahms symphony by presenting for hearing music which he had thoroughly mastered: Four charming episodes, presented in the form of a suite, from Faure's stage music for Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock;" Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton;" and Berlioz's "Carnival Romaine" overture. Here, at any rate, he was perfectly at home.

CITIZEN 20-2-1916
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Rachmaninoff, distinguished Russian composer and pianist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night. The concert was the fourth in Brooklyn's annual series under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Mr. Rachmaninoff played his own concerto in masterly fashion, receiving an elegant accompaniment from his instrumental associates. M. Rabaud, conductor of the Neo-Boston players, led them through the four movements of Brahms' D major symphony, and also Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. The audience was of accustomed large number and the soloist of the evening, together with the conductor and orchestra, received much of that sympathetic manifestation of sound which is designated as applause.

n EVENING JOURNAL
ress New York City ir est denominator.

The Boston Orchestra gave an indifferent performance of Brahms's Second symphony. Mr. Rabaud also presented some unfamiliar French music specially imported in score through the co-operation of the United States Government, the French High Commission and the French Government. The mountain brought forth merely its mouse. All the diplomatic labor occurred to get here Gabriel Faure's incidental music to Edmond Haraucourt's miserable adaptation of Shakespeare's "Shylock." The music is better than the play, but, even so, is like pouring Shakespeare through the commencement exercises of a girl's boarding school. Mr. Rabaud played it like the head master. Saint-Saens's "Phaeton" sounded like genuine music besid Faure and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture was.

Guiomar Novaes was the special attraction at the concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra. She played the Chopin F minor concerto with both illuminative stir and a wondrous legato delicacy. Mr. Stransky repeated music he had played previously this season.

om EVENING MAIL
ddress: New York City
Date

RABAUD'S PROGRAMME.

If Henri Rabaud has any intention of benefiting French music during his conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he is showing small skill in the making of his propaganda. Last Thursday he set up Beethoven's Fifth symphony as a target for his countrymen to shoot at, and the only one who turned in a score was Cesar Franck. On Saturday he chose the Second symphony of Brahms as a standard, and under its scathing fire of invention and solid workmanship, Faure, Saint-Saens and Berlioz withered away into nothingness. If Mr. Rabaud wishes to help French music, he should give it a fair chance.

His Brahms was not up to Boston traditions, with a hurried first movement and too little variety in the rest. But Faure's incidental music to "Shylock," prettily monotonous, except for the finale, would have had difficulty in competing with "Zampa" or the "Poet and Peasant" overture, and "Phaeton" and the "Carneval Romaine" did little to improve the situation. So far as German music is concerned, Mr. Rabaud is either a very generous foe or strangely blind to hard facts.

ADVERTISER AMERICA
FEBRUARY 16,

De Gogorza to Be Symphony Soloist

THE soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday will be Emilio de Gorgorza, the much-favored baritone of American birth, Spanish aristocratic ancestry and cosmopolitan culture. He will sing two operatic excerpts of the old-time Paris stage, an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and an aria from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore." In place of a symphony Mr. Rabaud will conduct Rimsky-Korsakoff's Oriental masterpiese, "Scheherazade." Another event will be the first performance in Boston of the Symphonic Prologue which Henry F. Gilbert wrote to John Synge's drama, "The Riders to the Sea." Ballet airs from Rameau's opera "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" complete the program.

From EVENING POST
Address New York City
Date FEB 10

Saturday and Sunday Music.

While the last two days brought the usual amount of music—liberal though not excessive, for most of the audiences were large—there was nothing that calls for extended comment, wherefore a brief record of the principal happenings must suffice. Beginning with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday afternoon concert, it brought a pleasant surprise in a really interesting reading of Brahms's second symphony by Henri Rabaud; a surprise, because French musicians have—in striking contrast with the British—heretofore shown very little interest in that composer. The orchestra, too, played with more euphony and unanimity than at any time this season. Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem, "Phaëton," had a genuine Parisian performance, delightful to hear, although the thunderbolt at the moment when Jupiter strikes the rash pilot of the sun chariot—the crash resulting from the coöperation of kettledrums, big drum, cymbals, and tam-tam—was only fortissimo, and not double fortissimo, as intended by the composer. The writer of these comments was present, many years ago, at a rehearsal of the Harvard Symphony Orchestra, at which Carl Zerrahn promised the cymbal player a new set if he smashed his at that thunderclap. He had the right idea. The suite from Gabriel Faurié's stage music to "Shylock," which preceded the "Phaëton" on Saturday, was agreeable music, but without a special message, except in the nocturne, a truly enchanting orchestral Chopin, languorous, expuisitely colored, and fragrant as the nocturnal wafts from a bed of nicotianas.

GLOBE—FEBRUARY

Gogorza the Week's Soloist at Symphony Concert

Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic prologue "The Riders of the Sea," to John Synge's folk-drama of the name, will be played this week at the Symphony concerts for the first time in Boston. It was first performed at one of the last MacDowell festivals given at Peterborough, N H, several years ago by about 40 men of the Boston Festival Orchestra, and has been played in New York.

Emilio de Gogorza, the baritone, appearing soloist, will sing a classic and a modern air out of French opera—from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore."

For orchestral numbers Mr Rabaud has chosen Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant "Scheherazade," a collection of ballet airs from Rameau's opera "Hippolyte and Aricie" and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

GLOBE FEBRUARY

ORCHESTRA PLAYS FRANCK'S "PSYCHE"

Until yesterday, Franck's suite from his symphonic poem, "Psyche," had not been played here in nearly 13 years. Mr Rabaud does well to revive and to play it with the beauty, imagination and understanding which rewarded him and the orchestra.

The subject of Psyche and her mystic lover was a more inspirational subject for Franck than those of the materialistic "Le Chasseur Maudit," and "Les Djinns," which had preceded it. Neither the sardonic nor the malevolent spoke the same language with him. And it is possible to imagine the more erotic vein in which others would have treated the maid borne by the zephrys for the wooing of Eros. Imagine the plangent colors of the young Richard Strauss, or the echoing tonalities of Debussy in his days of his "Pelleas and Melisande."

Franck's impersonal treatment, in which he does not portray a likeness as literally as Liszt, in his Faust symphony, characterized a Gretchen, but rather develops a mood, escapes the limiting boundaries of all program music and gives it the universality of sheer beauty. From the calm of Psyche's sleep, through her flight with the zephyrs to the gardens of Eros and the dawning passion there is increasing glow and feeling, but with the broadly humanizing sense of the Franck of the symphony, which was to follow this poem within a year, and which it foreshadows in thought, as it does at times almost in identity of expression. And there are quotations from his "Les Eolides."

One whose perception is less poetic than Mr Rabaud's, one who becomes restive or embarrassed in the presence of tranquility or to whom the impassioned is turbulent or boisterous, would find little to reward in this music, for there is little here with which to exploit personality. It was received with marked appreciation.

Is it possible that an opera which interests by a detached excerpt as does the prelude to act 2 of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" is so lacking in dramatic verity, musical worth or other merit as to be passed by these 30 years. This prelude is one of bodeful, even ominous anticipation. The heroine passes before us and the hearer shares her dream, which was told to laughter and fulfilled in blood.

Mr Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, was soloist in various cities of last week's Southern trip. Yesterday he appeared as such for the first time at these concerts. His performance of Mendelssohn's concerto was followed by a reception of enthusiasm. He was recalled again and again. Mr Fradkin plays with a tone fine spun and sweet in quality, and with an intonation which was commendable in such harrowing condition of the air for strings. He has facility, a youthful facility which later may permit him to appear less flurried in style and sense of rhythmic proportion than in that of yesterday.

It is chiefly some incidental reason that would bring to concert performance Faure's suite from his stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," a French adaptation of Shakspere's "Merchant of Venice," which was produced in Paris 30 years ago. Accompanying or dividing their scenes in the comedy, these six numbers no doubt would well serve their purpose. Faure's gift was never more happily shown than in the charm, poetic beauty and wide emotional range of his songs. Arthur Hackett treated the incidental music for a tenor behind the scenes in 1, Chanson, and 3, Madrigal, with excellent taste, not making of it more than the fanciful sentiment of the texts warranted and giving voice with opulence where it was required, as in the one climax in the eighth line of the Chanson.

Followed a surpassingly brilliant performance of Berlioz' wildly fantastic "Roman Carnaval" overture, built out of material from his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," a performance distinguished by Mr Speyer's English horn in Benvenuto's song, by the verve and abandon of the ensemble, a performance which it is not easy to imagine any of the orchestras which have visited Boston doing in a manner to be compared with it.

FRODKIN'S ART IS IN TECHNIQUE

Symphony's New Concert Master the Soloist at the Concert

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Symphony Program.

Franck, Psyche Suite.
Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Fredric Fradkin.
Chabrier, Prelude to Act II., "Gwendoline."
Faure, Suite from "Shylock."
Tenor soloist, Mr. Arthur Hackett.
Berlioz, Overture, "Carnaval Romaine."

The above program seemed tepid and at times even dull, although it was well played. The suite made from the symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus, entitled "Eros and Psyche," is not one of Franck's great works. He was about as fitted to describe this passionate love theme in music as to guide a balloon. Therefore he "idealizes and symbolizes" it, according to the French commentators. Fancy Wagner symbolizing and philosophizing in the prelude, or the love-death, in "Tristan and Isolde!" The first two movements were Franckly dull, but in the last movement one found something of the great master and it made amends for preceding weakness.

Love a la Chabrier was much more intense and powerful and the prelude pictured something of the Viking's passion as well as the tender heroine who died with and for him.

MR FRADKIN AS A SOLOIST.

16, Fradkin, although sterling in his quality of work cannot be ranked with his great predecessors, Kneisel or Witek, nor is the Mendelssohn concerto anything to grow fiercely enthusiastic over. It displays technique in a gentlemanly manner and even in this display the composer was jealous enough of his interpreting artist to put the cadenza display in the middle of the first movement, instead of at the end, so that the player should not excite the audience at the expense of the creator of the work.

It was played rather as a carefully prepared lesson than as an artistic revelation. One demanded a broader tone, but in freedom of bowing, in

15, ty of execution, in work in positions and in double stopping, Mr. Fradkin proved himself an adept, especially in cadenza work. The Finale was taken at a rattling pace, yet was clear and correct. The audience applauded on Friday afternoon, as if it were Ysaye and Keisler and Heifetz done up in a single package, and Mr. Fradkin was recalled four times with an abundance of enthusiasm, wherefore he should be content—and the reviewer also.

AN UNEQUAL WORK.

Faure's Suite was an unequal work. Mr. Hackett had a self-abnegating task to perform, for the voice seems used here almost as an obligato instrument and the chief points are to be sought for in the orchestral work. But the singer acquitted himself excellently in the difficult task and certainly deserved the applause which he won.

Of special points in the new work we would note the harp effects against the voice, in the first movement; the fine processional effects and rhythmic touches of the second movement, the entr'acte, and the interweaving of voice and orchestra in the Madrigal. By the way, one might complain of the French misuse of this word. A Madrigal was properly a contrapuntal composition for several voices, without accompaniment, in which the melody was dispersed through all the parts. But there are many disputes about the meaning of the word. Not so about the "Epithalame" which followed. One might define that by the very intellectual Boston conundrum—why is a misogynist like an Epithalium? Because he is a verse to marriage. But the Epithalame was by no means as bright as the conundrum.

Here, then, is another of the numerous musical works inspired by our great poet, who has caused more music than any one else in the world, composer or not. But the "Merchant of Venice" has not been so often set as his other plays, wherefore we welcome Faure's addition to the repertoire. "Romeo and Juliet" has been the favorite always, and has been tonalized all the way from Gounod's opera to "Rhum et Eau en Juillet," a parody.

BERLIOZ'S OVERTURE.

At the end of the program came Berlioz's overture and at once proved that the older Frenchman had very much more to say and was very much surer in saying it, than all his modern successors. Yet we were sorry that Franck, the great master, had for once strayed out of his true field.

During the

HERALD, FEBRUARY 15. Monitor 2/15

14TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Franck, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Faure, Chabrier on the Program

WILL BE REPEATED IN HALL TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Franck, Orchestral Suite from "Psyche," a symphonic poem; Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin; Chabrier, Prelude to Act II of "Gwendoline;" G. Faure, Suite from the Stage Music to Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock"—Chanson, Entr'acte, Madrigal, Epithalme, Nocturne, Final; Berlioz, Ouverture, "The Roman Carnival." Mr. Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, played the concerto. Arthur Hackett, tenor, sang the Chanson and Madrigal in the "Shylock" suite.

Cesar Franck's Suite was played in Boston as a Suite for the first time. "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche Borne away by the Zephyrs" were played for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Would the four movements gain in effect if they were heard in their proper place in the whole work, with the choral contrasts? Detached and arranged as movements of a symphony, they are beautiful, but there is hardly sufficient contrast between the first three to make each one of the movements stand out in bold relief. It is not necessary to follow closely the "explanation" of certain French commentators who insist that Franck's Psyche and Eros should not be regarded as the lovers in the old legend; that they were only symbols; that the whole work is "charged with the spirit of Christian mysticism." The music is sufficiently expressive, often enchanting, if the hearer has in mind only the familiar story told by Apuleius.

The Prelude to "Gwendoline" is also music that came from the heart. The love-music is more sensuous than that of Franck's, but not sensual after the manner of Massenet in his more pornographic operas, as "Esclarmonde," and "Thais." The death of Chabrier was a great loss to French art. Some of his successors have cunningly profited by his harmonic and orchestral audacity. What would they have done if Chabrier and Lalo had not blazed the way for them while they were thinking of following the beaten path! When this Prelude was played yesterday, the thought of the famous clarinet player that went down with the Bourgogne came to the mind. How eloquently he played the clarinet solo in this Prelude!

The stage music of Gabriel Faure is characteristic of that fastidious, ultra-refined composer. Especially noteworthy are the Entra'cte, Epithalme and Nocturne. The last suggests the moonlight scene in the fifth act of Shakespeare's comedy, but who knows what Haraucourt did to Shakespeare? "After Shakespeare," no doubt a long way after. And where are the songs, which are decidedly un-Shakespearian, inserted? In the scene of the caskets? or have they to do with Jessica? It is perhaps needless to say there is no music in the suite that can possibly be associated with Shylock. When Gabriel Faure wrote his Requiem, he omitted the Dies Irae, possibly from fear of shocking the sensibilities of the "petites dames" that frequent the Madeleine, probably because he knew that his musical strength did not lie in that direction. Mr. Hackett sang the two songs in a straightforward rather than subtle manner, and Faure's music demands subtlety, not merely honesty of purpose and frank expression; but the songs themselves are not among the best of the composer's melodies.

A brilliant performance of the "Roman Carnival" brought the end of an unusually interesting concert, admirably interpreted by Mr. Rabaud and admirably played. Noteworthy in the overture was the playing of the English horn by Mr Speyer.

Mr. Fradkin was loudly applauded for his performance of Mendelssohn's concerto. He took the first movement and the Finale at a very rapid pace, so rapid that some questioned it; but his performance was so clear and so musical that swiftness was welcome. Furthermore, the composer gave the indication Allegro molto vivace for the Finale. He marked the first "with great passion," but Mendelssohn in a passionate mood was an inherently amiable person—amiable except when other living composers were concerned—churning himself deliberately into frenzy. Taken at a conventionally allegro pace, the first movement soon becomes tiresome. In the second movement Mr. Fradkin happily avoided "sweetness" and sentimentalism. The music was sung, not sobbed. The hearty appreciation of the audience was justly deserved.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night is as follows: Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" Gilbert, Symphonic Prologue to Synge's tragedy, "Riders to the Sea"; Gluck, "Diane impitoyable," from "Iphigenie en Aulide"; Rameau, Ballet Airs from "Hippolyte and Aricie"; Massenet, "Promesse de mon Avenir," from "Le Roi de Lahore", Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gogorza will be the singer.

Music in Boston
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—From the majestic melodies of César Franck to the tunefulness of Mendelssohn is a long way, and the contrast, especially noticeable in these days of much modern music on our programs, makes very plain the fact that Mendelssohn undeniably sounds old-fashioned, and not only that, but empty and futile sometimes as well. Mr. Fradkin, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears as the soloist at the fourteenth pair of concerts of Feb. 14-15, playing the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor op. 64, which he has played elsewhere and which has already been noticed in these columns. The ebullient Mr. Fradkin plunged less precipitately into his concerted passages than on the occasion of his first appearance with the orchestra, thereby achieving a much smoother and more interesting performance. It was an interesting program that Mr. Rabaud put together. Besides the Mendelssohn concerto it included the orchestral suite from César Franck's Symphonic Poem "Psyché," the Prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9 and the suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," by Fauré. The program stated that Haraucourt's comedy was after Shakespeare, but the titles of the various divisions showed small correspondence with "The Merchant of Venice." Arthur Hackett sang the tenor solos in the Fauré work in full, free fashion.

On the evening of Thursday, Feb. 13, the orchestra gave its regular concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, in which respects were paid to the classics through Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, after which more romantic paths were followed. A second hearing of Mr. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" confirmed the impression produced on the presentation of the work in Boston that here is as fine, well knit, atmospheric, and effective a bit of program music as has appeared in recent years. Miss Ethel Frank, soprano, was the soloist. Her intonation was good, her voice fresh and pleasing but somewhat lacking in necessary volume.

Mr. Rabaud, in the course of an interview with a representative of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, set at rest any speculation as to his intention to include the music of Wagner on his programs, by remarking that he would defer to what he considered the wish of the country, namely, that Wagner be barred at least until the end of the war.

MERICAN
New York City.

RABAUD ESSAYS SYMPHONY BY BRAHMS

Conductor's Apparent Lack of Understanding of the Famous Composer's Music Disappoints Audience at Carnegie Hall

By MAX SMITH.

AT the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall, Henri Rabaud tackled Brahms' Second Symphony. His courage and his zeal, admirable in themselves, hardly made up, however, for the lack of understanding which he displayed for the German master's music.

A performance that showed such small appreciation for the spirit of this masterpiece the writer has never before had the misfortune to hear. The effect was much as if a singer were trying to interpret one of the composer's lieder without having the slightest conception of the meaning of the words. The formal outlines were fairly well exposed, though the details left something to be desired in technical clarity and precision. But underneath the shell one could discover little but empty phrases void of all emotional significance.

The contention that only a German can properly interpret so-called German music, only a Frenchman French music, only an Italian Italian music, has always seemed to me absurd. I can see absolutely no reason why Monsieur Rabaud's nationality should prevent him from understanding Brahms. Arturo Toscanini understands him, as a few privileged persons who heard the famous Italian conductor rehearsing the Second Symphony in the Metropolitan Opera House know full well. Even Mascagni grasps the inner meaning of this inspiring composition, if we may accept the opinion of that excellent composer and conductor, Adriano Ariani.

But Rabaud evidently had not saturated himself in Brahms' music; he had not made that composer's idiom part of his own equipment; he had not weighed corefully the emotional, the rhetorical, the gesticulatory, significance of the melodic phraseology and the metric prosidy. He seemed to have only a vague idea of where to place emphasis, of how to adjust the dynamics of the orchestra, of what subtle modulations in pace to adopt. He was even at sea in his tempi, taking the "Adagio," for example, at so slow and sentimental a pace that it almost seemed as if he had not noticed the "mon troppo" warning.

Happily the conductor somewhat counteracted the impression caused by his rigid, academical and tiresome performance of the Brahms symphony by presenting for hearing music which he had thoroughly mastered: Four charming episodes, presented in the form of a suite, from Faure's stage music for Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock;" Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," and Berlioz's "Carnival Romaine" overture. Here, at any rate, he was perfectly at home.

Transcript

NEWS OF MUSIC

CURRENT NEGLECT OF BRITISH COMPOSERS

For Years They Have Been Virtually Unheard at the Symphony Concerts—A Whole Interesting Generation Ignored—Programmes in Prospect—Fresh Debate of Mme. Galli - Curci's Song — Casella's Symphonic "Films" — Albert Spalding as Violinist Again

OCCASIONALLY within recent years the music of Delius has been played at the Symphony Concerts. Once, perhaps, Bantock's prelude to Dowson's poem, "The Pierrot of the Minute" has slipped into a programme. Otherwise unless memory fails, no piece by a British composer has been heard from the Symphony Orchestra since Mr. Fiedler's days as conductor. Delius, moreover, is English only by the accident of birth; he has preferred to live his life in France, Germany and the United States; while his musical speech is at once personal and cosmopolitan. Through the whole thirty-odd years of the Symphony Concerts the music of no other country has been so systematically disregarded as that of Britain. Doubtless the black notes set upon ruled staffs along white paper by the English country gentlemen "who also composed"—the Parrys, the Mackenzies et id genus omne—deserved no better fate. Perhaps the music of Stanford, though of more individuality and vitality, might reasonably lie unheeded. Yet there are English composers, "now living' as the programme-book likes to say, whose reputation in their own country and abroad, whose music in itself warrant performance of it at Symphony Hall.

Sir Edward Elgar's "Enigma Variations" are as interesting as many a French and many a German piece that has not only been played there but repeated by conductor after conductor. One or two of his overtures, like "Cockaigne" or "In Italy," do not lag far behind. There are two opinions of his symphonies, but for that very reason, they are the more entitled to occasional hearing. We are privileged to listen to the music of Bruneau of Paris and we have been privileged to listen to the music of Schillings of Berlin. Does not Elgar, by common international judgment, rank with either of these two eminences? Bantock's pieces, whatever their shortcomings, have been known to interest audiences, to hold their own in a "modern" programme. Yet only the faintest recollection of those played in Mr. Fiedler's day abide in a few long memories. Of the younger generation of British composers—men, often, of ability, individuality and promise fulfilled, men who write in the newer idioms—of Cyril Scott, of Vaughan Williams, of Walford Davies, we know nothing by actual hearing at Symphony Hall. Yet their music tempts curiosities, has received applause quite as freely as many a French, a German, a Russian number that has passed and repassed. A catholic choice of programme is one of the enduring standards of the concerts; the pitfall that ever lurks for them is the pitfall of contented routine. Yet for seven years—Delius aside—not a British composer has been received into them. Does our liking for the Britons extend no farther than their soldiers, sailors and sportsmen?

Here in Boston

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony: Mr. Rabaud's tone-picture, "The Midnight Procession"; the introduction to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline"; and Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival" are the orchestral numbers upon the programme in the usual Franco-German groove. of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday evening. Miss Ethel Frank, as singer, will also be heard in the air, "Batti Batti," from Mozart's opera, "Don Giovanni"; in a "Chanson Triste" by Duparc and in a "Chant Indoue" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Sadko."

At her concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Mme. Gluck will sing old airs, Russian pieces and songs by composers of the hour, as follows:

Plus ne suis ce que j'ai ete.....Marot
Quand mon Pari vient de dehors.....O. di Lasso
O, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me.....Händel
Love Was Once a Little Boy...Wade-Zimbalist
Songs of Little Russia.....Zimbalist
Lilacs—The Answer.....Rakhmaninov
The Rose Has Enchanted the Nightingale, Rimsky-Korsakov
Hopak.....Mussorgsky
Prayer Perfect.....Benson
The Shepherdess.....Horsman
Auld Daddy Darkness—Wat Down South..Homer
Sigh No More Ladies.....Treharne

Women singers from the Symphony Chorus are to hum the voice parts in "The Sirens" in the performance of Debussy's three Nocturnes which Mr. Rabaud is now making ready. The chorus in larger numbers will also share in Saint-Saëns's piece, "The Lyre and the Harp," at present in earlier stages of preparation for the Symphony Concerts.

HENRI RABAUD
The Brilliant French Composer And Conductor Who Directs The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Baltimore Sun

TIMES
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Rachmaninoff, pianist, and Rachmaninoff, composer, held the central [illegible] of interest in the fourth con[illegible] by the Boston Symphony Or[illegible] at the National Theater yes[illegible] afternoon, when Henri Rabaud directed a truly musical and [illegible]sting program before a capacity [illegible]dience.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene replaced Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, who was announced to appear, but who has not yet reached America, by the eminent Russian, who again showed his twofold mastery of music by the playing of his own piano concerto in C minor.

The pianistic art of Rachmaninoff is a thing of power and beauty. His concerto is most pianistic. And so this combination gave a notable rendition of a work of rich content that reached its own highest level in the last movement, the Allegro Scherzando. It stands like a gem, this movement, in which orchestra and piano give rare virtuoso passages or beauties of exquisite romance in tone, pastoral loveliness, that is swept along at times gently, again alive with rhythmic force.

One is impressed with the predominance of the lyric in this work. Massive chords announce it, and a sweeping great climax closes it, but between there flows and flows alluringly a great variety of piano episodes of classic simplicity and grandeur, of melodic beauty and enhancing technical achievements. In the first two movements there is much reiteration, and a less satisfying orchestral content, but in execution at all times is revealed the greatness of a master mind and a master artist.

The symphony was the lovely Brahms No. 2, D major. M. Rabaud brought to it vitality and force, and lucid clarity in its delineation, rather than temperamental fire. It was more definitely "marcato" than impassioned, placid beauty of exquisite delicacy rather than emotion. It was developed with the finest of execution in the parts, at times stately, again a palpitating fantasy, suave and altogether sane. Of strong syncopation in its oriental themes there was none. It was pale though lovely, scholarly formal rather than rhythmically compelling.

The Lalo, "Rhapsody," A major closed the program. From a richly orchestrated and rarely sustained introduction of churchly dignity, it threaded its way through dance scenes of picturesque type, graphically given and resolving into a climax of abandon that yet held lightness, betimes, for the wind choirs and the strings.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Sergei Rachmaninoff is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 7, replacing Arthur Rubinstein, who, being unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement. Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto, and the event should remind those who are in the way of exalting Rachmaninoff the pianist, above all else, that this great genius who has subjugated both pianoforte and orchestra completely to his will is not the sort who may docilely be tied to a box of strings. Surely he will be longest remembered by his songs, his opera, his orchestral compositions, which, with a working knowledge of every detail of orchestration, his unbridled imagination has created. And in the concerto, wherein the two mediums are blended, there will be opportunity to hear the authority of the composer's reading. At the head of the programme for Feb. 7 stands Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the last number will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

om POST
ddress: Washington, D. C.
ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Rachmaninoff, in Playing Own Compositions, Many Times Recalled.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conducting, gave the fourth concert this season yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, as soloist. The orchestra opened the program with "The Star-Spangled Banner," following immediately with the Brahms' second symphony in D major, opus 73. Their work was excellent throughout, showing spirit and rhythm, the only mar being the poor tone in the violins, which seemed overbalanced by the other instruments. The other number played by the orchestra was the Lalo rhapsody in A major in two movements.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played his own concerto, opus 18, No. 2, in C minor, and appeared to better advantage than in his recital a short time ago. The concerto is an interesting composition, with strong melody and beautiful orchestration. The composer-pianist displayed remarkable finger work in the last movement, allegro scherzando, and in the second movement, adagio sostenuto, he brought out the melody with good effects. At the close of the concerto he was enthusiastically recalled many times until the piano was finally moved back, showing the audience that applause was in vain.

The program did not begin sharply at 4:30, and the wait after the symphony made the program longer than those in the audience seemed to wish, for there was impatience shown after the concerto. There were many large hats which caused annoyance to those sitting behind them. The programs did not request their removal.

n REPUBLICAN
ress Springfield, Mass.
FEB 2 1919
e

SYMPHONY'S CONDUCTOR

BOSTON LEADER DISCUSSED

Will M Rabaud Remain Another Year?—The Type of Conductor Some Might Prefer

Discussion regarding the choice of next year's conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is current in Boston. What is behind it all? Is there a hunt for a conductor of the prima donna type? Is the orchestra losing popularity in its home city? If so there is only one conclusion: It is too good for Boston. Surely it has not materially lost in social prestige because it is no longer backed by Mr Higginson.

In the Herald Philip Hale writes:—

"The question has been raised: 'Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season?'

"This question should be answered publicly as soon as possible by the trustees of the orchestra, if they wish the confidence and the financial support of those interested in music and those possessed with civic pride. The answer is easy: that is, if Mr Rabaud will accept a second term.

"Mr Rabaud has shown himself an accomplished musician. This was expected, for he was known here as a composer before he visited Boston. He is now recognized here, in other American cities, as in those of Europe, as an admirable conductor. His sensitive, refined, poetic nature has been revealed through his interpretation of orchestra compositions; furthermore, when the music made the demand, he has shown compelling virility—without the taint of coarseness—dash and amazing brilliance. Catholic in the selection of programs, he is the sympathetic intepreter of the various schools, ancient and modern. No conductor in the past years of this orchestra has equaled him in his reading of Beethoven and Bach; while the modern romanticists and the members of the ultra-modern French school have found in him an appreciative, imaginative soul. Respected, admired as conductor and man by the audiences, he is held in affectionate regard by the players, who gladly obey and second him.

"To make a change would be folly; the change might be disastrous. Who is there to fill his place?

"Mr Rabaud was not anxious to leave Paris. No Parisian leaves that city without a sigh. He came here as a representative of French musical art, also as a patriot grateful to this country, encouraged, if not urged, by his government; not as one lured by American dollars. France could not have sent a more worthy and ingratiating representative. Having received from her the highest honors she can award a musician, he is here, a celebrated composer, a conductor of the first rank, a man of pure artistic purposes, a gentleman in the old and most significant meaning of the word."

What a "Genius" Might Do

In the Transcript, Mr Parker says:—

"If the trustees of the band can secure a conductor of larger abilities, more impressive personality, more vivid reputation than Mr Rabaud, then by all means the audiences at the symphony concerts here and elsewhere deserve to have him and for a term of years. If, on the other hand, none such is obtainable, there is sound reason for the continuance of Mr Rabaud in his present post. Individual by individual, choir by choir, the quality of the orchestra is as high as it ever was, probably higher.

"By so much the trustees and the management have indeed wrought well. Being, however, a recently constituted band, it needs to be assimilated, unified, polished into a sure and sensitive instrument to the conductor's band. The hundred men within it must come, likewise, to know and feel themselves in a common work. Not in weeks or in months are these desirable ends gained, but in season upon season of association, mutual understanding and ambition.

"Only the exceptional 'genius,' not easy to descry in the offing, is likely, for example, to better the relatively sparse audiences of Saturday evenings. Comparatively new habits of life as well as degree of musical curiosity and satisfaction have altered them, perhaps permanently. Indeed, the whole subscription to the concerts of the symphony orchestra both at home and abroad, was made last autumn under exceptional conditions that give little or no clew to the response of the public next year when war-time economies and preoccupations have receded into a dimmer distance, when the quality of the orchestra and the quality of the conductor—should Mr Rabaud continue—are better and more widely understood. Such condition is difficult for trustees and guarantors who would discern the future, but there is no altering it or the risk of it. Perhaps, therefore, the keener the search for the 'genius.'

"It is too early to say what direction Mr Rabaud's programs would take in the long run. For the present they move in a Franco-German grove, comfortable to most in his audiences; while within that groove they tend to be 'classic.' An ardent modernist, like Mr Monteux or Mr Rhene-Baton, would more please the youngsters—and distinctively overtax the elders. As for the 'genius,' sought in the offing, he could probably make his programs what he chose and satisfy his hearers. For good or ill, he [illegible]

om STAR
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
FEB 3
ate 162

Olin Downes, music critic of the Boston Post, in the Post, January 16, corroborates the impression received in Baltimore that Henri Rabaud, of France, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a man of fine feeling. He says:

"The writer of these words came over with Mr. Rabaud from New York. Noting the extreme sensitiveness of feature, the kindliness of glance, the simplicity, sincerity, and, in the highest sense of the word, gentleness, which characterized the man, one thought, 'What a fine nature! But how will he control the orchestra?'"

Then, Mr. Downes quotes a member of the orchestra thus:

"'Monsieur Rabaud—we love him. We give him gladly all there is in us. Also he has great tact and is very practical. If a little thing goes wrong in rehearsal, he says to himself, 'This man is a musician. He knows he has done wrong. I do not have to tell him so. Next time he will do right.' And we do. We think of the music—the big things in the music, not merely the details of technic. We like to play—for him.'"

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.
FEB 1 1919

RUSS COMPOSER WINS TRIUMPH

Sergei Rachmaninoff, with Boston Symphony, Charms Audience at National.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the noted Russian composer and pianist, scored another triumph with Washington yesterday when he appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conducting.

Because of the sensation that Rachmaninoff created on his recent appearance here a capacity audience filled the National Theater and stood up in the rear of the seats to hear the pianist play one of his most notable compositions, Concerto No. 2 in C minor.

Rachmaninoff did not disappoint in any respect. All of the extraordinary talents which he exhibited during his initial bow to Washington were revealed again yesterday in a pleasing manner and the three movements of the concerto each were accorded much applause. At the conclusion of the final movement the audience recalled the pianist five times.

The symphony was Brahms' No. 2 in D major, Op. 73. Mr. Rabaud was accorded much applause for his excellent direction of the beautiful symphony and his interpretation produced an exquisite effect, with his finesse of beauty and marvels of delicate harmony.

The concluding number stirred the audience almost as much as Rachmaninoff's concerto, the number being Lalo's "Rhapsody in A Major." The orchestra drew out all the fire that was written into the presto movement and displayed the skill of the Boston artists in executing the novel and delightful passages of the work.

Symphony-Goers Will Be Exempt From Ticket Tax

Symphony patrons will be exempt from ticket tax, when the new revenue law is signed by President Wilson shortly after his return next week. By a clause of the law symphony orchestras, which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable, are exempt from tax. Only 1[illegible] pairs of symphony concerts remain which are among the most attractive on the season's program.

Tomorrow and Saturday Emilio De Gorgorza will appear in Boston with the orchestra, which is an event of great interest to Symphony goers. Two of the rarest treats of the season are in preparation for some of the remaining concerts. They are Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a female chorus for "Sirens" and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just come from France. Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, and a chorus of 150 voices will take part in the latter production.

Transcript

NEWS OF MUSIC

CURRENT NEGLECT OF BRITISH COMPOSERS

For Years They Have Been Virtually Unheard at the Symphony Concerts—A Whole Interesting Generation Ignored—Programmes in Prospect—Fresh Debate of Mme. Galli - Curci's Song — Casella's Symphonic "Films" — Albert Spalding as Violinist Again

OCCASIONALLY within recent years the music of Delius has been played at the Symphony Concerts. Once, perhaps, Bantock's prelude to Dowson's poem, "The Pierrot of the Minute" has slipped into a programme. Otherwise unless memory fails, no piece by a British composer has been heard from the Symphony Orchestra since Mr. Fiedler's days as conductor. Delius, moreover, is English only by the accident of birth; he has preferred to live his life in France, Germany and the United States; while his musical speech is at once personal and cosmopolitan. Through the whole thirty-odd years of the Symphony Concerts the music of no other country has been so systematically disregarded as that of Britain. Doubtless the black notes set upon ruled staffs along white paper by the English country gentlemen "who also composed"—the Parrys, the Mackenzies et id genus omne—deserved no better fate. Perhaps the music of Stanford, though of more individuality and vitality, might reasonably lie unheeded. Yet there are English composers, "now living' as the programme-book likes to say, whose reputation in their own country and abroad, whose music in itself warrant performance of it at Symphony Hall.

Sir Edward Elgar's "Enigma Variations" are as interesting as many a French and many a German piece that has not only been played there but repeated by conductor after conductor. One or two of his overtures, like "Cockaigne" or "In Italy," do not lag far behind. There are two opinions of his symphonies, but for that very reason, they are the more entitled to occasional hearing. We are privileged to listen to the music of Bruneau of Paris and we have been privileged to listen to the music of Schillings of Berlin. Does not Elgar, by common international judgment, rank with either of these two eminences? Bantock's pieces, whatever their shortcomings, have been known to interest audiences, to hold their own in a "modern" programme. Yet only the faintest recollection of those played in Mr. Fiedler's day abide in a few long memories. Of the younger generation of British composers—men, often, of ability, individuality and promise fulfilled, men who write in the newer idioms—of Cyril Scott, of Vaughan Williams, of Walford Davies, we know nothing by actual hearing at Symphony Hall. Yet their music tempts curiosities, has received applause quite as freely as many a French, a German, a Russian number that has passed and repassed. A catholic choice of programme is one of the enduring standards of the concerts; the pitfall that ever lurks for them is the pitfall of contented routine. Yet for seven years—Delius aside—not a British composer has been received into them. Does our liking for the Britons extend no farther than their soldiers, sailors and sportsmen?

Here in Boston

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; Mr. Rabaud's tone-picture, "The Midnight Procession"; the introduction to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline"; and Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival" are the orchestral numbers upon the programme in the usual Franco-German groove, of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday evening. Miss Ethel Frank, as singer, will also be heard in the air, "Batti Batti," from Mozart's opera, "Don Giovanni"; in a "Chanson Triste" by Duparc and in a "Chant Indoue" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Sadko."

At her concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Mme. Gluck will sing old airs, Russian pieces and songs by composers of the hour, as follows:

Plus ne suis ce que j'ai ete.....Marot
Quand mon Pari vient de dehors.....O. di Lasso
O, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me.....Händel
Love Was Once a Little Boy...Wade-Zimbalist
Songs of Little Russia.....Zimbalist
Lilacs—The Answer.....Rakhmaninov
The Rose Has Enchanted the Nightingale.
Rimsky-Korsakov
Hopak.....Mussorgsky
Prayer Perfect.....Benson
The Shepherdess.....Horsman
Auld Daddy Darkness—'Wat Down South..Homer
Sigh No More Ladies.....Treharne

Women singers from the Symphony Choruses are to hum the voice-parts in "The Sirens" in the performance of Debussy's three Nocturnes which Mr. Rabaud is now making ready. The chorus in larger numbers will also share in Saint-Saëns's piece, "The Lyre and the Harp," at present in earlier stages of preparation for the Symphony Concerts.

HENRI RABAUD
The Brilliant French Composer And Conductor Who Directs The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Baltimore Sun

TIMES
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Rachmaninoff, pianist, and Rachmaninoff, composer, held the central place of interest in the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, when Henri Rabaud directed a truly musical and interesting program before a capacity audience.

Mrs. Wilson Greene replaced Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, who was announced to appear, but who has not yet reached America, by the eminent Russian, who again showed his twofold mastery of music by the playing of his own piano concerto in C minor.

The pianistic art of Rachmaninoff is a thing of power and beauty. His concerto is most pianistic. And so this combination gave a notable rendition of a work of rich content that reached its own highest level in the last movement, the Allegro Scherzando. It stands like a gem, this movement, in which orchestra and piano give rare virtuoso passages or beauties of exquisite romance in tone, pastoral loveliness, that is swept along at times gently, again alive with rhythmic force.

One is impressed with the predominance of the lyric in this work. Massive chords announce it, and a sweeping great climax closes it, but between there flows and flows alluringly a great variety of piano episodes of classic simplicity and grandeur, of melodic beauty and enhancing technical achievements. In the first two movements there is much reiteration, and a less satisfying orchestral content, but in execution at all times is revealed the greatness of a master mind and a master artist.

The symphony was the lovely Brahms No. 2, D major. M. Rabaud brought to it vitality and force, and lucid clarity in its delineation, rather than temperamental fire. It was more definitely "marcato" than impassioned, placid beauty of exquisite delicacy rather than emotion. It was developed with the finest of execution in the parts, at times stately, again a palpitating fantasy, suave and altogether sane. Of strong syncopation in its oriental themes there was none. It was pale though lovely, scholarly formal rather than rhythmically compelling.

The Lalo, "Rhapsody," A major closed the program. From a richly orchestrated and rarely sustained introduction of churchly dignity, it threaded its way through dance scenes of picturesque type, graphically given and resolving into a climax of abandon that yet held lightness, betimes, for the wind choirs and the strings.

om POST
ddress: Washington, D. C.
ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Rachmaninoff, in Playing Own Compositions, Many Times Recalled.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conducting, gave the fourth concert this season yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, as soloist. The orchestra opened the program with "The Star-Spangled Banner," following immediately with the Brahms' second symphony in D major, opus 73. Their work was excellent throughout, showing spirit and rhythm, the only mar being the poor tone in the violins, which seemed overbalanced by the other instruments. The other number played by the orchestra was the Lalo rhapsody in A major in two movements.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played his own concerto, opus 18, No. 2, in C minor, and appeared to better advantage than in his recital a short time ago. The concerto is an interesting composition, with strong melody and beautiful orchestration. The composer-pianist displayed remarkable finger work in the last movement, allegro scherzando, and in the second movement, adagio sostenuto, he brought out the melody with good effects. At the close of the concerto he was enthusiastically recalled many times until the piano was finally moved back, showing the audience that applause was in vain.

The program did not begin sharply at 4:30, and the wait after the symphony made the program longer than those in the audience seemed to wish, for there was impatience shown after the concerto. There were many large hats which caused annoyance to those sitting behind them. The programs did not request their removal.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Sergei Rachmaninoff is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 7, replacing Arthur Rubinstein, who, being unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagement. Rachmaninoff is to play his own C minor concerto, and the event should remind those who are in the way of exalting Rachmaninoff the pianist, above all else, that this great genius who has subjugated both pianoforte and orchestra completely to his will is not the sort who may docilely be tied to a box of strings. Surely he will be longest remembered by his songs, his opera, his orchestral compositions, which, with a working knowledge of every detail of orchestration, his unbridled imagination has created. And in the concerto, wherein the two mediums are blended, there will be opportunity to hear the authority of the composer's reading. At the head of the programme for Feb. 7 stands Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, and the last number will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

n REPUBLICAN
ress Springfield, Mass.

SYMPHONY'S CONDUCTOR

BOSTON LEADER DISCUSSED

Will M Rabaud Remain Another Year?—The Type of Conductor Some Might Prefer

Discussion regarding the choice of next year's conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is current in Boston. What is behind it all? Is there a hunt for a conductor of the prima donna type? Is the orchestra losing popularity in its home city? If so, there is only one conclusion: It is too good for Boston. Surely it has not materially lost in social prestige because it is no longer backed by Mr Higginson.

In the Herald Philip Hale writes:—

"The question has been raised: 'Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season?'

"This question should be answered publicly as soon as possible by the trustees of the orchestra, if they wish the confidence and the financial support of those interested in music and those possessed with civic pride. The answer is easy: that is, if Mr Rabaud will accept a second term.

"Mr Rabaud has shown himself an accomplished musician. This was expected, for he was known here as a composer before he visited Boston. He is now recognized here, in other American cities, as in those of Europe, as an admirable conductor. His sensitive, refined, poetic nature has been revealed through his interpretation of orchestra compositions; furthermore, when the music made the demand, he has shown compelling virility—without the taint of coarseness—dash and amazing brilliance. Catholic in the selection of programs, he is the sympathetic intepreter of the various schools, ancient and modern. No conductor in the past years of this orchestra has equaled him in his reading of Beethoven and Bach; while the modern romanticists and the members of the ultra-modern French school have found in him an appreciative, imaginative soul. Respected, admired as conductor and man by the audiences, he is held in affectionate regard by the players, who gladly obey and second him.

"To make a change would be folly; the change might be disastrous. Who is there to fill his place?

"Mr Rabaud was not anxious to leave Paris. No Parisian leaves that city without a sigh. He came here as a representative of French musical art, also as a patriot grateful to this country, encouraged, if not urged, by his government; not as one lured by American dollars. France could not have sent a more worthy and ingratiating representative. Having received from her the highest honors she can award a musician, he is here, a celebrated composer, a conductor of the first rank, a man of pure artistic purposes, a gentleman in the old and most significant meaning of the word."

What a "Genius" Might Do

In the Transcript, Mr Parker says:—

"If the trustees of the band can secure a conductor of larger abilities, more impressive personality, more vivid reputation than Mr Rabaud, then by all means the audiences at the symphony concerts here and elsewhere deserve to have him and for a term of years. If, on the other hand, none such is obtainable, there is sound reason for the continuance of Mr Rabaud in his present post. Individual by individual, choir by choir, the quality of the orchestra is as high as it ever was, probably higher.

"By so much the trustees and the management have indeed wrought well. Being, however, a recently constituted band, it needs to be assimilated, unified, polished into a sure and sensitive instrument to the conductor's band. The hundred men within it must come, likewise, to know and feel themselves in a common work. Not in weeks or in months are these desirable ends gained, but in season upon season of association, mutual understanding and ambition.

"Only the exceptional 'genius,' not easy to descry in the offing, is likely, for example, to better the relatively sparse audiences of Saturday evenings. Comparatively new habits of life as well as degree of musical curiosity and satisfaction have altered them, perhaps permanently. Indeed, the whole subscription to the concerts of the symphony orchestra both at home and abroad, was made last autumn under exceptional conditions that give little or no clew to the response of the public next year when war-time economies and preoccupations have receded into a dimmer distance, when the quality of the orchestra and the quality of the conductor—should Mr Rabaud continue—are better and more widely understood. Such condition is difficult for trustees and guarantors who would discern the future, but there is no altering it or the risk of it. Perhaps, therefore, the keener the search for the 'genius.'

"It is too early to say what direction Mr Rabaud's programs would take in the long run. For the present they move in a Franco-German grove, comfortable to most in his audiences; while within that groove they tend to be 'classic.' An ardent modernist, like Mr Monteux or Mr Rhene-Baton, would more please the youngsters—and distinctively overtax the elders. As for the 'genius,' sought in the offing, he could probably make his programs what he chose and satisfy his hearers. For good or ill, he would count with the [illegible] both

om STAR
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
ate 162

Olin Downes, music critic of the Boston Post, in the Post, January 16, corroborates the impression received in Baltimore that Henri Rabaud, of France, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a man of fine feeling. He says:

"The writer of these words came over with Mr. Rabaud from New York. Noting the extreme sensitiveness of feature, the kindliness of glance, the simplicity, sincerity, and, in the highest sense of the word, gentleness, which characterized the man, one thought, 'What a fine nature! But how will he control the orchestra?'"

Then, Mr. Downes quotes a member of the orchestra thus:

"'Monsieur Rabaud—we love him. We give him gladly all there is in us. Also he has great tact and is very practical. If a little thing goes wrong in rehearsal, he says to himself, 'This man is a musician. He knows he has done wrong. I do not have to tell him so. Next time he will do right.' And we do. We think of the music—the big things in the music, not merely the details of technic. We like to play—for him.'"

HERALD
ss Washington, D. C.

RUSS COMPOSER WINS TRIUMPH

Sergei Rachmaninoff, with Boston Symphony, Charms Audience at National.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the noted Russian composer and pianist, scored another triumph with Washington yesterday when he appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conducting.

Because of the sensation that Rachmaninoff created on his recent appearance here a capacity audience filled the National Theater and stood up in the rear of the seats to hear the pianist play one of his most notable compositions, Concerto No. 2 in C minor.

Rachmaninoff did not disappoint in any respect. All of the extraordinary talents which he exhibited during his initial bow to Washington were revealed again yesterday in a pleasing manner and the three movements of the concerto each were accorded much applause. At the conclusion of the final movement the audience recalled the pianist five times.

The symphony was Brahms' No. 2 in D major, Op. 73. Mr. Rabaud was accorded much applause for his excellent direction of the beautiful symphony and his interpretation produced an exquisite effect, with his finesse of beauty and marvels of delicate harmony.

The concluding number stirred the audience almost as much as Rachmaninoff's concerto, the number being Lalo's "Rhapsody in A Major." The orchestra drew out all the fire that was written into the presto movement and displayed the skill of the Boston artists in executing the novel and delightful passages of the work.

Symphony-Goers Will Be Exempt From Ticket Tax

Symphony patrons will be exempt from ticket tax, when the new revenue law is signed by President Wilson shortly after his return next week. By a clause of the law symphony orchestras, which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable, are exempt from tax. Only 1 pairs of symphony concerts remain which are among the most attractive on the season's program.

Tomorrow and Saturday Emilio De Gorgorza will appear in Boston with the orchestra, which is an event of great interest to Symphony goers. Two of the rarest treats of the season are in preparation for some of the remaining concerts. They are Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a female chorus for "Sirens" and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just come from France. Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, and a chorus of 150 voices will take part in the latter production.

REDUCTION RATIO

13x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

VENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 5 1919

LYRIC

Boston Symphony.

The interest which at such concerts as those given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra often centers in the symphony was transferred last night to the third number on the program, which introduced Sergei Rachmaninoff in the dual capacity of the soloist of the evening and the composer of the work which he had selected to show his virtuosity as a pianist not less than as the creator of music in its higher forms.

As a composer the Russian is known to Baltimoreans far better than as a pianist, and it was therefore with not a little curiosity that the large audience received him when he came on to take his seat at the instrument. The greeting, moreover, left nothing to be desired in point of warmth, so that he was assured of a most sympathetic hearing at the start. This attitude supplied all the conditions which should have enabled him to appear at his best. He had selected as the particular vehicle to display his attainments as a pianist the Concerto No. 2 in C minor, which won for him in 1904 the Glinka prize of 500 roubles, founded by the publisher Belaieff, and the audience was most generous in manifesting approbation at the end of each movement, with a prolonged outburst at the close. The predominating tone of the composition is distinctly Russian in that it reflects the moodiness and the sombre qualities characteristic of much of the Slav music. Its development, however, proceeds along rather regular lines, with close adherence to form and unity of ideas. It is a study not so much in contrasting colors as in subdued shades, with no great climacteric effects and with the working out of the several themes proceeding in a methodical way which has little of the massiveness of some other Rachmaninoff compositions, and would hardly be regarded as showing high inspiration. It is a work that would be pronounced scholarly rather than as rising to great heights, and, while always sure of an attentive hearing, falls short of supplying real thrills or appealing profoundly to the emotions.

It was played in excellent style and with a fine accentuation of all of its strong points. As the composer's own interpretation, it was bound to enlist the closest interest. But it may be doubted whether the applause so liberally bestowed was as much a tribute to a surpassing pianistic performance as to the author of the concerto. It has been said that Rachmaninoff has won well nigh as much fame as a pianist as he enjoys in the capacity of a composer, but last night's work seemed to carry the touch of an intellectual effort rather than an emotional one.

The two orchestral numbers which claimed exceptional notice because of their unfamiliarity to Baltimore audiences and which may, therefore, be regarded as novelties, were Chabrier's prelude to act II of the opera "Gwendoline," a dreamy, poetically imaginative number, free in form, rather like a preluding improvisation than a carefully worked out composition, and a "Rhapsody" in A major by Lalo, a Spaniard, most of whose musical career was passed in Paris. The rhapsody was by far the more engrossing of the two. It is also called a Norwegian fantasy and has for its motif a Scandinavian tune, which Grieg employed in the first number of "Aus dem Volksleben" (From the Life of the People), a set of pianoforte pieces. This latter work is full of color and rich in invention, and was rendered with much dash as well as brilliancy. In fact, if a vote of the discriminating part of the audience could have been taken, the rhapsody would probably have carried off first honors for effectiveness and engrossing qualities. And this does not leave out of consideration the beautiful and perennially entrancing. Beethoven symphony No. 5 in C minor. No good orchestra can fail in appealing to an audience with this most satisfying work, but the symphony has been given here at times perhaps with greater finish, with more precision of attack and with better balancing of effects than it received under the baton of M. Henri Rabaud last night. The treatment appeared to be at times rather abrupt and uneven in the emphasizing of musical values, though, of course, with such an orchestra and such a leader it could not be otherwise than highly artistic. On the whole, the concert will be deservedly counted among the most notable events of the musical season.

om BULLETIN
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 6 1

Boston Symphony

Rachmaninoff Piano Soloist at Fourth Concert of Season

As the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert of the season, and the third to be conducted in this city by Henri Rabaud, at the Academy of Music last evening, Sergei Rachmaninoff appeared as soloist, in his own Concerto No. 2, in C minor, for piano and orchestra. The audience was the largest that has attended any of the recent concerts of the organization here, the crowd which filled practically every seat evidently being especially attracted by the presence of the distinguished Russian pianist-composer.

It was not distinctly a soloist-program that was presented, however, for the orchestra had four numbers of its own, and Mr. Rabaud again received the attention and the applause due him as a fine as well as a celebrated conductor. First was played Cesar Franck's orchestral suite from the symphonic poem of "Psyche," a descriptive work of much melody, written in the elegant and polished style of the French composer. A sort of rhapsody of love, true in sentiment to the suggestion of its title, with the gentle influence of Eros felt in its melodious sway, this excerpt from a work that was written for orchestra and chorus proved interesting and impressive. Of especial beauty is the second movement, "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs," which was played with the utmost delicacy and grace.

Interest centred, naturally, in the appearance of the famous Russian, whose recent piano recital here brought him much acclaim as a soloist, though his fame probably rests principally upon his ability as a composer. His C minor concerto is a work of large scope and tremendous power, which none but a great pianist could be expected to accomplish successfully. Having set even himself a severe task in realizing all its possibilities, Rachmaninoff, in his superb interpretation, wins a double triumph. Again he impressed by means of his dignified personality and by the serious manner of complete absorption in the task at hand—though task to him it may not appear to be.

The work begins with a mighty combination of piano and orchestra, in which the full-sweeping band seems to make endeavor to deluge the one contending instrument, but is compelled to acknowledge the triumph of its rival when so great a master is the pilot. There is splendid strength and brilliancy, as well as remarkable technical command, in Rachmaninoff's playing, and a momentary yielding to more gentle sway in the adagio movement. But the music is notable for power and grandeur more than for any prevailing allurement of melodious beauty, and what there is in it of the true Russian spirit is brought to the front and emphasized in the interpretation of its native composer.

The other numbers on the altogether notable program were Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, No. 2, Op. 39, "Phaeton;" suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," Faure, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Probably because the soloist at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony in the Academy was no less a personage than Sergei Rachmaninoff, the audience was of the old-time variety. It filled every seat and overflowed into much of the standing room in the back of the hall. If, however, it came primarily to hear the famous Russian composer play his own Second Concerto, it must have departed with the conviction that the orchestra is once again the premier band and that in Henri Rabaud it has a conductor worthy and capable of carrying on its great traditions.

The program, which included in addition to the concerto, the Brahms Symphony in D and the Berlioz' Overture, "Carnival Romain," went without a hitch, except for Mr. Rachmaninoff's objectio nto a flowery screen. When the pianist seated himself at his instrument he discovered that a part of the floral decorations hid him from the view of the audience. Apparently he voiced his objections in no uncertain terms to the conductor and band, for before he would begin one of the first violinists had to carry the offending plant into the wings. The audience liked the episode.

Rachmaninoff had played this concerto earlier in the season with the New York Symphony at one of the Sunday concerts in Aeolian Hall. Last evening, however, his playing was in comparison a sublimated thing. In it was greater expression of the poetic spirit and less of the exposition of the so-called "grand" style of playing. The work has many beauties to commend it, is indeed one of the finest piano concertos of recent composition, and in the more than capable hands of Rachmaninoff and the orchestra sounded nobly effective last evening.

The French conductor's reading of the most delightful of Brahms symphonies was inspired. It was a reading surcharged with delicacy of nuance, of fine distinctions of light and shade, of evanescent and luminous color. The genius of Rabaud discovered the romantic, the ethereal Brahms. Under his guidance the orchestra ran the wide gamut of dynamics and color variety, of which it is so capable. The third movement was in reality a "Allegretto grazioso." Rabaud will make his orchestra whisper sweetly, if necessary, but he can also make it thunder in majestic rhythm. Between the two extremes is the widest field for expression.

Consideration of the program revealed the fact that the orchestra is once again fully constituted. The eight horns of last year's band are all returned. In addition Laurent, former flautist of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, has been added to the personnel. The months of Rabaud's consulship have welded the band once again into the instrument of other days, so far as mere virtuosity is concerned, and, so far as color and richness, into a better band, than ever played under the direction of Dr. Muck.

No definite decision has been arrived at with regard to a conductor next year. The management gave out that Rabaud would return to Paris as soon as the present season was past. It is to be hoped that he will see his

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 5 1919

MODERNIST FASHION IN PROGRAM-MAKING

The Twilight of German Music Brought Innovations Simply and Inevitably.

ACADEMY'S MASTER HAND

Cunning Contrasts, Thought and Study Given to Avoid Triteness.

It is a positive pleasure this season to follow Leopold Stokowski's deftness in arranging his programs. There is every kind of cunning and subtlety in the study which is being made to attain an artistic effectiveness.

Twenty-five pairs of concerts in Philadelphia alone is no slight undertaking. We have heard that at least one man (perhaps two) refused the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra because of the large number of programs which he would have to prepare. Toscanini, like Stokowski, likes to memorize all the music he plays; and this grows to be a pretty daunting matter, what with the kind of schedule either the Philadelphia or the Boston orchestras must fulfill.

Formalism Out of Date.

That the day of the old highly formalized symphonic program is past seems assured. The war's heavy hand on German music made the new sort of attack necessary; and the new sort of attack has been so eminently successful we are not likely to fall back into the academic groove. M. Rabaud's Boston programs are as little conventional, for the most part, as our own. But Stokowski is also quite willing to give up his place to a visiting conductor, as willing as he is to experiment with new music. The whole present procedure at the Academy builds up a psychologically piquant and racy atmosphere. You never know quite in advance what may be coming. Only you are practically assured that you will not be bored.

Fascinating Old Violo.

Last week's utilization of an old-time instrument, very magically played, for the solo contribution to the program, was solidly to the good. The viola d'amore has a tone which creeps into the crevices of the soul; and it was a fine satisfaction to have heard it in this large way.

DEFINES IDEALS OF THE FOLK SPIRIT

Cambridge Man Composes Symphonic Prologue

Henry F. Gilbert, born in Cambridge, and still living there, whose symphonic prologue to John Synge's stark drama of Irish fisher folk, "Riders to the Sea," will be played at the Symphony concerts tomorrow and Saturday, has defined his ideals to be toward an expression of the folk spirit of humanity.

HENRY F. GILBERT.

"At present, owing to the war," he has said, "the National consciousness of America is becoming much aroused. People are now dimly aware of the fact that a great Nation must have its cultural expression, and that a great cultural expression can only proceed from the National consciousness of a great people.

"This is the rich soil from which springs all distinguished art; the background of all significant individual accomplishment. Toward the realization of these ideas I have devoted my creative gift.

"In America we certainly lack to a great degree the rich substratum of folk-melody and folk-lore which has been the vivifying source from whence has sprung the art cultures of the old world. But still there does exist such a thing (which is ever becoming more defined) as a national American consciousness.

"I believe that a new note of life has been sounded here—that a new faith in itself and in its power of accomplishment is being realized by humanity through America—which shall eventually give birth to new and vital forms of art. The strength of my conviction has enabled me bodily to strike out in the new direction."

CITIZEN
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Rachinoff Appears as Soloist at the Academy of Music.

The fourth concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening to the usual large and representative audience of Brooklyn music patrons. The programme was one of the best and the work of the new conductor, M. Henri Rabaud, was dignified and masterly.

The opening number was Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major and four movements. There is a delicacy of feeling and harmony in Brahms' work that is readily noticable in the orchestration of such an organization as the Boston Symphony, and during the rendition of the long score last night the only stirring of the auditors was the quick drawing of breath and little ohs to be heard as the master's theme was interpreted.

Rachmaninoff's Concerto No 2 in C minor, for pianoforte, with orchestra, in three movements was the second number offered, and Sergei Rachmaninoff, the author, was at the piano. This number scored such a hit with the audience that M. Rachmaninoff was compelled time and again to appear in response to the plaudits.

The programme closed with Berlioz's Overture from "Le Carnival Romain," a most exquisite number for orchestration, and the rendition by the Boston Symphony must leave a lasting impression with those who were so fortunate as to have been present last night. There is much opportunity for reed and brass in the composition and the solo parts were delightfully interpreted.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 21, with M. Henri Rabaud directing.

PROPOSAL TO REMIT TAX ON SYMPHONY TICKETS

A reported clause in the new revenue bill will be of especial interest to patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts. It proposes to exempt symphony orchestras, which are held to be neither luxuries or to be financially profitable, from the prevailing tax on tickets at places of amusement.

The management made a departure from earlier seasons by continuing to offer tickets for the remainder of the season at a pro rata basis. This offer has been taken advantage of by a great many. It is now especially attractive because of the prospect of no further taxes on admission to these concerts though the date of the application of the new law is not yet fixed.

A feature of one of the subsequent concerts of the season will be a performance of Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," parts for which have just arrived from France. There will be a chorus of 150 and Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath as the solo singers.

French Numbers on Symphony Program

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, postponed from October 18 and 19 on account of the epidemic, will be given next Friday and Saturday. Schumann's symphony in C major will be the classical number on the program. The remaining three numbers are French: "The Hunt and Storm," from Berlioz's opera "The Trojans"; Saint-Saens' light and charming symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel," and Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption."

Attention is called to the fact that only nine pairs of concerts remain in the season. The offer which the management has made of subscription seats on a pro rata basis is tempting. Symphony concerts, under the new revenue law, are to be exempt from taxation. For the concerts to come many special features are scheduled.

Herald Sat 22

SYMPHONY'S 18TH CONCERT

Diversified and Interesting Program—Brilliant Performance

PROLOGUE TO "RIDERS OF THE SEA" GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Lalo, overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"; Gilbert, Symphonic Prologue to Synge's drama "Riders to the Sea"; Gluck, "Diane impitoyable" from "Iphigenie en Aulide"; Rameau, Airs de Ballet from "Hippolyte et Aricie"; Massenet, "Promesse de mon avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gogorza was the singer.

Another diversified and interesting program; another brilliant concert with two compositions unknown to Boston and an excellent and favorite singer.

About 15 years ago Mr. Gilbert wrote a little prelude for a performance of Synge's tragedy by amateurs in this city. That prelude may be considered as a sketch or a study for the prologue that was first performed at a MacDowell Festival in Peterborough, N. H., in 1914 and later (1917) in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society. Mr. Gilbert has succeeded in translating the mood of Synge's play into tones. Without any attempt at photographic realism in the portraiture of the sea that robbed Maurya of husband and sons, there is a powerful suggestion of its cruel might, its unconscious remorselessness. In the section that follows, the lamentation for the dead, the Celtic feeling colors the song that occurs again and again as a keen, growing in the intensity of grief and at last dying away as in exhaustion, the expression of Maurya's resignation, now that nothing more can be demanded of her. And there was the remembrance of her final speech: "Michael has a clean burial in the far north, by the grace of the Almighty God. Bartly will have a fine coffin out of the white boards, and a deep grave surely. What more can we want than that? No man at all can be living forever, and we must be satisfied."

This Prologue is impressive music. It owes nothing to Munich or Paris. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Gilbert's other compositions—and we remember with pleasure his Comedy Overture on Negro Themes that was played at a Symphony concert eight years ago—no one can deny his native, individual strength. He thinks for himself; he belongs to no school; he does not worship abjectly in any musical chapel. Even his crudities, showing a certain ruggedness that is not wholly displeasing, are those of a virile thinker. Much so-called American music might bear the stamp "made in Germany." Some of our younger composers, imperfectly taught, superficial, try laboriously to rank themselves with leaders of the French impressionistic school, whose idiom is, however, natural to them, who underwent the severest pedagogic training before they blazed new paths.

It took courage to write a prologue for Synge's great tragedy. That Mr. Gilbert reproduced so well the mood and suggested the scene and the characters ters shows that his ambition was not presumptuous.

The ballet music from Rameau's first opera that was produced was played here for the first time. The spirited "Airs de Matelots," the charming air in rondo form for flutes and strings, and the jolly Rigaudon in tambourin form with tis saucy flageolet music played by a piccolo (the music an octave lower), delighted the audience. It is a good thing to hear music of the 18th century, for orchestra, chamber or clavecin. There were brave men before Agamemnon. There were musicians with fine ears and graceful fancy before Ravel and Debussy.

Lalo's brilliant overture was performed so effectively that Mr. Rabaud was thrice called on for acknowledgment of the applause. The overture has other conspicuous qualities than brilliance: haunting melody, harmonies that were not common at the time they were written, true sentiment even in the measures that interrupt the beautiful theme for violoncello, richly colored instrumentation. And this overture and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite gave full opportunity for solo players as Messrs. Fradkin, Malkin, Laurent, Longy, Sand, Laus, Jaenicke to show their technical skill and musical intelligence. "Scheherazade" was again an epitome of "The Thousand Nights and a Night."

Mr. de Gogorza, who sang here for the first time at a concert of the Symphony Orchestra, gave a noble reading of Gluck's noble aria. The sugary tune of Massenet was evidently more to the taste of the audience, this time sung by the villain Scindia as a "ballad made to his mistress' eyebrow." It is a pleasure to hear Mr. de Gogorza, whatever the selection, but we like to think of him today as declaiming and singing in the pure and grand style the Sophoclean music of Gluck. That he sang Scindia's syrupy measures in the appropriately Massenetian manner, proved his versatility, if such evidence was needed at this late day.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Franck, symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; Saint-Saens, "Le rouet d'Omphale"; Berlioz, Royal Hunt and Storm, descriptive symphony from "Les Troyens"; Schumann, Symphony has seen portents in the air and listened to vain counsels and words of false comfort and seen futile ruses that were of none effect. Here is the whole substance of the ancient tragedy of Fate wrought into this stark tragedy of the sea and these Irish islanders beside it. From Mycenæ and Thebes, Fate has come down into Galway. Like the pillar of fire, the imagination and the power of Synge have led it there.

So runs the play. In the autumn of 1917, the Philharmonic Society in New York played Mr. Gilbert's music of prologue and the reviewer for The Times then wrote of it:

"The piece presents, according to the composer's programme-note, 'the two dominant moods of Synge's Irish tragedy, 'Riders to the Sea.' There is the elemental mood of the impersonal the irrevocable sea; and then the human emotion, the lament or song of grief.' The music itself is of strong and vigorous imaginative power. There is the touch of Irish idiom in it that benefits its reference to Synge's play. The mood is gloomy throughout; the mood of crushed grief, of resignation. The lack of contrast is necessary to the subject; but it puts a burden upon the music. Mr. Gilbert's orchestration finely heightens the expression of his musical ideas; it throws a sure touch, a confident application of means to the desired end. The piece made no ordinary impression, and Mr. Gilbert was called several times to bow his acknowledgments.

The reviewer for The Tribune was hardly as well-disposed, saying:

"The composition is a well-written, melodious presentation of the moods evoked by the dramatist, and especially the opening portion ideas are worked out in an interesting fashion. Later on there were moments of monotony, though this was perhaps excusable because of the sombreness of the subject. The piece is far from revolutionary in ideas or manner, but it is simple, and, what is rare with American composers, it is vigorous in spirit. Mr. Gilbert's is certainly one of the few genuine native musical talents extant today.

Post Feb 22

GILBERT'S PROLOGUE PERFORMED

Surpassingly Brilliant List Played by Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic prologue to Singe's drama, "Riders to the Sea," was performed for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The soloist of the occasion was Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, who sang airs by Gluck and Massenet. The concert opened with Lalo's overture to the opera, "Le roi d'Ys," and came to an end with a surpassingly brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

GILBERT'S PROLOGUE

Lalo's overture is an extremely brilliant piece of music, and all that was dramatic in it was revealed by Mr. Rabaud. The effect of the music was surprising, for it is clearly music of another period, and a combination of excellent orchestration and the romanticism, translated in terms of the French theatre of Carl Maria von Weber.

Mr. Rabaud also devoted his best gifts as a musician and conductor to the remarkable music of Mr. Gilbert. The prologue to "Riders to the Sea" is an amplification and an extended development of material found in a very brief prelude which Mr. Gilbert wrote for an amateur performance of the play years ago in this city. The prelude was intended only to establish atmosphere for the raising of the curtain. The prologue is in a sense an orchestral unfoldment of the principal motives of the drama. There is tumultuous music of the sea. Against the background, as it were, of the storm, the instruments make lament. At last there is a mood of melancholy and resignation—the thought of the old mother, in Singe's drama, whose last son has perished, and from whom the sea can take no more.

Measures of Titanic Quality

Very few modern composers of whom we know have succeeded in speaking in such an elemental and impressive manner as has Mr. Gilbert in the earlier pages of this prologue. And the music is far more than a sea-scape. It is fatalistic. Passages of haunting beauty and melancholy are born of the Celtic imagination from which Synge's drama sprang. Mr. Gilbert's belief in the value and the logic of the employment of folk-song by the individual composer is ideally justified in this work, since the thematic fragment of Irish folk-song which is the germinal motive of the composition is in itself eloquent of the essence of the drama; and this oneness of mood and musical material is never lost as the composition progresses.

The instrumentation, perhaps overheavy in places, is nevertheless full of originality and dramatic and almost scenic suggestion. It is as the instrumentation of a tempest, dark, sombre, wild and eerie in its echo of sounds of the storm. There are measures of titanic quality, as for example, those in which mighty progressions of the brass choir are heard over the rolling and pounding of drums. Like most of Mr. Gilbert's composition, this one says its say in an unpolished, direct manner, which is not invariably, perhaps the most transparent and advantageous expression of the though; but it grips and thrills the hearer, because of the sincerity, the nature poetry, the rugged force and sweep of the music.

Mr. De Gogorzas Singing

This music was flanked on the one hand by Lalo's brilliant composition; on the other, by the excellent singing of Mr. De Gogorza. Mr. Gilbert's music stirred profoundly a minority and mystified a majority, more responsive to an amorous air of Massenet than to the work of a creative musician, comparatively little known and unsung in his own land. The minority applauded the prologue for many minutes, and heads were craned for the composer, who, however, kept himself in the background. Notwithstanding the technical brilliancy, color and high artistic value of other music on the programme; notwithstanding the novelty of Mr. Gilbert's musical speech and its disconcerting effect on many of the hearers, the prologue to "Riders to the Sea" stands out in retrospect as one of the most salient and impressive features of the concert.

Mr. De Gogorza is an exceptionally accomplished singer, who knows how to use his voice and how to treat a melodic line. He sang the recitative and air, "Diane impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphegenie in Aulide," and the recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "Roi de Lahore." He was particularly fortunate in the music of Massenet, in which his admirable phrasing and vocal art and his feeling for this music fired the enthusiasm of his hearers.

"Scheherazade"

The culminating point of the concert was the memorable performance of the "Scheherazade" music. At last the Oriental extravagance, the scintillating colors, the barbaric fantasy of this work were fully revealed. Other conductors have given as effective a reading of the first movement, the most truly symphonic of the four, but none that we remember has given the other movement the splendor and excitement of yesterday's performance. Nor have they so successfully accentuated every fascinating detail of rhythm and instrumental effect, while holding consistently to the main ideas and outlines of a composition bewildering in its constant and kaleidoscopic transformation.

Nor was there lacking the brutality and the unbridled sensuality of the East. From the preliminary exorcism of the brass to the last measure in which the sea heaves restlessly in the depths of the double basses, Mr. Rabaud held captive the attention and emotions of his hearers, slaves of the ring, enchanted by a masterpiece of Slavic art.

From ~~SUN~~ LIFE Brooklyn N.Y.
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15 1919

Music Notes.

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

A large bunch of forsythia, forced into bloom before its time, gave a pleasing touch of spring to the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last week Friday evening. But its place in the long stretch of footlight greenery was where the prompter's box is wont to be on opera nights and it all but concealed Rachmaninoff when he sat down at the piano to play his share of his big Concerto No. 2, in C minor. Feeling sure that a good pianist needs no bush, the distinguished Russian smilingly declined to strike the keys until he was exposed to full view. Rachmaninoff had a wonderfully fine reception, to which his masterly performance fully entitled him. There was also much enthusiasm after the Brahms Symphony No. 2, in D major, than which this orchestra has played nothing better since Rabaud took over the conductorship. It was music of two enemy countries, for Brahms was born in Berlin and died in Vienna, but Rabaud, who is more than liberal-minded in art, conducted it with every evidence of its being a con amore task. For a finale there was the big Berlioz overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," which is a brilliant composition of its kind even though, as truth compels the annotator of the program to note, it is dedicated to a Prince with Hohenzollern in his hyphenated name.

De Gogorza Is Soloist at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Program.

Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys.
Gilbert, Symphonic Poem, "The Riders to the Sea."
Gluck, Aria, "Diane Impitoyable."
Soloist, Emilio De Gogorza.
Rameau, Airs de Ballet.
Massenet, "Promesse de mon Avenir."
Mr. De Gogorza.
Rimski-Korsakoff, Suite, "Scheherazade."

THIS was varied and of more interest than its predecessor of the week before. We confess that a vocal soloist always breaks the continuity of a symphonic program for us, but the public differ from that opinion and such a baritone as M. De Gogorza ought always to be welcome. He sang his two numbers with noble voice and artistic phrasing and evoked, of course, the chief applause of the concert. The Gluck number had very much of the old recitative in declamatory style; the Massenet work was the more popular.

But the orchestral numbers were almost all of a melodic type and there were no musical problems to solve or puzzles to worry over.

Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture is by no means light or trivial music, but it is clear and logical as if Lalo followed out the dramatic vein of a Weber and was picturesque without becoming ponderous or ascetic. The work was read in a dramatic manner which made it very effective, and it won fervent applause. Rameau was directly melodic. Rameau was the gentleman who exclaimed in 1722 that Music was dead, that all possible combinations had been used and that in a short time only repetitions would be possible. Yet there were a few prominent composers after that time. But his daintiness in this suite from "Hyppolite et Aricie" can scarcely be overestimated. It had tunes enough to set up a dozen modern composers. Yet there were some pretty touches of counterpoint as well. The piccolo had brilliant work to do in the finale (as well as in the subsequent "Scheherzade") and there was good opportunity to display the excellence of our wood-wind, which department of our orchestra was never in better condition than at present.

Of Rimski-Korsakoff's dazzling Oriental tone-picture there is nothing new to say. It has been heard often and is deservedly a favorite. Its scintillating tone-colors do not become stale with repetition. Mr. Fradkin was the Scheherazade of the occasion, for the figure which represents the heroine is almost always given to the solo violin, and he gave the theme clearly and expressively. It is a good and legitimate use of a guiding melody. The Turkish march in the third movement was especially effective. It is decidedly more Oriental than Beethoven's attempts in this direction. The wildly fantastic finale, a perfect Midway Plaisance of music, was most showily interpreted. Altogether the orchestra conquered great difficulties in this work in a manner which showed that they are not retrogressing, and M. Rabaud read it with a brilliancy that fully deserved the enthusiasm it created.

But the interest centred chiefly on a new American work upon an Irish subject, Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea." We do not consider this quite as successful as his Place Congo Ballet, but it has some fine suggestions of the mighty sea and some of the crooning [illegible] by it. We should like to hear the work again to understand it better. It is strongly orchestrated, and in spite of coming after the very brilliant performance of the Lalo work it won so much applause that the composer was obliged to bow from his place in the audience again and again. Mr. Gilbert is one of the American composers who generally has something to say, and he is never too prolix in saying it.

MONITOR FEBRUARY 22,

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—A miscellaneous program, all of interesting compositions, together with a soloist who caught the popular approval, made the Friday afternoon concert of the fifteenth pair in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season one of great satisfaction. Musical amusement apparently was the chief aim of this program, and it fulfilled its mission. A first time in Boston performance of Henry Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue to J. M. Synge's Play, 'Riders to the Sea,'" which was the third the work has received, indicated a praiseworthy attempt on the part of Mr. Rabaud to encourage American writers who are worth encouraging, and Mr. Gilbert is emphatically that. The part of the prologue descriptive of the sea is a uncommonly fine bit of writing, but that part which is meant to represent human grief strikes the present reviewer as less sincerely felt and less effectively scored. The program began with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," and included also airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gogorza, the soloist, sang the recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," and the recitative and air from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," "Promesse de Mon Avenir." He was in good voice and was liberally applauded.

An interested visitor at the concert was Emil Oberhoffer, the excellent conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, who is on a visit to Eastern cities. Mr. Oberhoffer was emphatic in his approval of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor and the orchestra as a band.

TRAVELER FEBRUARY 20,

SYMPHONY SOON EX-TAX

Revenue Measure Frees Concerts

With the President's signature attached to the new revenue bill the war tax on tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts ceases. This means that those purchasing tickets for the remaining concerts, of which there are 10 pairs, largely of exceptional interest, will have no war tax to pay. These tickets are sold on a pro rata basis, a new departure this season. Purchasers of tickets for the remainder of the season are also entitled to the privilege of subscribing for the same seats next season.

Soloists yet to appear include Emilio De Gogorza, Harold Bauer, Jacques Thibaud, Joseph Malkin and Raoul Laparra. Among the more interesting compositions to come are Debussy's "Nocturnes" with a female chorus; Saint-Saens, "The Lwde and the Harp," with chorus of 150 voices and [illegible]

HERALD, FEBRUARY [illegible]

One of the Symphony Rush Line Is Joyous in Her Fortune

To the Editor of the Herald:

In your columns, not long ago, somebody deplored the "human spectacle" which the rush line at the Symphony concerts [illegible], I feel qualified to pro[illegible] of the seasoned habitues [illegible]. [illegible] feel like zoological speci[illegible] on the steps in rows. [illegible] stem is best if specula[illegible]ded, we are respectably [illegible] old Boston tradition, [illegible]ashamed. We, who have [illegible]hing and adjusted our[illegible]stless and fussy, after [illegible] box-office line, or an [illegible]rodded by uncertainty. [illegible] doubtful point of ex[illegible] 505th, everything is [illegible] as smoothly as the [illegible]net itself. Bless you, [illegible]pared to kill time com[illegible] succeed. We usually [illegible] three together, and, [illegible] the steps, we placidly [illegible]pics as if we were in [illegible]irs, Sarah's children, [illegible] Rabaud, spring hats, [illegible]opley, a new teacher, [illegible] friend Constance, the [illegible]r enemy Josephine. [illegible] among us—Conserva[illegible], piano scores of the [illegible]oyed; shabby-genteel [illegible]h their knitting, who [illegible]shed" ever since the [illegible] actually rehearsals; [illegible]ing bunches who hail [illegible]e serpentine unwinds [illegible] at 1:30; occasionally an individual with a child and a bag of peanuts who is curiously taking in Boston's best band as she would Boston's highest monument; very occasionally, stray people who are seeking a variation upon the movies, the price being equal.

But we, the old-timers, are different from these last. We have learned to pass our time better than by staring at the vacant lot to the left of us, or the variously gold-lettered windows across the way, describing vocalists, chiropodists, Theosophists, Universalists and other sects peculiar to Boston. We do not even have to occupy ourselves with the fanatical old woman who rants to us collectively down the whole length of the line, denouncing transgressors who spend their time and money on a worldly singer, when they should be seeking after righteousness. If we buy an evening paper from the newsboy, it is merely to sit on, for have we not a novel concealed in our "Boston bag," Meredith or Oppenheim, according to the taste? Neither do the vendors of chocolate and oranges catch us unprepared. For from those same bags there come enviable home-made victuals, even to celery and nut salad in a glass jar, and a spoon to eat it with.

The only time the rush line really rushes is in trying to outdo the people immediately ahead by cutting the corners of the marble stairs. Once seated, we who know resume our convivialities, while the uninitiated study the plaster-casts, read the program books with dull amazement and wonder at the electric click which lights the lights and gives reassurance that life exists in the silent and empty nether regions of Symphony Hall.

Why call us objects of curiosity—we who get such a fine view of the worthies below who, after the first movement of the symphony (allegro) hustle in (frenetico)? Are we not their intellectual and musical as well as architectural superiors, even though, like them, we are far from perfect, and always fall for the soloist?

Why, indeed, should we complain? We have the best seats in the hall. Moreover, Symphony concerts are to be exempt from war taxation, and while they have paid their season's tax irrevocably, we may once more fling our unencumbered quarters into the canvas bag at the doorway. No longer need the provident official anticipate delay by distributing penny-change beforehand.

Boston. JANET N. BAXTER.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts which were postponed from Oct. 18 and 19 on account of the epidemic, will be given next Friday and Saturday, the subscribers' tickets for that pair being good for this. Schumann's Second Symphony in C major will be the classical number on the program. The remaining three numbers are French, "The Hunt and Storm," from Berlioz's opera "The Trojans"; Saint-Saens's charming Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption."

The following events have been announced for the nine pairs of Boston Symphony concerts which remain in the season:

Two interesting choral works are under preparation: Debussy's "Nocturnes" with a female chorus of sirens, and Saint-Saens's cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be this quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Soloists of other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first violin-'cellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, pianist; Jacques Thibaud, violinist; Raoul Laparra, the Spanish composer-pianist, who will play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday"; and Sophie Braslau, contralto.

104

NOVEL MUSIC AT HAND

NEW PIECES BY MR. LOEFFLER AND MR. GILBERT

The Franco-American Composer's String Quartet in Memory of a Dead Aviator—Distinctions of Material, Method and Manner That Flower Into Beauty of Contents and Impression—Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue" to Synge's Irish Tragedy, "Riders to the Sea"—The Play and the Music

TOMORROW evening, in Jordan Hall, from the bows and strings of the Flonzaley Quartet, Bostonians may hear for the first time Mr. Loeffler's new "Music, in E minor, for Four Stringed Instruments." The piece was written in memory of Victor Chapman, an American aviator, killed in the late war in the service of France. It was played by "The Flonzaleys" for the first time anywhere at a concert of the The Friends of Music in New York last Saturday afternoon. It was then received by an expert audience and by the reviewers for the newspapers as a truly remarkable piece of music, written not only with Mr. Loeffler's habitual skill and distinctive means but with beauty of idea and expression with fine imagination, with warm and reciprocated emotion. Since the piece is not easy of comprehension at a single hearing two of these reviews may serve as enlightening preparation. The first, written by Mr. Henderson for The Sun, says:

"The key is minor, albeit such a statement must be taken with liberal latitude. The three movements have distinct moods to delineate, and all are made not only with skill, but poetic feeling and something of imaginative vision. The first movement is the most complex of the three, for after a broadly conceived introduction the allegro is developed in sonata form, but in a manner displaying the full assimilation of French modernism which is Mr. Loeffler's. He long ago accepted the doctrines of Debussy, but his application of them to his artistic practice is so thoroughly his own that he stands proudly independent in originality. Not Debussy nor Ravel, nor any other of the Gallic moderns saw things as Loeffler says them, and few of them have as much that is worth saying.

"The second movement of yesterday's composition is the most beautiful of the three. It bears the title 'Easter Sunday,' and is developed from a lovely plain chant, which is instrumentally treated with most effective polyphony. The last movement, entitled 'A Vol d'oiseau,' is free and delineative. First we hear the song of a 'Un jardin de fleurs naives.' The second episode describes a 'plain of emerald guarded by poplars,' after which comes a theme in thirds in barcarole style suggesting perhaps the flight of an airplane, then a pause and after it a distant 'Vieille marche de soldats de France.' Now there is a hint ofthe aviator's fall, which is followed by a funeral march and a ravishing glorification sung by the 'cello on an old chant.

"The first movement of the work is as we have said difficult to grasp, but the composition as a whole has Mr. Loeffler's fine aristocracy of style. There is not a commonplace measure in it. And its noble harmonies, its rich melodic textures, its profound feeling and its large outlook make it absorbing to the sympathetic listener. The middle movement is a masterpiece unsurpassed in recent chamber music."

In The Tribune, Mr. Krehbril writes also: "The composition is in three movements, which, without following conventional patterns, pay that respect to form which every work of art entitled to the name and effective in its æsthetic and emotional appeal pays. The first is an allegro, preceded by a moderately slow introduction. In the first measures it was apparent that Mr. Loeffler's modernism was to be of the conservative kind. There was to be good part-writing in lucid quartet idioms, with no turgidity of thought or straining after orchestral expression. And this admirable virtue remained to the end, growing indeed, as the symbols which the composer had chosen to express a poetical conceit took on increasing beauty.

"The music, confessedly programmatic, did not take on an externally delineative character till the finale was reached. The fact that the second movement, which had a secondary title, 'Le Saint Jour de Paques,' was largely based on the Gregorian melodies to which the introit 'Resurrexi' and the sequence 'Victimæ paschali' are sung in the Easter service of the Roman Church, led quite naturally to the thought that the date was of some special significance in the career of the young aviator; but this is not the case. The use of the themes was due to the religious spirit of some of young Chapman's writings, and, we fancy, to the growing admiration which Mr. Loeffler has disclosed of late in the melos of the church as a source of artistic material.

"In the last movement, however, the employment of another ecclesiastical canticle has a direct connection with the programmatic scheme. There is a vigorous introduction, suggestive of the beginning of an aeroplane flight, which is repeated again and still again between episodes which the composer has entitled, 'A garden of innocent flowers' and 'A green plain guarded by poplars,' then a hush and the sound of a distant band playing an old French military march. An interruption, funereal music, and for an apotheosis the exquisite old Gregorian tune to which in the Roman burial service the antiphon 'In Paradisum deducant' is sung: 'May the angels conduct thee to Paradise; at thy coming may the martyrs receive thee and lead thee to Jerusalem, the Holy City. May the angelic choir receive thee, and with Lazarus, once a beggar, mayest thou have eternal rest.'

"This outline may suggest the fine spirit and fine material of Mr. Loeffler's work. It cannot even hint at his beautiful harmonization of the themes, the ingenuity and the originality of his color efforts (all attained without putting a strain upon his instrumental medium) and the depth and variety of feeling for which he has found utterance. It is beautiful music, and to hear it was a refreshment of mind and soul."

Gilbert and Synge

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra will play for the first times in Boston, Mr. Henry Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue to Synge's Tragedy, 'Riders to the Sea,'" thus bringing back to Symphony Hall a composer whose music has gone unheard in it far too long. Synge's play is familiar to many on the printed page and in performance by the Irish company of the Abbey Theatre in Dublin during its visits, a few years ago to Boston and other cities of the United States. A paragraph will suffice to recall it.

The impact of "Riders to the Sea" is not the impact of a tragedy in little or the impact of what it is the patronizing custom to call a tragedy of the humble. Rather it is the impact of tragedy concentrated and distilled to its final essence. The great doom of the sea upon those that go down into it or even dwell beside it fills the play as Fate fills the old tragedies. Men and women palter with this doom as gods and heroes paltered with Fate, in fond belief that they may withstand or trick it. The sea swallows Maurya's five sons, even as Fate smote the seven that warred against Thebes. Maurya's daughters wail and will not be comforted, and so they who saw and feared and endured wailed in the old tragedy. But Maurya herself bows in resignation; for she has learned that the sea

Post Feb. 22

GILBERT'S PROLOGUE PERFORMED

Surpassingly Brilliant List Played by Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic prologue to Singe's drama, "Riders to the Sea," was performed for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The soloist of the occasion was Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, who sang airs by Gluck and Massenet. The concert opened with Lalo's overture to the opera, "Le roi d'Ys," and came to an end with a surpassingly brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

GILBERT'S PROLOGUE

Lalo's overture is an extremely brilliant piece of music, and all that was dramatic in it was revealed by Mr. Rabaud. The effect of the music was surprising, for it is clearly music of another period, and a combination of excellent orchestration and the romanticism, translated in terms of the French theatre of Carl Maria von Weber.

Mr. Rabaud also devoted his best gifts as a musician and conductor to the remarkable music of Mr. Gilbert. The prologue to "Riders to the Sea" is an amplification and an extended development of material found in a very brief prelude which Mr. Gilbert wrote for an amateur performance of the play years ago in this city. The prelude was intended only to establish atmosphere for the raising of the curtain. The prologue is in a sense an orchestral unfoldment of the principal motives of the drama. There is tumultuous music of the sea. Against the background, as it were, of the storm, the instruments make lament. At last there is a mood of melancholy and resignation—the thought of the old mother, in Singe's drama, whose lost son has perished, and from whom the sea can take no more.

Measures of Titanic Quality

Very few modern composers of whom we know have succeeded in speaking in such an elemental and impressive manner as has Mr. Gilbert in the earlier pages of this prologue. And the music is far more than a sea-scape. It is fatalistic. Passages of haunting beauty and melancholy are born of the Celtic imagination from which Synge's drama sprang. Mr. Gilbert's belief in the value and the logic of the employment of folk-song by the individual composer is ideally justified in this work, since the thematic fragment of Irish folk-song which is the germinal motive of the composition is in itself eloquent of the essence of the drama; and this oneness of mood and musical material is never lost as the composition progresses.

The instrumentation, perhaps overheavy in places, is nevertheless full of originality and dramatic and almost scenic suggestion. It is as the instrumentation of a tempest, dark, sombre, wild and eerie in its echo of sounds of the storm. There are measures of titanic quality, as for example, those in which mighty progressions of the brass choir are heard over the rolling and pounding of drums. Like most of Mr. Gilbert's composition, this one says its say in an unpolished, direct manner, which is not invariably, perhaps the most transparent and advantageous expression of the though; but it grips and thrills the hearer, because of the sincerity, the nature poetry, the rugged force and sweep of the music.

Mr. De Gogorzas Singing

This music was flanked on the one hand by Lalo's brilliant composition; on the other, by the excellent singing of Mr. De Gogorza. Mr. Gilbert's music stirred profoundly a minority and mystified a majority, more responsive to an amorous air of Massenet than to the work of a creative musician, comparatively little known and unsung in his own land. The minority applauded the prologue for many minutes, and heads were craned for the composer, who, however, kept himself in the background. Notwithstanding the technical brilliancy, color and high artistic value of other music on the programme; notwithstanding the novelty of Mr. Gilbert's musical speech and its disconcerting effect on many of the hearers, the prologue to "Riders to the Sea" stands out in retrospect as one of the most salient and impressive features of the concert.

Mr. De Gogorza is an exceptionally accomplished singer, who knows how to use his voice and how to treat a melodic line. He sang the recitative and air, "Diane impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphegenie in Aulide," and the recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "Roi de Lahore." He was particularly fortunate in the music of Massenet, in which his admirable phrasing and vocal art and his feeling for this music fired the enthusiasm of his hearers.

"Scheherazade"

The culminating point of the concert was the memorable performance of the "Scheherazade" music. At last the Oriental extravagance, the scintillating colors, the barbaric fantasy of this work were fully revealed. Other conductors have given as effective a reading of the first movement, the most truly symphonic of the four, but none that we remember has given the other movement the splendor and excitement of yesterday's performance. Nor have they so successfully accentuated every fascinating detail of rhythm and instrumental effect, while holding consistently to the main ideas and outlines a composition bewildering in its constant and kaleidoscopic transformation.

Nor was there lacking the brutality and the unbridled sensuality of the East. From the preliminary exorcism of the brass to the last measure in which the sea heaves restlessly in the depths of the double basses, Mr. Rabaud held captive the attention and emotions of his hearers, slaves of the ring, enchanted by a masterpiece of Slavic art.

From ~~SUN~~ LIFE Brooklyn N.Y.

Address: New York ~~City~~.

Date FEB 1 5 1911

Music Notes.

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

A large bunch of forsythia, forced into bloom before its time, gave a pleasing touch of spring to the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last week Friday evening. But its place in the long stretch of footlight greenery was where the prompter's box is wont to be on opera nights and it all but concealed Rachmaninoff when he sat down at the piano to play his share of his big Concerto No. 2, in C minor. Feeling sure that a good pianist needs no bush, the distinguished Russian smilingly declined to strike the keys until he was exposed to full view. Rachmaninoff had a wonderfully fine reception, to which his masterly performance fully entitled him. There was also much enthusiasm after the Brahms Symphony No. 2, in D major, than which this orchestra has played nothing better since Rabaud took over the conductorship. It was music of two enemy countries, for Brahms was born in Berlin and died in Vienna, but Rabaud, who is more than liberal-minded in art, conducted it with every evidence of its being a con amore task. For a finale there was the big Berlioz overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," which is a brilliant composition of its kind even though, as truth compels the annotator of the program to note, it is dedicated to a Prince with Hohenzollern in his hyphenated name.

De Gogorza Is Soloist at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Simphony Program.

Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys.

Gilbert, Symphonic Poem, "The Riders to the Sea."

Gluck, Aria, "Diane Impitoyable."
Soloist, Emilio De Gogorza.

Rameau, Airs de Ballet.

Massenet, "Promesse de mon Avenir."
Mr. De Gogorza.

Rimski-Korsakoff, Suite, "Scheherazade."

THIS was varied and of more interest than its predecessor of the week before. We confess that a vocal soloist always breaks the continuity of a symphonic program for us, but the public differ from that opinion and such a baritone as M. De Gogorza ought always to be welcome. He sang his two numbers with noble voice and artistic phrasing and evoked, of course, the chief applause of the concert. The Gluck number had very much of the old recitative in declamatory style; the Massenet work was the more popular.

But the orchestral numbers were almost all of a melodic type and there were no musical problems to solve or puzzles to worry over.

Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture is by no means light or trivial music, but it is clear and logical as if Lalo followed out the dramatic vein of a Weber and was picturesque without becoming ponderous or ascetic. The work was read in a dramatic manner which made it very effective, and it won fervent applause. Rameau was directly melodic. Rameau was the gentleman who exclaimed in 1722 that Music was dead, that all possible combinations had been used and that in a short time only repetitions would be possible. Yet there were a few prominent composers after that time. But his daintiness in this suite from "Hyppolite et Aricie" can scarcely be overestimated. It had tunes enough to set up a dozen modern composers. Yet there were some pretty touches of counterpoint as well. The piccolo had brilliant work to do in the finale (as well as in the subsequent "Scheherzade") and there was good opportunity to display the excellence of our wood-wind, which department of our orchestra was never in better condition than at present.

Of Rimski-Korsakoff's dazzling Oriental tone-picture there is nothing new to say. It has been heard often and is deservedly a favorite. Its scintillating tone-colors do not become stale with repetition. Mr. Fradkin was the Scheherazade of the occasion, for the figure which represents the heroine is almost always given to the solo violin, and he gave the theme clearly and expressively. It is a good and legitimate use of a guiding melody. The Turkish march in the third movement was especially effective. It is decidedly more Oriental than Beethoven's attempts in this direction. The wildly fantastic finale, a perfect Midway Plaisance of music, was most showily interpreted. Altogether the orchestra conquered great difficulties in this work in a manner which showed that they are not retrogressing, and M. Rabaud read it with a brilliancy that fully deserved the enthusiasm it created.

But the interest centred chiefly on a new American work upon an Irish subject, Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea." We do not consider this quite as successful as his Place Congo Ballet, but it has some fine suggestions of the mighty sea and some of the crooning lament of those bereft by it. We should like to hear the work again to understand it better. It is strongly orchestrated, and in spite of coming after the very brilliant performance of the Lalo work it won so much applause that the composer was obliged to bow from his place in the audience again and again. Mr. Gilbert is one of the American composers who generally has something to say, and he is never too prolix in saying it.

MONITOR, FEBRUARY 22,

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—A miscellaneous program, all of interesting compositions, together with a soloist who caught the popular approval, made the Friday afternoon concert of the fifteenth pair in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season one of great satisfaction. Musical amusement apparently was the chief aim of this program, and it fulfilled its mission. A first time in Boston performance of Henry Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue to J. M. Synge's Play, 'Riders to the Sea,'" which was the third the world has received, indicated a praiseworthy attempt on the part of Mr. Rabaud to encourage American writers who are worth encouraging, and Mr. Gilbert is emphatically that. The part of the prologue descriptive of the sea is a uncommonly fine bit of writing, but that part which is meant to represent human grief strikes the present reviewer as less sincerely felt and less effectively scored. The program began with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," and included also airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gogorza, the soloist, sang the recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," and the recitative and air from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," "Promesse de Mon Avenir." He was in good voice and was liberally applauded.

An interested visitor at the concert was Emil Oberhoffer, the excellent conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, who is on a visit to Eastern cities. Mr. Oberhoffer was emphatic in his approval of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor and the orchestra as a band.

TRAVELER, FEBRUARY 20,

SYMPHONY SOON EX-TAX

Revenue Measure Frees Concerts

With the President's signature attached to the new revenue bill the war tax on tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts ceases. This means that those purchasing tickets for the remaining concerts, of which there are 10 pairs, largely of exceptional interest, will have no war tax to pay. These tickets are sold on a pro rata basis, a new departure this season. Purchasers of tickets for the remainder of the season are also entitled to the privilege of subscribing for the same seats next season.

Soloists yet to appear include Emilio De Gogorza, Harold Bauer, Jacques Thibaud, Joseph Malkin and Raoul Laparra. Among the more interesting compositions to come are Debussy's "Nocturnes" with a female chorus; Saint-Saens, "The Lwde and the Harp," with chorus of 150 voices and a [illegible]

HERALD, FEBRUARY 23,

One of the Symphony Rush Line Is Joyous in Her Fortune

To the Editor of the Herald:

In your columns, not long ago, somebody deplored the "human spectacle" which the rush line at the Symphony concerts affords. I feel qualified to pro- [illegible] of the seasoned habitues [illegible]e.

[illegible] feel like zoological speci- [illegible] on the steps in rows. [illegible]ystem is best if specula- [illegible]ided, we are respectably [illegible] old Boston tradition, [illegible]ashamed. We, who have [illegible]thing and adjusted our- [illegible]estless and fussy, after [illegible] box-office line, or an [illegible] prodded by uncertainty. [illegible] doubtful point of ex- [illegible]e 56th, everything is [illegible] as smoothly as the [illegible]anet itself. Bless you, [illegible]pared to kill time com- [illegible] succeed. We usually [illegible] three together, and, [illegible] the steps, we placidly [illegible]pics as if we were in [illegible]airs, Sarah's children, [illegible] Rabaud, spring hats, [illegible] Copley, a new teacher, [illegible] friend Constance, the [illegible]ur enemy Josephine. [illegible] among us—Conserva- [illegible]h piano scores of the [illegible]layed; shabby-genteel [illegible]h their knitting, who [illegible]ished" ever since the [illegible] actually rehearsals; [illegible]ing bunches who hail [illegible]e serpentine unwinds [illegible] Occasionally an individual with [illegible] child and a bag of peanuts who is curiously taking in Boston's best band as she would Boston's highest monument; very occasionally, stray people who are seeking a variation upon the movies, the price being equal.

But we, the old-timers, are different from these last. We have learned to pass our time better than by staring at the vacant lot to the left of us, or the variously gold-lettered windows across the way, describing vocanists, chiropodists, Theosophists, Universalists and other sects peculiar to Boston. We do not even have to occupy ourselves with the fanatical old woman who rants to us collectively down the whole length of the line, denouncing transgressors who spend their time and money on a worldly singer, when they should be seeking after righteousness. If we buy an evening paper from the newsboy, it is merely to sit on, for have we not a novel concealed in our "Boston bag," Meredith or Oppenheim, according to the taste? Neither do the vendors of chocolate and oranges catch us unprepared. For from those same bags there come enviable home-made victuals, even to celery and nut salad in a glass jar, and a spoon to eat it with.

The only time the rush line really rushes is in trying to outdo the people immediately ahead by cutting the corners of the marble stairs. Once seated, we who know resume our convivialities, while the uninitiated study the plaster-casts, read the program books with dull amazement and wonder at the electric click which lights the lights and gives reassurance that life exists in the silent and empty nether regions of Symphony Hall.

Why call us objects of curiosity—we who get such a fine view of the worthies below who, after the first movement of the symphony (allegro) hustle in (frenetico)? Are we not their intellectual and musical as well as architectural superiors, even though, like them, we are far from perfect, and always fall for the soloist?

Why, indeed, should we complain? We have the best seats in the hall. Moreover, Symphony concerts are to be exempt from war taxation, and while they have paid their season's tax irrevocably, we may once more fling our unencumbered quarters into the canvas bag at the doorway. No longer need the provident official anticipate delay by distributing penny-change beforehand.

Boston. JANET N. BAXTER.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts which were postponed from Oct. 18 and 19 on account of the epidemic, will be given next Friday and Saturday, the subscribers' tickets for that pair being good for this. Schumann's Second Symphony in C major will be the classical number on the program. The remaining three numbers are French, "The Hunt and Storm," from Berlioz's opera "The Trojans"; Saint-Saens's charming Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption."

The following events have been announced for the nine pairs of Boston Symphony concerts which remain in the season:

Two interesting choral works are under preparation: Debussy's "Nocturnes" with a female chorus of sirens, and Saint-Saens's cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be this quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Soloists of other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first violin-'cellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, pianist; Jacques Thiband, violinist; Raoul Laparra, the Spanish composer-pianist, who will play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday"; and Sophie Braslau, contralto.

104

NOVEL MUSIC AT HAND

NEW PIECES BY MR. LOEFFLER AND MR. GILBERT

The Franco-American Composer's String Quartet in Memory of a Dead Aviator—Distinctions of Material, Method and Manner That Flower Into Beauty of Contents and Impression—Mr. Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue" to Synge's Iris Tragedy, "Riders to the Sea"—The Play and the Music

TOMORROW evening, in Jordan Hall, from the bows and strings of the Flonzaley Quartet, Bostonians may hear for the first time Mr. Loeffler's new "Music, in E minor, for Four Stringed Instruments." The piece was written in memory of Victor Chapman, an American aviator, killed in the late war in the service of France. It was played by "The Flonzaleys" for the first time anywhere at a concert of the The Friends of Music in New York last Saturday afternoon. It was then received by an expert audience and by the reviewers for the newspapers as a truly remarkable piece of music, written not only with Mr. Loeffler's habitual skill and distinctive means but with beauty of idea and expression, with fine imagination, with warm and reciprocated emotion. Since the piece is not easy of comprehension at a single hearing, two of these reviews may serve as enlightening preparation. The first, written by Mr. Henderson for The Sun, says:

"The key is minor, albeit such a statement must be taken with liberal latitude. The three movements have distinct moods to delineate, and all are made not only with skill, but poetic feeling and something of imaginative vision. The first movement is the most complex of the three, for after a broadly conceived introduction the allegro is developed in sonata form, but in a manner displaying the full assimilation of French modernism which is Mr. Loeffler's. He long ago accepted the doctrines of Debussy, but his application of them to his artistic practice is so thoroughly his own that he stands proudly independent in originality. Not Debussy nor Ravel, nor any other of the Gallic moderns saw things as Loeffler says them, and few of them have as much that is worth saying.

"The second movement of yesterday's composition is the most beautiful of the three. It bears the title 'Easter Sunday,' and is developed from a lovely plain chant, which is instrumentally treated with most effective polyphony. The last movement, entitled 'A Vol d'oiseau,' is free and delineative. First we hear the song of a 'Un jardin de fleurs naives.' The second episode describes a 'plain of emerald guarded by poplars,' after which comes a theme in thirds in barcarole style suggesting perhaps the flight of an airplane, then a pause and after it a distant 'Vieille marche de soldats de France.' Now there is a hint ofthe aviator's fall, which is followed by a funeral march and a ravishing glorification sung by the 'cello on an old chant.

"The first movement of the work is as we have said difficult to grasp, but the composition as a whole has Mr. Loeffler's fine aristocracy of style. There is not a commonplace measure in it. And its noble harmonies, its rich melodic textures, its profound feeling and its large outlook make it absorbing to the sympathetic listener. The middle movement is a masterpiece unsurpassed in recent chamber music."

In The Tribune, Mr. Krehbril writes also: "The composition is in three movements, which, without following conventional patterns, pay that respect to form which every work of art entitled to the name and effective in its æsthetic and emotional appeal pays. The first is an allegro, preceded by a moderately slow introduction. In the first measures it was apparent that Mr. Loeffler's modernism was to be of the conservative kind. There was to be good part-writing in lucid quartet idioms, with no turgidity of thought or straining after orchestral expression. And this admirable virtue remained to the end, growing indeed, as the symbols which the composer had chosen to express a poetical conceit took on increasing beauty.

"The music, confessedly programmatic, did not take on an externally delineative character till the finale was reached. The fact that the second movement, which had a secondary title, 'Le Saint Jour de Paques,' was largely based on the Gregorian melodies to which the introit 'Resurrexi' and the sequence 'Victimæ paschali' are sung in the Easter service of the Roman Church, led quite naturally to the thought that the date was of some special significance in the career of the young aviator; but this is not the case. The use of the themes was due to the religious spirit of some of young Chapman's writings, and, we fancy, to the growing admiration which Mr. Loeffler has disclosed of late in the melos of the church as a source of artistic material.

"In the last movement, however, the employment of another ecclesiastical canticle has a direct connection with the programmatic scheme. There is a vigorous introduction, suggestive of the beginning of an aeroplane flight, which is repeated again and still again between episodes which the composer has entitled, 'A garden of innocent flowers' and 'A green plain guarded by poplars,' then a hush and the sound of a distant band playing an old French military march. An interruption, funereal music, and for an apotheosis the exquisite old Gregorian tune to which in the Roman burial service the antiphon 'In Paradisum deducant' is sung: 'May the angels conduct thee to Paradise; at thy coming may the martyrs receive thee and lead thee to Jerusalem, the Holy City. May the angelic choir receive thee, and with Lazarus, once a beggar, mayest thou have eternal rest.'

"This outline may suggest the fine spirit and fine material of Mr. Loeffler's work. It cannot even hint at his beautiful harmonization of the themes, the ingenuity and the originality of his color efforts (all attained without putting a strain upon his instrumental medium) and the depth and variety of feeling for which he has found utterance. It is beautiful music, and to hear it was a refreshment of mind and soul."

Gilbert and Synge

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at the Symphony Concerts,, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra will play for the first times in Boston, Mr. Henry Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue to Synge's Tragedy, 'Riders to the Sea,'" thus bringing back to Symphony Hall a composer whose music has gone unheard in it far too long. Synge's play is familiar to many on the printed page and in performance by the Irish company of the Abbey Theatre in Dublin during its visits, a few years ago to Boston and other cities of the United States. A paragraph will suffice to recall it.

The impact of "Riders to the Sea" is not the impact of a tragedy in little or the impact of what it is the patronizing custom to call a tragedy of the humble. Rather it is the impact of tragedy concentrated and distilled to its final essence. The great doom of the sea upon those that go down into it or even dwell beside it fills the play as Fate fills the old tragedies. Men and women palter with this doom as gods and heroes paltered with Fate, in fond belief that they may withstand or trick it. The sea swallows Maurya's five sons, even as Fate smote the seven that warred against Thebes. Maurya's daughters wail and will not be comforted, and so they who saw and loved and endured wailed in the old tragedy. But Maurya herself bows in resignation; for she has learned that the sea, which to her and hers is Fate, is the [illegible] And in the learning she

Post Feb 22

GILBERT'S PROLOGUE PERFORMED

Surpassingly Brilliant List Played by Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic prologue to Singe's drama, "Riders to the Sea," was performed for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The soloist of the occasion was Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, who sang airs by Gluck and Massenet. The concert opened with Lalo's overture to the opera, "Le roi d'Ys," and came to an end with a surpassingly brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

GILBERT'S PROLOGUE

Lalo's overture is an extremely brilliant piece of music, and all that was dramatic in it was revealed by Mr. Rabaud. The effect of the music was surprising, for it is clearly music of another period, and a combination of excellent orchestration and the romanticism, translated in terms of the French theatre of Carl Maria von Weber.

Mr. Rabaud also devoted his best gifts as a musician and conductor to the remarkable music of Mr. Gilbert. The prologue to "Riders to the Sea" is an amplification and an extended development of material found in a very brief prelude which Mr. Gilbert wrote for an amateur performance of the play years ago in this city. The prelude was intended only to establish atmosphere for the raising of the curtain. The prologue is in a sense an orchestral unfoldment of the principal motives of the drama. There is tumultuous music of the sea. Against the background, as it were, of the storm, the instruments make lament. At last there is a mood of melancholy and resignation—the thought of the old mother, in Singe's drama, whose lost son has perished, and from whom the sea can take no more.

Measures of Titanic Quality

Very few modern composers of whom we know have succeeded in speaking in such an elemental and impressive manner as has Mr. Gilbert in the earlier pages of this prologue. And the music is far more than a sea-scape. It is fatalistic. Passages of haunting beauty and melancholy are born of the Celtic imagination from which Synge's drama sprang. Mr. Gilbert's belief in the value and the logic of the employment of folk-song by the individual composer is ideally justified in this work, since the thematic fragment of Irish folk-song which is the germinal motive of the composition is in itself eloquent of the essence of the drama; and this oneness of mood and musical material is never lost as the composition progresses.

The instrumentation, perhaps overheavy in places, is nevertheless full of originality and dramatic and almost scenic suggestion. It is as the instrumentation of a tempest, dark, sombre, wild and eerie in its echo of sounds of the storm. There are measures of titanic quality, as for example, those in which mighty progressions of the brass choir are heard over the rolling and pounding of drums. Like most of Mr. Gilbert's composition, this one says its say in an unpolished, direct manner, which is not invariably, perhaps the most transparent and advantageous expression of the though; but it grips and thrills the hearer, because of the sincerity, the nature poetry, the rugged force and sweep of the music.

Mr. De Gogorzas Singing

This music was flanked on the one hand by Lalo's brilliant composition; on the other, by the excellent singing of Mr. De Gogorza. Mr. Gilbert's music stirred profoundly a minority and mystified a majority, more responsive to an amorous air of Massenet than to the work of a creative musician, comparatively little known and unsung in his own land. The minority applauded the prologue for many minutes, and heads were craned for the composer, who, however, kept himself in the background. Notwithstanding the technical brilliancy, color and high artistic value of other music on the programme; notwithstanding the novelty of Mr. Gilbert's musical speech and its disconcerting effect on many of the hearers, the prologue to "Riders to the Sea" stands out in retrospect as one of the most salient and impressive features of the concert.

Mr. De Gogorza is an exceptionally accomplished singer, who knows how to use his voice and how to treat a melodic line. He sang the recitative and air, "Diane impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphegenie in Aulide," and the recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "Roi de Lahore." He was particularly fortunate in the music of Massenet, in which his admirable phrasing and vocal art and his feeling for this music fired the enthusiasm of his hearers.

"Scheherazade"

The culminating point of the concert was the memorable performance of the "Scheherazade" music. At last the Oriental extravagance, the scintillating colors, the barbaric fantasy of this work were fully revealed. Other conductors have given as effective a reading of the first movement, the most truly symphonic of the four, but none that we remember has given the other movement the splendor and excitement of yesterday's performance. Nor have they so successfully accentuated every fascinating detail of rhythm and instrumental effect, while holding consistently to the main ideas and outlines a composition bewildering in its constant and kaleidoscopic transformation.

Nor was there lacking the brutality and the unbridled sensuality of the East. From the preliminary exorcism of the brass to the last measure in which the sea heaves restlessly in the depths of the double basses, Mr. Rabaud held captive the attention and emotions of his hearers, slaves of the ring, enchanted by a masterpiece of Slavic art.

From ~~SUN~~ LIFE Brooklyn N.Y.

Address: New York City.

Date FEB 1 5 1911

Music T

The Fourth Boston Symphony

A large bunch of forsythia, time, gave a pleasing touch of of the Boston Symphony Orche last week Friday evening. But of footlight greenery was wher to be on opera nights and it al when he sat down at the pian Concerto No. 2, in C minor pianist needs no bush, the d declined to strike the keys unti Rachmaninoff had a wonderfu masterly performance fully e much enthusiasm after the B major, than which this orche since Rabaud took over the c two enemy countries, for Br died in Vienna, but Rabaud, in art, conducted it with con amore task. For a finale ture, "Le Carnaval Romain," of its kind even though, as m the program to note, it is de zollern in his hyphenated na nan Bolshevik, nd if he keeps Allies in entire point.—New

PALACE Telep 260 Bedf ntic Avenues
turdays, Sunda 2:30 A. M., 2:30 :00 P.M. On 0 P. M. and 8: given by appoin e skating by expe ing except Satu olidays.
ellent Music
nd Waltzing Lesson by Miss Grace Alle

De Gogorza Is Soloist at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Program.

Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys.

Gilbert, Symphonic Poem, "The Riders to the Sea."

Gluck, Aria, "Diane Impitoyable."
Soloist, Emilio De Gogorza.

Rameau, Airs de Ballet.

Massenet, "Promesse de mon Avenir."
Mr. De Gogorza.

Rimski-Korsakoff, Suite, "Scheherazade."

THIS was varied and of more interest than its predecessor of the week before. We confess that a vocal soloist always breaks the continuity of a symphonic program for us, but the public differ from that opinion and such a baritone as M. De Gogorza ought always to be welcome. He sang his two numbers with noble voice and artistic phrasing and evoked, of course, the chief applause of the concert. The Gluck number had very much of the old recitative in declamatory style; the Massenet work was the more popular.

But the orchestral numbers were almost all of a melodic type and there were no musical problems to solve or puzzles to worry over.

Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture is by no means light or trivial music, but it is clear and logical as if Lalo followed out the dramatic vein of a Weber and was picturesque without becoming ponderous or ascetic. The work was read in a dramatic manner which made it very effective, and it won fervent applause. Rameau was directly melodic. Rameau was the gentleman who exclaimed in 1722 that Music was dead, that all possible combinations had been used and that in a short time only repetitions would be possible. Yet there were a few prominent composers after that time. But his daintiness in this suite from "Hyppolite et Aricie" can scarcely be overestimated. It had tunes enough to set up a dozen modern composers. Yet there were some pretty touches of counterpoint as well. The piccolo had brilliant work to do in the finale (as well as in the subsequent "Scheherzade") and there was good opportunity to display the excellence of our wood-wind, which department of our orchestra was never in better condition than at present.

Of Rimski-Korsakoff's dazzling Oriental tone-picture there is nothing new to say. It has been heard often and is deservedly a favorite. Its scintillating tone-colors do not become stale with repetition. Mr. Fradkin was the Scheherazade of the occasion, for the figure which represents the heroine is almost always given to the solo violin, and he gave the theme clearly and expressively. It is a good and legitimate use of a guiding melody. The Turkish march in the third movement was especially effective. It is decidedly more Oriental than Beethoven's attempts in this direction. The wildly fantastic finale, a perfect Midway Plaisance of music, was most showily interpreted. Altogether the orchestra conquered great difficulties in this work in a manner which showed that they are not retrogressing, and M. Rabaud read it with a brilliancy that fully deserved the enthusiasm it created.

But the interest centred chiefly on a new American work upon an Irish subject, Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea." We do not consider this quite as successful as his Place Congo Ballet, but it has some fine suggestions of the mighty sea and some of the crooning lament of those bereft by it. We should like to hear the work again to understand it better. It is strongly orchestrated, and in spite of coming after the very brilliant performance of the Lalo work it won so much applause that the composer was obliged to bow from his place in the audience again and again. Mr. Gilbert is one of the American composers who generally has something to say, and he is never too prolix in saying it.

MONITOR, FEBRUARY 22,

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—A miscellaneous program, all of interesting compositions, together with a soloist who caught the popular approval, made the Friday afternoon concert of the fifteenth pair in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season one of great satisfaction. Musical amusement apparently was the chief aim of this program, and it fulfilled its mission. A first time in Boston performance of Henry Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue to J. M. Synge's Play, 'Riders to the Sea,'" which was the third the world has received, indicated a praiseworthy attempt on the part of Mr. Rabaud to encourage American writers who are worth encouraging, and Mr. Gilbert is emphatically that. The part of the prologue descriptive of the sea is an uncommonly fine bit of writing, but that part which is meant to represent human grief strikes the present reviewer as less sincerely felt and less effectively scored. The program began with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," and included also airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gogorza, the soloist, sang the recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," and the recitative and air from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," "Promesse de Mon Avenir." He was in good voice and was liberally applauded.

An interested visitor at the concert was Emil Oberhoffer, the excellent conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, who is on a visit to Eastern cities. Mr. Oberhoffer was emphatic in his approval of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor and the orchestra as a band.

TRAVELER, FEBRUARY 20,

SYMPHONY SOON EX-TAX

Revenue Measure Frees Concerts

With the President's signature attached to the new revenue bill the war tax on tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts ceases. This means that those purchasing tickets for the remaining concerts, of which there are 10 pairs, largely of exceptional interest, will have no war tax to pay. These tickets are sold on a pro rata basis, a new departure this season. Purchasers of tickets for the remainder of the season are also entitled to the privilege of subscribing for the same seats next season.

Soloists yet to appear include Emilio De Gogorza, Harold Bauer, Jacques Thibaud, Joseph Malkin and Raoul Laparra. Among the more interesting compositions to come are Debussy's "Nocturnes" with a female chorus; Saint-Saens, "The Lwde and the Harp," with chorus of 150 voices and a [illegible]

HERALD, FEBRUARY 23,

One of the Symphony Rush Line Is Joyous in Her Fortune

To the Editor of the Herald:

In your columns, not long ago, somebody deplored the "human spectacle" which the rush line at the Symphony concerts affords. I feel qualified to protest in behalf of the seasoned habitues of the rush line.

No, we don't feel like zoological specimens, standing on the steps in rows. We know the system is best if speculation is to be avoided, we are respectably carrying on an old Boston tradition, and we are not ashamed. We, who have well tried this thing and adjusted ourselves, are not restless and fussy, after the manner of a box-office line, or an income tax line, prodded by uncertainty. Except for the doubtful point of exclusion after the 565th, everything is scheduled ahead as smoothly as the course of our planet itself. Bless you, no! We come prepared to kill time comfortably, and we succeed. We usually arrange it two or three together, and, settling down on the steps, we placidly discuss endless topics as if we were in our own arm chairs, Sarah's children, Bolshevism, Mr. Rabaud, spring hats, the show at the Copley, a new teacher, the merits of our friend Constance, the shortcomings of our enemy Josephine. Many types are among us—Conservatory students with piano scores of the symphony to be played; shabby-genteel maiden ladies with their knitting, who have evidently "rushed" ever since the "rehearsals" were actually rehearsals; young girls in giggling bunches who hail their bunches as the serpentine unwinds at 1:30; occasionally an individual with a child and a bag of peanuts who is curiously taking in Boston's best band as she would Boston's highest monument; very occasionally, stray people who are seeking a variation upon the movies, the price being equal.

But we, the old-timers, are different from these last. We have learned to pass our time better than by staring at the vacant lot to the left of us, or the variously gold-lettered windows across the way, describing vocanists, chiropodists, Theosophists, Universalists and other sects peculiar to Boston. We do not even have to occupy ourselves with the fanatical old woman who rants to us collectively down the whole length of the line, denouncing transgressors who spend their time and money on a worldly singer, when they should be seeking after righteousness. If we buy an evening paper from the newsboy, it is merely to sit on, for have we not a novel concealed in our "Boston bag," Meredith or Oppenheim, according to the taste? Neither do the vendors of chocolate and oranges catch us unprepared. For from those same bags there come enviable home-made victuals, even to celery and nut salad in a glass jar, and a spoon to eat it with.

The only time the rush line really rushes is in trying to outdo the people immediately ahead by cutting the corners of the marble stairs. Once seated, we who know resume our convivialities, while the uninitiated study the plaster casts, read the program books with dull amazement and wonder at the electric clock which lights the lights and gives reassurance that life exists in the silent and empty nether regions of Symphony Hall.

Why call us objects of curiosity—we who get such a fine view of the worthies below who, after the first movement of the symphony (allegro) hustle in (frenetico)? Are we not their intellectual and musical as well as architectural superiors, even though, like them, we are far from perfect, and always fall for the soloist?

Why, indeed, should we complain? We have the best seats in the hall. Moreover, Symphony concerts are to be exempt from war taxation, and while they have paid their season's tax irrevocably, we may once more fling our unencumbered quarters into the canvas bag at the doorway. No longer need the provident official anticipate delay by distributing penny-change beforehand.

Boston. JANET N. BAXTER.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts which were postponed from Oct. 18 and 19 on account of the epidemic, will be given next Friday and Saturday, the subscribers' tickets for that pair being good for this. Schumann's Second Symphony in C major will be the classical number on the program. The remaining three numbers are French, "The Hunt and Storm," from Berlioz's opera "The Trojans"; Saint-Saens's charming Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption."

The following events have been announced for the nine pairs of Boston Symphony concerts which remain in the season:

Two interesting choral works are under preparation: Debussy's "Nocturnes" with a female chorus of sirens, and Saint-Saens's cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be this quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Soloists of other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first violin-'cellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, pianist; Jacques Thibaud, violinist; Raoul Laparra, the Spanish composer-pianist, who will play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday"; and Sophie Braslau, contralto.

104

NOVEL MUSIC AT HAN

NEW PIECES BY MR. LOEFFLER AN MR. GILBERT

The Franco-American Composer's Strin Quartet in Memory of a Dead Aviator—Distinctions of Material, Method an Manner That Flower Into Beauty o Contents and Impression—Mr. Gilbert "Symphonic Prologue" to Synge's Iris Tragedy, "Riders to the Sea"—The Pla and the Music

TOMORROW evening, in Jordan Hal from the bows and strings of th Flonzaley Quartet, Bostonians ma hear for the first time Mr. Loef fler's new "Music, in E minor, for Four Stringed Instruments." The piece wa written in memory of Victor Chapman, a American aviator, killed in the late wa in the service of France. It was playe by "The Flonzaleys" for the first tim anywhere at a concert of the The Friend of Music in New York last Saturday af ternoon. It was then received by an ex pert audience and by the reviewers for th newspapers as a truly remarkable piece o music, written not only with Mr. Loef fler's habitual skill and distinctive means but with beauty of idea and expression with fine imagination, with warm and reciprocated emotion. Since the piece is no easy of comprehension at a single hearing two of these reviews may serve as en lightening preparation. The first, writte by Mr. Henderson for The Sun, says:

"The key is minor, albeit such a statement must be taken with liberal latitude. The three movements have distinct moods to delineate, and all are made not only with skill, but poetic feeling and something of imaginative vision. The first movement is the most complex of the three, for after a broadly conceived introduction the allegro is developed in sonata form, but in a manner displaying the full assimilation of French modernism which is Mr. Loeffler's. He long ago accepted the doctrines of Debussy, but his application of them to his artistic practice is so thoroughly his own that he stands proudly independent in originality. Not Debussy nor Ravel, nor any other of the Gallic moderns saw things as Loeffler says them, and few of them have as much that is worth saying.

"The second movement of yesterday's composition is the most beautiful of the three. It bears the title 'Easter Sunday,' and is developed from a lovely plain chant, which is instrumentally treated with most effective polyphony. The last movement, entitled 'A Vol d'oiseau,' is free and delineative. First we hear the song of a 'Un jardin de fleurs naives.' The second episode describes a 'plain of emerald guarded by poplars,' after which comes a theme in thirds in barcarole style suggesting perhaps the flight of an airplane, then a pause and after it a distant 'Vieille marche de soldats de France.' Now there is a hint ofthe aviator's fall, which is followed by a funeral march and a ravishing glorification sung by the 'cello on an old chant.

"The first movement of the work is as we have said difficult to grasp, but the composition as a whole has Mr. Loeffler's fine aristocracy of style. There is not a commonplace measure in it. And its noble harmonies, its rich melodic textures, its profound feeling and its large outlook make it absorbing to the sympathetic listener. The middle movement is a masterpiece unsurpassed in recent chamber music."

In The Tribune, Mr. Krehbril writes also: "The composition is in three movements, which, without following conventional patterns, pay that respect to form which every work of art entitled to the name and effective in its æsthetic and emotional appeal pays. The first is an allegro, preceded by a moderately slow introduction. In the first measures it was apparent that Mr. Loeffler's modernism was to be of the conservative kind. There was to be good part-writing in lucid quartet idioms, with no turgidity of thought or straining after orchestral expression. And this admirable virtue remained to the end, growing indeed, as the symbols which the composer had chosen to express a poetical conceit took on increasing beauty.

"The music, confessedly programmatic, did not take on an externally delineative character till the finale was reached. The fact that the second movement, which had a secondary title, 'Le Saint Jour de Paques,' was largely based on the Gregorian melodies to which the introit 'Resurrexi' and the sequence 'Victimæ paschali' are sung in the Easter service of the Roman Church, led quite naturally to the thought that the date was of some special significance in the career of the young aviator; but this is not the case. The use of the themes was due to the religious spirit of some of young Chapman's writings, and, we fancy, to the growing admiration which Mr. Loeffler has disclosed of late in the melos of the church as a source of artistic material.

"In the last movement, however, the employment of another ecclesiastical canticle has a direct connection with the programmatic scheme. There is a vigorous introduction, suggestive of the beginning of an aeroplane flight, which is repeated again and still again between episodes which the composer has entitled, 'A garden of innocent flowers' and 'A green plain guarded by poplars,' then a hush and the sound of a distant band playing an old French military march. An interruption, funereal music, and for an apotheosis the exquisite old Gregorian tune to which in the Roman burial service the antiphon 'In Paradisum deducant' is sung: 'May the angels conduct thee to Paradise; at thy coming may the martyrs receive thee and lead thee to Jerusalem, the Holy City. May the angelic choir receive thee, and with Lazarus, once a beggar, mayest thou have eternal rest.'

"This outline may suggest the fine spirit and fine material of Mr. Loeffler's work. It cannot even hint at his beautiful harmonization of the themes, the ingenuity and the originality of his color efforts (all attained without putting a strain upon his instrumental medium) and the depth and variety of feeling for which he has found utterance. It is beautiful music, and to hear it was a refreshment of mind and soul."

Gilbert and Synge

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at the Symphony Concerts,, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra will play for the first times in Boston, Mr. Henry Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue to Synge's Tragedy, 'Riders to the Sea,'" thus bringing back to Symphony Hall a composer whose music has gone unheard in it far too long. Synge's play is familiar to many on the printed page and in performance by the Irish company of the Abbey Theatre in Dublin during its visits, a few years ago to Boston and other cities of the United States. A paragraph will suffice to recall it.

The impact of "Riders to the Sea" is not the impact of a tragedy in little or the impact of what it is the patronizing custom to call a tragedy of the humble. Rather it is the impact of tragedy concentrated and distilled to its final essence. The great doom of the sea upon those that go down into it or even dwell beside it fills the play as Fate fills the old tragedies. Men and women palter with this doom as gods and heroes paltered with Fate, in fond belief that they may withstand or trick it. The sea swallows Maurya's five sons, even as Fate smote the seven that warred against Thebes. Maurya's daughters wail and will not be comforted, and so they who saw and loved and endured wailed in the old tragedy. But Maurya herself bows in resignation: for she has learned that the sea, which to her and hers is Fate, is the [illegible] And in the learning she

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
FEB 1919

105

Uncle Jed, Caddie Master

HE ATTENDS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

By Joseph Chapman

EVENIN', Mistah Banks—evenin', suh. Yassuh; Ah think de shower is 'bout ovah, suh. If you-all wait a minute you is bound to git yo' match.

Well, suh, Ah had de most curious experience last evenin'; an' Ah doan' know zackly whut to think—same as a man dat's been hit by a golf ball on de loose, an' can't figure whether he is glad 'cause he ain't dead or mad 'cause his hat got spoiled.

It start' off yesterday 'bout sundown, when Mistah Jackson was a-payin' off his caddie, an' look' up all of a sudden an' say: "Jed, Ah got a extry ticket to de concert to-night—de Sympathy Ochestra. It belong' to ma missus; but she is on a unexpected visit to her kin. How'd you-all like to go?"

Well, suh, music is jest de same to me as cream to a stray alley cat; an' Ah say: "Mistah Jackson, suh, you come nigh to undermannin' me with such a temptin' prospectus; an' indeed Ah'd be most highly honored to 'company you-all to de musicale." An' we 'range to meet at his house an ride down in his fine motor cah.

He fix me up with a big segah on de front seat 'longside de drivah, who was a white man. Ah did ma best to socialize with dat chofer; but Ah didn't make no real headway, 'cause it 'peared like he wuz sore 'bout somepin. It pass ma mind dat maybe his missus had ben treatin' him to de curry-comb; an' atter dat Ah give him ma silent sympathy an' we git 'long fust-class.

Bimeby we git to de theater; an' Mistah Jackson go to de box office an' swap his tickets for two at de top, splainin' dat de music riz up—same as a goff ball hit with a mashie—an' de people in de pit miss de best effect. He hustle me through de marble-an'-gold hall with de lights a-shinin' like diamonds—sayin' dat we is late—an up some stairs, an' up some mo' stairs; an' den up some mo' stairs, till Ah feel like Ise jest one big heart a-beatin'. An' den we climb down a steep bank to de seats.

Well, suh, de position seem' so ticklish Ah ain't had a chance to look round till Ah git set; an' den Ah look over de edge, an'—pow!—ma stomach done a sure-enough buck-an'-wing. 'Way down 'bout as far as de prospective wus a big lot o' people, an' all round in de balconies wus a lot mo'—fine high-up-lookin' people, actin' jest as ca'm an' natural as if dey wus settin' in a funeral. An' 'bout as far off as de reach of a drivin' iron, through a arch de size o' de gateway inter de Promised Land, wus a stage as big as de Town Square.

Ise accustomed to attend de Luxury Movin'-Picture Theater near ma home; but—my land, Mistah Banks—you could put de whole Luxury in dat opery house an' you would hatter tie a string to it an' keep holt o' de end if you wanted to find it ag'in.

On de stage dey wus a bank o' chairs 'ranged like a hoss-shoe, an' a li'l' stand at de front in de middle, with a railin' round it. Dat stand an' dat railin' intensified me—bein' like de stand at de County Fair where dey exhibit de prize squash; an' Ah wuz wonderin' whut dey wus gonna show off on dis one an' whut de railin' was fixed fo' to pen up. On de chairs was a lot o' musicians, an' mo' kinds o' instruments dan Ah knowed dere really wuz.

In front wus de fiddles an' 'way back wus mo' fiddles; but dey wus older lookin' an' so big dat de men had to stand 'em on de floor. An' at de very back wus de oldes' an bigges' fiddles o' de lot—balky an' mean lookin', so dat de men managin' 'em had to stand up an' drive 'em on de bit de whole time.

Ah see a lot o' horns an' drums an' flutes, an' one contraption like a bean pole, with a crooked twig comin' out de side dat de man put in his mouf. Ah ax Mistah Jackson whut dat wus, an' he whisper somepin soundin' like bassoon. Dis s'prise me, 'cause Ah always thought dat wus some kind of a animal.

Right soon de people begun clappin', an' a man come out an' mount de stand. Ah look him over careful, but Ah doan' see nothin' pertickilar 'bout him. He wave a li'l' stick an' we all riz up; an' dat band sail inter "Oh, say, can you see——" An'—my land!—Mistah Banks, dat wus some band! Dey fill dat place so full o' harmony it seem' like somepin gotta crack, an' Ah feel de chills round ma backbone like de hands of a pickpocket in a crowd tryin' to locate de lucre.

Atter dat dey settle down to de real business o' de evenin'; an'—fo' a fact, Mistah Banks—dere wus some curious doin's.

Fust, de man on de stand, de leader dey call' him—he seem' to me mo' like de follower, 'cause he's always atter 'em so hard—fust, de leader hold up de li'l' stick an' dey all git quiet like dey wuz awaitin' fo' somepin to happen. An'—'deed indeed—it happened! Dey wus de mos' awful bust o' noise dat ever ketch me head-on in de countenance, comin' a mile a minute, an' it like to raise me clean outen de seat. Dis kept up fo' a minute, with de leader actin' like a crazy man an' all de musicians weavin' an' wreathin' like a passel o' niggahs gittin' religion; an' den—bam!—it stop' jest as solid as bangin' shut de lid o' de cedar chest on a cat fight goin' on in de in'ards.

Right away a sound come along as if dey wus a jenny wren fussin' over de lack o' buildin' materials, an' den one o' de men with de horns woke up an' squelched dat with a blast dat would 'a' made de Angel Gabriel feel like a peacock in de moltin' season.

Den dey all got more er less busy an' seem' to be playin' some kind of a game, with de leader chidin' 'em an wavin' his stick an' shakin' his fist at' em every minute; an' Ah began to realize de usefulness o' de railin' dat kep' him in place. If it hadn't been fo' dat, dere wus a lot o' times durin' de evenin' when he would 'mos' surely tore loose an' gone at some o' de musicians hand to hand.

Atter a bit Ah begun to notice some o' de details—such as de man with de drums. He had two sort o' kettles an' peared to be havin' trouble with 'em. He'd crouch down back o' de music stand, watchin' de leader like he spected him to heave a brick any time; den, with a flourish o' de drumstick, he'd fetch one kettle a good lick, an' den jump on it like he feared it'd git away from him. Sometimes he'd touch 'em up real soft—fust one an' den de other—like he was tryin' to make up; but he'd always lose his temper in de end an' begin to beat de stuffin' outer 'em ag'in.

Ah got to watchin' de rest o' de players; an' dey 'peared to be divided up inter teams. One team would play like fury fo' a minute an' den chop off—spang!—with a jolt; an' den one o' de other teams would try an' snatch it up without spillin' any crumbs. Dey'd toss it back an fo'th data-away by de hour, with de leader actin' as umpire an' watchin' like a hen hawk fo' de least slip.

Dat appeared to be de main game.

Atter a pause a fine lady come out an' started to sing. At fust she seem' to be splainin' 'bout de matter—an' pleadin'; but, though Ah listened close, Ah couldn't ketch de drift. 'Long 'bout de middle she loose off a high piercin' yowl, an' Ah suttinly thought de man back o' her must 'a' jabbed her with a pin, or de like; but she quiet' down right away an didn't pull no razah nor nothin', so Ah s'pose Ah must 'a' been mistaken. Prob'ly she done it fo' fun, or else to 'tract attention.

Soon atter dat she commenced de sweetes', saddes', softes' li'l' tune Ah ever heered, an' Ah mighty nigh forgot all 'bout de theater an' de audience an' mase'f, an' de whole world, till Ah felt a stingin' in ma nose. An'—blame me, Mistah Banks—if Ah didn't find Ol' Uncle Jed with tears in de eyes!

Yassah; dat lady wus surely a sweet singah—if only de band hadn't kept a-bustin' in like as if dey wus jealous. An' Ah suttinly would like to hear her in a rendition of Ol' Black Joe.

Well, suh, de business come to de end at las', an' we all rode home in dat fine machine. On de way Ah axed Mistah Jackson why dey called dat band a Sympathy Ochestra. He give a long disputation on de subject; but, whut with de whirrin' o' de machine an' Mistah Jackson talkin' from de back seat, Ah didn't rightly git de idea.

Maybe dey has sympathy—fo' dey kin, like as not, an' fo' dey close friends. As fo' mase'f, Ah couldn't locate no sympathy 'bout 'em—anyhow, not fo' de audience.

TRIBUNE, PROVIDENCE, FEBRUARY 23,

EVENTS SCHEDULED AHEAD.

Excellent Program is Offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On account of the revised federal laws for taxation on amusements which exempt Symphony concerts, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to offer pro rata and tax free, subscription seats for the remainder of the season in Boston, giving the buyer the option of retaining his seat for next season.

The opportunity is made especially tempting by the nature of the ten pairs of concerts to come. Besides Mr. de Gorgorza this week (a baritone at the concerts is a rare event) the following soloists are engaged: Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist, Harold Bauer, the great pianist, Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist; Raoul Laparra, the Spanish composer-pianist, who is to play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday," and Miss Sophie Braslau, the much favored contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Co. Also, those who admire Mr. Rabaud's taste in introducing French music will be interested in two choral works which are under preparation, Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a women's chorus of "sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have been obtained from France.

FREDERIC FRADKIN
Of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Soloist at the March 11 at a Concert in Infantry Hall.

that the New York public alone paid $25,680 to hear three of his recitals last season, and the record of box office receipts at the Hofmann concerts for several years past has been the public's endorsement of his acknowledged supremacy.

This season's concerts include a tour to the Pacific Coast as well as constant engagements throughout the East and Middle West. As always, Mr. Hofmann will be heard with the leading orchestras, the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, Philadelphia Symphony and Chicago Symphony.

Mr. Hofmann will play the following program on Sunday next:

Sonata Appasionata — Allegro assai, Andante con moto, Allegro ma non troppo, Beethoven; Alceste, Gluck-Saint-Saens; Chorus of the Dervishes, Beethoven-Saint-Saens; Nocturns in C minor, Valse in A flat major, Prelude in D flat major, Etude in G flat major, Scherzo in C Sharp minor, Chopin; Poeme, Scriabine; Polichinelle, Rachmaninoff; Reverie du Soir, Tschaikowsky; Venezia e Napoli, Liszt.

FRADKIN COMING WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The new American concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Frederic Fradkin, is to be the soloist at the last concert but one in Infantry Hall on March 11, playing Mendelssohn's perennial violin concerto.

Any trace of the august and pompous bearing which attaches to the typical concertmaster would be hard indeed to find in Mr. Fradkin. His outstanding traits are unaffected exuberance and youthful vitality. For he is only 26, and the youngest concertmaster the orchestra has had since Franz Kneisel held the post in his early days, now remote.

Mr. Fradkin was born of Russian parents in Troy, New York, studied in Paris and has played everywhere. He was the first American violinist to win a grand prize at the Paris Conservatoire, and the French Government presented him with a fine instrument in appreciation of the event, and his remarkable playing. After a long European success as concertmaster and soloist both, he came to this country with the Russian Ballet in 1915 and toured with them as concertmaster.

Recently Mr. Fradkin appeared in Philadelphia as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the big Mendelssohn concerto which it is hoped he will play here. Of his playing of this concerto the following from well known music critics was published in leading newspapers:

"Frederic Fradkin made a great impression, and one that was rather a surprise. Occupying his chair during the symphony and doing some notably beautiful rhythmic work in the scherzo, he stepped forth a stranger and ended a friend of all who enjoy really fine violin playing coupled with an entire absence of pose. He was delightfully ingenuous and engaging and revealed himself artistically, as the peer of any of the well known players. The great charm of his playing lies in a rather delicate, sweet tone, fine style and a technique that can grow to such spread that it fairly flies. The final movement of the concerto, with its intricate staccato passages, was a dream of light, fairy-like playing.

"Again Mr. Fradkin was loudly applauded for his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto. He took the first movement and the finale at a very rapid pace; so rapid that some questioned it; but his performance was so clear and so musical that swiftness was welcome. Furthermore, the composer gave the indication Allegro molto vivace for the finale. He marked the first movement 'with great passion,' but Mendelssohn in a passionate mood was an inherently amiable person—amiable except when other living composers were concerned—churning himself deliberately into frenzy."

REPUBLICAN
ress Springfield, Mass.

SYMPHONY'S CONDUCTOR

BOSTON LEADER DISCUSSED

Will M Rabaud Remain Another Year?—The Type of Conductor Some Might Prefer

Discussion regarding the choice of next year's conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is current in Boston. What is behind it all? Is there a hunt for a conductor of the prima donna type? Is the orchestra losing popularity in its home city? If so there is only one conclusion: It is to good for Boston. Surely it has no materially lost in social prestige because it is no longer backed by Ma Higginson.

In the Herald Philip Hale writes:—

"The question has been raised: 'Wh will be the conductor of the Bosto Symphony orchestra next season?'

"This question should be answere publicly as soon as possible by th trustees of the orchestra, if they wis the confidence and the financial su port of those interested in music a those possessed with civic pride. Th answer is easy: that is, if Mr Raba will accept a second term.

"Mr Rabaud has shown himself accomplished musician. This was e pected, for he was known here as composer before he visited Boston. is now recognized here, in other Am ican cities, as in those of Europe, as admirable conductor. His sensiti refined, poetic nature has been vealed through his interpretation orchestra compositions; furtherm when the music made the demand, has shown compelling virility—with the taint of coarseness—dash amazing brilliance. Catholic in selection of programs, he is the sy pathetic intepreter of the vari schools, ancient and modern. No c ductor in the past years of this chestra has equaled him in his re ing of Beethoven and Bach; while modern romanticists and the meml of the ultra-modern French sc have found in him an appreciat imaginative soul. Respected, adm as conductor and man by the diences, he is held in affectionate gard by the players, who gladly and second him.

"To make a change would be fo the change might be disastrous. is there to fill his place?

"Mr Rabaud was not anxious leave Paris. No Parisian leaves city without a sigh. He came he a representative of French musical also as a patriot grateful to this c try, encouraged, if not urged, by government; not as one lured American dollars. France could have sent a more worthy and in tiating representative. Having rec from her the highest honors she award a musician, he is here, a brated composer, a conductor of first rank, a man of pure artistic poses, a gentleman in the old and significant meaning of the word.

What a "Genius" Might D

In the Transcript, Mr P says:—

"If the trustees of the ban secure a conductor of larger ab more impressive personality, vivid reputation than Mr Rabaud by all means the audiences a symphony concerts here and else deserve to have him and for a of years. If, on the other hand such is obtainable, there is soun son for the continuance of M baud in his present post. Indi by individual, choir by choir, the quality of the orchestra is as high as i ever was, probably higher.

"By so much the trustees and the management have indeed wrought well. Being, however, a recently constituted band, it needs to be assimilated, unified, polished into a sure and sensitive instrument to the conductor's band. The hundred men within it must come, likewise, to know and feel themselves in a common work. Not in weeks or in months are these desirable ends gained, but in season upon season of association, mutual understanding and ambition.

"Only the exceptional 'genius,' not easy to descry in the offing, is likely, for example, to better the relatively sparse audiences of Saturday evenings. Comparatively new habits of life as well as degree of musical curiosity and satisfaction have altered them, perhaps permanently. Indeed, the whole subscription to the concerts of the symphony orchestra both at home and abroad, was made last autumn under exceptional conditions that give little or no clew to the response of the public next year when war-time economies and preoccupations have receded into a dimmer distance, when the quality of the orchestra and the quality of the conductor—should Mr Rabaud continue—are better and more widely understood. Such condition is difficult for trustees and guarantors who would discern the future, but there is no altering it or the risk of it. Perhaps, therefore, the keener the search for the 'genius.'

"It is too early to say what direction Mr Rabaud's programs would take in the long run. For the present they move in a Franco-German grove, comfortable to most in his audiences; while within that groove they tend to be 'classic.' An ardent modernist, like Mr Monteux or Mr Rhene-Baton, would more please the youngsters—and distinctively overtax the elders. As for the 'genius,' sought in the offing, he could probably make his programs what he chose and satisfy his hearers. For good or ill, he would count with them above both orchestra and music."

SYMPHONY IS TAX EXEMPT

Ticket Holders Will Reap Benefit of New Law Now Ready to Be Signed

TEN MORE CONCERTS OFFER BIG FEATURES

When President Wilson returns to the White House next week, one of his first official duties will be to sign the new revenue law which contains a clause of special interest to patrons of symphony concerts. The new law proposes to exempt symphony orchestras, (which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable.

Last autumn, when the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were placed on sale, it was proposed to tax all concerts at the rate of 20 per cent. This proposal, with the epidemic which postponed the opening of the symphony season, caused many former patrons of the orchestra to relinquish their seats in the interest of economy.

Made a Departure

The management made a departure from earlier seasons by continuing to offer tickets for the remainder of the season at a pro rata basis. This offer has been taken advantage of by many. It is now especially attractive, because of the prospect of no further taxes on admission to these concerts, though the date of the application of the new law is not yet fixed.

Only 10 pairs of symphony concerts remain. The opportunity to subscribe at this time is made the more tempting by the special nature of the 10 pairs of concerts to come. Tomorrow and Saturday Emilio De Gogorza, the Spanish singer, will make his first appearance with the orchestra. For two programs in the concerts to follow two interesting choral works are under preparation. Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a femal chorus for "Sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be a quartet, including Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Many Great Soloists

Soloists of other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first violoncellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, Jacques Thibaud, Raoul Laparra, Spanish composer-pianist, who will play a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday," and Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Also, from the purely orchestral point of view, these concerts should be the finest of the season. The gradual moulding of the orchestra under the alert and exacting ear of their leader has been a matter of general comment. Furthermore, as indicated by the consensus of critical opinion in the various cities visited, appreciation is now no less established of Mr. Rabaud's success in the making of interesting and beautiful programs.

Those who take advantage of this opportunity to become subscribers will be granted every privilege, including that of retaining their seats for next fall.

PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 1919

105

Uncle Jed, Caddie Master

HE ATTENDS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

By Joseph Chapman

EVENIN', Mistah Banks—evenin', suh. Yassuh; Ah think de shower is 'bout ovah, suh. If you-all wait a minute you is bound to git yo' match.

Well, suh, Ah had de most curious experience last evenin'; an' Ah doan' know zackly whut to think—same as a man dat's been hit by a golf ball on de loose, an' can't figure whether he is glad 'cause he ain't dead or mad 'cause his hat got spoiled.

It start' off yesterday 'bout sundown, when Mistah Jackson was a-payin' off his caddie, an' look' up all of a sudden an' say: "Jed, Ah got a extry ticket to de concert to-night—de Sympathy Ochestra. It belong' to ma missus; but she is on a unexpected visit to her kin. How'd you-all like to go?"

Well, suh, music is jest de same to me as cream to a stray alley cat; an' Ah say: "Mistah Jackson, suh, you come nigh to undermannin' me with such a temptin' prospectus; an' indeed Ah'd be most highly honored to 'company you-all to de musicale." An' we 'range to meet at his house an ride down in his fine motor cah.

He fix me up with a big segah on de front seat 'longside de drivah, who was a white man. Ah did ma best to socialize with dat chofer; but Ah didn't make no real headway, 'cause it 'peared like he wuz sore 'bout somepin. It pass ma mind dat maybe his missus had ben treatin' him to de curry-comb; an' atter dat Ah give him ma silent sympathy an' we git 'long fust-class.

Bimeby we git to de theater; an' Mistah Jackson go to de box office an' swap his tickets for two at de top, splainin' dat de music riz up—same as a goff ball hit with a mashie—an' de people in de pit miss de best effect. He hustle me through de marble-an'-gold hall with de lights a-shinin' like diamonds—sayin' dat we is late—an up some stairs, an' up some mo' stairs; an' den up some mo' stairs, till Ah feel like Ise jest one big heart a-beatin'. An' den we climb down a steep bank to de seats.

Well, suh, de position seem' so ticklish Ah ain't had a chance to look round till Ah git set; an' den Ah look over de edge, an'—pow!—ma stomach done a sure-enough buck-an'-wing. 'Way down 'bout as far as de prospective wus a big lot o' people, an' all round in de balconies wus a lot mo'—fine high-up-lookin' people, actin' jest as ca'm an' natural as if dey wus settin' in a funeral. An' 'bout as far off as de reach of a drivin' iron, through a arch de size o' de gateway inter de Promised Land, wus a stage as big as de Town Square.

Ise accustomed to attend de Luxury Movin'-Picture Theater near ma home; but—my land, Mistah Banks—you could put de whole Luxury in dat opery house an' you would hatter tie a string to it an' keep holt o' de end if you wanted to find it ag'in.

On de stage dey wus a bank o' chairs 'ranged like a hoss-shoe, an' a li'l' stand at de front in de middle, with a railin' round it. Dat stand an' dat railin' intensified me—bein' like de stand at de County Fair where dey exhibit de prize squash; an' Ah wuz wonderin' whut dey wus gonna show off on dis one an' whut de railin' was fixed fo' to pen up. On de chairs was a lot o' musicians, an' mo' kinds o' instruments dan Ah knowed dere really wuz.

In front wus de fiddles an' 'way back wus mo' fiddles; but dey wus older lookin' an' so big dat de men had to stand 'em on de floor. An' at de very back wus de oldes' an bigges' fiddles o' de lot—balky an' mean lookin', so dat de men managin' 'em had to stand up an' drive 'em on de bit de whole time.

Ah see a lot o' horns an' drums an' flutes, an' one contraption like a bean pole, with a crooked twig comin' out de side dat de man put in his mouf. Ah ax Mistah Jackson whut dat wus, an' he whisper somepin soundin' like bassoon. Dis s'prise me, 'cause Ah always thought dat wus some kind of a animal.

Right soon de people begun clappin', an' a man come out an' mount de stand. Ah look him over careful, but Ah doan' see nothin' pertickilar 'bout him. He wave a li'l' stick an' we all riz up; an' dat band sail inter "Oh, say, can you see——" An'—my land!—Mistah Banks, dat wus some band! Dey fill dat place so full o' harmony it seem' like somepin gotta crack, an' Ah feel de chills round ma backbone like de hands of a pickpocket in a crowd tryin' to locate de lucre.

Atter dat dey settle down to de real business o' de evenin'; an'—fo' a fact, Mistah Banks—dere wus some curious doin's.

Fust, de man on de stand, de leader dey call' him—he seem' to me mo' like de follower, 'cause he's always atter 'em so hard—fust, de leader hold up de li'l' stick an' dey all git quiet like dey wuz awaitin' fo' somepin to happen. An'—'deed indeed—it happened! Dey wus de mos' awful bust o' noise dat ever ketch me head-on in de countenance, comin' a mile a minute, an' it like to raise me clean outen de seat. Dis kept up fo' a minute, with de leader actin' like a crazy man an' all de musicians weavin' an' wreathin' like a passel o' niggahs gittin' religion; an' den—bam!—it stop' jest as solid as bangin' shut de lid o' de cedar chest on a cat fight goin' on in de in'ards.

Right away a sound come along as if dey wus a jenny wren fussin' over de lack o' buildin' materials, an' den one o' de men with de horns woke up an' squelched dat with a blast dat would 'a' made de Angel Gabriel feel like a peacock in de moltin' season.

Den dey all got more er less busy an' seem' to be playin' some kind of a game, with de leader chidin' 'em an wavin' his [illegible]lick an' shakin' his fist at' em every minute; an' Ah began to realize de usefulness o' de railin' dat kep' him in place. If it hadn't been fo' dat, dere wus a lot o' times durin' de evenin' when he would 'mos' surely tore loose an' gone at some o' de musicians hand to hand.

Atter a bit Ah begun to notice some o' de details—such as de man with de drums. He had two sort o' kettles an' peared to be havin' trouble with 'em. He'd crouch down back o' de music stand, watchin' de leader like he spected him to heave a brick any time; den, with a flourish o' de drumstick, he'd fetch one kettle a good lick, an' den jump on it like he feared it'd git away from him. Sometimes he'd touch 'em up real soft—fust one an' den de other—like he was tryin' to make up; but he'd always lose his temper in de end an' begin to beat de stuffin' outer 'em ag'in.

Ah got to watchin' de rest o' de players; an' dey 'peared to be divided up inter teams. One team would play like fury fo' a minute an' den chop off—spang!—with a jolt; an' den one o' de other teams would try an' snatch it up without spillin' any crumbs. Dey'd toss it back an fo'th data-away by de hour, with de leader actin' as umpire an' watchin' like a hen hawk fo' de least slip.

Dat appeared to be de main game.

Atter a pause a fine lady come out an' started to sing. At fust she seem' to be splainin' 'bout de matter—an' pleadin'; but, though Ah listened close, Ah couldn't ketch de drift. 'Long 'bout de middle she loose off a high piercin' yowl, an' Ah suttinly thought de man back o' her must 'a' jabbed her with a pin, or de like; but she quiet' down right away an didn't pull no razah nor nothin', so Ah s'pose Ah must 'a' been mistaken. Prob'ly she done it fo' fun, or else to 'tract attention.

Soon atter dat she commenced de sweetes', saddes', softes' li'l' tune Ah ever heered, an' Ah mighty nigh forgot all 'bout de theater an' de audience an' mase'f, an' de whole world, till Ah felt a stingin' in ma nose. An'—blame me, Mistah Banks—if Ah didn't find Ol' Uncle Jed with tears in de eyes!

Yassah; dat lady wus surely a sweet singah—if only de band hadn't kept a-bustin' in like as if dey wus jealous. An' Ah suttinly would like to hear her in a rendition of Ol' Black Joe.

Well, suh, de business come to de end at las', an' we all rode home in dat fine machine. On de way Ah axed Mistah Jackson why dey called dat band a Sympathy Ochestra. He give a long disputation on de subject; but, whut with de whirrin' o' de machine an' Mistah Jackson talkin' from de back seat, Ah didn't rightly git de idea.

Maybe dey has sympathy—fo' dey kin, like as not, an' fo' dey close friends. As fo' mase'f, Ah couldn't locate no sympathy 'bout 'em—anyhow, not fo' de audience.

REPUBLICAN
ress Springfield, Mass.

SYMPHONY'S CONDUCTOR

BOSTON LEADER DISCUSSEL

Will M Rabaud Remain Another Year?—The Type of Conductor Some Might Prefer

Discussion regarding the choice of next year's conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is current in Boston. What is behind it all? Is there a hunt for a conductor of the prima donna type? Is the orchestra losing popularity in its home city? If so there is only one conclusion: It is to good for Boston. Surely it has no materially lost in social prestige be cause it is no longer backed by Ma Higginson.

In the Herald Philip Hale writes:—

"The question has been raised: 'Wh will be the conductor of the Bosto Symphony orchestra next season?'

"This question should be answere publicly as soon as possible by th trustees of the orchestra, if they wis the confidence and the financial su port of those interested in music a those possessed with civic pride. Th answer is easy: that is, if Mr Raba will accept a second term.

"Mr Rabaud has shown himself accomplished musician. This was e pected, for he was known here as composer before he visited Boston. is now recognized here, in other Am ican cities, as in those of Europe, as admirable conductor. His sensiti refined, poetic nature has been vealed through his interpretation orchestra compositions; furthermo when the music made the demand, has shown compelling virility—with the taint of coarseness—dash amazing brilliance. Catholic in selection of programs, he is the sy pathetic intepreter of the vari schools, ancient and modern. No c ductor in the past years of this chestra has equaled him in his re ing of Beethoven and Bach; while modern romanticists and the meml of the ultra-modern French sc have found in him an appreciat imaginative soul. Respected, adm as conductor and man by the diences, he is held in affectionate gard by the players, who gladly and second him.

"To make a change would be fo the change might be disastrous. is there to fill his place?

"Mr Rabaud was not anxious leave Paris. No Parisian leaves city without a sigh. He came he a representative of French musical also as a patriot grateful to this c try, encouraged, if not urged, by government; not as one lured American dollars. France could have sent a more worthy and in tiating representative. Having rec from her the highest honors she award a musician, he is here, a brated composer, a conductor of first rank, a man of pure artistic poses, a gentleman in the old and significant meaning of the word.

What a "Genius" Might D

In the Transcript, Mr P says:—

"If the trustees of the band secure a conductor of larger ab more impressive personality, vivid reputation than Mr Rabaud by all means the audiences a symphony concerts here and else deserve to have him and for a of years. If, on the other hand such is obtainable, there is soun son for the continuance of M baud in his present post. Indi by individual, choir by choir, the quality of the orchestra is as high as i ever was, probably higher.

"By so much the trustees and the management have indeed wrought well. Being, however, a recently constituted band, it needs to be assimilated, unified, polished into a sure and sensitive instrument to the conductor's band. The hundred men within it must come, likewise, to know and feel themselves in a common work. Not in weeks or in months are these desirable ends gained, but in season upon season of association, mutual understanding and ambition.

"Only the exceptional 'genius,' not easy to descry in the offing, is likely, for example, to better the relatively sparse audiences of Saturday evenings. Comparatively new habits of life as well as degree of musical curiosity and satisfaction have altered them, perhaps permanently. Indeed, the whole subscription to the concerts of the symphony orchestra both at home and abroad, was made last autumn under exceptional conditions that give little or no clew to the response of the public next year when war-time economies and preoccupations have receded into a dimmer distance, when the quality of the orchestra and the quality of the conductor—should Mr Rabaud continue—are better and more widely understood. Such condition is difficult for trustees and guarantors who would discern the future, but there is no altering it or the risk of it. Perhaps, therefore, the keener the search for the 'genius.'

"It is too early to say what direction Mr Rabaud's programs would take in the long run. For the present they move in a Franco-German grove, comfortable to most in his audiences; while within that groove they tend to be 'classic.' An ardent modernist, like Mr Monteux or Mr Rhene-Baton, would more please the youngsters—and distinctively overtax the elders. As for the 'genius,' sought in the offing, he could probably make his programs what he chose and satisfy his hearers. For good or ill, he would count with them above both orchestra and music."

SYMPHONY IS TAX EXEMPT

Ticket Holders Will Reap Benefit of New Law Now Ready to Be Signed

TEN MORE CONCERTS OFFER BIG FEATURES

When President Wilson returns to the White House next week, one of his first official duties will be to sign the new revenue law which contains a clause of special interest to patrons of symphony concerts. The new law proposes to exempt symphony orchestras, (which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable.

Last autumn, when the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were placed on sale, it was proposed to tax all concerts at the rate of 20 per cent. This proposal, with the epidemic which postponed the opening of the symphony season, caused many former patrons of the orchestra to relinquish their seats in the interest of economy.

Made a Departure

The management made a departure from earlier seasons by continuing to offer tickets for the remainder of the season at a pro rata basis. This offer has been taken advantage of by many. It is now especially attractive, because of the prospect of no further taxes on admission to these concerts, though the date of the application of the new law is not yet fixed.

Only 10 pairs of symphony concerts remain. The opportunity to subscribe at this time is made the more tempting by the special nature of the 10 pairs of concerts to come. Tomorrow and Saturday Emilio De Gogorza, the Spanish singer, will make his first appearance with the orchestra. For two programs in the concerts to follow two interesting choral works are under preparation—Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a femal chorus for "Sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be a quartet, including Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Many Great Soloists

Soloists of other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first violoncellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, Jacques Thibaud, Raoul Laparra, Spanish composer-pianist, who will play a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday," and Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Also, from the purely orchestral point of view, these concerts should be the finest of the season. The gradual moulding of the orchestra under the alert and exacting ear of their leader has been a matter of general comment. Furthermore, as indicated by the consensus of critical opinion in the various cities visited, appreciation is now no less established of Mr. Rabaud's success in the making of interesting and beautiful programs.

Those who take advantage of this opportunity to become subscribers will be granted every privilege, including that of retaining their seats for next fall.

EVENTS SCHEDULED AHEAD.

Excellent Program is Offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On account of the revised federal laws for taxation on amusements which exempt Symphony concerts, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to offer pro rata and tax free, subscription seats for the remainder of the season in Boston, giving the buyer the option of retaining his seat for next season.

The opportunity is made especially tempting by the nature of the ten pairs of concerts to come. Besides Mr. De Gorgorza this week (a baritone at the concerts is a rare event) the following soloists are engaged: Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist, Harold Bauer, the great pianist, Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist; Raoul Laparra, the Spanish composer-pianist, who is to play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday," and Miss Sophie Braslau, the much favored contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Co. Also, those who admire Mr. Rabaud's taste in introducing French music will be interested in two choral works which are under preparation, Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a women's chorus of "sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have been obtained from France.

TRIBUNE, PROVIDENCE, FEBRUARY 23,

FREDERIC FRADKIN
Of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Soloist at the March 11 at a Concert in Infantry Hall.

that the New York public alone paid $25,680 to hear three of his recitals last season, and the record of box office receipts at the Hofmann concerts for several years past has been the public's endorsement of his acknowledged supremacy.

This season's concerts include a tour to the Pacific Coast as well as constant engagements throughout the East and Middle West. As always, Mr. Hofmann will be heard with the leading orchestras, the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, Philadelphia Symphony and Chicago Symphony.

Mr. Hofmann will play the following program on Sunday next:

Sonata Appasionata — Allegro assai, Andante con moto, Allegro ma non troppo, Beethoven; Alceste, Gluck-Saint-Saens; Chorus of the Dervishes, Beethoven-Saint-Saens; Nocturns in C minor, Valse in A flat major, Prelude in D flat major, Etude in G flat major, Scherzo in C Sharp minor, Chopin; Poeme, Scriabine; Polichinelle, Rachmaninoff; Reverie du Soir, Tschaikowsky; Venezia e Napoli, Liszt.

FRADKIN COMING WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The new American concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Frederic Fradkin, is to be the soloist at the last concert but one in Infantry Hall on March 11, playing Mendelssohn's perennial violin concerto.

Any trace of the august and pompous bearing which attaches to the typical concertmaster would be hard indeed to find in Mr. Fradkin. His outstanding traits are unaffected exuberance and youthful vitality. For he is only 26, and the youngest concertmaster the orchestra has had since Franz Kneisel held the post in his early days, now remote.

Mr. Fradkin was born of Russian parents in Troy, New York, studied in Paris and has played everywhere. He was the first American violinist to win a grand prize at the Paris Conservatoire, and the French Government presented him with a fine instrument in appreciation of the event, and his remarkable playing. After a long European success as concertmaster and soloist both, he came to this country with the Russian Ballet in 1915 and toured with them as concertmaster.

Recently Mr. Fradkin appeared in Philadelphia as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the big Mendelssohn concerto which it is hoped he will play here. Of his playing of this concerto the following from well known music critics was published in leading newspapers:

"Frederic Fradkin made a great impression, and one that was rather a surprise. Occupying his chair during the symphony and doing some notably beautiful rhythmic work in the scherzo, he stepped forth a stranger and ended a friend of all who enjoy really fine violin playing coupled with an entire absence of pose. He was delightfully ingenuous and engaging and revealed himself artistically, as the peer of any of the well known players. The great charm of his playing lies in a rather delicate, sweet tone, fine style and a technique that can grow to such spread that it fairly flies. The final movement of the concerto, with its intricate staccato passages, was a dream of light, fairy-like playing.

"Again Mr. Fradkin was loudly applauded for his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto. He took the first movement and the finale at a very rapid pace; so rapid that some questioned it; but his performance was so clear and so musical that swiftness was welcome. Furthermore, the composer gave the indication Allegro molto vivace for the finale. He marked the first movement 'with great passion,' but Mendelssohn in a passionate mood was an inherently amiable person—amiable except when other living composers were concerned—churning himself deliberately into frenzy."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
FEB 1919

105

Uncle Jed, Caddie Master

HE ATTENDS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

By Joseph Chapman

EVENIN', Mistah Banks—evenin', suh. Yassuh; Ah think de shower is 'bout ovah, suh. If you-all wait a minute you is bound to git yo' match.

Well, suh, Ah had de most curious experience last evenin'; an' Ah doan' know zackly whut to think—same as a man dat's been hit by a golf ball on de loose, an' can't figure whether he is glad 'cause he ain't dead or mad 'cause his hat got spoiled.

It start' off yesterday 'bout sundown, when Mistah Jackson was a-payin' off his caddie, an' look' up all of a sudden an' say: "Jed, Ah got a extry ticket to de concert to-night—de Sympathy Ochestra. It belong' to ma missus; but she is on a unexpected visit to her kin. How'd you-all like to go?"

Well, suh, music is jest de same to me as cream to a stray alley cat; an' Ah say: "Mistah Jackson, suh, you come nigh to undermannin' me with such a temptin' prospectus; an' indeed Ah'd be most highly honored to 'company you-all to de musicale." An' we 'range to meet at his house an ride down in his fine motor cah.

He fix me up with a big segah on de front seat 'longside de drivah, who was a white man. Ah did ma best to socialize with dat chofer; but Ah didn't make no real headway, 'cause it 'peared like he wuz sore 'bout somepin. It pass ma mind dat maybe his missus had ben treatin' him to de curry-comb; an' atter dat Ah give him ma silent sympathy an' we git 'long fust-class.

Bimeby we git to de theater; an' Mistah Jackson go to de box office an' swap his tickets for two at de top, splainin' dat de music riz up—same as a goff ball hit with a mashie—an' de people in de pit miss de best effect. He hustle me through de marble-an'-gold hall with de lights a-shinin' like diamonds—sayin' dat we is late—an up some stairs, an' up some mo' stairs; an' den up some mo' stairs, till Ah feel like Ise jest one big heart a-beatin'. An' den we climb down a steep bank to de seats.

Well, suh, de position seem' so ticklish Ah ain't had a chance to look round till Ah git set; an' den Ah look over de edge, an'—pow!—ma stomach done a sure-enough buck-an'-wing. 'Way down 'bout as far as de prospective wus a big lot o' people, an' all round in de balconies wus a lot mo'—fine high-up-lookin' people, actin' jest as ca'm an' natural as if dey wus settin' in a funeral. An' 'bout as far off as de reach of a drivin' iron, through a arch de size o' de gateway inter de Promised Land, wus a stage as big as de Town Square.

Ise accustomed to attend de Luxury Movin'-Picture Theater near ma home; but—my land, Mistah Banks—you could put de whole Luxury in dat opery house an' you would hatter tie a string to it an' keep holt o' de end if you wanted to find it ag'in.

On de stage dey wus a bank o' chairs 'ranged like a hoss-shoe, an' a li'l' stand at de front in de middle, with a railin' round it. Dat stand an' dat railin' intensified me—bein' like de stand at de County Fair where dey exhibit de prize squash; an' Ah wuz wonderin' whut dey wus gonna show off on dis one an' whut de railin' was fixed fo' to pen up. On de chairs was a lot o' musicians, an' mo' kinds o' instruments dan Ah knowed dere really wuz.

In front wus de fiddles an' 'way back wus mo' fiddles; but dey wus older lookin' an' so big dat de men had to stand 'em on de floor. An' at de very back wus de oldes' an bigges' fiddles o' de lot—balky an' mean lookin', so dat de men managin' 'em had to stand up an' drive 'em on de bit de whole time.

Ah see a lot o' horns an' drums an' flutes, an' one contraption like a bean pole, with a crooked twig comin' out de side dat de man put in his mouf. Ah ax Mistah Jackson whut dat wus, an' he whisper somepin soundin' like bassoon. Dis s'prise me, 'cause Ah always thought dat wus some kind of a animal.

Right soon de people begun clappin', an' a man come out an' mount de stand. Ah look him over careful, but Ah doan' see nothin' pertickilar 'bout him. He wave a li'l' stick an' we all riz up; an' dat band sail inter "Oh, say, can you see——" An'—my land!—Mistah Banks, dat wus some band! Dey fill dat place so full o' harmony it seem' like somepin gotta crack, an' Ah feel de chills round ma backbone like de hands of a pickpocket in a crowd tryin' to locate de lucre.

Atter dat dey settle down to de real business o' de evenin'; an'—fo' a fact, Mistah Banks—dere wus some curious doin's.

Fust, de man on de stand, de leader dey call' him—he seem' to me mo' like de follower, 'cause he's always atter 'em so hard—fust, de leader hold up de li'l' stick an' dey all git quiet like dey wuz awaitin' fo' somepin to happen. An'—'deed indeed—it happened! Dey wus de mos' awful bust o' noise dat ever ketch me head-on in de countenance, comin' a mile a minute, an' it like to raise me clean outen de seat. Dis kept up fo' a minute, with de leader actin' like a crazy man an' all de musicians weavin' an' wreathin' like a passel o' niggahs gittin' religion; an' den—bam!—it stop' jest as solid as bangin' shut de lid o' de cedar chest on a cat fight goin' on in de in'ards.

Right away a sound come along as if dey wus a jenny wren fussin' over de lack o' buildin' materials, an' den one o' de men with de horns woke up an' squelched dat with a blast dat would 'a' made de Angel Gabriel feel like a peacock in de moltin' season.

Den dey all got more er less busy an' seem' to be playin' some kind of a game, with de leader chidin' 'em an wavin' his [illegible] stick an' shakin' his fist at' em every minute; an' Ah began to realize de usefulness o' de railin' dat kep' him in place. If it hadn't been fo' dat, dere wus a lot o' times durin' de evenin' when he would 'mos' surely tore loose an' gone at some o' de musicians hand to hand.

Atter a bit Ah begun to notice some o' de details—such as de man with de drums. He had two sort o' kettles an' peared to be havin' trouble with 'em. He'd crouch down back o' de music stand, watchin' de leader like he spected him to heave a brick any time; den, with a flourish o' de drumstick, he'd fetch one kettle a good lick, an' den jump on it like he feared it'd git away from him. Sometimes he'd touch 'em up real soft—fust one an' den de other—like he was tryin' to make up; but he'd always lose his temper in de end an' begin to beat de stuffin' outer 'em ag'in.

Ah got to watchin' de rest o' de players; an' dey 'peared to be divided up inter teams. One team would play like fury fo' a minute an' den chop off—spang!—with a jolt; an' den one o' de other teams would try an' snatch it up without spillin' any crumbs. Dey'd toss it back an fo'th data-away by de hour, with de leader actin' as umpire an' watchin' like a hen hawk fo' de least slip.

Dat appeared to be de main game.

Atter a pause a fine lady come out an' started to sing. At fust she seem' to be splainin' 'bout de matter—an' pleadin'; but, though Ah listened close, Ah couldn't ketch de drift. 'Long 'bout de middle she loose off a high piercin' yowl, an' Ah suttinly thought de man back o' her must 'a' jabbed her with a pin, or de like; but she quiet' down right away an didn't pull no razah nor nothin', so Ah s'pose Ah must 'a' been mistaken. Prob'ly she done it fo' fun, or else to 'tract attention.

Soon atter dat she commenced de sweetes', saddes', softes' li'l' tune Ah ever heered, an' Ah mighty nigh forgot all 'bout de theater an' de audience an' mase'f, an' de whole world, till Ah felt a stingin' in ma nose. An'—blame me, Mistah Banks—if Ah didn't find Ol' Uncle Jed with tears in de eyes!

Yassah; dat lady wus surely a sweet singah—if only de band hadn't kept a-bustin' in like as if dey wus jealous. An' Ah suttinly would like to hear her in a rendition of Ol' Black Joe.

Well, suh, de business come to de end at las', an' we all rode home in dat fine machine. On de way Ah axed Mistah Jackson why dey called dat band a Sympathy Ochestra. He give a long disputation on de subject; but, whut with de whirrin' o' de machine an' Mistah Jackson talkin' from de back seat, Ah didn't rightly git de idea.

Maybe dey has sympathy—fo' dey kin, like as not, an' fo' dey close friends. As fo' mase'f, Ah couldn't locate no sympathy 'bout 'em—anyhow, not fo' de audience.

REPUBLICAN
ress Springfield, Mass.

SYMPHONY'S CONDUCTOR

BOSTON LEADER DISCUSSED

Will M Rabaud Remain Another Year?—The Type of Conductor Some Might Prefer

Discussion regarding the choice of next year's conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is current in Boston. What is behind it all? Is there a hunt for a conductor of the prima donna type? Is the orchestra losing popularity in its home city? If so there is only one conclusion: It is to good for Boston. Surely it has not materially lost in social prestige because it is no longer backed by Ma Higginson.

In the Herald Philip Hale writes:—

"The question has been raised: 'Wh will be the conductor of the Bostor Symphony orchestra next season?'

"This question should be answere publicly as soon as possible by th trustees of the orchestra, if they wis the confidence and the financial su port of those interested in music ar those possessed with civic pride. Th answer is easy: that is, if Mr Raba will accept a second term.

"Mr Rabaud has shown himself accomplished musician. This was e pected, for he was known here as composer before he visited Boston. is now recognized here, in other Ame ican cities, as in those of Europe, as admirable conductor. His sensiti refined, poetic nature has been vealed through his interpretation orchestra compositions; furthermo when the music made the demand, has shown compelling virility—with the taint of coarseness—dash amazing brilliance. Catholic in selection of programs, he is the sy pathetic intepreter of the vari schools, ancient and modern. No c ductor in the past years of this chestra has equaled him in his re ing of Beethoven and Bach; while modern romanticists and the meml of the ultra-modern French scl have found in him an appreciat imaginative soul. Respected, adm as conductor and man by the diences, he is held in affectionate gard by the players, who gladly and second him.

"To make a change would be fo the change might be disastrous. is there to fill his place?

"Mr Rabaud was not anxious leave Paris. No Parisian leaves city without a sigh. He came her a representative of French musical also as a patriot grateful to this c try, encouraged, if not urged, by government; not as one lured American dollars. France could have sent a more worthy and in tiating representative. Having rec from her the highest honors she award a musician, he is here, a brated composer, a conductor of first rank, a man of pure artistic poses, a gentleman in the old and significant meaning of the word.

What a "Genius" Might D

In the Transcript, Mr P says:—

"If the trustees of the band secure a conductor of larger ab more impressive personality, vivid reputation than Mr Rabaud by all means the audiences a symphony concerts here and else deserve to have him and for a ten of years. If, on the other hand, non such is obtainable, there is sound rea son for the continuance of Mr Rabaud in his present post. Individual by individual, choir by choir, the quality of the orchestra is as high as i ever was, probably higher.

"By so much the trustees and the management have indeed wrought well. Being, however, a recently constituted band, it needs to be assimilated, unified, polished into a sure and sensitive instrument to the conductor's band. The hundred men within it must come, likewise, to know and feel themselves in a common work. Not in weeks or in months are these desirable ends gained, but in season upon season of association, mutual understanding and ambition.

"Only the exceptional 'genius,' not easy to descry in the offing, is likely, for example, to better the relatively sparse audiences of Saturday evenings. Comparatively new habits of life as well as degree of musical curiosity and satisfaction have altered them, perhaps permanently. Indeed, the whole subscription to the concerts of the symphony orchestra both at home and abroad, was made last autumn under exceptional conditions that give little or no clew to the response of the public next year when war-time economies and preoccupations have receded into a dimmer distance, when the quality of the orchestra and the quality of the conductor—should Mr Rabaud continue—are better and more widely understood. Such condition is difficult for trustees and guarantors who would discern the future, but there is no altering it or the risk of it. Perhaps, therefore, the keener the search for the 'genius.'

"It is too early to say what direction Mr Rabaud's programs would take in the long run. For the present they move in a Franco-German grove, comfortable to most in his audiences; while within that groove they tend to be 'classic.' An ardent modernist, like Mr Monteux or Mr Rhene-Baton, would more please the youngsters—and distinctively overtax the elders. As for the 'genius,' sought in the offing, he could probably make his programs what he chose and satisfy his hearers. For good or ill, he would count with them above both orchestra and music."

SYMPHONY IS TAX EXEMPT

Ticket Holders Will Reap Benefit of New Law Now Ready to Be Signed

TEN MORE CONCERTS OFFER BIG FEATURES

When President Wilson returns to the White House next week, one of his first official duties will be to sign the new revenue law which contains a clause of special interest to patrons of symphony concerts. The new law proposes to exempt symphony orchestras, (which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable.

Last autumn, when the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were placed on sale, it was proposed to tax all concerts at the rate of 20 per cent. This proposal, with the epidemic which postponed the opening of the symphony season, caused many former patrons of the orchestra to relinquish their seats in the interest of economy.

Made a Departure

The management made a departure from earlier seasons by continuing to offer tickets for the remainder of the season at a pro rata basis. This offer has been taken advantage of by many. It is now especially attractive, because of the prospect of no further taxes on admission to these concerts, though the date of the application of the new law is not yet fixed.

Only 10 pairs of symphony concerts remain. The opportunity to subscribe at this time is made the more tempting by the special nature of the 10 pairs of concerts to come. Tomorrow and Saturday Emilio De Gogorza, the Spanish singer, will make his first appearance with the orchestra. For two programs in the concerts to follow two interesting choral works are under preparation—Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a femal chorus for "Sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be a quartet, including Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Many Great Soloists

Soloists of other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first violoncellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, Jacques Thibaud, Raoul Laparra, Spanish composer-pianist, who will play a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday," and Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Also, from the purely orchestral point of view, these concerts should be the finest of the season. The gradual moulding of the orchestra under the alert and exacting ear of their leader has been a matter of general comment. Furthermore, as indicated by the consensus of critical opinion in the various cities visited, appreciation is now no less established of Mr. Rabaud's success in the making of interesting and [illegible] programs.

[illegible] who take advantage of this op[illegible] to become subscribers will be [illegible] every privilege, including that [illegible] their seats for next fall.

EVENTS SCHEDULED AHEAD.

Excellent Program is Offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On account of the revised federal laws for taxation on amusements which exempt Symphony concerts, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be able to offer pro rata and tax free, subscription seats for the remainder of the season in Boston, giving the buyer the option of retaining his seat for next season.

The opportunity is made especially tempting by the nature of the ten pairs of concerts to come. Besides Mr. De Gorgorza this week (a baritone at the concerts is a rare event) the following soloists are engaged: Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist, Harold Bauer, the great pianist, Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist; Raoul Laparra, the Spanish composer-pianist, who is to play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday," and Miss Sophie Braslau, the much favored contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Co. Also, those who admire Mr. Rabaud's taste in introducing French music will be interested in two choral works which are under preparation, Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a women's chorus of "sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have been obtained from France.

TRIBUNE, PROVIDENCE, FEBRUARY 23,

FREDERIC FRADKIN
Of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Soloist at the March 11 at a Concert in Infantry Hall.

that the New York public alone paid $25,680 to hear three of his recitals last season, and the record of box office receipts at the Hofmann concerts for several years past has been the public's endorsement of his acknowledged supremacy.

This season's concerts include a tour to the Pacific Coast as well as constant engagements throughout the East and Middle West. As always, Mr. Hofmann will be heard with the leading orchestras, the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic, New York Symphony, Philadelphia Symphony and Chicago Symphony.

Mr. Hofmann will play the following program on Sunday next:

Sonata Appasionata — Allegro assai, Andante con moto, Allegro ma non troppo, Beethoven; Alceste, Gluck-Saint-Saens; Chorus of the Dervishes, Beethoven-Saint-Saens; Nocturns in C minor, Valse in A flat major, Prelude in D flat major, Etude in G flat major, Scherzo in C Sharp minor, Chopin; Poeme, Scriabine; Polichinelle, Rachmaninoff; Reverie du Soir, Tschaikowsky; Venezia e Napoli, Liszt.

FRADKIN COMING WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The new American concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Frederic Fradkin, is to be the soloist at the last concert but one in Infantry Hall on March 11, playing Mendelssohn's perennial violin concerto.

Any trace of the august and pompous bearing which attaches to the typical concertmaster would be hard indeed to find in Mr. Fradkin. His outstanding traits are unaffected exuberance and youthful vitality. For he is only 26, and the youngest concertmaster the orchestra has had since Franz Kneisel held the post in his early days, now remote.

Mr. Fradkin was born of Russian parents in Troy, New York, studied in Paris and has played everywhere. He was the first American violinist to win a grand prize at the Paris Conservatoire, and the French Government presented him with a fine instrument in appreciation of the event, and his remarkable playing. After a long European success as concertmaster and soloist both, he came to this country with the Russian Ballet in 1915 and toured with them as concertmaster.

Recently Mr. Fradkin appeared in Philadelphia as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the big Mendelssohn concerto which it is hoped he will play here. Of his playing of this concerto the following from well known music critics was published in leading newspapers:

"Frederic Fradkin made a great impression, and one that was rather a surprise. Occupying his chair during the symphony and doing some notably beautiful rhythmic work in the scherzo, he stepped forth a stranger and ended a friend of all who enjoy really fine violin playing coupled with an entire absence of pose. He was delightfully ingenuous and engaging and revealed himself artistically, as the peer of any of the well known players. The great charm of his playing lies in a rather delicate, sweet tone, fine style and a technique that can grow to such spread that it fairly flies. The final movement of the concerto, with its intricate staccato passages, was a dream of light, fairy-like playing.

"Again Mr. Fradkin was loudly applauded for his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto. He took the first movement and the finale at a very rapid pace; so rapid that some questioned it; but his performance was so clear and so musical that swiftness was welcome. Furthermore, the composer gave the indication Allegro molto vivace for the finale. He marked the first movement 'with great passion,' but Mendelssohn in a passionate mood was an inherently amiable person—amiable except when other living composers were concerned—churning himself deliberately into frenzy."

POST, FEBRUARY 23.

Symphony Exempt from Tax

One of President Wilson's first official duties after his landing will be to sign the new revenue law which contains a clause of special interest to patrons of Symphony concerts. The new law proposes to exempt symphony orchestras (which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable).

Last autumn, when the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were placed on sale, the United States was straining every nerve to help win the war, and it was proposed at that time to tax all concerts at the rate of 20 per cent. These things, with the epidemic which postponed the opening of the Symphony season, resulted in many former patrons of the orchestra relinquishing their seats in the interest of economy. The management made a departure from earlier seasons by continuing to offer tickets for the remainder of the season at a pro rata basis. This offer has been taken advantage of by a great many. It is now especially attractive because of the prospect of no further taxes on admisison to these concerts, though the date of the application of the new law is not yet fixed.

Boston's musical season has usually opened with Symphony concerts the middle of October, and closed with the last pair of Symphony concerts the first week in May. The proximity of the close of the present season can best be realized by noting the fact that only ten pairs of Symphony concerts remain. The opportunity to subscribe at this time is made the more tempting by the special nature of the ten pairs of concerts to come.

For two programmes in the concerts to follow two interesting choral works are uuder preparation, Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a woman's chorus of "Sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be a distinguished quartet, including Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, ocntralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Soloists at other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, always a favorite in Boston; Jacques Thibaud, the foremost French violinist; Raoul Laparra, Spanish composer-pianist, who is to play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday"; Miss Sophie Braslau, the rich-voiced young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Also, from the purely orchestral point of view, these concerts should be the finest of the season. The gradual moulding of the orchestra under the alert and exacting ear of their leader, has been a matter of general comment. Furthermore (as indicated by the consensus of critical opinion in the various cities visited) appreciation is now no less established of Mr. Rabaud's success in the making of programmes, which are both interesting and beautiful.

Those who take advantage of this opportunity to become subscribers will be granted every privilege, including that of retaining their seats for next fall.

n REPUBLICAN
dress Springfield, Mass.
te

A Musical Event

The measure of Springfield's eagerness to hear the Boston symphony orchestra in a free concert will be the number of those unable to obtain admission to the Auditorium this afternoon. It has not been often that the Boston symphony orchestra has taken part in an occasion of this kind, or, in fact, appeared at all outside the established series of concerts in Boston and a few of the larger eastern cities; indeed, the public appearances of this great musical organization, one of America's pre-eminent achievements in art, have been governed by laws with the rigidity of those of the Medes and Persians. Possibly the trustees who now control the orchestra are to be less strict than Maj Higginson, whose financial support enabled the organization to grow and perfect itself.

There have been famous conductors in the past. Mr Rabaud, the first Frenchman to hold the position, has won the highest praise in the few weeks since the crchestra became his own, to mold to his own artistic purposes. Beethoven's fifth symphony, which is on the program to-day, he regards as "the summit of music." It was included in the Boston program of Friday afternoon and last night, and Philip Hale, the well-known critic, says that Mr Rabaud's interpretation of the work was remarkably impressive. "We do not remember one that has equaled it in dramatic intensity and nobility," Mr Hale writes.

The managers of the Young Men's Christian course showed commendable initiative in arranging for this visit of the great Boston orchestra, which will bring both musical education and musical pleasure—the two are really synonymous—into the city.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 24

WEEK-END CONCERTS

ASSORTED RUSSIANS AND A FEW AMERICANS

Rameau and Mr. Gilbert Yield Novel Music to the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Rakhmaninov in an Array of Muscovite Pieces for the Piano—Mr. McCormack Cultivates Eighteenth-Century Composers—The Days of the Overlooked

To gather the harvest of concerts between a Friday afternoon and a Monday afternoon, to winnow it when the Saturday, the Sunday and even the Monday have been holidays, is an ungrateful task—a raking or re-raking, to shift the figure, of dead embers. The Symphony Concerts, for example, of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening seem now altogether of the series past and gone—the merits of Mr. de Gogorza's singing almost as remote as those of Mr. Cortot's playing weeks ago, the quality of Mr. Gilbert's Prologue to "Riders of the Sea" as much matter for academic discussion as the worth of Mr. Rabaud's earlier venture with an American composer in Mr. Converse's tone-poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter." Yet a concert-chronicle remains a concert-chronicle, presumably expected by readers, and there is naught for the reviewer to do bu hang as gracefully as he may upon the horns of his dilemma. Suffice it, then, to say, first, that Mr. Rabaud's programme began with Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Ys," and ended with Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," both standard pieces grateful alike to orchestra and audience; that between stood Mr. Gilbert's prologue to Synge's tragedy of Irish agitations the Russian Ballet has firmly fisher-folk, "Riders to the Sea," and a suite of dances from Rameau's eighteenth-century opera, "Hippolytus and Aricia"; and that for further intermezzi Mr. de Gogorza sang an austere air from Gluck's opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," and a more succulent "romance" from Massenet's early opera, "The King of Lahore." Furthermore, whatever the inciting cause—probably it was anticipation, half of the singer and half of "Scheherazade"—the audience on Saturday evening was uncommonly large and vigorously applausive. By every sign, it departed well pleasured.

In performance, Mr. Rabaud succeeded well with the overture to "The King of Ys," romantic, directly melodious, vigorously marching, warmly colored music such as he almost always plays with becoming eloquence. In the martial conclusion, indeed, he and the orchestra let forth a flood of sound such as Symphony Hall has hardly known since the distant day in which Mr. Fiedler carried the prelude to "The Mastersingers" to like exuberant climax and the concert-room rocked with a like answering applause. Whatever the shortcomings of the orchestra on that score in the past, no hearer may now reasonably question its muscularity. Mr. Stransky and the Philharmonic Society of New York must look to their laurels for sheer power. Throughout "Scheherazade," not a few of the virtuosi of the band—Mr. Fradkin among the violins, the wood-wind choir separately and collectively—had rich and diverse opportunity to prove their prowess; while the whole suite was played with the clean-cut line, the bright and incisive rhythm, the glowing warmth of harmonic and instrumental color, the graphic and fantastic quality essential to the music. Whether the listener heard it with memory of the action that for some imaginations the Russian Ballet have firmly fastened upon it or with thought of the programme—far different—that Rimsky-Korsakov devised for it; or with ear only for the suggestion of the play of color, rhythm and the imagination guiding them, "Scheherazade" perennially renews a transparent fascination. In turn, Mr. de Gogorza excelled himself in the suave progressions and the operatic intensities of the air out of Massenet and yet more in the soberer beauty of declamation, the graver and sincerer passion that fills Gluck's music. In the prime of voice and of every power at once ardent and controlled, his audiences applauded him with reason, with elation.

Of the novel pieces, the dances from Rameau's opera gave immediate pleasure. Dr. Muck brought him back, as he had long deserved, to the Symphony Concerts and Mr. Rabaud is as happily disposed to continue him there. After all, the "airs de ballet" of Gluck and, say, Grétry are not the beginning and the end of such eighteenth-century music. Indeed Rameau's dances have a vigor of rhythm, a largeness of line, an energy of motion, commending them to twentieth-century ears above the soft wistfulness of much of Gluck's ballet-music or the surface sprightliness of Grétry's. Moreover, he could command at will, as these very dances proved, the grace and elegance over which his compeers were prone to dally. The vigors of Rameau are the vigors of an enduring vitality. . . . It was pleasure to hear Mr. Gilbert's prologue to Synge's tragedy applauded, to see him receiving rewards coram publico, of which he has had too little in proportion to his deserts and for just encouragement. His music is as brief and concentrated as the play it would preface—music of the sea as relentless and indomitable, as grim and grave as Fate itself; music of the mourning, wild and shrill, of the peasant folk for those whom it has swallowed; music, in a few periods at the end, of the submission of those upon whom the fate of the sea can wreak no more ill. Throughout Mr. Gilbert writes with an exceeding directness of means and expression, in high concentration, with large imagination, above all with that "native wildness" which gives him individuality, which sets him apart from the schools and the product of the schools, which suits him to such matter as "Riders of the Sea," his negro overture, his ballet-pantomime, last winter, of the dances of the blacks of New Orleans. Unmistakably this wildness rings often out of the prologue, even if Mr. Gilbert is less fortunate, sometimes, in his expressive means, than in the moods and images he would have them convey. Almost inevitably this note eluded Mr. Rabaud, as in the ballet at the Opera House last April, it eluded Mr. Monteux. Not for the Parisian conservative or radical, unless he be a very exceptional Parisian, is the wildness of either Gilbert or Synge.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A MANY-TONGUED MISCELLANY OF MUSIC

From the Passionate Franck of "Psyche" to the Smooth Faure of Theatre Pieces — A Misty Fragment of Chabrier's Opera and a Blazing Overture of Berlioz — Mr. Fradkin Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto

Coming expectant to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the audience for the Symphony Concert departed well entertained. Miscellaneous pieces, all but one French, filled the programme: Franck's suite, "Psyche"; Mendelssohn's concerto for violin; a suite drawn by Fauré from his incidental music to a Parisian version of Shakspeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice"; and, as heard at Cambridge the previous evening, the introduction to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival." Only the concerto and the overture were familiar numbers; but the two suites and the operatic fragment were all music quickly pleasuring the ear, easy to comprehend and to feel; while the whole list offered a diversity of voice and mood agreeable to all but the narrow few who dislike too many shiftings of their point of view in the brief space of an hour and fifty minutes. For, like predecessors, Mr. Rabaud seems little by little to be lengthening his programmes. Four months ago he began to make them full, as were his forerunners, of good resolution to be brief. Gradually, however, and no earlier and no later than they, he has discovered that an interestingly coördinated and contrasted programme cannot always be compressed into an arbitrary ninety minutes. Pieces mating well together will stretch into a hundred or even a hundred and ten. The conductor, being an intelligent musician, bows accordingly to artistic self-respect and necessity—the more since the number of the departing dowagers is a relatively fixed quantity.

There was, moreover, plentiful applause to lengthen the concert of Friday—for Mr. Fradkin, leader of the strings, who played the solo part in the violin-concerto, and for Mr. Arthur Hackett, who provided the tenor voice, not off stage, as in the theatre, but visible and audible upon it, that carries two divisions of Fauré's suite. To both the audience was cordial; while, at the end of Franck's suite, its plaudits for both orchestra and conductor were uncommonly hearty. And with reason, since the band played it eloquently, emotionally; while more clearly and pervasively than hitherto Mr. Rabaud asserted his mettle as operatic conductor. The suavities of the orchestra with Fauré's music likewise deserved the plaudits received; while more than once, as at Cambridge, with Berlioz's overture, it struck running fire. Time and again, moreover, notably when Mr. Speyer played the air for English horn in this "Roman Carnival," individual distinctions flecked this supple and eager ensemble. No small betterment is he to the wood-wind choir, not only for his own tone, touch and taste, but also for his stimulating effect upon his fellows. Again the orchestra goes forward.

Mr. Rabaud seemed operatic conductor in Franck's "Psyche," because that music, as the suite of yesterday brings it occasionally back to the concert-hall, is really Franck's opera. His ostensible operas, "Hulda" and "Ghisèle," vanished long since from stage and memory. Le père Franck had scant sense of the theatre in the fashion in which Massenet exemplifies it. As one and another of his settings of The Beatitudes prove, there were limitations to his invention when he would deal dramatically in tones with evil-doers and their works; while even a mechanician of the Parisian opera houses, like the recently departed Monsieur Leroux, would have balked at the fable and texts of "Hulda" and "Ghisèle." In the orchestral parts of "Psyche," in which the original "symphonic poem" for instruments and orchestra now survives, Franck was hampered by no text and need take no thought of necessary or assumed requirement of the theatre. The Grecian fable of the loves of Eros and Psyche was matter to stir his imagination, to set free his half-erotic, half-mystical vein. Evil-doers and evil-doing nowhere intruded. At his ease, as well as enkindled, Franck might write his music of passion, the so-called love-duet of the end of the suite; sound the preparatory voices in the episode of "The Garden of Eros," set down his music of the scene in the division, "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs"; and around "The Slumber of Psyche" inscribe his prologue—and in all four attain a dramatic force, a pictorial illusion sure to evade him in the theatre. Over his shoulder, he could also see and hear "Lohengrin" flourishing there, and it was not desirable that "Lohengrin" should contribute too much, though it does a little, to the mystical union of Eros and Psyche, to her desire to question the mysterious lover.

Yet with due deference to d'Indy to Derepas, to the other commentators who exalt the mystical, the spiritual side of this music of Franck, not to such voice does the ear, hearing in the ways and with the lusts of the flesh, first respond. Franck wastes few measures upon sensuous and colorful tone-picturing of the garden of Eros where Psyche reposes. Clearly it little interested him. Eager was he to "get on" with the love-music that fills the larger part of the third episode and the whole of the fourth. It is a thrilling music, sustaining itself out of itself, warm, rich, incisive, rising and falling, advancing and receding with clear accent of erotic passion. Mystical, if the hearer prefers, but if he has ever happened to peruse some of the memoirs of mystical, visioning and generally overwrought nuns and monks—memoirs that lie thick in many a monastery or convent—he will [illegible] appearing "for the first time" [illegible] certs," sang Zerlina's playfully fondlin "Batti, Batti" from Mozart's opera of Do Juan, Duparc's "Chanson Triste" and a "Chant Indoue" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Sadko." Since nervousness so pinched and dimmed Miss Frank's tones that they were far from their better or ampler selves, it is superfluous to comment upon singing so little indicative of her true abilities. Beside the familiar "Batti, Batti" and the relatively conventional Parisian matter and manner of the sensuous and melancholy "Chanson Triste," the wondrous melody of Rimsky-Korsakov in the "Chant Indoue" shone like a thread of gold—radiant or plaintive, penetrating always, ascendant in unbroken curve yet endlessly modulated, arabesque twined within arabesque, illuding the ear, touching the heart. In the East and not the West, in the Russia that is double door to both, lies the new fount of melody. Our [illegible] skin in voice, be it of word or music, are ecstasies of the flesh and ecstasies of the spirit. True, Franck perceptibly over-writes his erotic music as he does his preluding in "The Slumbers of Psyche." True also, he uses often what is now the familiar a nerve-stimulating procedure of the Wa nerian climax; but nowhere else, outs the more eloquent Beatitudes and symphony, has he written music of su power and passion as these final mo ments of "Psyche."

By conscious or unconscious w Franck, unwilled Franck, there wri music-drama. Of music-drama, too, the brief, beautiful, delicately imagi and subtly accomplished music of zephyrs. It is as though he here achie the lightness and the airiness of mot the gossamer texture, the irridescent g and glow sought but not always ga in the earlier tone-poem, "The Daugh of Æolus." Little music from any pe so tenuous of fabric, yet so luminous impression. The prologue, "The Slum of Psyche," is of Franck more famili voiced. For, in it after necessary meas of preluding and exposition of mot he soon strikes his own particular sounding again and again in his m of wistful longing, rising from res eagerness into sustained aspiration (a the symphony) but here gentler and r melancholy. It is a note easy to pro unduly, a note that quickly irritates tain listening temperaments. Yet in prelude, over-written as it is, it rem a note to awaken responsive mood. Rabaud did well to reassemble and re this suite of "Psyche"; next to Fran symphony and his symphonic variati as the Franckian repertory for orche goes, it is characteristically eloquent of composer. And, as it seemed yesterda quasi-operatic music, Mr. Rabaud open eager, operatic arms.

Whatever the intrinsic merit of Faure incidental music to Haraucourt's "Sh lock," it was good to hear, because n where does it recall the Wagner who h so infected French music of the gener tion Mr. Rabaud seems to love best. (F with Wagner "banned," Wagnerian imit tion is provocative.) Not that the suite of Fauré,, when, as in some of his cham ber music and songs, he is most delica of invention and fancy, most subtle, f licitous and individual of workmanshi Rather the six brief numbers are a we made, well fitting music for the purpo in hand, often agreeable, occasional charming, to hear—work of the day u dertaken on commission and becoming done. If the verses that furnish forth t "chanson" and the "madrigal" for ten voice—both sung by Mr. Hackett somewh wirily and with undistinguished Frenc diction—exemplify Haraucourt's poetry, may little have stimulated Fauré to musi making. It is thirty years since this "Shy lock" lived brief life on the stage the Odéon: it is now as dead, gone and i recoverable as the other contents of th crowded limbo of "failures" in the theatre but there is reason to believe that the pla was as pale, trite and generally mediocr in itself as it is in the reflected lustres o "The Merchant of Venice."

Therefore it is possible only to surmis where in the course of Haraucourt's o Shakspeare's play, this incidental musi sounded. Possibly the "chanson" and th "madrigal," each of which has pleasan archaic flavor, beguiled two choices of th caskets; possibly, the "Epithalme" or ma riage song, crowned the third, though it velvety measures are far enough from Portia's.

You see me, Lord Bassanio, where I stand,
Such as I am:

or his

Only my blood speaks to you in my veins.

Pretty and pulsing, too, is the soft glow o the Nocturne, presumably for Lorenzo an Jessica capping verses and kisses in th moonlit, tremulous garden. There is pom of masque or, may be, "Magnificoes" in th entr'acte; while the final number is gay high-spirited, at moments almost starry music-making. There is no reason at al why a composer, even a Fauré, should not occasionally fill a chocolate-box and let his hearers savor his confectionery.

On the way from Franck, via Chabrier to Fauré, Mr. Fradkin played the violin part in Mendelssohn's fluent, animated, ele gant and often artful concerto, played a became the virtuoso and the musician whose incidental solos in the orchestra o the Russian Ballet recalled and commended him to Bostonian ears when he first came to Symphony Hall last autumn. A little ill at ease at the beginning of the concerto, he seemed to play the superabundant passage-work of this Allegro "Appassionato" precisely, dryly. Once embarked, however, upon the plastic, sparkling, manifold cadenza, upon the suavities and the sentiment of the Andante, upon the flicking and the flashing play of the Rondo, he gave his hearers the pleasure of sure and pliant fingers, sensitive bowing; a tone that mingled fineness, sensibility and propulsive power; animation of rhythm and progress, adept and flowing modulation, bright and changeful color and just perception of Mendelssohnian artifice, elegance and charm. Out of these abilities and this outcome spoke not only the virtuoso of the violin, but a perceiving and transmitting musician, an artist of fine fibre and keen discernment, seeker and attainer of the just, the persuading mean.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 14.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

The Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Rabaud at Cambridge—A Neglected Opportunity with Eighteenth-Century Music—A Tone-Poem by the Conductor, an Interesting Fragment from Chabrier, and a Wondrous Tune by Rimsky-Korsakov—Mme. Frijsh's and Mr. Bauer's Recitals

Like his predecessors in the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud neglects a rare opportunity that its concerts in Cambridge afford, when music of the eighteenth century is n hand. Beside Symphony Hall in Bos tcn or Carnegie Hall in New York, Sanders Theatre is a relatively small and compact auditorium. Being wooden-walled and roofed, it is also an exceptionally resonant and revealing concert-hall. According to the formulæ of acoustics an orchestra of, say, forty players, or even less, would "sound" there clearly, effectively. Sometimes, indeed, the present Symphony Orchestra, seventy, eighty or ninety strong, as the necessities of the programme may prescribe, seems too heavy for the dimensions and the resonance of the room. Why not, then, when a symphony by Mozart stands on the list as did the "Jupiter" last evening, or a symphony by Haydn, or a concerto from Händel or Bach, assemble a relatively small band and make the test whether such music so played would not sound with truer and more characteristic voice? A "small band" does not imply "the two or three gathered together" in a still place which was Mr. Dolmetsch's fantastic notion of an eighteenth-century orchestra and which reduces symphony, suite or concerto to a mere tinkle. It indicates, rather, a band of sufficient numbers to "sound" to twentieth-century ears and to accord with the acoustical quality of the auditorium, but essentially a band that will not impede and thicken this ancient music by unescapable weight of tone.

When sixty-odd men play this "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, as they did on Thursday in Cambridge, or any other eighteenth-century piece, they generate, however light the touch, a volume and a weight of tone, especially in the string choir, altogether strange to the designing ear of the composer. Such numbers and such body of sound may be necessary in Symphony or in Carnegie Hall, but in Sanders Theatre, and in relation to ancient music, it distinctly recalls the parsmen who cannot pull their own weight. Bach and Händel, being large of voice and stride, fare better than Mozart or Haydn under this inflation. The first Allegro and the Fugued Finale of this symphony in C major of Mozart bear it better than do most of his pages. Yet in general, upon this eighteenth-century music, the effect of the sheer weight of tone produced by an orchestra of sixty men, is to clog its notion and progress, stiffen its fibre, cloud its transparency. However fleet the conductor and the players in the usual Finale of a symphony by Mozart or Hadyn, in a figue by Bach, the pace of the music outruns them to the imaginative ear. The flowing pattern, the line interlaced with line, the darting ornament or the whipping figuration of these ancient pieces similarly stiffen from the inevitable inability of an orchestra sixty strong to escape sharp turns, thick strands, more or less rigid accents. If ever there was a transparent music, clear as a fleckless noon, it is these symphonies of Mozart and Haydn. The relatively big voice of the usual orchestra playing them obscures the very sounds it would utter.

At the least the experiment would be interesting, exhilarating and possibly fruitful, if when Mr. Rabaud next sets a symphony by Mozart or Haydn or a concerto by Bach or Händel on a programme for Cambridge, he should cut his orchestra nearly in halves, and test the consequences upon the music, his hearers, his own perceptions. Last evening the orchestra played the "Jupiter" symphony with more lightness of hand and lip, with more transparent tone, in more pliant motion, than it gained in Symphony Hall last November. Yet when did the music sound most Mozartean? Often, when the orchestra was reduced to relatively few voices, as clear to the ear, as lovely of texture as, say, Mr. Laurent's flute. Then the hearer perceived the luminous line, the festooning ornament shed by Mozart upon Andante and Minuet. When, on the other hand, did the music sound heavy, fall into an appreciable monotony of voice? Exactly while the orchestra—the unescapably heavy strings en tete—was making its way through the figurations of the first Allegro, through the counterpoint of the Fugued Finale. It is quite possible to imagine a more elastic and a more variously shading hand than Mr. Rabaud lays to many measures in this "Jupiter" symphany. He might pleasingly be less "respectful" of it as a classic and freer with it as a vivid and inspiriting music. Yet a relatively small orchestra might readily tempt him to more diversified shadings and lighter accents.

To Mozart as German classic succeeded, according to the conductor's favorite formula for programmes, a miscellany of French pieces. It began with his own tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne," so pleasing to the listeners and so fit occasion for good will to the composer-conductor, that they thrice and warmly summoned him from his modest place among his men. Again, it was pleasure to note the plastic accord with which the visioned scene and the visioning music steadily take common course; to note the composer's apt choice and adept economy of harmonic and instrumental means; to feel his fine ear for the voice, his fine feeling for the texture, of his music; to be illuded by the suggestion of magic and mystery that he weaves through his preluding and concluding measures. Yet, to hear so, was also to suspect that Mr. Rabaud is more imaginative composer than, sometimes, he is conductor and to observe also that, while for the present he denies Wagner pleas upon his [illegible] lively self-contained and clear-voiced. [illegible] ascends to large climax from two motives, [illegible] of spirits communing in a restless, foreboding love. It falls away into measures hinting at impending fate and grim future. It was interesting to hear Chabrier's music so far removed from the familiar and refulgent "España" and from the clanging, tossing overture to this same "Gwendoline." The listener with a little imagination, might even feel him vaguely as poet and dramatist in music of the opera house. Yet even so, it was possible to doubt whether the concert-room is just place for these fragments of music-drama. Then back to the composer from whom Wagner in his turn learned not a little to the Berlioz of the overture, "Roman Carnival," quick with rhythm, aflame with color, seething with romantic ardor, imaginative and pictorial energy, stinging almost in every measure. And it is in such pieces that Mr. Rabaud and his present orchestra likewise sound.

Between these pieces, Miss Ethel Fr[illegible]

IS XEMPT

Will Reap
Law Now
Signed

NCERTS
EATURES

Wilson returns next week, one ities will be to ue law which special interest
hony concerts.
ses to exempt
s, (which are xuries nor fin-

he season tickets
hony Orchestra on sale, it was certs at the rate roposal, with the ned the opening on, caused many orchestra to rethe interest of arture ade a departure

by continuing to emainder of the basis. This offer age of by many.
tractive, because further taxes on certs, though the
of the new law

mphony concerts
ity to subscribe
e more tempting
f the 10 pairs of morrow and Sat-rza, the Spanish first appearance or two program
w two interesting er preparation-with a femal
nd Saint-Saens',
the Harp," th
ust arrived from work, besides a there will be a
Kline, soprano;
; Arthur Hack-
ld Werrenrath,

oloists ncerts will be violoncellist of Bauer, Jacques
, Spanish com-
l play a new asque Sunday," he Metropolitan orchestral point should be the gradual mould-nder the alert

heir leader has neral comment.
ed by the conn in the various tion is now no
Rabaud's suc-
interesting and

tage of this opbscribers will be including that for next fall.

POST, FEBRUARY 23,

Symphony Exempt from Tax

One of President Wilson's first official duties after his landing will be to sign the new revenue law which contains a clause of special interest to patrons of Symphony concerts. The new law proposes to exempt symphony orchestras (which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable).

Last autumn, when the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were placed on sale, the United States was straining every nerve to help win the war, and it was proposed at that time to tax all concerts at the rate of 20 per cent. These things, with the epidemic which postponed the opening of the Symphony season, resulted in many former patrons of the orchestra relinquishing their seats in the interest of economy. The management made a departure from earlier seasons by continuing to offer tickets for the remainder of the season at a pro rata basis. This offer has been taken advantage of by a great many. It is now especially attractive because of the prospect of no further taxes on admisison to these concerts, though the date of the application of the new law is not yet fixed.

Boston's musical season has usually opened with Symphony concerts the middle of October, and closed with the last pair of Symphony concerts the first week in May. The proximity of the close of the present season can best be realized by noting the fact that only ten pairs of Symphony concerts remain. The opportunity to subscribe at this time is made the more tempting by the special nature of the ten pairs of concerts to come.

For two programmes in the concerts to follow two interesting choral works are under preparation, Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a woman's chorus of "Sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be a distinguished quartet, including Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, ocntralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Soloists at other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, always a favorite in Boston; Jacques Thibaud, the foremost French violinist; Raoul Laparra, Spanish composer-pianist, who is to play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday"; Miss Sophie Braslau, the rich-voiced young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Also, from the purely orchestral point of view, these concerts should be the finest of the season. The gradual moulding of the orchestra under the alert and exacting ear of their leader, has been a matter of general comment. Furthermore (as indicated by the consensus of critical opinion in the various cities visited) appreciation is now no less established of Mr. Rabaud's success in the making of programmes, which are both interesting and beautiful.

Those who take advantage of this opportunity to become subscribers will be granted every privilege, including that of retaining their seats for next fall.

---

n REPUBLICAN
lress Springfield, Mass.
te

A Musical Event

The measure of Springfield's eagerness to hear the Boston symphony orchestra in a free concert will be the number of those unable to obtain admission to the Auditorium this afternoon. It has not been often that the Boston symphony orchestra has taken part in an occasion of this kind, or, in fact, appeared at all outside the established series of concerts in Boston and a few of the larger eastern cities; indeed, the public appearances of this great musical organization, one of America's pre-eminent achievements in art, have been governed by laws with the rigidity of those of the Medes and Persians. Possibly the trustees who now control the orchestra are to be less strict than Maj Higginson, whose financial support enabled the organization to grow and perfect itself.

There have been famous conductors in the past. Mr Rabaud, the first Frenchman to hold the position, has won the highest praise in the few weeks since the crchestra became his own, to mold to his own artistic purposes. Beethoven's fifth symphony, which is on the program to-day, he regards as "the summit of music." It was included in the Boston program of Friday afternoon and last night, and Philip Hale, the well-known critic, says that Mr Rabaud's interpretation of the work was remarkably impressive. "We do not remember one that has equaled it in dramatic intensity and nobility," Mr Hale writes.

The managers of the Young Men's Christian course showed commendable initiative in arranging for this visit of the great Boston orchestra, which will bring both musical education and musical pleasure—the two are really synonymous—into the city.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 24

WEEK-END CONCERTS

ASSORTED RUSSIANS AND A FEW AMERICANS

Rameau and Mr. Gilbert Yield Novel Music to the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Rakhmaninov in an Array of Muscovite Pieces for the Piano—Mr. McCormack Cultivates Eighteenth-Century Composers—The Days of the Overlooked

To gather the harvest of concerts between a Friday afternoon and a Monday afternoon, to winnow it when the Saturday, the Sunday and even the Monday have been holidays, is an ungrateful task—a raking or re-raking, to shift the figure, of dead embers. The Symphony Concerts, for example, of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening seem now altogether of the series past and gone—the merits of Mr. de Gogorza's singing almost as remote as those of Mr. Cortot's playing weeks ago, the quality of Mr. Gilbert's Prologue to "Riders of the Sea" as much matter for academic discussion as the worth of Mr. Rabaud's earlier venture with an American composer in Mr. Converse's tone-poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter." Yet a concert-chronicle remains a concert-chronicle, presumably expected by readers, and there is naught for the reviewer to do bu hang as gracefully as he may upon the horns of his dilemma. Suffice it, then, to say, first, that Mr. Rabaud's programme began with Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Ys," and ended with Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," both standard pieces grateful alike to orchestra and audience; that between stood Mr. Gilbert's prologue to Synge's tragedy of Irish agitations the Russian Ballet has firmly fisher-folk, "Riders to the Sea," and a suite of dances from Rameau's eighteenth-century opera, "Hippolytus and Aricia"; and that for further intermezzi Mr. de Gogorza sang an austere air from Gluck's opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," and a more succulent "romance" from Massenet's early opera, "The King of Lahore." Furthermore, whatever the inciting cause—probably it was anticipation, half of the singer and half of "Scheherazade"—the audience on Saturday evening was uncommonly large and vigorously applausive. By every sign, it departed well pleasured.

In performance, Mr. Rabaud succeeded well with the overture to "The King of Ys," romantic, directly melodious, vigorously marching, warmly colored music such as he almost always plays with becoming eloquence. In the martial conclusion, indeed, he and the orchestra let forth a flood of sound such as Symphony Hall has hardly known since the distant day in which Mr. Fiedler carried the prelude to "The Mastersingers" to like exuberant climax and the concert-room rocked with a like answering applause. Whatever the shortcomings of the orchestra on that score in the past, no hearer may now reasonably question its muscularity. Mr. Stransky and the Philharmonic Society of New York must look to their laurels for sheer power. Throughout "Scheherazade," not a few of the virtuosi of the band—Mr. Fradkin among the violins, the wood-wind choir separately and collectively—had rich and diverse opportunity to prove their prowess; while the whole suite was played with the clean-cut line, the bright and incisive rhythm, the glowing warmth of harmonic and instrumental color, the graphic and fantastic quality essential to the music. Whether the listener heard it with memory of the action that for some imaginations the Russian Ballet have firmly fastened upon it or with thought of the programme—far different—that Rimsky-Korsakov devised for it; or with ear only for the suggestion of the play of color, rhythm and the imagination guiding them, "Scheherazade" perennially renews a transparent fascination. In turn, Mr. de Gogorza excelled himself in the suave progressions and the operatic intensities of the air out of Massenet and yet more in the soberer beauty of declamation, the graver and sincerer passion that fills Gluck's music. In the prime of voice and of every power at once ardent and controlled, his audiences applauded him with reason, with elation.

Of the novel pieces, the dances from Rameau's opera gave immediate pleasure. Dr. Muck brought him back, as he had long deserved, to the Symphony Concerts and Mr. Rabaud is as happily disposed to continue him there. After all, the "airs de ballet" of Gluck and, say, Grétry are not the beginning and the end of such eighteenth-century music. Indeed Rameau's dances have a vigor of rhythm, a largeness of line, an energy of motion, commending them to twentieth-century ears above the soft wistfulness of much of Gluck's ballet-music or the surface sprightliness of Grétry's. Moreover, he could command at will, as these very dances proved, the grace and elegance over which his compeers were prone to dally. The vigors of Rameau are the vigors of an enduring vitality. . . . It was pleasure to hear Mr. Gilbert's prologue to Synge's tragedy applauded, to see him receiving rewards coram publico, of which he has had too little in proportion to his deserts and for just encouragement. His music is as brief and concentrated as the play it would preface—music of the sea as relentless and indomitable, as grim and grave as Fate itself; music of the mourning, wild and shrill, of the peasant folk for those whom it has swallowed; music, in a few periods at the end, of the submission of those upon whom the fate of the sea can wreak no more ill. Throughout Mr. Gilbert writes with an exceeding directness of means and expression, in high concentration, with large imagination, above all with that "native wildness" which gives him individuality, which sets him apart from the schools and the product of the schools, which suits him to such matter as "Riders of the Sea," his negro overture, his ballet-pantomime, last winter, of the dances of the blacks of New Orleans. Unmistakably this wildness rings often out of the prologue, even if Mr. Gilbert is less fortunate, sometimes, in his expressive means, than in the moods and images he would have them convey. Almost inevitably this note eluded Mr. Rabaud, as in the ballet at the Opera House last April, it eluded Mr. Monteux. Not for the Parisian conservative or radical, unless he be a very exceptional Parisian, is the wildness of either Gilbert or Synge.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A MANY-TONGUED MISCELLANY OF MUSIC

From the Passionate Franck of "Psyche" to the Smooth Faure of Theatre Pieces — A Misty Fragment of Chabrier's Opera and a Blazing Overture of Berlioz — Mr. Fradkin Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto

COMING expectant to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the audience for the Symphony Concert departed well entertained. Miscellaneous pieces, all but one French, filled the programme: Franck's suite, "Psyche"; Mendelssohn's concerto for violin; a suite drawn by Fauré from his incidental music to a Parisian version of Shakspeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice"; and, as heard at Cambridge the previous evening, the introduction to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival." Only the concerto and the overture were familiar numbers; but the two suites and the operatic fragment were all music quickly pleasuring the ear, easy to comprehend and to feel; while the whole list offered a diversity of voice and mood agreeable to all but the narrow few who dislike too many shiftings of their point of view in the brief space of an hour and fifty minutes. For, like predecessors, Mr. Rabaud seems little by little to be lengthening his programmes. Four months ago he began to make them full, as were his forerunners, of good resolution to be brief. Gradually, however, and no earlier and no later than they, he has discovered that an interestingly coördinated and contrasted programme cannot always be compressed into an arbitrary ninety minutes. Pieces mating well together will stretch into a hundred or even a hundred and ten. The conductor, being an intelligent musician, bows accordingly to artistic self-respect and necessity—the more since the number of the departing dowagers is a relatively fixed quantity.

There was, moreover, plentiful applause to lengthen the concert of Friday—for Mr. Fradkin, leader of the strings, who played the solo part in the violin-concerto, and for Mr. Arthur Hackett, who provided the tenor voice, not off stage, as in the theatre, but visible and audible upon it, that carries two divisions of Fauré's suite. To both the audience was cordial; while, at the end of Franck's suite, its plaudits for both orchestra and conductor were uncommonly hearty. And with reason, since the band played it eloquently, emotionally; while more clearly and pervasively than hitherto Mr. Rabaud asserted his mettle as operatic conductor. The suavities of the orchestra with Fauré's music likewise deserved the plaudits received; while more than once, as at Cambridge, with Berlioz's overture, it struck running fire. Time and again, moreover, notably when Mr. Speyer played the air for English horn in this "Roman Carnival," individual distinctions flecked this supple and eager ensemble. No small betterment is he to the wood-wind choir, not only for his own tone, touch and taste, but also for his stimulating effect upon his fellows. Again the orchestra goes forward.

Mr. Rabaud seemed operatic conductor in Franck's "Psyche," because that music, as the suite of yesterday brings it occasionally back to the concert-hall, is really Franck's opera. His ostensible operas, "Hulda" and "Ghisèle," vanished long since from stage and memory. Le père Franck had scant sense of the theatre in the fashion in which Massenet exemplifies it. As one and another of his settings of The Beatitudes prove, there were limitations to his invention when he would deal dramatically in tones with evil-doers and their works; while even a mechanician of the Parisian opera houses, like the recently departed Monsieur Leroux, would have balked at the fable and texts of "Hulda" and "Ghisèle." In the orchestra parts of "Psyche," in which the origina "symphonic poem" for instruments and orchestra now survives, Franck was hampered by no text and need take no though of necessary or assumed requirement o the theatre. The Grecian fable of the loves of Eros and Psyche was matter to stir his imagination, to set free his half-erotic, half-mystical vein. Evil-doers and evil-doing nowhere intruded. At his ease, as well as enkindled, Franck might write his music of passion, the so-called love-duet of the end of the suite; sound the preparatory voices in the episode of "The Garden of Eros," set down his music of the scene in the division, "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs"; and around "The Slumber of Psyche" inscribe his prologue—and in all four attain a dramatic force, a pictorial illusion sure to evade him in the theatre. Over his shoulder, he could also see and hear "Lohengrin" flourishing there, and it was not desirable that "Lohengrin" should contribute too much, though it does a little, to the mystical union of Eros and Psyche, to her desire to question the mysterious lover.

Yet with due deference to d'Indy to Derepas, to the other commentators who exalt the mystical, the spiritual side of this music of Franck, not to such voice does the ear, hearing in the ways and with the lusts of the flesh, first respond. Franck wastes few measures upon sensuous and colorful tone-picturing of the garden of Eros where Psyche reposes. Clearly it little interested him. Eager was he to "get on" with the love-music that fills the larger part of the third episode and the whole of the fourth. It is a thrilling music, sustaining itself out of itself, warm, rich, incisive, rising and falling, advancing and receding with clear accent of erotic passion. Mystical, if the hearer prefers, but if he has ever happened to peruse some of the memoirs of mystical, visioning and generally overwrought nuns and monks—memoirs that lie thick in many a monastery or convent—he will discover somewhere appearing for the first time in concerts," sang Zerlina's playfully fondlin "Batti, Batti" from Mozart's opera of Don Juan, Duparc's "Chanson Triste" and "Chant Indoue" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Sadko." Since nervousness so pinched and dimmed Miss Frank's tones that they were far from their better or ampler selves, it is superfluous to comment upon singing so little indicative of her true abilities. Beside the familiar "Batti, Batti" and the relatively conventional Parisian matter and manner of the sensuous and melancholy "Chanson Triste," the wondrous melody of Rimsky-Korsakov in the "Chant Indoue" shone like a thread of gold—radiant or plaintive, penetrating always, ascendant in unbroken curve yet endlessly modulated, arabesque twined within arabesque, illuding the ear, touching the heart. In the East and not the West, in the Russia that is double door to both, lies the new fount of melody. Our akin in voice, be it of word or music, are ecstasies of the flesh and ecstasies of the spirit. True, Franck perceptibly over-writes his erotic music as he does his preluding in "The Slumbers of Psyche." True also, he uses often what is now the familiar a nerve-stimulating procedure of the Wa nerian climax; but nowhere else, outs the more eloquent Beatitudes and symphony, has he written music of su power and passion as these final mo ments of "Psyche."

By conscious or unconscious w Franck, unwilled Franck, there wri music-drama. Of music-drama, too, the brief, beautiful, delicately imagi and subtly accomplished music of zephyrs. It is as though he here achie the lightness and the airiness of mot the gossamer texture, the iridescent g and glow sought but not always ga in the earlier tone-poem, "The Daugh of Æolus." Little music from any pe so tenuous of fabric, yet so luminous impression. The prologue, "The Slum of Psyche," is of Franck more famili of preluding and exposition of mot he soon strikes his own particular n sounding again and again in his m of wistful longing, rising from res eagerness into sustained aspiration (a the symphony) but here gentler and n melancholy. It is a note easy to pro unduly, a note that quickly irritates tain listening temperaments. Yet in prelude, over-written as it is, it rem a note to awaken responsive mood. Rabaud did well to reassemble and rep this suite of "Psyche"; next to Fran symphony and his symphonic variati as the Franckian repertory for orche goes, it is characteristically eloquent of composer. And, as it seemed yesterda quasi-operatic music, Mr. Rabaud open eager, operatic arms.

Whatever the intrinsic merit of Faur incidental music to Haraucourt's "Sh lock," it was good to hear, because n where does it recall the Wagner who h so infected French music of the gener tion Mr. Rabaud seems to love best. (F with Wagner "banned," Wagnerian imit tion is provocative.) Not that the suite of Fauré,, when, as in some of his chan ber music and songs, he is most delica of invention and fancy, most subtle, f licitous and individual of workmansh Rather the six brief numbers are a w made, well fitting music for the purpo in hand, often agreeable, occasional charming, to hear—work of the day u dertaken on commission and becoming done. If the verses that furnish forth t "chanson" and the "madrigal" for ten voice—both sung by Mr. Hackett somewh wirily and with undistinguished Fren diction—exemplify Haraucourt's poetry, may little have stimulated Fauré to musi making. It is thirty years since this "Sh lock" lived brief life on the stage the Odéon; it is now as dead, gone and i recoverable as the other contents of th crowded limbo of "failures" in the theatre but there is reason to believe that the pla was as pale, trite and generally mediocr in itself as it is in the reflected lustres "The Merchant of Venice."

Therefore it is possible only to surmis where in the course of Haraucourt's Shakspeare's play, this incidental musi sounded. Possibly the "chanson" and th "madrigal," each of which has pleasan archaic flavor, beguiled two choices of th caskets; possibly, the "Epithalme" or ma riage song, crowned the third, though i velvety measures are are far enough fron Portia's.

You see me, Lord Bassanio, where I stand,
Such as I am:

or his

Only my blood speaks to you in my veins.

Pretty and pulsing, too, is the soft glow o the Nocturne, presumably for Lorenzo an Jessica capping verses and kisses in th moonlit, tremulous garden. There is pom of masque or, may be, "Magnificoes" in the entr'acte; while the final number is gay high-spirited, at moments almost starry music-making. There is no reason at all why a composer, even a Fauré, should not occasionally fill a chocolate-box and let his hearers savor his confectionery.

On the way from Franck, via Chabrier to Fauré, Mr. Fradkin played the violin part in Mendelssohn's fluent, animated, ele gant and often artful concerto, played as became the virtuoso and the musician whose incidental solos in the orchestra o the Russian Ballet recalled and commended him to Bostonian ears when he first came to Symphony Hall last autumn. A little ill at ease at the beginning of the concerto, he seemed to play the superabundant passage-work of this Allegro "Appassionato" precisely, dryly. Once embarked, however, upon the plastic, sparkling, manifold cadenza, upon the suavities and the sentiment of the Andante, upon the flicking and the flashing play of the Rondo, he gave his hearers the pleasure of sure and pliant fingers, sensitive bowing; a ton that mingled fineness, sensibility and propulsive power; animation of rhythm and progress, adept and flowing modulation, bright and changeful color and just perception of Mendelssohnian artifice, elegance and charm. Out of these abilities and this outcome spoke not only the virtuoso of the violin, but a perceiving and transmitting musician, an artist of fine fibre and keen discernment, seeker and attainer of the just, the persuading mean.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 14,

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

The Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Rabaud at Cambridge—A Neglected Opportunity with Eighteenth-Century Music—A Tone-Poem by the Conductor, an Interesting Fragment from Chabrier, and a Wondrous Tune by Rimsky-Korsakov—Mme. Frijsh's and Mr. Bauer's Recitals

LIKE his predecessors in the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud neglects a rare opportunity that its concerts in Cambridge afford, when music of the eighteenth century is in hand. Beside Symphony Hall in Boston or Carnegie Hall in New York, Sanders Theatre is a relatively small and compact auditorium. Being wooden-walled and roofed, it is also an exceptionally resonant and revealing concert-hall. According to the formulæ of acoustics an orchestra of, say, forty players, or even less, would "sound" there clearly, effectively. Sometimes, indeed, the present Symphony Orchestra, seventy, eighty or ninety strong, as the necessities of the programme may prescribe, seems too heavy for the dimensions and the resonance of the room. Why not, then, when a symphony by Mozart stands on the list as did the "Jupiter" last evening, or a symphony by Haydn, or a concerto from Händel or Bach, assemble a relatively small band and make the test whether such music so played would not sound with truer and more characteristic voice? A "small band" does not imply "the two or three gathered together" in a still place which was Mr. Dolmetsch's fantastic notion of an eighteenth-century orchestra and which reduced a symphony, suite or concerto to a mere tinkle. It indicates, rather, a band of sufficient numbers to "sound" to twentieth-century ears and to accord with the acoustical quality of the auditorium, but essentially a band that will not impede and thicken this ancient music by unescapable weight of tone.

When sixty-odd men play this "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, as they did on Thursday in Cambridge, or any other eighteenth-century piece, they generate, however light the touch, a volume and a weight of tone, especially in the string choir, altogether strange to the designing ear of the composer. Such numbers and such body of sound may be necessary in Symphony or in Carnegie Hall, but in Sanders Theatre, and in relation to ancient music, it distinctly recalls the barsmen who cannot pull their own weight. Bach and Händel, being large of voice and stride, fare better than Mozart or Haydn under this inflation. The first Allegro and the Fugued Finale of this symphony in C major of Mozart bear it better than do most of his pages. Yet in general, upon this eighteenth-century music, the effect of the sheer weight of tone produced by an orchestra of sixty men, is to clog its motion and progress, stiffen its fibre, cloud its transparency. However fleet the conductor and the players in the usual Finale of a symphony by Mozart or Hadyn, in a fugue by Bach, the pace of the music outruns them to the imaginative ear. The flowing pattern, the line interlaced with line, the darting ornament or the whipping figuration of these ancient pieces similarly stiffen from the inevitable inability of an orchestra sixty strong to escape sharp turns, thick strands, more or less rigid accents. If ever there was a transparent music, clear as a fackless noon, it is these symphonies of Mozart and Haydn. The relatively big voice of the usual orchestra playing them obscures the very sounds it would utter.

At the least the experiment would be interesting, exhilarating and possibly fruitful, if when Mr. Rabaud next sets a symphony by Mozart or Haydn or a concerto by Bach or Händel on a programme for Cambridge, he should cut his orchestra nearly in halves, and test the consequences upon the music, his hearers, his own perceptions. Last evening the orchestra played the "Jupiter" symphony with more lightness of hand and lip, with more transparent tone, in more pliant motion, than it gained in Symphony Hall last November. Yet when did the music sound most Mozartean? Often, when the orchestra was reduced to relatively few voices, as clear to the ear, as lovely of texture as, say, Mr. Laurent's flute. Then the hearer perceived the luminous line, the festooning ornament shed by Mozart upon Andante and Minuet. When, on the other hand, did the music sound heavy, fall into an appreciable monotony of voice? Exactly while the orchestra—the unescapably heavy strings even—was making its way through the figurations of the first Allegro, through the counterpoint of the Fugued Finale. It is quite possible to imagine a more elastic and a more variously shading hand than Mr. Rabaud lays to many measures in this "Jupiter" symphany. He might pleasingly be less "respectful" of it as a classic and freer with it as a vivid and inspiriting music. Yet a relatively small orchestra might readily tempt him to more diversified shadings and lighter accents.

To Mozart as German classic succeeded, according to the conductor's favorite formula for programmes, a miscellany of French pieces. It began with his own tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne," so pleasing to the listeners and so fit occasion for good will to the composer-conductor, that they thrice and warmly summoned him from his modest place among his men. Again, it was pleasure to note the plastic accord with which the visioned scene and the visioning music steadily take common course; to note the composer's apt choice and adept economy of harmonic and instrumental means; to feel his fine ear for the voice, his fine feeling for the texture, of his music; to be illuded by the suggestion of magic and mystery that he weaves through his preluding and concluding measures. Yet, to hear so, was also to suspect that Mr. Rabaud is more imaginative composer than, sometimes, he is conductor and to observe also that, while for the present he denies Wagner place upon his pr[illegible] ively self-contained and clear-voiced. [illegible] ascends to large climax from two motives, [illegible]s of spirits communing in a restless, foreboding love. It falls away into measures hinting at impending fate and grim future. It was interesting to hear Chabrier in music so far removed from the familiar and refulgent "España" and from the clanging, tossing overture to this same "Gwendoline." The listener, with a little imagination, might even feel him vaguely as poet and dramatist in music of the opera house. Yet even so, it was possible to doubt whether the concert-room is just place for these fragments of music-drama. Then back to the composer from whom Wagner in his turn learned not a little—to the Berlioz of the overture, "Roman Carnival," quick with rhythm, aflame with color, seething with romantic ardor, imaginative and pictorial energy, stinging almost in every measure. And it is in such pieces that Mr. Rabaud and his present orchestra likewise sound.

Between these pieces, Miss Ethel Frank

LOWELL, COURIER-CITIZEN, MARCH 2, 1913.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMES TO LOWELL FOR CONCERT

First Appearance Here in Many Years of Famous Musical Organization—Strand Theatre Crowded for the Event.

Not since the early days of its career, first under Henschel and then under Gericke, as far as the records show, has the Boston Symphony orchestra given a concert in Lowell until last night, when under the baton of Henri Rabaud, the distinguished musician our ally France has lent to us, it came in the fulness of its powers to the Strand theatre for a concert under the auspices of Pilgrim Commandery Guard.

On its former appearances here it was in the formative period of its organization. This time, moulded by the skill of a long series of eminent directors, with notable tradition of achievement, the great orchestra came as one acknowledged to be among the finest in the world. Something, this, to the credit of America, in spite of the fact that we have not been considered to be a musical nation. That Lowell should once more have the privilege to hear it here at home is a matter for congratulation. The writer has often wished that in some way the founder could have made it possible for all the people, rather than a cultured few to enjoy the musical education and stimulus that a more or less frequent hearing of such an organization brings. It would have done much for the advancement of music in this country. Perhaps the concert of last night was a token that something of the sort may become possible occasionally under the new regime. If it turns out to be so we shall indeed be fortunate.

The Strand theatre made a very satisfactory concert hall for the occasion, the stage and an extension allowing for adequate arrangement of the orchestra, and, as far as could be judged, the acoustic properties met the test.

Mr. Rabaud had wisely chosen a program that would be likely to appear to his audience, neither too severe nor yet trivial, and coming to a climax in the Fifth Symphony in C Minor of Beethoven. Preceding this masterpiece were the Symphonic Piece from Franck's oratorio "The Redemption," Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and the Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Not a seat was vacant in the theatre when Mr. Rabaud lifted his baton for "The Star Spangled Banner," which he took at a stately tempo which gave it something of a new dignity and impressiveness.

Franck's symphonic piece, written as an intermezzo to his "The Redemption," is religious in character and somewhat austere in its development, as one listens to it apart from its setting in the entire work. It shows evidence of the composer's skill in the treatment of music of the kind in which he was perhaps most interested, and Mr. Rabaud brought it to performance with rare appreciation, as was natural enough, since Franck spent almost his entire life in Paris where most of his notable works were produced. Very effective and rich in tonal quality were the strains of the brass instruments toward the close of the piece, reminding one of similar effects in the Wagnerian scores and yet revealing characteristics that were Franck's and his alone.

Fortunately we have not become so musically blasé as to feel obliged to sneer at Saint-Saens' tone poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" as salon music. Granted that it does not reach the sublimity of the symphony which closed the program; the composer did not aim at such a height. But as a sample of graceful melody and most ingenious orchestration, it has uncommon charm, and Mr. Rabaud evidently does not consider it out of place on a symphony program, since he chose to present it last week in Boston, when the audience, like that of last night, evidently warmed to it. Indicating his idea of the music to his orchestra by the slightest movement of baton or of his graceful left hand, Mr. Rabaud set Omphale's wheel spinning and humming till the musical illusion was well nigh perfect. The double-basses had their chance in depicting the groaning Hercules, and the oboe its opportunity, admirably expressed, in the mocking laugh of Omphale. Then on went the wheel again until at last, Omphale having tired of her sport, it gradually loses momentum and finally, after a few hesitating revolutions, is still. Strings and wood-wind played with wonderful delicacy throughout.

The Mendelssohn Nocturne was notable at the opening for the smooth quality of the horns in the familiar melody, while in the Scherzo the fairy-like piping of the wood-wind was beautiful in its tonal quality. No composer has better suggested the comedy of Shakespear in tone. The music invariably calls to mind all the motley and humorous figures of the play.

The opportunity to hear Mr. Rabaud's interpretation of the Beethoven symphony was welcome indeed, for it is deservedly one of the most popular of the nine and furthermore the conductor himself has been quoted as saying that he considers it the summit of music. Whether or not, as some contend, it was intended to symbolize the struggle of the individual against the weapons of fate, until he finally achieves triumph, and victory and happiness, matters little after all. One can revel in it for the beauty of the music itself aside from what a stereotyped program note can suggest. In fact to limit oneself to a set idea is often to curb the imagination. The opening movement it is true, with its incisive triple notes and ominous pause, recurring in various forms and guises does suggest fate knocking at the door, and the final march of triumph is instinct with victory, but much that goes between may well be enjoyed as pure music, and so I imagine, Beethoven wrote it.

Mr. Rabaud made the so-called fate motive tremendously impressive, developing it with marked skill and bringing out the various themes of the movement with thorough understanding both of the score and of the resources of the orchestra at his command.

The beautiful opening strain of the Andante was nobly sung by the 'cellos and the purity of tone of the flutes, clarinet, oboe and bassoon made an entrancing effect in the following phrase and in the second melody with which the movement is developed, the whole being worked up to a splendid climax near the close.

The Allegro and Trio, or Scherzo, gave further evidence of the virtuosity of the band. The three notes of the first movement, coming now in triple measure, were capitally emphasized. With the trio the double-basses were brought into unwonted activity in their elephantine gambols. Mr. Rabaud built up the movement with steadily cumulating power till it swept into the glorious march of the final movement with such splendid impetus and verve that some of the audience did not realize the last movement had begun. The fanfare introducing the march was resonant and stirring in its clear cut rhythm and not for a moment did the conductor allow the interest to lag, spurring the band in all its various choirs to alert response to his will until the final reappearance of the march theme and the sharp and incisive chords of close were reached.

The symphony evidently stirred the audience, as it rarely fails to do and Mr. Rabaud was recalled several times to the platform to bow his acknowledgment, finally bringing the members of the orchestra to their feet to share the honors.

It is needless, perhaps, to say that all the details of the arrangements for the concert were managed most successfully by the Commandery Guard which may be counted upon, when doing a thing, to do it well and in excellent taste.

It may not be amiss also to remind those who, like Oliver Twist, are eager for more, that the orchestra is to appear at the Strand again on April 1 with Lambert Murphy, the well-liked tenor, as soloist.

S. R. F.

Herald March 2.

* * *

A programme comprising the pick and choice of a month's symphony music in Boston, stands on the Boston Symphony programme scheduled for Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 11. Rimsky-Korsakoff's masterpiece of modern orchestral coloring, "Scheherazade," will take the place of a symphony. It is a Symphonic Suite, depicting in four movements various episodes of the Arabian Nights. The transparent beauty of the scoring, Oriental and sensuous, has been done splendid justice by Mr. Rabaud and his illustrious band, as Boston has enthusiastically attested. The composer spreads forth, in many important solo passages, the individual virtuosi of the orchestra—first violin, viola, 'cello, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, French horn, trumpet, trombone—the newly constituted orchestra is in full display as a triumph of French musicianship. Mr. Fradkin, the concert master, weaving the supple theme of "Scheherazade," the narrator, through the whole work, will recall to some that he took the same role in the Russian Ballet Orchestra when they played the same work.

Mr. Fradkin will also be the soloist proper of the evening, playing in Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso," which he has prepared with the orchestra especially for Providence. The other numbers, also French, will be Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," and Debussy's Nocturnes, entitled "Clouds" and "Festivals."

The programme follows:

Franck, Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption;" Debussy, Nocturnes, Nuages, Fetes; Saint-Saens, Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for violin and orchestra; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35, The Sea and Sinbad's Ship, The Story of the Kalandar-Prince, The Young Prince and the Young Princess, Festival at Bagdad, The Sea, The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior, Conclusion. Soloist, Frederic Fradkin. There will be an intermision of 10 minutes after Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso."

A memorable program is scheduled for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to take place Tuesday evening, March 11, in Infantry Hall. Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous masterpiece of modern orchestral scoring, the symphonic suite, "Sheherezade," depicting in four movements various episodes of the Arabian Nights in suitable Oriental and sensuous style, will be the principal number. It shows forth, one by one, in important solo passages, all the virtuosi of the orchestra, leading the different string and wind section. Mr. Fradkin, the new concertmaster, especially, carries through the work the sinous theme of Sheherezade, telling the tales to her lord and consort. Mr. Fradkin, it will be remembered, held the same notable place in the Russian ballet orchestra when they played the same work.

Mr. Fradkin is also to be the soloist proper of the evening, playing in Saint-Saens's "Rondo Carriccioso," which Providence alone is to hear. The other numbers are also French—Franck's symphonic piece from his "Redemption," and Debussy's Nocturnes, entitled "Clouds" and "Festivals."

HAVENS TO PLAY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Raymond Havens, that brilliant young pianist, formerly of Providence, whose name is now becoming widely known throughout the musical world of America is to be the soloist at the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, at the Colonial Theatre, Lawrence, Mass., this afternoon.

Mr. Havens will play the "Tschaikowsky Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor." Allegro non troppo molto maestoso; Allegro con spirito; Andantino semplice; Allegro; Vivace assai; Allegro con fuoco.

MR. RAYMOND HAVENS
Gifted Young Pianist, Formerly of Providence, Who Will Be the Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Concert in the Colonial Theatre, Lawrence, Mass., This Afternoon.

Record March 8

SIRENS' CHORUS IN DEBUSSY WORK AT SYMPHONY

"Nocturnes" Feature of the Concert—Coming Musical Events

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henri Rabaud, conductor, Joseph Malkin, 'cellist. Seventeenth concert. The program:—

Beethoven—Overture to Coriolanus.
Tschaikowsky — Variations on Rococo Theme for violoncello.
Debussy—Nocturnes.
Mendelssohn—Italian (A major) symphony.

The feature of the concert was the Debussy work heard for the first time in Boston in the revised version. The work is one of such great beauty, so subtle, so fine in its painting of moods as represented in nature, that one is not inclined to treat it with levity, yet the picture presented to the audience yesterday was not without incongruous features. The third section of the work demands the alluring voices of sirens. Yesterday the sirens were not heard off stage. They were grouped around the feet of Maestro Rabaud, to whom they looked with adoring eyes and who rewarded them after they had sung their song with polite applause.

Sirens at a Symphony concert should be heard but not seen. When the requisite number of sirens (Debussy calls for 16; did not Mr. Rabaud go him two better?), gowned in very modern clothes, paraded on the stage, one was predisposed against taking their future croonings, hummings, sighing, the sounds by which the sirens allure the traveller, too seriously. The last sirens Boston saw were in one of Mr. Kern's polite little music plays.

They were very frisky sirens. They danced and showed the latest frills and furbelows in undergarments. There was no dancing by yesterday's charmers. Their seduction was strictly vocal. They sang the measures which Debussy attributes to them with fine quality of tone. Especially the mezzo-soprano section wrought the desired effect.

The Debussy work, remembered by some through previous performances in a slightly different form, is a fascinating work. The music, distinctly Debussian, is positively insidious. The effect, especially of the first movement, les nuages, is intense. It is a work which demands the most careful and minute analysis by the musician and the student of musician, such a complete study as cannot even be hinted at in a popular newspaper.

In the Tschaikowsky number Mr. Malkin played with a suave, mellow tone. His instrument, apparently, is a particularly fine one. We do not lay emphasis on the instrument as in any way reflecting on Mr. Malkin, but 'cellos are 'cellos and many a virtuoso, even Mr. Casals, have not always been heard at their best through unfortunate choice of an instrument. The Beethoven overture and the Mendelssohn symphony are very familiar, especially to the older attendant at concerts. Time was when the "Italian" and the "Scotch" symphonies were common occurrences. Mr. Rabaud worked wonders with the Symphony. He gave it a glow that held the audience to the last bar.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 7,

Coriolanus a Feature at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Beethoven—Coriolanus Overture.
Tschaikowsky—Variations for Cello and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mr. Joseph Malkin.
Debussy—Three Nocturnes.
Mendelssohn—Italian Symphony. A major.

THERE is no question but that M. Rabaud knows his Beethoven. His reading of the "Coriolanus" overture was a worthy successor to his great interpretation of that master's fifth symphony, recently given. Although it is not Shakespeare's "Coriolanus" that is here portrayed, one can, nevertheless, easily recognize the mighty general, his pleading family, his assassination and death. The three mighty chords which begin the work and come again in the development and coda were given with great majesty and the sweetly contrasted second theme (the feminine element) was most expressive. Altogether, it was one of M. Rabaud's marked successes.

Debussy's Nocturnes are somewhat unequal. The "Nuages" ("Clouds"), which begin the short suite, are not of a nature to suggest a waterproof or an umbrella, but they give the idea of fanciful Summer clouds with some success. Yet we think that this composer could have pictured such a subject better upon the piano than with orchestral forces. The second movement was entitled "Fetes." It did not give the hurly-burly of a festival such as Wagner portrayed in his "Mastersingers," but was none the less in a military mood, and it was read better and with more spirit than we have ever heard it in these concerts.

But the final movement—"Sirens"—was the gem of the work. Here Debussy uses a female chorus with his orchestral forces; not with words (possibly his feeling were too deep for words) but vocalizing on notes, as if the voices were an orchestral tone-color. Debussy was always a master in his employment of female chorus, as witness his setting of the "Blessed Damosel," and as the chorus had been excellently trained by Mr. Stephen Townsend, the ensemble here was very effective. There is in this movement a delicacy and charm which makes it one of Debussy's great successes, and we do not always find him successful in marine pictures, being quite unable to reconcile ourselves to his "La Mer." We're glad to see Mr. Townsend associated with M. Rabaud in receiving the applause at the end of the work.

There are a few musicians who hold the A major symphony to be Mendelssohn's best. We cannot rank it with the "Scotch" symphony. There are, however, some excellent touches in the work. The slow movement is one of the good pieces for violas, and Mendelssohn manages to bring out just the brooding melancholy which is the distinguishing characteristic of the instrument. The suavity of the counterpoint all through this delicious movement, which we hold to be the gem of the symphony, is remarkably attractive. Mendelssohn was able to be learned without becoming ascetic or abstruse, and this movement wins musician and laity alike, as it did on this occasion. It was finely read and played.

Spite of the excitement and dash of the Salterello which ends the work, we believe that many Kapellmeisters could have written a movement of this type. It has by no means the originality which is displayed in the A minor symphony finale, and we can add that Mendelssohn seems to have been the only German composer who attained the real Scottish flavor. The soloist of the concert was the excellent young violoncellist, Mr. Malkin. He has abundant technique and has poetry and temperament besides. Tschaikowsky's theme is a quaint, old-fashioned thing, in the formal "Two-period" shape with return of the first phrase at the close. Such a theme is easily followed through the various embroideries and changes, particularly when it has strong rhythmic effects and modulations as this melody has. It is true violoncello music besides, displaying many points of technique. There was some broad work on the C string, in which Mr. Malkin was especially effective; there were high positions and harmonics (always difficult on thick strings) which were pure and clear; there was double-stopping and pizzicato work, all of which was brilliantly executed. But such display takes a composition out of the really classical and places it in the virtuoso school, and we fear that we must class these variations with the musical firework repertoire. But such a work wins the public all the more because of its pyrotechnical display, and the audience were most emphatic in response to Mr. Malkin's excellent work, recalling him twice most heartily.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A Notable Concert by Mme. Frijsh—With Ampler and More Elastic Means the Singer Renews and Heightens Familiar Distinctions—Mr. Rabaud Makes a Programme of Novel Pieces—"Butterflies" of Japan and Italy—Items and Incidents

TO the penetrating and projecting intelligence and imagination that Mme. Frijsh has long brought to the singing of songs, she added, at her concert last evening, in Jordan Hall, unexpected and heightening qualities of voice itself. For two seasons and more Bostonian ears have not heard her at home and in that time her tones have materially gained in resonance and in warmth. This richer and more vibrant body gives them now almost a sensuous beauty in themselves to the larger advantage of the singer, to the ampler pleasure of the listener, when she essays the broad phrases, the outspread ascendant periods of old airs by Haendel or the sustained and ecstatic measures of modern songs like Franck's "Procession." As Mme. Frijsh profits by this new fullness of voice, so she is the gainer by a new freedom of tone. Her song is more elastic to rhythm than it was of old, as she proved in particular in the intricacies of Mr. Loeffler's "Bolero Triste," Debussy's "Mandoline" and Stravinsky's Russian piece; it is more amenable to suggestive and subtle inflection; more readily, more resiliently, it takes and diversifies color. Thus, more than ever before is her singing in Boston, Mme. Frijsh's tones become enhancing as well as imparting voice to her intelligence and imagination, and, in degree, a pleasure in themselves as pure song. They give her title also to the place in orchestral concerts that, hitherto, has seemed beyond her powers.

This new quality, these ampler and more elastic means, broaden, deepen and heighten Mme. Frijsh's attributes as interpretive singer. Her discerning and designing mind plans the progress and the cumulation of her pieces of sustained and mounting contour as in the airs from Haendel and the song of Franck aforesaid as in sundry other numbers of last evening. So adroit is the proportioning, just the march, and inevitable the climax that the listener hears in stimulating mental exercise. A like acuteness of mind and skill measures the contrasts, for example, of the bleak beginning and the ardent end of Gretchaninov's song of "The Steppe" or adjusts the recurring refrain of Chabrier's "Villanelle of the Little Ducks." Akin is Mme. Frijsh's ability to isolate and concentrate, to make graphic for the instant, so fugitive—and also so wild—a piece as Sinding's "Sea Gull's Cry," or to distill, as in the overflowing cup of the moment, the amorous ecstasy of Grieg's "Woodland Wandering." The singer is capable of the tone that summons and details a picture, that compasses an atmosphere, works an illusion. Hear, for example, the suggestion of the whiteness, the stillness, the flakiness of falling snow that she weaves from and around the music of Lie's familiar song. Or listen to the mingled radiance of summer fields and of simple hearts, piously rejoicing with which she suffuses Franck's music for the procession of the holy Host.

Mme. Frijsh does not miss the note of mystic ecstasy quivering once and again in these measures and she is subtle and illusory at once when she strikes that note, and the folk-note too, in Stravinsky's strange song of the homely invocations and images of the ancient Russian flagellants. She best applies this keenness of perception, this skill in subtle inflection and in implicating color to such pieces as Mr. Loeffler's finely wrought songs of ironic disillusion endured—"Je te Vis, Je t' Aimais" or the "Boléro Triste." Hers is his note, in such music, of the pity and the pain of introspective, remembering pang. At other extreme stands the singer's fancy, the singer's esprit, as the French would call it, that guides her and her hearers gaily through the whimsies of Chabrier's caprice about the ducks and playfully through the "gentillesses" of Debussy's "Mandoline." Only in Richepin's grewsome and piteous tale of the lad, the heart, the cruel courtesan and the pardoning mother did Mme. Frijsh fall short of illusion, in part doubtless because of Gounod's pale music, in part, probably, from lack of the personifying power that Mme Guilbert brings to the narrating. Nor for Mme. Frijsh are the mere bald declamation of Greig's "Staunch Friend" or the commonplace mood and images of Sinding's "May Night." Out of next to nothing, she can only make a little less than something. Elsewhere—the more surely, the more variously for her new resources—she achieves the finest story of the singer, works of the imagination.

Novel Pieces in Prospect

Mr. Rabaud's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon, March 14, and Saturday evening, March 15, is plentiful in novel and promising music—a suite, "Musiques de Plein Air," by Florent Schmitt, to be played for the first times in Boston; Saint-Saens's symphony in A minor, rarely heard in concerts in America; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," the earlier tone-picture whence sprang the later opera; and a concerto (No. 2 in F major) of Bach, for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, with accompanying harpsichord. In this piece of eighteenth century chamber music, Mr Fradkin, Mr. Longy, Mr. Laurent and Mr Heim will play the solo instruments and Mr. C. W. Adams, the harpsichord. All five, moreover, will follow the original score of Bach without later retouchings, since Mr. Adams is expert and inventive enough to supply the accompaniment when the engraved page only hints at it. Since the distant day in which Dr. Muck and the orchestra played the tone-poem, "The Tragedy of Salome," no music by Schmitt has been heard at the Symphony Concerts. To most hearers, likewise, Saint-Saëns's symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture will be novel and interesting matter. Only Chabrier's "Espana" [illegible] number on the programme, is a familiar repertory piece.

This concerto by Bach will be played also at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York, on Saturday afternoon, March 22. For it also, Mr. Rabaud proposes Saint-Saëns "organ symphony," played here in Boston early in the season and with no little eloquence. New York is also to hear Mr. Rabaud's and the orchestra version of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and of Debussy's two Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Fêtes."

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
4.5 mm 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
3.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TIGHT BINDING

Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 8 1919

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

THE first year of peace has not been all beer and skittles for some of our great orchestral organizations, and among these has been the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Troubles both financial and artistic appear to have beset the famous organization, and, from a recent article in the Boston Transcript, some doubt actually existed for a time as to the future of the orchestra. However, the deficit was guaranteed by private subscription and the continuance of the orchestra assured for at least two years to come.

The Transcript points out that "it has been an open secret for many weeks that the expenditures of the orchestra for the current year would considerably exceed its income. The cost of the reorganization of the band, begun last summer and completed for the time a fortnight ago, has been considerable, as the management has sought for many of the posts musicians of signal ability, who expect and receive large salaries. Similarly, the cost of travel has mounted and, as in every household and every business, almost all the fixed charges to which the orchestra is subject have increased in the ratio of the hour.

"On the other hand, in this year of transition from the old order to the new," continues the article, "its receipts have appreciably diminished—more from the concerts in Boston than from those undertaken in several other cities. The unescapable, foreseen outcome was a considerable deficit, estimated by those informed of it at, say, $120,000.

WHEN the situation became acute immediate action was necessary to save the body which has had such a fine artistic history and done so much for music in America, not only for the present season, but also to assure its future for at least a season or two ahead. Accordingly, to quote again from the Transcript, "the trustees recently assembled a few friends of the orchestra and to them set forth the financial and general situation in its affairs and prospects. From these friends and from their own members, they received subscriptions sufficient to pay the deficit for the current season, along with pledges that secure any similar deficits arising within the next two years.

"In the judgment of the trustees, it was wiser to ask for private aid in this fashion than to appeal to the town in general, as did the Philadelphia Orchestra a few years ago when it was in need of like relief and guarantee. The trustees in their wisdom have also preferred to keep these matters from the public, but as was inevitable where so many persons were concerned, more or less authentic versions of them have run from tongue to tongue, the best accredited of which is here written.

"The Boston Orchestra has many enemies, especially in other cities; wherever opportunity offers, they abound in malevolent gossip; the simple facts of the present situation, the more if the trustees themselves had disclosed them, may avert recurrence of it."

OF EVEN wider general interest to the musical public than this frank acknowledgment of the financial straits of the orchestra comes the news in the same article that M. Henri Rabaud may not be the conductor next year. It had been the general impression, at least outside of the charmed circle in Boston, that M. Rabaud has a contract extending over a term of years, but this seems not to be the case. The Transcript says on this point:

"With the continuance of the orchestra in its present estate and policies thus assured, there is hope, and even expectation, that the public of the symphony concerts here and elsewhere (which, after all, is its chief source of revenue) may soon learn who is to be the conductor for next year. For the time being, speculation and surmise, which is plenty, may run whither it chooses.

"It is impossible to say with any show of authority whether Mr. Rabaud is disposed to remain for another season with the orchestra, as many of his hearers would gladly see him do, or whether the trustees are disposed to continue him in his present post. In a single intermission at Symphony Hall it is easy to hear that Mr. Toscanini will succeed him, and that Mr. Toscanini is resolved to remain in Milan until he has set on the stage Boito's posthumous opera, 'Nero.' Similarly the fitness for the post of Mr. Chevillard, of Mr. Rhene-Baton, of Mr. Mengelberg, of Amsterdam, is variously discussed, although neither the elder Parisian nor the Hollander seems a conductor likely to please the public of 'these concerts.'"

AS IS natural, the name of the conductor of our own orchestra, Mr. Stokowski, appears in the discussion as to the new leader, if there is to be one. The article goes on, in discussing the conductorship: "There is questioning as well about Mr. Bodansky, of the Metropolitan Opera House, now an American citizen; about Mr. Gabrilowitsch, of Detroit; about Mr. Stokowski, of Philadelphia, and of new laurels in New York. Yet each of these three, whatever his desires or qualifications, seems led to his present work, while to Mr. Bodansky and Mr. Gabrilowitsch dissenters on wartime scores readily raise objections.

"As some say, again out of this cloudy background may suddenly spring a new conductor as relatively unknown hereabouts as was Mr. Rabaud last October. Doubtless in their own good time the trustees will dispel these mists of speculation and surmise—not the best of atmospheres for either orchestra or public—while from the experiences of last autumn, especially on the financial side, they must have learned the advantage of early and decisive action. At the least, they have not only assured the continuance of the symphony concerts, but have assembled an orchestra worthy of the ablest available conductor, whether it be Mr. Rabaud or a newly summoned leader."

IT IS to be hoped by every lover of music in the country that the troubles of this great organization will soon be satisfactorily settled and the orchestra restored to full confidence in its permanent future. At least this future is assured for two years to come and by that time matters may have so cleared up in an international as well as a national sense that a practical solution for its troubles may be found. No orchestra can appear at its best with such an atmosphere of uncertainty surrounding it.

Certainly it would be a musical disaster for any of the great American orchestras, which now take rank with any in the world, to be disbanded, because the artistic rivalry which they engender is a healthy one and makes for the betterment of orchestral playing. Then, too, the great orchestras constitute probably the principal single feature in bringing the best music to the people as a whole, upon whom in the end the entire musical fabric must rest.

Musical Events of the Coming Week in Phila.

SUNDAY—Neighborhood Sing, Settlement Music School, 416 Queen street, 8 p. m.
WEDNESDAY — Horatio Connell, vocal recital, Witherspoon Hall, 8:15 p. m.
THURSDAY—Mendelssohn Club Concert, Bellevue-Stratford, 8:15 p. m.
THURSDAY—Conly Concert Company, Witherspoon Hall, 8:15 p. m.
FRIDAY — Philadelphia Orchestra, Academy of Music, 3 p. m.
SATURDAY—Philadelphia Orchestra, Academy of Music, 8:15 p. m.
SATURDAY—Pupils' Concert of Institute of Music and Allied Arts, Presser Hall, 2:45 p. m.

AMERICAN
New York City.
19

TOSCANINI IS LIKELY TO RETURN

Willing to Accept Boston Symphony Offer, and Hammerstein May Want Him—Farrar Appears Again in "Thais" at Metropolitan

By MAX SMITH.

EVIDENCE tending to show that Arturo Toscanini will be in America next season is accumulating. To one of his friends recently the famous Italian confided that he was anxious to return to this country; that he felt, in fact, positively homesick for the United States.

As already suggested in The American, there have been rumors that Oscar Hammerstein, who intends to enter the operatic arena once more in January, 1920, is considering the advisability of engaging the services of Maestro Toscanini for his new venture and of giving him absolutely free rein in the artistic direction of the Manhattan Opera House.

However, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has offered Toscanini the position now held temporarily by Henri Rabaud, and it is no secret that the great conductor has signified his willingness to assume that post when he is at liberty to leave Italy.

"PARSIFAL" IN ENGLISH

SUN
New York City.
MAR 2 1919

108

Memories of "The Henschels," Musicians

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL and HIS WIFE

By W. B. McCORMICK.

MUSIC lovers in New York city whose memories go back to the '90s of the last century will have their recollections of the concerts, those delightful concerts, of "the Henschels" reawakened by the mere sight of the title of Sir George Henschel's Musings and Memories of a Musician. In those days the concerts of Georg (as he was then) and Lilian Henschel were on the same high artistic plane as the recitals of the Kneisel Quartet and were regarded as something that must be "done" if one were to be of the musically elect. Oddly enough, these functions evidently did not occupy so high a place in Sir George's esteem as New Yorkers would like, for he says almost nothing of them in his chatty, bright and amusing memories, centring all his attention on things American around his experiences as the organizer and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the ægis of Col. Higginson, in the years 1881-1883.

A prefatory note to the volume states that this book "was written and in type before the war," and it is to be inferred that the Germanic tone and atmosphere of the early part of the volume may have had something to do with its long deferred publication. If so, this prevented a warharried host of music loving Britons and Americans from having their troubled spirits quieted and charmed for a little while by one of the most delightful books of memoirs that have come to us in a long while. For Sir George Henschel not only gives his readers many delightful and characteristic glimpses of musical life in Germany in the '60s and early '70s, but even more agreeable ones of artistic and musical life in London after 1876, when he went to London for the first time and fell so completely in love with the British metropolis and its people that he remained for the rest of his life "bondslave to the isles of Vivien." Quite the best part of his German reminiscences is that devoted to his friendship for Brahms, and he gives one of his chapters to reproducing a most interesting diary he kept of a summer he spent with Brahms on the island of Rügen. Those of us who don't like Wagner will be interested in Brahms's comment that the "Ring" "would be really powerful and carry one away if it all concerned—let us say, young Buonaparte, or some other hero who stands nearer to our sensibilities, has a closer claim to our affection. And then the stilted, bombastic language. . . . I do not understand this kind of thing. What really does happen to the Ring? Do you know?" One of his casual references is to "another uniformed officer, Lieut.-Col. César Cui, a composer of great merit," who accompanied Count Paul Sehuvaloff as he played the violoncello in his own home in Petrograd, dressed the while in the uniform of a Russian General. That was the only time in Henschel's life when he "ate a dinner off solid gold plate."

Owing to the fact that the people he knew in London are a little nearer to us than his other friends, his English memories will prove the most interesting to the average American reader. He tells of Sargent—whose portrait of Henschel is one of his finest achievements; of Edwin A. Abbey, in the days when he was doing illustrations for Harpers, and Alma Tadema; of Jenny Lind and Patti, Burne-Jones, Whistler, Browning, the famous Blumenthal musical parties, Henry James, Ethel Smyth and the Semons. His anecdote of Rubinstein playing the Erl-King for Queen Victoria is quite the best story in the book and one that every one who ever heard that robustious composition will enjoy immensely. But another anecdote in which royalty does not shine in so charming a light is that of the present Empress of Germany, while on a visit to Hatfield House in England, asking Henschel to sing a song from The Trumpeter of Sakkingen, by a "second rate composer," as this author styles Nassler. Henschel expressed his regrets at not having the song in his repertory (he had just sung his own cycle from the original book), "and with a curt nod of the five huge emeralds in her Majesty's diadem was dismissed." It is to be feared Majesty's taste was that of the bourg

The last chapter, describing his vis Saracinesco in the Sabine Hills to local color for his opera "Nubia" give spirited picture of that exotic Italian hi village, so near and yet so remote from the Italy surrounding it. The name of the place will instantly recall to readers of Marion Crawford's novels the title of one of his best Roman tales. Henschel met Crawford, when he first went to Boston, in the home of the future novelist's aunt, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, and Sir George describes Crawford as looking like a young Greek god in modern clothes. Crawford and his family were of the opinion that Marion could sing, and Henschel was asked to pass judgment on that belief. His opinion was in the negative, with the result that Crawford turned to writing Mr. Isaacs, with what success in the field of novel writing the world knows.

MUSINGS AND MEMORIES OF A MUSICIAN. By SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL. The Macmillan Company. $5.

MONITOR, MARCH 8

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTONN, Massachusetts—To ask an audience to turn from the delicate and evanescent beauty of Debussy's nocturnes, even with an intermission intervening, to the conventional, limited and solid tunefulness of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is to require more than an adjustment of national and racial interest, it calls for rearrangement of artistic and social standards, to say nothing of stepping into another era of civilization. Debussy's clouds, wandering idly, though clearly defined, through the sky, disappear below the horizon when the orderly Mendelssohnian chords sweep across the orchestra. And this must necessarily be so, for between the Nipponese economy of line of Debussy and the Dutch opulence of discription of Mendelssohn a great gulf is fixed and folish and reactionary is he who would attempt to span it.

So Mr. Rabaud in the seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season set an unsolvable problem before his hearers, especially since the Debussy nocturnes were backed up by the rich harmonies of Tschaikowsky's variations on a "Rococo" theme for violoncello, and all this reenforced by the Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture.

The nocturnes were given for the first time in the United States in the revised version completed by Debussy. As memory serves from a former hearing, the orchestration has been tightened greatly, the outlines made clear and the women's voices in "Sirènes" treated more as a component part of the orchestra. The choir trained by Stephen S. Townsend, which has been used on former occasions, did excellent work, the effacement of the individuals in merely a choir of the orchestra being noticeable. Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist.

GLOBE, MARCH 8,

BEETHOVEN OVERTURE FEATURE OF CONCERT

Mr Rabaud's performance yesterday afternoon of Beethoven's overture to Collin's play, "Coriolanus," was one of significant dramatic force. Some may be more familiar with the noble Roman of Shakespere than with that of Collin. Nor need this overture seem the less opposite in the towering individuality it pictures.

Hearing Mr Rabaud and the orchestra one sensed the solitary grandeur of the character, the fearlessness, the nobility of heart and speech, a nobility not unused to tenderness, and in that resembling Beethoven himself.

The performance of Debussy's "Nocturnes," consisting of the three numbers, "Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens," was the first in the United States with the revisions in the score made by the composer before his death. The chorus of women's voices used in the last movement, sat upon the stage in a semicircle below the conductor's desk. They had been trained by Mr Townsend.

These three exquisite numbers, characteristic of the genius later to be dulled by ill health, received sympathetic treatment at Mr Rabaud's hands as his first programmed music here of Debussy. There was much of beauty in the first. The hearer stood in the presence of nature, untroubled by the touch of humans. The second is Debussy with his incomparable fantasy, a tapestry of gorgeous colors, bizarre in the spirit of exquisite play. A very beautiful and delicately imaginative performance.

Literally and figuratively the sirens occupied stage center in the number bearing their name. Sirens are persons most illusive when seen and heard at a distance—at least at first, calling from an opposite shore, from some inviting grotto or from behind the organ. If memory serves rightly, their song had such illusion at other performances.

The first movement of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is typically sunny, blithesome, gay in themes and their expansion. The second interests by its hymn, whatever its origin, and the steady march of the double basses: The remainder is the smug Mendelssohn, who for the mad folly of the carnival in the last has only a well-greased facility to exploit fiddlers. The strings in particular played the whole symphony with great precision, unanimity and brilliance.

Mr Malkin was the soloist of the day in Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme in which the 'cello is made to ride bareback, jump through hoops and the like. Mr Malkin appears to find pleasure in the jugglery.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 8,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BEETHOVEN, DEBUSSY, CHAIKOVSKY, MENDELSSOHN

The Faded "Italian Symphony" and a Audience That Knew It—New Eloquen for the "Cariolanus" Overture—The Nocturnes of Clouds, Sirens and Fetes Renewed Beauty — The Russian for 'Cellist's Skill

THERE was a sign of the times the end of the Symphony Conce yesterday afternoon. The fin piece was Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," presumably played anew because conservative conductors, French or German, believe themselves under such obligation to his music and his memory. The applause was not hearty at any of the pauses, while after the final measures it was mere perfunctory courtesy to leader and band. Apparently the audience thrust off Mendelssohn as it drew on its coats; in fact cursory inspections of the hall during the playing of the symphony disclosed it less as an auditorium than as a reading-room for the ever-entertaining programme-book. Now, the performance of the symphony had neither signal merit nor signal demerit. Mr. Rabaud was literal and lucid, discreet and dutiful with the music; the orchestra played it precisely, euphoniously. It was possible to imagine the symphony in more elastic voice, with apter flow of light and shade, with more heed for Mendelssohn's little strokes of instrumental dexterity than for his polished filling of orthodox patterns. Yet, it is doubtful whether the most animating and adroit performance conceivable would have stirred more interest, drawn more applause. The truth seems to be that the public of orchestral concerts in these days has plainly outgrown the symphonies of Mendelssohn—Italian, Scotch, Reformation, what not—and that conductors discharge only a "traditional" obligation, long since hollowed to emptiness by time and change, when they play them.

With reason audiences still hear gladly Mendelssohn's more fanciful, more light-handed symphonic music—the overture and the incidental pieces to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" compact of fantasy, humor, poetized artifice and pictorial illusion; the overtures of the "Prosperous Voyage" and "The Hebrides" for this dweller by choice in the inland cities of Berlin, London, Rome, was imaginative in his tone-picturing of the sea. In all four are measures inviting conductors and orchestras to little feats of rhythmic and colorful dexterity, to enhancing touches, to the play of discerning and embroidering fancies. The moribund symphonies are music of another sort—prosaic of motive, monotonous of progress, glossy of surface, but no more in substance or in whole impression than the faithful filling of prescribed moulds. Rarely in them does the Mendelssohn of fancy release himself for even a few measures; scant relatively is his play with happy dexterities. Beyond reanimation, the Mendelssohnian symphony has become withered and sapless. Only "the tradition" now brings it back at long intervals into the concert halls of the twentieth century—and then audiences are the perfunctory hearers of yesterday.

To write these things of Mendelssohn's sterile symphonies is not to write despitefully of the enduring classics that bloom above the years and through the fashions. One such stood on the programme of Friday—Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," music of the figure of Roman chronicle, of Plutarch, of Shakspeare and not of the stilted lifeless tragedy (by all accounts) that gave it birth. Eloquently, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra played it, with the grave, stately, lofty speech in tones that French actors of the spoken word and "the classic tradition" bring to the high austerities of Corneille in his Roman tragedies of "Les Horaces" and of "Polyeucte." Time and change do not dull the imagery or lessen the power of the motive that less suggests than incarnates the unbending Roman. No more do they dim or thin the beauty of the contrasting motive of petition and of pity. Again, as in the "Leonora" overtures, Beethoven epitomizes, conducts a whole drama and in yet briefer, tenser measures. The audience hears, perceives, is stirred. If from the theatre we may no longer receive tragedy, the opera house on occasion still yields it; while now and then the concert hall concentrates and distills it. To hear the overture, "Coriolanus," as it was played yesterday, is to hear in tones the exalted speech of ancient tragedy, to look upon its high-placed, far-falling figures, to know the voice, the tread of pride and pity and fate. The measures of the end are like the echo of this tragedy down the ages. Perhaps from the Parisian theatre where such plays still survive, Mr. Rabaud learned the eloquence with which he clothed Beethoven's music.

Incidentally, by right and title as the first violoncellist of the orchestra, Mr. Malkin played his annual solo piece. Wheresoever the concerto abounds, as it has abounded these many days in the symphony concerts of America, the first violinist, the first violoncellist yearly plays the piece of his choice. The occasion, his occasion, is the regular thing in the regular way, "the tradition" too well established for anyone to question it. Yet, upon second thought, the concerto, except for the signally illustrious violinist or pianist—and not too often even for him—has been banished in recent years from the concert-halls of Paris. There are formulas, customs that we in America may not wisely copy; there are others, say concertos from the ranks of the orchestra, that—but who dare speak of such a thing? Moreover, Mr. Malkin did not play a concerto but the briefer and often more fanciful variations "upon a rococo theme," Chaikovsky's one piece for violoncello and orchestra. It is pleasant enough pastime to hear it—to note the graceful lines, the easy flow, the pretty caprice, the festooning ornament of the music, to listen to a Chaikovsky, playful, artificial and light-fingered at his sport. Light, too, were the fingers and the bow of Mr. Malkin and flowing and gracious in its turn was his tone. He is not of the violoncellists who over-stress the voice of their instrument till it smears and blurs. Rather he summons it in undulating fineness, in subdued lustres, in linked progress of phrase into phrase and measure into measure. Nor is he heavy-handed when Chaikovsky sets the violoncello to dancing paces and teases it into cadenzas that are very rococo indeed. Perhaps he smiled within as he wrote them; perhaps even the absorbed Mr. Malkin smiles at them in his moments of relaxation, but he was sufficiently serious yesterday to brighten and soften them with a becoming elegance. Those eighteenth-century connoisseurs of salon music would have admired Josef Malkin, violoncellist.

To say nothing of violoncellos and violoncellists, even the power of Beethoven overture aforesaid barely withstood t beauty of Debussy's Nocturnes, strange overlooked, except for a single playing "Clouds," these seven years at the Symphony Concerts. Like the "Prelude to t Afternoon of a Fawn," like the opera Pélleas and Mélisande, they are music the young prime of Debussy, when spoke his mind and heart in tones witho thought, as in later years, of his ov formulas; when invention ran free and i agination beat high; when he was struggling composer, with a speech, a fanta courage and contempt that were all own; when he was not rich, fat, a co noisseur in costly wines, if not in bourgeois wives, an established reputation, convention, almost, of contempora French music. To exalt those days is n to forget the days that he enriched wi "The Sea-Sketches," with the ghostly m sic of "Gigues"; with the flash a fragrance of "Iberia," but those you years were the years of Debussy most D bussy and as such incomparable. N afterwards did he match that fecund and plasticity of invention that mak motive spring from motive, that twir and parts them endlessly through t three Nocturnes and yet sustains amo them the recurring, binding, haunt measures of the English Horn. Only "Pélleas" and in the prelude to Ma armé's verses do his harmonies seem su play of rare, spontaneous instant image do his sudden chords, his darting or ling ing rhythms so play upon mind and fan do the voices of his instruments shimm with such range of hue and suggestion. these Nocturnes, as in the opera and prelude, is music that bids the inner to changeful vision, that immerses the in a new, strange beauty, the like of wh there was not and still is not; that ting and glows upon well nigh every sensat in the hearer. A unique music, a music individual genius, a music that is not circles in the water.

The hearer may listen as he elects. he choose to hear the Nocturnes as "ab lute music," then will the motive of the English horn haunt him and other motives flash and flicker, caress, tease, entice. Then will he marvel at the delicacy or the force, the freedom and the plasticity of Debussy's rhythms, find phrase after phrase engrossing and stimulating his ear, follow long lines of tone till they coalesce and part anew, hear harmonies, see colors that are revelation. Such a hearer cannot miss the still beauty of the Nocturne of "Clouds," the sustained background against which the music moves in ever-changing shape and progress. No more can he escape the myriad tonal glints, the gleaming rhythms, the endless luminosity, the sheer flame and light in tireless motion of the Nocturne of "Fetes." As clearly he will feel the vague and fitful beauty of the sests and men [illegible] Mr. Townsend's choir yesterday with all its loveliness of tone and felicity of phrase and rhythm a shade too numerous for the floating measures?) He will hear this song as though it penetrated and haunted a music that already beats with the restlessness of the sea, that curls in the wave-like contours, that throws off the harmonic spray of the ocean pieces to come. (Did Mr. Rabaud quite interweave song and sea-music in the mingled illusion that Debussy sought?)

In better case, however, than this listener to the Nocturnes in the abstract, will be he who in Debussy's tones sees the cloud-shapes rise and traverse the still expanse of the outspread heaven, glow and fade in tones, vanish as softly as they have come. And in this concrete listener's fancy, the whirling sparks, the pulsing fires, the advances and recessions, the rising and the falling flames of the Nocturne of "Fetes" will be dream-pageant of all the colors and all the motions. Perhaps he will need to stretch his imagination a little to hear in the song of Debussy's sirens the magic and irresistible music for which Ulysses voyaging stopped his ears and lashed his seamen to their oars. Yet even in this song, he will hear wondrous echo of the voices of fantasy as in spray or wave the sea conjures them upon the attuned ear.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 10,

WEEK-END CONCERTS

FAIR FORTUNES FOR EVERY ONE CONCERNED

The Prowess of the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus in Debussy's Nocturnes—Miss Hempel in Fine Play of Her Fine Powers and in Music Becoming Them—Mr. Seidel as Violinist With Clear, Interesting and Impressive Individuality—Programmes in Prospect

THE repetition of Debussy's "Nocturnes" at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening gave fresh occasion to test and to praise the new quality, individually and collectively, of the reconstituted orchestra. Often the Parisian disposes his instrumental voices so that they are naked to the ear; again in one or two of them he isolates for the moment the substance and the progress of the music; while yet again, particularly in the Nocturne of Fetes, he seeks the motive power of tonal masses. It is the custom to say that eighteenth-century pieces are severe test of the virtue of an orchestra, since in such transparent music the quality of every tone, the incidence of every inflection stand clear. Debussy's music of the days of these Nocturnes, of the Faun, of Pélleas, is hardly less a mirror of the playing orchestra while it asks much more of the individual virtuosi in technical skill, in imaginative felicity of voice and accent. Even the instruments of percussion are charged with delicate suggestions of color, with subtle pointings of rhythm. Aptly on Saturday the players made them. From the brass choir came no hint of the mere bigness and corresponding coarseness of tone that sometimes of late has seemed to infect it under overdriving. The wood-winds, as often since Mr. Laurent at the first flute and Mr. Speyer at the English horn have restored the balance of the choir, were in flawless flow and euphony, yet with each voice in clear individuality whatever the shaded speech Debussy asked of it. The strings were as free as the brass from the mere weight of tone that sometimes passes for power; at moments they shimmered as of old; while their elasticity flecked the music with the light and shade of the composer's will and vision. The orchestra was limpid instrument in "Clouds," rhythmic instrument in "Fetes," fusing and fugitive instrument in "Sirens"; while from beginning to end, in the weaving of the harmonic background it added beauty to beauty, illusion to illusion. As it sounded on Saturday, a finer instrument has seldom tempted and stimulated a conductor's hand.

As sensitive to the composer's bidding, as discerning of his finer purposes, as impeccable in quality and euphony of tone were the twenty-four women-singers in "Sirens." In themselves, their voices could hardly have been better chosen—fresh, smooth, bright, light. Mr. Townsend's training had not only schooled the choir until Debussy's difficult intervals and phrasing became as second nature, but he had also blended the human voices until they compared in loveliness of texture with those of the flutes, the English horn and the other reeds of the orchestra. If only, perhaps, the singers had been seated in crescent behind these wood-winds, the texture of the whole sea-piece would have been as perfect. There was the more reason to rejoice in these merits because the Symphony Chorus had seemed hardly itself in the concerts of "victory and peace" last December. Obviously, its shortcomings then were the shortcomings of too hasty preparation. With time and opportunity, the chorus can still keep the mettle that it proved last year. The more the satisfaction, therefore, that next week New York will hear these women in "Sirens" and that, in the final concerts of the year, the chorus in larger numbers will pleasure its public at home.

HERALD, MARCH 13,

"POPS" TO BAR INTOXICANTS

Ten-Week Season Will Open May 5

Conductor Agide Jacchia, leader of the 80 Symphony players comprising the orchestra at the "Pops" last season, will again direct the concerts this year, it was announced last night. In setting the opening of the 10-week season for May 5, Manager William H. Brennan said that in keeping with the spirit of the times the serving of wine, beer and similar beverages will be eliminated.

In making this announcement the management points out that many music lovers have preferred to subscribe for balcony seats in past years, largely owing to a feeling that they might be expected to order intoxicants against their desire if they were to occupy the more convenient places on the lower floor. Since the public has shown that the musical program rather than the liquid menu is the greater attraction, only soft drinks and light refreshments will henceforth be offered.

Post Mar. 13.

DEBUSSY'S NOCTURNES PERFORMED

Symphony Assisted By Chorus—Malkin, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 17th concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of Beethoven's overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme for solo violoncello, with orchestral accompaniment, Debussy's Nocturnes for orchestra, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony.

The soloist was Josef Malkin, first 'cellist of the orchestra. A chorus of female voices trained by Stephen Townsend, assisted the orchestra in the performance of the last of the three "Nocturnes."

DEBUSSY AT HIS ZENITH

These three pieces are as modern today as when they were first heard in Boston in 1904—and the art of music is developing so rapidly that a composition which retains its pristine modernity for the length of 15 years gives reasonable assurance of being a work of genius. There are those who rank these nocturnes as the very high water mark of Debussy's achievement. If all of his other orchestral works were destroyed, these pieces alone would give him the rank he now holds. The first one, "Nuages"—"the unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and solemn march of clouds dissolving in a gray agony tinted with white"—this piece is indeed as a miraculous manifestation of creative power.

It matters little whether, as Mr. Calvocoressi claims, with considerable show of justice, Debussy obtained the suggestion of the harmonic scheme of "Nuages" from Moussorgsky of the later songs or not—Debussy uses the idea after a manner completely his own. He polishes the precious jewel and gives it an incomparable setting. It is the spirit and not the letter which counts in art. Moussorgsky's song—it is one of the cycle "Without Sunlight"—profoundly impressive in itself, is an inspiration native and authentic with the great Russian. Suppose Debussy did help himself to this treasure, as he may well have done? It will be found that his conception, coloring, technic are wholly at variance with like processes in the composition of Moussorgsky.

Not Astonishing in Harmony

The Second Nocturne is not so astonishing, in harmony as it is pagan and antique in spirit. Think of anything you like of notes dancing in the sunbeams, of the joy of the forest on a marvellous, windy autumn day, or the wanton play of spirits of the air—it is music sprung from the elements, born of the earth from which the creative artist sprang. And the middle portion of this piece of nature music is of a barbaric pomp and gorgeousness almost, as it seems today—this moment—without parallel. Perhaps the composer was thinking of the sunrise, the sun that rises like trumpets and thunder out of the East, prouder and greater than any ancient king.

There is that in the thrumming and plunking of strings and the splendid summons of the trumpets which causes the heart almost to stop beating in wonder at a phenomenon ever new, and older than humanity itself. How simply it is done, how much every note says, how surely the thought develops to its inevitable fulfilment.

As the Song of the Sea

The third Nocturne is as impressionistic, in another vein, as the first—the moonlist sea, the voices of sirens that float over the waters. The song should seem to come from nowhere and from everywhere. It is heard through the soughing of night winds, the grave, calm under-tone of great depths, the swish of spray. It is as the very song of the sea, and the harmonies of the music are as precious and as rare as the colors of mother-of-pearl. It seemed to us—it is a matter of individual impression and opinion, that at times the voices of the singers were too strong, too present, as one might say, not always mysterious and remote enough and not sufficiently homogenous with the orchestral tone. Be it as it may, the music wove its spell—music not heard before Debussy put pen to paper, music which will not be written again, by any composer to come. After the performance Mr. Rabaud brought Mr. Townsend on the stage to acknowledge the applause with him.

Mr. Malkin's Solo

Mr. Malkin, for reasons best known to himself, chose the somewhat lugubrious variations of Tschaikowsky for his display piece. That he played the music like a thorough musician, an experienced and accomplished virtuoso, is and was a foregone conclusion. But why this music? Admitted that good pieces for 'cello are rare, that the 'cello is not an ideal concert instrument—are there not more interesting 'cello suites, concertos, variations for a symphony concert? There is a certain charm in the "rococo" air, but the variations are slight, pretty rather than imaginative, ornamental in a superficial way. The one in dance rhythm, toward the end, is interesting and enlivening. In the cadenza the 'cellist may pluck, and trum, and buzz busily up and down his keyboard as he listeth. What avails it all?

The 'cellist was applauded and recalled. He could have chosen a more worthy vehicle of his skill.

GLOBE, MARCH 8,

BEETHOVEN OVERTURE FEATURE OF CONCERT

Mr Rabaud's performance yesterday afternoon of Beethoven's overture to Collin's play, "Coriolanus," was one of significant dramatic force. Some may be more familiar with the noble Roman of Shakespere than with that of Collin. Nor need this overture seem the less opposite in the towering individuality it pictures.

Hearing Mr Rabaud and the orchestra one sensed the solitary grandeur of the character, the fearlessness, the nobility of heart and speech, a nobility not unused to tenderness, and in that resembling Beethoven himself.

The performance of Debussy's "Nocturnes," consisting of the three numbers, "Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens," was the first in the United States with the revisions in the score made by the composer before his death. The chorus of women's voices used in the last movement, sat upon the stage in a semicircle below the conductor's desk. They had been trained by Mr Townsend.

These three exquisite numbers, characteristic of the genius later to be dulled by ill health, received sympathetic treatment at Mr Rabaud's hands as his first programmed music here of Debussy. There was much of beauty in the first. The hearer stood in the presence of nature, untroubled by the touch of humans. The second is Debussy with his incomparable fantasy, a tapestry of gorgeous colors, bizarre in the spirit of exquisite play. A very beautiful and delicately imaginative performance.

Literally and figuratively the sirens occupied stage center in the number bearing their name. Sirens are persons most illusive when seen and heard at a distance—at least at first, calling from an opposite shore, from some inviting grotto or from behind the organ. If memory serves rightly, their song had such illusion at other performances.

The first movement of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is typically sunny, blithesome, gay in themes and their expansion. The second interests by its hymn, whatever its origin, and the steady march of the double basses: The remainder is the smug Mendelssohn, who for the mad folly of the carnival in the last has only a well-greased facility to exploit fiddlers. The strings in particular played the whole symphony with great precision, unanimity and brilliance.

Mr Malkin was the soloist of the day in Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme in which the 'cello is made to ride bareback, jump through hoops and the like. Mr Malkin appears to find pleasure in the jugglery.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 8,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BEETHOVEN, DEBUSSY, CHAIKOVSKY, MENDELSSOHN

The Faded "Italian Symphony" and a Audience That Knew It—New Eloquen for the "Cariolanus" Overture—The Nocturnes of Clouds, Sirens and Fetes Renewed Beauty — The Russian for 'Cellist's Skill

THERE was a sign of the times the end of the Symphony Conce yesterday afternoon. The fin piece was Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," presumably played anew because conservative conductors, French or German, believe themselves under such obligation to his music and his memory. The applause was not hearty at any of the pauses, while after the final measures it was mere perfunctory courtesy to leader and band. Apparently the audience thrust off Mendelssohn as it drew on its coats; in fact cursory inspections of the hall during the playing of the symphony disclosed it less as an auditorium than as a reading-room for the ever-entertaining programme-book. Now, the performance of the symphony had neither signal merit nor signal demerit. Mr. Rabaud was literal and lucid, discreet and dutiful with the music; the orchestra played it precisely, euphoniously. It was possible to imagine the symphony in more elastic voice, with apter flow of light and shade, with more heed for Mendelssohn's little strokes of instrumental dexterity than for his polished filling of orthodox patterns. Yet, it is doubtful whether the most animating and adroit performance conceivable would have stirred more interest, drawn more applause. The truth seems to be that the public of orchestral concerts in these days has plainly outgrown the symphonies of Mendelssohn—Italian, Scotch, Reformation, what not—and that conductors discharge only a "traditional" obligation, long since hollowed to emptiness by time and change, when they play them.

With reason audiences still hear gladly Mendelssohn's more fanciful, more light-handed symphonic music—the overture and the incidental pieces to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" compact of fantasy, humor, poetized artifice and pictorial illusion; the overtures of the "Prosperous Voyage" and "The Hebrides" for this dweller by choice in the inland cities of Berlin, London, Rome, was imaginative in his tone-picturing of the sea. In all four are measures inviting conductors and orchestras to little feats of rhythmic and colorful dexterity, to enhancing touches, to the play of discerning and embroidering fancies. The moribund symphonies are music of another sort—prosaic of motive, monotonous of progress, glossy of surface, but no more in substance or in whole impression than the faithful filling of prescribed moulds. Rarely in them does the Mendelssohn of fancy release himself for even a few measures; scant relatively is his play with happy dexterities. Beyond reanimation, the Mendelssohnian symphony has become withered and sapless. Only "the tradition" now brings it back at long intervals into the concert halls of the twentieth century—and then audiences are the perfunctory hearers of yesterday.

To write these things of Mendelssohn's sterile symphonies is not to write despitefully of the enduring classics that bloom above the years and through the fashions. One such stood on the programme of Friday—Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," music of the figure of Roman chronicle, of Plutarch, of Shakspeare and not of the stilted lifeless tragedy (by all accounts) that gave it birth. Eloquently, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra played it, with the grave, stately, lofty speech in tones that French actors of the spoken word and "the classic tradition" bring to the high austerities of Corneille in his Roman tragedies of "Les Horaces" and of "Polyeucte." Time and change do not dull the imagery or lessen the power of the motive that less suggests than incarnates the unbending Roman. No more do they dim or thin the beauty of the contrasting motive of petition and of pity. Again, as in the "Leonora" overtures, Beethoven epitomizes, conducts a whole drama and in yet briefer, tenser measures. The audience hears, perceives, is stirred. If from the theatre we may no longer receive tragedy, the opera house on occasion still yields it; while now and then the concert hall concentrates and distills it. To hear the overture, "Coriolanus," as it was played yesterday, is to hear in tones the exalted speech of ancient tragedy, to look upon its high-placed, far-falling figures, to know the voice, the tread of pride and pity and fate. The measures of the end are like the echo of this tragedy down the ages. Perhaps from the Parisian theatre where such plays still survive, Mr. Rabaud learned the eloquence with which he clothed Beethoven's music.

Incidentally, by right and title as the first violoncellist of the orchestra, Mr. Malkin played his annual solo piece. Wheresoever the concerto abounds, as it has abounded these many days in the symphony concerts of America, the first violinist, the first violoncellist yearly plays the piece of his choice. The occasion, his occasion, is the regular thing in the regular way, "the tradition" too well established for anyone to question it. Yet, upon second thought, the concerto, except for the signally illustrious violinist or pianist—and not too often even for him—has been banished in recent years from the concert-halls of Paris. There are formulas, customs that we in America may not wisely copy; there are others, say concertos from the ranks of the orchestra, that—but who dare speak of such a thing? Moreover, Mr. Malkin did not play a concerto but the briefer and often more fanciful variations "upon a rococo theme," Chaikovsky's one piece for violoncello and orchestra. It is pleasant enough pastime to hear it—to note the graceful lines, the easy flow, the pretty caprice, the festooning ornament of the music, to listen to a Chaikovsky, playful, artificial and light-fingered at his sport. Light, too, were the fingers and the bow of Mr. Malkin and flowing and gracious in its turn was his tone. He is not of the violoncellists who over-stress the voice of their instrument till it smears and blurs. Rather he summons it in undulating fineness, in subdued lustres, in linked progress of phrase into phrase and measure into measure. Nor is he heavy-handed when Chaikovsky sets the violoncello to dancing paces and teases it into cadenzas that are very rococo indeed. Perhaps he smiled within as he wrote them; perhaps even the absorbed Mr. Malkin smiles at them in his moments of relaxation, but he was sufficiently serious yesterday to brighten and soften them with a becoming elegance. Those eighteenth-century connoisseurs of salon music would have admired Josef Malkin, violoncellist.

To say nothing of violoncellos and violoncellists, even the power of Beethoven overture aforesaid barely withstood t beauty of Debussy's Nocturnes, strange overlooked, except for a single playing "Clouds," these seven years at the Symphony Concerts. Like the "Prelude to t Afternoon of a Fawn," like the opera Pélleas and Mélisande, they are music the young prime of Debussy, when spoke his mind and heart in tones witho thought, as in later years, of his ov formulas; when invention ran free and i agination beat high; when he was struggling composer, with a speech, a fanta courage and contempt that were all own; when he was not rich, fat, a co noisseur in costly wines, if not in bourgeois wives, an established reputation, convention, almost, of contempora French music. To exalt those days is n to forget the days that he enriched wi "The Sea-Sketches," with the ghostly m sic of "Gigues"; with the flash a fragrance of "Iberia," but those you years were the years of Debussy most I bussy and as such incomparable. N afterwards did he match that fecund and plasticity of invention that mak motive spring from motive, that twir and parts them endlessly through t three Nocturnes and yet sustains amo them the recurring, binding, haunt measures of the English Horn. Only "Pélleas" and in the prelude to Ma armé's verses do his harmonies seem su play of rare, spontaneous instant image do his sudden chords, his darting or ling ing rhythms so play upon mind and fan do the voices of his instruments shimm with such range of hue and suggestion. these Nocturnes, as in the opera and prelude, is music that bids the inner to changeful vision, that immerses the in a new, strange beauty, the like of wh there was not and still is not; that ting and glows upon well nigh every sensat in the hearer. A unique music, a music individual genius, a music that is not circles in the water.

The hearer may listen as he elects. he choose to hear the Nocturnes as "ab lute music," then will the motive of the English horn haunt him and other motives flash and flicker, caress, tease, entice. Then will he marvel at the delicacy or the force, the freedom and the plasticity of Debussy's rhythms, find phrase after phrase engrossing and stimulating his ear, follow long lines of tone till they coalesce and part anew, hear harmonies, see colors that are revelation. Such a hearer cannot miss the still beauty of the Nocturne of "Clouds," the sustained background against which the music moves in ever-changing shape and progress. No more can he escape the myriad tonal glints, the gleaming rhythms, the endless luminosity, the sheer flame and light in tireless motion of the Nocturne of "Fetes." As clearly he will feel the vague and fitful beauty of the

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 10,

WEEK-END CONCERTS

FAIR FORTUNES FOR EVERY ONE CONCERNED

The Prowess of the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus in Debussy's Nocturnes—Miss Hempel in Fine Play of Her Fine Powers and in Music Becoming Them—Mr. Seidel as Violinist With Clear, Interesting and Impressive Individuality—Programmes in Prospect

THE repetition of Debussy's "Nocturnes" at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening gave fresh occasion to test and to praise the new quality, individually and collectively, of the reconstituted orchestra. Often the Parisian disposes his instrumental voices so that they are naked to the ear; again in one or two of them he isolates for the moment the substance and the progress of the music; while yet again, particularly in the Nocturne of Fetes, he seeks the motive power of tonal masses. It is the custom to say that eighteenth-century pieces are severe test of the virtue of an orchestra, since in such transparent music the quality of every tone, the incidence of every inflection stand clear. Debussy's music of the days of these Nocturnes, of the Faun, of Pélleas, is hardly less a mirror of the playing orchestra while it asks much more of the individual virtuosi in technical skill, in imaginative felicity of voice and accent. Even the instruments of percussion are charged with delicate suggestions of color, with subtle pointings of rhythm. Aptly on Saturday the players made them. From the brass choir came no hint of the mere bigness and corresponding coarseness of tone that sometimes of late has seemed to infect it under overdriving. The wood-winds, as often since Mr. Laurent at the first flute and Mr. Speyer at the English horn have restored the balance of the choir, were in flawless flow and euphony, yet with each voice in clear individuality whatever the shaded speech Debussy asked of it. The strings were as free as the brass from the mere weight of tone that sometimes passes for power; at moments they shimmered as of old; while their elasticity flecked the music with the light and shade of the composer's will and vision. The orchestra was limpid instrument in "Clouds," rhythmic instrument in "Fetes," fusing and fugitive instrument in "Sirens"; while from beginning to end, in the weaving of the harmonic background it added beauty to beauty, illusion to illusion. As it sounded on Saturday, a finer instrument has seldom tempted and stimulated a conductor's hand.

As sensitive to the composer's bidding, as discerning of his finer purposes, as impeccable in quality and euphony of tone were the twenty-four women-singers in "Sirens." In themselves, their voices could hardly have been better chosen—fresh, smooth, bright, light. Mr. Townsend's training had not only schooled the choir until Debussy's difficult intervals and phrasing became as second nature, but he had also blended the human voices until they compared in loveliness of texture with those of the flutes, the English horn and the other reeds of the orchestra. If only, perhaps, the singers had been seated in crescent behind these wood-winds, the texture of the whole sea-piece would have been as perfect. There was the more reason to rejoice in these merits because the Symphony Chorus had seemed hardly itself in the concerts of "victory and peace" last December. Obviously, its shortcomings then were the shortcomings of too hasty preparation. With time and opportunity, the chorus can still keep the mettle that it proved last year. The more the satisfaction, therefore, that next week New York will hear these women in "Sirens" and that, in the final concerts of the year, the chorus in larger numbers will pleasure its public at home.

HERALD, MARCH 13,

"POPS" TO BAR INTOXICANTS

Ten-Week Season Will Open May 5

Conductor Agide Jacchia, leader of the 80 Symphony players comprising the orchestra at the "Pops" last season, will again direct the concerts this year, it was announced last night. In setting the opening of the 10-week season for May 5, Manager William H. Brennan said that in keeping with the spirit of the times the serving of wine, beer and similar beverages will be eliminated.

In making this announcement the management points out that many music lovers have preferred to subscribe for balcony seats in past years, largely owing to a feeling that they might be expected to order intoxicants against their desire if they were to occupy the more convenient places on the lower floor. Since the public has shown that the musical program rather than the liquid menu is the greater attraction, only soft drinks and light refreshments will henceforth be offered.

DEBUSSY'S NOCTURNES PERFORMED

Symphony Assisted By Chorus—Malkin, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 17th concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of Beethoven's overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme for solo violoncello, with orchestral accompaniment, Debussy's Nocturnes for orchestra, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony.

The soloist was Josef Malkin, first 'cellist of the orchestra. A chorus of female voices trained by Stephen Townsend, assisted the orchestra in the performance of the last of the three "Nocturnes."

DEBUSSY AT HIS ZENITH

These three pieces are as modern today as when they were first heard in Boston in 1904—and the art of music is developing so rapidly that a composition which retains its pristine modernity for the length of 15 years gives reasonable assurance of being a work of genius. There are those who rank these nocturnes as the very high water mark of Debussy's achievement. If all of his other orchestral works were destroyed, these pieces alone would give him the rank he now holds. The first one, "Nuages"—"the unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and solemn march of clouds dissolving in a gray agony tinted with white"—this piece is indeed as a miraculous manifestation of creative power.

It matters little whether, as Mr. Calvocoressi claims, with considerable show of justice, Debussy obtained the suggestion of the harmonic scheme of "Nuages" from Moussorgsky of the later songs or not—Debussy uses the idea after a manner completely his own. He polishes the precious jewel and gives it an incomparable setting. It is the spirit and not the letter which counts in art. Moussorgsky's song—it is one of the cycle "Without Sunlight"—profoundly impressive in itself, is an inspiration native and authentic with the great Russian. Suppose Debussy did help himself to this treasure, as he may well have done? It will be found that his conception, coloring, technic are wholly at variance with like processes in the composition of Moussorgsky.

Not Astonishing in Harmony

The Second Nocturne is not so astonishing in harmony as it is pagan and antique in spirit. Think of anything you like of notes dancing in the sunbeams, of the joy of the forest on a marvellous, windy autumn day, or the wanton play of spirits of the air—it is music sprung from the elements, born of the earth from which the creative artist sprang. And the middle portion of this piece of nature music is of a barbaric pomp and gorgeousness almost, as it seems today—this moment—without parallel. Perhaps the composer was thinking of the sunrise, the sun that rises like trumpets and thunder out of the East, prouder and greater than any ancient king.

There is that in the thrumming and plunking of strings and the splendid summons of the trumpets which causes the heart almost to stop beating in wonder at a phenomenon ever new, and older than humanity itself. How simply it is done, how much every note says, how surely the thought develops to its inevitable fulfilment.

As the Song of the Sea

The third Nocturne is as impressionistic, in another vein, as the first—the moonlist sea, the voices of sirens that float over the waters. The song should seem to come from nowhere and from everywhere. It is heard through the soughing of night winds, the grave, calm under-tone of great depths, the swish of spray. It is as the very song of the sea, and the harmonies of the music are as precious and as rare as the colors of mother-of-pearl. It seemed to us—it is a matter of individual impression and opinion, that at times the voices of the singers were too strong, too present, as one might say, not always mysterious and remote enough and not sufficiently homogenous with the orchestral tone. Be it as it may, the music wove its spell—music not heard before Debussy put pen to paper, music which will not be written again, by any composer to come. After the performance Mr. Rabaud brought Mr. Townsend on the stage to acknowledge the applause with him.

Mr. Malkin's Solo

Mr. Malkin, for reasons best known to himself, chose the somewhat lugubrious variations of Tschaikowsky for his display piece. That he played the music like a thorough musician, an experienced and accomplished virtuoso, is and was a foregone conclusion. But why this music? Admitted that good pieces for 'cello are rare, that the 'cello is not an ideal concert instrument—are there not more interesting 'cello suites, concertos, variations for a symphony concert? There is a certain charm in the "rococo" air, but the variations are slight, pretty rather than imaginative, ornamental in a superficial way. The one in dance rhythm, toward the end, is interesting and enlivening. In the cadenza the 'cellist may pluck, and trum, and buzz busily up and down his keyboard as he listeth. What avails it all?

The 'cellist was applauded and recalled. He could have chosen a more worthy vehicle of his skill.

GLOBE Mar 13

NO MORE WINE AND BEER AT SYMPHONY HALL POPS

Prohibition Hits Time-Honored Boston Institution—Big Stock of Drinkables in Cellar Is a Problem

Beer and wine no longer will play a leading part in the pop concerts.

For years these concerts have been featured by the sale of light drinks, but the strong arm of prohibition has dealt a heavy blow and the concerts and intoxicants have been divorced.

Patrons of the pops, which will open at Symphony Hall for a season of 10 weeks beginning May 5, may well say with Cassio: "O, thou invisible spirit of wine—"

The concerts this year will be directed by Agide Jacchia, whose conducting last year was largely responsible for the record-breaking attendance.

Manager William H. Brennan is in somewhat of a quandary as to what he will do with the accumulation of fine old wines in the cellar of Symphony Hall. It is probable that the stock will be disposed of to some restaurateur. It is said there is a considerable quantity on which a heavy duty remains to be paid. This tax may be one of the reasons for Mr Brennan's decision to divorce music and alcohol, because if the tax is paid, a price would have to be charged the buyer that would not favor its ready sale.

Mr. Brennan says he has observed that many music lovers have preferred to subscribe for balcony seats in past years, largely owing to the feeling that they might be expected to order intoxicants against their desire if they were to occupy the more convenient places at tables on the lower floor.

The service of refreshments, the management points out, is intended solely as an accommodation to the patrons of the Pops and not as a money maker, and consequently, since the public has shown that the musical program, rather than the liquid menu, is the greater attraction, only soft drinks will henceforth be served.

the middle por-nature music is and gorgeousness day—this moment
erhaps the com-
the sunrise, the mpets and thun-st, prouder and
ent king.
e thrumming and
and the splendid pets which causes beating in won-n ever new, and tself. How simply every note says,
ht develops to its

of the Sea

ne is as impresvein, as the first—e voices of sirens waters. The song from nowhere and is heard through t winds, the grave, great depths, the s as the very song harmonies of the us and as rare as
-of-pearl. It seemed r of individual im-that at times the s were too strong.
might say, not ald remote enough homogenous with
Be it as it may, the l—music not heard en to paper, music
itten again, by any
After the performrought Mr. Town-to acknowledge the in's Solo

easons best known he somewhat lugu-Tschaikowsky for
That he played the h musician, an ex-plished virtuoso, is e conclusion. But Admitted that good rare, that the 'cello cert instrument—are resting 'cello suites,
s for a symphony
a certain charm in t the variations are
r than imaginative, perficial way. The m, toward the end, enlivening. In the t may pluck, and ily up and down his
eth. What avails it applauded and re-have chosen a more his skill.

Drawn for The Christian Science Monitor

Henri Rabaud

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. RABAUD ON WAR AND COMPOSITION

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Because he is a typical representative of the generation of writers of music who delight not only our own day, but whose works, according to our best judgment, will endure for the delight of other days to come, Mr. Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was asked by a representative of The Christian Science Monitor to express his opinions on what effect the war would have on modern composition.

Mr. Rabaud was perfectly willing to admit that the war would have an influence on the music to be written, but he intimated that his interviewer was probably several years too early in asking his question. It would take a long time for the reactions to the turmoil of the last four years to be set forth in musical terms, he felt, and meanwhile the composers had been grievously interrupted.

Deprecatingly citing his own case as an example—for Mr. Rabaud is an extremely modest man and hesitated about bringing himself into the discussion at all—he admitted that living in a country which had been fighting for its life and the ideals of the rest of the world, had totally interrupted his labors of composition. War work, philanthropies, the overturning of the daily routine, all combined to throw the composer off the track. Then, too, the emotions that found expression merely in composition now found outlet in patriotic ardor or in sympathy with the war sufferers. Thus [illegible] foremost effect of the war [illegible] almost to stop the writing of music.

Composition Delayed

Mr. Rabaud was careful to point out, however, that on the other hand the war of course had stimulated a certain type of patriotic music which was palpably ephemeral in character. So taking it all in all, the first effect of the war on music had been rather a negative one. It had set composition back for some years, he thought. It was impossible to conceive, however, he felt, that the struggle through which the world had passed, including the dethronement of false gods and the setting up of practicable ideals, should not give rise to a form of musical expression which might put forth new forms and harmonies.

Indirectly, of course, Mr. Rabaud felt that the war had been responsible for changing the source of influence on composers. He felt very strongly more or less a pioneer, whose achievement is just beginning to obtain the recognition outside his own country that it deserves. César Franck never wrote a piece of cheap or uninteresting music, which makes him well worth the study that might before the war have gone in the direction of Munich or Berlin. Thus Mr. Rabaud brought out that before any direct result of the war could be apparent in the music of the present-day writers, there would be the indirect one brought about by the change in values placed on the writers of Russia and France.

American Composition

The subject of contemporary writers naturally brought out a query as to what opinion the conductor had formed on the American music he had read and heard. Was there any indication of a typical American school that he had observed? Were there certain characteristics that he could call strictly American?

No, he could not say that there were. He mentioned the works that he had performed during his incumbency in Boston—an orchestral fantasy by Frederic S. Converse, a symphonic prologue by Henry Gilbert, a patriotic hymn by George W. Chadwick, a symphonic fantasy by Henry Hadley, and told of other works which he had read, by Arthur Foote, John Alden Carpenter, Charles Martin Loeffler, MacDowell, E. B. Hill. These, he said, he had found very good, but there was a diversity of influence observable, and taken together they could not be called typically American. The real American music, like that which would show the result of the war, he believed would be written, but when — he disclaimed any faculty or intention of playing the prophet.

TRANSCRIPT MARCH 15,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ANOTHER PLEASING MISCELLANY FOR PROGRAMME

A Fable in Tones from Rimsky-Korsakov and Chabrier's "Espana" Both Vividly Played—A Neat Little Symphony from Saint-Saens's Youth — Schmitt's Stale Music and the "Trumpet Concerto" of Bach—Details of an Amusing Afternoon

WHATEVER the merits and demerits of Mr. Rabaud as conductor, of late he has made the Symphony Concerts capital entertainment. Nearly all his recent programmes have been agreeable miscellanies, divided between French, Russian, classic German and American numbers. Scarcely a piece has been over-long or over-intricate in kind; none has exacted too much of the casual hearer; nearly all have yielded general, immediate and easy pleasure. Out of many the new mettle of the orchestra has shone; not a few have asked and received the conductor's better powers. The programme of yesterday afternoon was excellent example of these pleasing lists, with a fantastic tone-picture, "Sadko," from Rimsky-Korsakov; a pretty little symphony from Saint-Saëns, youthful; a concerto from Bach, with four virtuosi of the orchestra displayed therein; novel, if none too interesting, pieces from the relatively little known Florent Schmitt; and for ending Chabrier's fiery and familiar rhapsody, "España." Not one of these items was so long as to irritate those who might dislike it; while the diversity of them brought in due turn satisfaction to many differing tastes.

Nearly all these pieces, moreover, lay within Mr. Rabaud's clear and tested abilities. The only music of pure line and stripped pattern, with which he is prone to be rigid and monotonous, was Bach's concerto, and for his shortcomings therewith, the prowess of Mr. Heim in the difficult and showy trumpet part, the skill and taste of Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent and Longy at violin, flute and oboe, were sufficient compensation. Once and again, as in the first movement Saint-Saëns's little symphony is linear music of dexterous workmanship and little else; but the finale leaps with the bright rhythms that Mr. Rabaud accents well, while the slow song and the half airy, half mellifluous scherzo are the pretty pastiches that the conductor polishes no less lightly and adroitly than the composer. Rhythm and color, both at Mr. Rabaud's command, are the essentials to inspiriting and graphic performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture and of Chabrier's rhapsody. In "España," indeed, leader and orchestra excelled themselves in the bite of the rhythms, the free motion of the music, the glow of harmonic and instrumental color, the warmth of their phrases, the fire of their modulations. It is hard to remember when the music of Chabrier has so flamed upon the ear, so run exuberant yet sure-footed race.

It was the composer who defeated conductor and orchestra with Schmitt's "Musiques de Plein Air," as, in his fantastic fashion with titles, he names these "out-of-door" pieces. All performance might lend to them, they seemed to receive in distribution of color, play of rhythm, roundness of phrase and songful progress. Even so, they seemed a mediocre, a pointless music written with pains but written also without imagination. It is hard to descry Schmitt's purpose; it is harder still to be interested in his accomplishment of it. Presumably the first "Musique" is designed to image a solemn procession of the country-folk winding, as in pilgrimage, through the woods, at the foot of a mountain, gradually ascending the slopes. The second would seemingly recall and animate an ancient dance, forgotten, ignored, elsewhere than in the hill-country, known or imagined by Schmitt. The third apparently would summon the luminous calm upon a clear summer day in these lonely heights. Yet almost nowhere does the music bear graphic suggestion; while almost everywhere it lacks either light or heat. Faithfully, it plods along the course until the composer is ready to halt.

Schmitt's motives neither quicken the ear nor stir the fancy. They are mere matters of sterile tonal fact. They kindle him as little as they kindle his hearers, and he can only dress and re-dress them in various harmonic and instrumental vesture. Being a practised composer, he knows the routine of these things; being somewhat more, he occasionally brightens and animates the process with happily imagined or wrought detail. Quite as often he is merely mechanical. Once and again, tonal coloring weaves thin atmosphere about the third "Musique" but never come the spacious and luminous measures that the composer seemingly purposed. The dance lags, sags in dull rhythms, in lifeless modulation, sounding neither as melancholy and ancient rite nor as village play and pastime. The illusion of procession in grave and wending march scarcely rises from the "Musique" presumed to image it. In the music of Schmitt, hitherto heard in Boston—in the savage and reverberant Psalm, in the mordant and sinister "Tragedy of Salome," in minor pieces of many moods—he was invariably interesting, individual. Yet in these "Musiques de Plein-Air," he is merely and steadily commonplace and footless.

At the least, Saint-Saëns is not dull in his pleasing exercise with artifice and fancy in the little symphony in A minor of his twenty-fifth year. The motives out of which he weaves it are as one listener called them—need the sex be specified?—"dear little themes." From them flowers first an allegro of skilful workmanship which is "appassionato" only in the studious pains obviously spent upon it. Saint-Saëns remembers Mozart, the youthful Beethoven, the methodical and polishing Mendelssohn—not to quote from them, but to hint, so to say, how well grounded he is in ancient and contemporary masters. He is resourceful, too, and economical; he has the wit and the courage to little strokes of his own; the allegro is well and fugally made. The ensuing "Romanza" drops from the tips of his adept fingers, is as prettily invented as it is fashioned. A touch of distinction in the handling saves it from place in the "Parlor Pianist." The scherzo flows gracefully until Saint-Saëns snaps it off at the very moment in which it should repeat itself—dauntless youth, ready to make the bourgeoisie of the sixties, if not "sit up," at least stir uneasily in their arm chairs. Last a genteel riot of rhythms, in the manner of Mendelssohn excited, and toward the end timely thought of Beethoven and a few measures, songful and mysterious, after the occasional custom in such place, of the master. Whether Saint-Saëns's saltarello betters that of Mendelssohn in the Italian symphony of last week, only the connoisseurs of Victorian musical gew-gaws may decide. In what for some are the bold and brazen twenties, Saint-Saëns was plainly mastering the theory and practice of "chocolate-box" music.

And it was a courtly Bach, as he could sometimes be, who wrote the "trumpet concerto" for His Royal Highness of Brandenburg. Possibly the Margrave possessed a trumpeter, who was as capable of high running passages, of long held quavers and semi-quavers as was Mr. Heim, yesterday. In and out of the first allegro flashes the trumpet in measures more grateful to the voice of the accompanying strings which it sometimes imitates; athwart the finale it is yet more flaring and florid. Possibly the eighteenth-century ear enjoyed these pastimes, these high and jerky tones, more than does the ear of the twentieth. At least it did not hear an accompanying music made stiff and sluggish, as it was on Friday, by the sheer weight of Mr. Rabaud's full string choir, nor a harpsichord that in so big a hall could barely purl its gentle way through the intermediate slow division. It was all very well for the conductor to return, except incidentally, in the trumpet part, to Bach's original score. But if Bach is not Bach when Mottl discreetly "arranges him," no more is he Bach when Mr. Rabaud clogs his figures and thickens his lines with a mass of string tone. His Highness of Brandenburg did not count his violins in sixteens.

So ran the pieces that filled the hour between the end of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko" and the beginning of Chabrier's "Espana." Yet through all the concert the memory of the Russian "tone-picture" withstood the impression of the rest. Rimsky was no older than the Saint-Saëns of the little symphony, when he wrote this music of fantasy, imagery, humor and graphic illusion. He spreads his sea-picture of calm or storm, and the ear perceives it. Down goes Sadko the minstrel to the chambers of the sea-king and touches the strings of his magic guzli. Measure by measure, the dance infects prince and people. The whole court of the sea-king dances and will not be stayed; the sea riots with it and will not be calmed—till Sadko breaks the strings and his music stills. Once upon a time, the Russian Ballet mimed this fable to this very music, in sight of Bostonian eyes, to sound of Bostonian ears. The music itself was yesterday as vivid with it, while it wove also a mist of romantic fantasy about the tale that dancers and mimes may not compass. What matter Rimsky's means? In the sixties, the purists may have questioned his dependence for suggestion upon rhythm, modulation, color. Perhaps the pedants still doubt today, though such means are the commonplace of music now written. It is the misfortune, however, of much of it that the composers do not mix the colors, deploy the rhythms, jewel the modulations with Rimsky's and with Russians' imagination. His fantasy, not his procedure, evades them.

H. T. P.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date.....

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Boston Orchestra To Be Heard in Saint-Saens' "Organ Symphony."

The most important number scheduled for the closing Boston Symphony concert of the season, at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 21, will be the "Organ Symphony" of Saint-Saens in C minor. This, the noblest and largest orchestral work of Mr. Rabaud's friend and compatriot, Boston found to be one of the French conductor's most sympathetic and monumental achievements. Also of interest will be Bach's Concerto in F major, No. 2, for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, which the conductor has restored to its original form, discarding the version, or "perversion," of Felix Mottl. Messrs. Fradkin, Longy, Laurent and Heim, the regular virtuosi, will play the instruments above named, and Charles W. Adams will play the harpsichord accompaniment.

The remaining numbers are Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

110

MONITOR, MARCH 15,

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Nationally speaking, the eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth season is made up of three French composers, one Russian, and one German. Musically speaking it will be found that it can be boiled down, as the newspaper phrase goes, to one Russian and one German, and two-thirds of the German's work can be eliminated. Starting with Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," Mr. Rabaud passed to Saint-Saëns second symphony in A minor, Op. 55, thence to Bach's concerto No. 2 in F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, thence to Florent Schmitt's "Out-door Music," a suite for orchestra Op. 44, which was heard for the first time in Boston, and concluded with Chabrier's rhapsody "España."

Interest naturally attached to the Schmitt music, which this reviewer found distinctly disappointing. The first part, though labeled "The Mountain Procession," seemed in its succession of peculiar harmonies and frank dissonances to picture neither procession nor mountains—in fact, it got nowhere. The second part was called "A Dance Out of Fashion," and nobody would shed tears of grief that it had been out-moded, nor could he be at all concerned if it never came "in" again. The third part, bearing the title "Momentary Calm," was like Mendelssohn's overture "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" rewritten in modern harmonies, but retaining its Victorian dullness and conventionality of sentiment. It is unfair to judge the Schmitt of the "Forty-Seventh Psalm" by this music.

Poor propaganda for French music is Saint-Saëns' second symphony. The gallic grace of the adagio fails to compensate for the emptiness of the other movements and the slimness of the ideas therein developed. Far better in this respect is the flashy but popular "España" rhapsody of Chabrier. The audience as a matter of course rose to it with much applause.

Remain now the Russian and the German. Some day we may hear this Bach concerto with an orchestra which does not smother the solo instruments and the harpsichord. Until that day comes, judgment on the first and third movements must be suspended. The andante, with its lovely harmonies and quiet beauty allows Mr. Fradkin, the violinist; Mr. Laurent, the flutist; Mr. Longy, the oboist, and Mr. Heim, the trumpeter, to shine in their stellar parts, individually and collectively. No number this season has been better played on this stage than the "Sadko" tone picture of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Conductor and orchestra gave an exhibition of musical tone painting and musical description both stimulating and satisfying. It is fortunate for modern music that Rimsky-Korsakoff happens to be one of the Russians whose influence is potent in these days.

Mar 15 ?

18TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Performance of Chabrier's "Espana" Is Extraordinarily Brilliant

"MOMENTARY CALM" HEARD FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsadoff, "Sadko"; Saint-Saens, Symphony No. 2, A minor; Bach, Concerto No. 2, F major, for trumpet, flute, oboe, violin (Messrs. Heim, Larrent, Longy, Fradkin) with accompaniment of strings and harpsichord (Charles W. Adams); Florent Schmitt; Out-Door Music: 1—The Mountain Procession. 2—A Dance out of Fashion. 3—Momentary Calm (first time in Boston); Chabrier, Espana.

The legend of Sadko appealed to Rimsky-Korsakoff, who wrote an opera with him for the hero. The symphonic poem heard yesterday for the first time at a Symphony concert since 1905 was used by the Ballet Russe for the ballet "Sadko," seen at the Boston Opera House. The story—or this particular legend, for there are several—was thus made familiar, although we did not see there the becalmed ship and Sadko, like Jonah, thrown overboard. Having sailed the seas, Rimsky-Korsakoff pictured in tones. The raging billows in "Scheherazade" and a calm; two widely different tonal seascapes, both eminently successful, far more so than Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony with all its movements now forgotten. The larger portion of "Sadko" is concerned with the wild dancing at the wedding of the sea-king's daughter. Sadko, an uninvited guest of sudden and surprising arrival, plays on his gusli for the dancers until the virtuoso breaks the strings and puts an end to the frenzy of the dancers and of the sympathetic ocean. The music fascinates by its changes of mood, the wildness of the dance, the oriental spirit, the brilliance of the instrumentation.

Saint-Saens' Symphony in A minor—it might be called a sinfonietta—was played in Paris nearly 60 years ago. It has not been heard here at a Symphony concert since 1892 when Mr. Nikisch waved his exquisitely manicured hand and turned the interesting pallor of his romantic face towards the enthralled audience. Saint-Saens has always been an expert assimilator. In this little work we hear at times the voices of Bach, Mozart and the early Beethoven, but with a Parisian accent. The first movement in spite of its fugal character is entertaining, exciting admiration for the workmanship. The second is charmingly simple. It has a Mozartian flavor. The trio of the Scherzo is peculiarly graceful and piquant, while in the rushing Finale there is towards the end a foretaste of 1919 modernism, an unexpected little episode, that might be compared to the mysterious measures in Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The Symphony contains many effects gained by the utmost economy of means. The music reminds one of Athenaeus's proposition. "Music should excite affability and a gentlemanly like joy." Mr. Rabaud is to be thanked heartily for reviving the long-neglected work.

The Concerto of Bach was first heard here Dec. 28, 1901. Mr. Gericke then used Felix Mottl's arrangement. Mottl transposed the trumpet part, written extremely high, and divided it between two trumpets. He added wood wind instruments and horns. Other arrangements, or disarrangements, of this concerto have been made.

Mr. Rabaud was anxious that the suite should be played as Bach wrote it. He therefore did away with Mottl's additional instruments, but retained his arrangement of the trumpet part. He also restored the harpsichord.

This reverence paid to Bach is praiseworthy. It is therefore the more surprising that Mr. Rabaud changed the title of the concerto in the program book. Bach wrote the title in Italian on the autograph score. In English it reads: "Second concerto for one trumpet, one flute, hautbois, one violin."

This concerto has always been known as the trumpet concerto. The chief interest in it has been concerned with the ability of the trumpeter to play the music of his part as written. Neither Mottl, nor Kretzschmar, nor Wolfrum, nor Richard Strauss in their tinkering of the score thought of giving the violin, ute, or oboe priority over the trumpet in the title.

The performance was a spirited one, reflecting credit on all that took part. Boston may well be proud of Messrs. Heim, Laurent, Longy, Fradkin and other virtuosi in the orchestra. It is hardly necessary to speak of the music itself. The Andante is beautiful. The spirited other movements might have been lengthened by Bach, or shortened without essentially changing the character of the music or grieving the hearer.

Florent Schmitt's Suite was played here for the first time. He was born in Lorraine. The mountains of his childhood were the Vosges. Had he come from the south of France, one might think that "the mountain procession" was Biscayan, for the Basques are much given to pilgrimages to hill places, as Richard Ford noted over 70 years ago, but the character of the music forbids this thought, for at these pilgrimages "the chacoli (a poor wine) and shillelah are devoutly used." Schmitt's music suggests a religious procession to a mountain, or one winding its way through a forest at the base of one. This and the succeeding movements show little individuality and a paucity of ideas. The effects are chiefly those gained by instrumentation. The composer is seen groping after something definite. There is, especially at the beginning of the first movement and in certain pages of the third, "atmosphere," to borrow a word from current aesthetic jargon. The music as a whole is pleasantly futile.

The performance of "Espana" was extraordinarily brilliant. The conductors of this orchestra heretofore failed to catch the spirit, the swing of this gorgeously colored, irresistibly rhythmed entrancingly romantic Rhapsody. Beside it the quasi-Spanish music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and even Ravel's and Debussy's seems northern and pale.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will make its final southern trip next week. The program of March 28, 29 is as follows: Gabriel Faure, Prelude to "Penelope;" Beethoven, Concerto No. 5 E flat major, for piano (Harold Bauer, pianist); Hill, "Stevensoniana," four pieces for orchestra after poems from Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verse" (first time at these concerts); Berlioz, Grand Fete at Capulet's House from "Romeo and Juliet."

TRANSCRIPT MARCH 14

Items of the Day

As some say who are familiar with suc matters, conductors having contracts t make with orchestras in the United State for next year are slow to sign them, eve when they have agreed to all stipulations They want, it seems, to learn who will b the leader of the Boston Orchestra next au tumn, hoping, perhaps, that choice may alight upon them. Many hereabouts, wh are not conductors but only hearers of conductors, wait as eagerly (or impatiently) for the decision of the trustees.

GLOBE—MARCH 16,

More Novelties by the Orchestra Next Week

Mr Rabaud continues to find novelties for the Symphony concerts. After this last Southern trip of the year the orchestra will include in its program next Friday and Saturday a week, the Prelude to Faure's Lyric Poem, "Penelope" and Edward Burlingame Hills' "Four Pieces for Orchestra"—(1) March, (2) Lullaby, "The Land of Nod," (3) Scherzo, (4) "The Unseen Playmate," after "A Child's Garden of Verses." Harold Bauer, as soloist, will play the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto.

Stevensoniana

"Any little boy," wrote Mr. Henderson in the Sun, when Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana," about to be played by the Symphony here, was introduced to New York last spring, "who listened attentively to the music would be likely to think that if he had not a good papa of his own he would like to be Mr. Hill's little boy."

Now Mr. Hill, who lives in Boston, has been regarded as one of the modern composers who stands upon the edge of the future and dabbles a curious hand into the unknown sea of "polyharmony." A disciple of Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky is supposed by many to be necessarily complex and sophisticated, by some to be "decadent." Surely he must be inspired by Verlaine or Mallarme, and not by such gems from "A Child's Garden of Verses" as these:

Mary Jane commands the party,
Peter leads the rear;
Feet in time, alert and hearty,
Each a Grenadier.

And:

Green leaves a-floating,
Castles of the foam;
Boats of mine a-boating,
When will all come home?

The music the critics found naive and delightful—entirely in the mood. One of them remarked that two of the best native compositions so far have been about children—"Adventures in a Perambulator" and "Stevensoniana." This, in the latter case, despite muted trumpets and delicate audacities of percussion. There is one explanation at least. Both Mr. Hill and Mr. Carpenter have little boys of their own.

POST MARCH

SYMPHONY USES OWN SOLOISTS

Virtuoso Quartet Heard in Bach—Rimsky's "Antar"

BY OLIN DOWNES

Various instrumentalists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Messrs. Fradkin, concertmaster; Laurent, first flute; Longy, first oboe, and Heim, first trumpet—and not a highly advertised visiting virtuoso, were soloists at the concert given by that organization, conducted by Henri Rabaud, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The compositions performed were Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, Bach's concerto No. 2 in F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with accompaniment of strings and harpsichord, Florent Schmitt's "Musiques de plein-air" ("Outdoor Music"), and Chabrier's "Espana."

A TONAL PANORAMA

The performance of Rimsky's beautiful music was highly imaginative, and how imaginative is this composition itself! The ship of Sadko is sunk by the angry waves at the bidding of the sea-king. The minstrel sinks to the palace of the monster. There, a Russian Orpheus, he defends himself by playing on his ancient harp, or gusli, a wild strain, which causes the king and all his court to dance madly. Thanks to his magic, Sadko escapes, with the daughter of the sea-king for his bride. All this is broadly and poetically pictured in the orchestra. A tonal panorama of rolling billows is as simple as it is suggestive; fantastical transformation passages, preluding on a harp, and then the exultant song of the minstrel are heard. There is a return of the sea music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, the magician of the old legends, conjures for us in various works the desert and the fruition of all the desires of man; strange caverns of the sea, the incredible tales of Arabian lore. "Antar" is a comparatively early work, not as substantial in musical material, or at least as advanced nd individual in the musical ideas, as more mature compositions by this Russian genius, yet it is music of unique richness of color and of an enchantment which the most sober-minded will hardly resist.

Used by Balakireff

Incidentally, "Sadko" contains measures to which Balakireff, apparently, helped himself bodily for his "Thamar," a work which presumably followed "Sadko," even in the compilation of the early sketches. There is a passage in the latter composition which is almost identical in figuration and harmony with Balakireff's masterpiece. It must be noticed too, that this symphonic poem of "Sadko" is the complete essence of the modern Russian style of orchestration, in which pulsatile instruments give not only rhythm but all sorts of tone-color, in which the old German formula of groups of instruments which hold chords with little significance in themselves for the sake of sheer body of tone is forsaken for an instrumental scheme a hundred times more picturesque, iridescent, pictorial in character.

The material in the tone poem of "Sadko" is identical with the principal thematic material of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera on the same theme.

Saint-Saens' Symphony

Saint-Saens' early symphony, it was composed in 1859, though numbered the fourth in the composer's published works, thus coming next to the fifth symphony, composed in 1886, is remarkable not only for its clearness and economy of means, but for the modesty with which the composer writes, and the spirit and enthusiasm of the writing. Today it appears in large part a French Mendelssohn and Schumann affair, but even in this youthful composition the Gallic wit, sobriety, and love of clear outlines are convincingly shown. Nor does Saint-Saens content himself with filling a preordained symphonic mould. His slow movement is of as modest proportions and pretensions as he chose it to be. His scherzo has a virility in the first part and a folk-like character in the second which set each other off in a finished and original manner.

Nor is the abrupt conclusion of this movement without individuality, while the finale is entertaining in a way of which Saint-Saens is peculiarly the master. Mr. Rabaud's revival of this symphony had thus much more than historical interest.

Bach's Concerto

Another revival of a sort, and thrilling in the extreme, was the Bach concerto, given as consistently with modern scoring as the mechanism of instruments manufactured today permits. The joy and vitality of this music, the ever-fruitful manner in which small rhythmical motives expand and develop themselves; the tender exfoliations of the song of the slow movement, supported by a substantial and unfailing bass, and the heel-tingling vivacity of the finale are the things of which we can remind ourselves in words. But these do not suffice to communicate the marvellous sensations that this music, perennially young, reborn, as it were, from instant to instant, excites in the hearer. Phrase expands into another phrase, and this into two more, just as the most cells of living organism grow out, one from the other, before the eyes of an observer. Nor does there seem any end to the process. When the final chord sounds one feels that it has merely punctuated a pause in this eternally recreative music, which is continuing its life as inevitably as the round of the seasons in sonorities, which have merely passed for a while from the ken of human ears.

The performance of the soloists was admirable in the extreme. Each man of the quartet was distinguishing himself and distracting the attention of the listener from one instrument to another of the group as the performance went on. The musicianly and finished playing of Charles Adams at the harpsichord, loaned for this ocasion by Ernest B. Dane, added materially to the justness of the effect.

Suggests Midnight Oil

At a first hearing we can only honestly commend one movement of Schmitt's suite of "open-air music." "Open-air" it is precisely not, to our thinking. The simplicity is studied, calculated—a matter, it certainly appears, of midnight oil. The first and second movements are outrageously long—an unjustifiable stringing out of poor material. This was an early composition of Schmitt, one of the works he sent back to Paris while enjoying the privileges of his Prix de Rome. It is outrageously unyouthful. The primitive and grotesque in "A Dance Out of Fashion" is strongly accented, but no primitives could have made the awful noises Mr. Schmitt achieved with his immense and skilfully handled modern orchestra. Little boys or young men who produce this sort of thing should be deprived of a pen while there is hope, and turned out to pasture.

A relief was the crackling music of Chabrier, music of indescribable wit and bonheur, of flashing genius, of the broadest and most absurd sallies, all touched in the electrical rhythms of

GLOBE—MARCH 15,

SADKO AND ESPANA BRILLIANTLY PLAYED

In the scenario for his undersea ballet in the Russian legend of "Sadko," performed to Rimsky-Korsakoff's music at the Boston Opera House four years ago, Mr Bolm, who impersonated the hero, caused him to cast such a spell over the undersea wedding festivities by his playing upon his gusli that he was able to carry off the King's daughter in a submarine of his own magic invention resembling a great sea shell.

Mr Rabaud gave a glowing performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous tone picture yesterday, one opulent in imagination and riot with color. The unlegendary but fantastic ending of Mr Bolm's pantomime would have seemed an expected one, could the orgy induced by the less, then most fortunate musician's playing have been interpreted with such taste and ardor.

To make the concert truly symphonic, Mr Rabaud returned to the chief theme of brilliance at the close and conducted Chabrier's "Espana" with an abandon, a sense of its characteristic verve and inspiriting rhythm which made this performance, like so many others of his "first times," the superior of all which have preceded it.

Saint-Saens' second symphony, unheard at these concerts since the days of Nikisch, has at least a curious, if not an inherent interest in revival. A score now 63 years old, it shows the early Saint-Saens, by nature a cosmopolitan, a well-graced man of the world, yet steeped in classic models of form. It is often Haydnish in a mid-19th century guise, as its conservative instrumentation is almost that of the early Beethoven, with no trombone, but a pair of horns, two trumpets, a pair each of flutes, obces, clarinets and bassoons. If the Conservatoire was shocked by Cesar Franck's English horn in his symphony in the year 1879, what of Saint-Saens' brief use of it here in 1856 in the quaint slow movement, beautifully played yesterday by conductor and men?

Bach's second concerto in F-major for violin, flute, oboe, trumpet with harpsichord (yesterday played by Charles W. Adams) and an orchestra—smaller far than that of yesterday—was another mark of passing time. Bach's parts for trumpet are well-nigh impossible today of their original effect. That in this concerto is for F-trumpet, written very high, even to D above. The modern B-in timbre, is out of character here, even in timber, is out of character here, even in the higher transposition necessary.

Mr Rabaud discarded Mottl's arrangement and gave some of Bach's trumpet part to a second player, Mr Mann. Mr Heim undertook the tremendously difficult solo part commendably. Unfortunately its severe demands induced him to use a cornet, more facile in execution than the trumpet, but out of place with its shallow tone. Could a capable player be found, it might be interesting to hear this music done with the now almost obsolete E flat cornet of the wind bands of a generation ago. Its voice might supply the clarion brilliance of Bach's smaller and higher trumpets.

The calm, lyrical spirit of the andante, in which the other three instruments weave garlands, is as modern as though written in this present year. Messrs Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim were applauded.

Florent Schmitt's "Outdoor Music," op. 44, suite for orchestra, was played for the first time in Boston. It does not add any distinctive honor to the reputation of the admirable French composer of the Psalm of barbaric splendor, of the engaging quartets for four voices and eight hands piano, or of the fantastic and very stimulating "Salome." "The Mountain Procession," evidently to a Wagnerian shrine, would seem to contain Tristans and Parsifals. "The Obsolete Dance" is out of proportion dynamically. The "Momentary Calm" has tranquil moments when it permits the hearer to forget the sol-la-si-la-sol theme which is everywhere

GLOBE—MARCH 29

Symphony Orchestra and Mr Rabaud

With the last Southern trip just completed, and six pairs of concerts remaining for the present season, there is timely interest in the Symphony Orchestra and in its conductor for that to follow.

The superiority of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was no better confirmed or declared than by the alacrity with which the envious raised their voices with the cry of depreciation in this crucial year of uprooting and reamalgamation. It no doubt is galling to some in New York that the Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to give five pairs of concerts each year in that city and to exactly as many people as Carnegie Hall will hold. It is probably more galling to read the New York newspapers the next morning and compare the reviews in general with what is written of the local orchestras.

To remove practically one-fourth of the man power of a machine as intricate and specific in its construction as a symphony orchestra, to supply the vacancies with individuals, many of whom are strange to each other as to the organization, to call a new conductor and set him to welding these elements into one instrument, is a confessed undertaking. If there should be momentary hazard to past standards it reasonably should find casual rather than surprised recognition. To seize upon these stages of transition as the standards of futurity is to show something other than a regard for the truth, much less for the welfare and health of the orchestra.

It has been the privilege of the writer to sit in Symphony Hall through every Friday afternoon concert of the 18 given except one. It was instructive and assuring to have observed Mr Monteux, both in rehearsal and performance. He was an expressionist rather than a repressionist and he was an able musician. Remembering his two weeks here, it is likely that he inspired a gratitude for his services which lead to excessive praise of his actual abilities. His ardor was prone to become hectic. In a concert he was too apt to harry the orchestra as a gust of wind the surface of a pool, but he served intelligently, conscientiously and well in the preliminary labor of organization.

Meeting Mr Rabaud at first casually one might have said, "A scholar, a dreamer, a visionary, but conservative, perhaps academic; a supersensitive and therefore lacking, it may be, in severity of discipline." To the courtly grace of a gentleman of France, Mr Rabaud added at the first concert he conducted, which was in Cambridge, the distinction of an interpretating conductor. His concerts here have only served to deepen and confirm that first impression.

Although a Frenchman, his Beethoven is noble, lofty, majestic, but human. His sense of the dramatic is not confounded with the melodramatic or the theatrical. He respects the formal rites of the classicist, but beneath them glow a romantic ardor and the poetic truth of life. His Schubert was a revelation. When have these imperishable melodies been sung with such primeval joy and freshness as of that unsullied, of the morn of the first day?

So with the old school, so with modern scores. It is only necessary to recall the recent performances of Debussy's "Nocturnes," of Chabrier's "Espana," of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade"—each of them in its own vein incomparable. With an unassuming, unpretentious, almost depreciatory manner, the range of appreciation, style, understanding in racial and individual veins, colors, moods, is amazing, wholly uncommon.

He has played no Tschaikowsky, no Dvorak, as he himself says; no Wagner until after the peace of Paris, and by way of a good example, no Strauss or other of the self-subscribed despoilers of Belgium—Weingartner, Bruch, Humperdinck and Nikisch, although the latter is a condcctor and not a composer. Otherwise, his programs have been fairly representative in repertory.

Whether or not Mr Rabaud cares to remain another season or more as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has endeared himself to this public and to these audiences as a man, as a program maker with a sense of balance and contrast as of content, as a conductor who week after week would bring to music more or less familiar the distinction of a new and rounded beauty.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

MAR 1 1919

MUSI

The last local concert of the seas by a visiting orchestra will take pla at the Lyric next Wednesday nig when the Boston Symphony Orchest under M. Rabaud's direction, will ma its fifth appearance with Reinald W renrath instead of Mme. Melba, as loist.

The Peabody's regular series of art recitals closed last Friday with Ma Garrison winning new honors in h "home town" through her beauti singing of an exacting program.

From now on until graduation time t majority of the Peabody affairs doul less will be more or less of the st dent variety, with the exception of t postponed recital by Hulda Lashansk soprano, which will take place March 28.

Dear me, it seems as if the seas only opened a week or so ago, and he it is already winding up! Unless a del from some managerial machine or oth appears and gets busy, only four mo events of real moment will occur.

These are two concerts by the Ba timore Symphony, the one closest hand being dated March 30, the joint r cital by Sophie Braslau and Efre Zimbalist on March 29 and the Heife recital on April 10. Interspersed amo these will be a number of informal r citals, chiefly of a public nature.

Guild Organ Recital.

William J. Kraft, who will give th third of the series of Lenten organ re citals this evening at Old St. Paul' Protestant Episcopal Church under the auspices of the Maryland Chapter, American Guild of Organists, is organist at Columbia University and is well-known as a virtuoso and lecturer.

His numbers will be Cole's Fantaisie Symphonique, Federlein's Cradle Song and Gavotte; Saint-Saens' "The Swan," Matthews' Scherzo, Callerts' Intermezzo, Schubert's "By the Sea," Jadassohn's Scherzo-Canon and Guilmant's "Marche Religieuse Religieuse."

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The announcement that Mme. Melba would be unable to appear with the Boston Symphony next Wednesday night, sorry to say, had the effect of curtailing somewhat the box-office sale. This is a discouraging proceeding, and is not at all just to the soloist engaged in the diva's place. Reinald Werrenrath is a young American barytone who has won a well-merited place among the leading concert singers of the day and who recently made a highly successful debut at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Mr. Werrenrath's numbers will be the recitative "Tutto e Disposto" and the aria "Aprite un po Quegl 'Occhi," from the fourth act of Mozart's "Figaro," and the "Vision Fugitive," from Massanet's "Herodiade."

No changes have been made in the orchestral numbers. These comprise Saint-Saens' A Minor Symphony No. 2, Op. 55; Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," the overture to Weber's "Freischutz" and Bach's Concerto No. 2, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with harpsichord accompaniment. This will be played by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, with Charles W. Adams as the accompanist.

AND MUS

Reinald Werrenrath

Reinald Werrenrath, the well-known American barytone, who recently made his operatic debut with the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, scoring a decided success, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert next Wednesday night.

Mar 15 ?

18TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Performance of Chabrier's "Espana" Is Extraordinarily Brilliant

"MOMENTARY CALM" HEARD FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsadoff, "Sadko"; Saint-Saens, Symphony No. 2, A minor; Bach, Concerto No. 2, F major, for trumpet, flute, oboe, violin (Messrs. Heim, Larrent, Longy, Fradkin) with accompaniment of strings and harpsichord (Charles W. Adams); Florent Schmitt; Out-Door Music: 1—The Mountain Procession. 2—A Dance out of Fashion. 3—Momentary Calm (first time in Boston); Chabrier, Espana.

The legend of Sadko appealed to Rimsky-Korsakoff, who wrote an opera with him for the hero. The symphonic poem heard yesterday for the first time at a Symphony concert since 1905 was used by the Ballet Russe for the ballet "Sadko," seen at the Boston Opera House. The story—or this particular legend, for there are several—was thus made familiar, although we did not see there the becalmed ship and Sadko, like Jonah, thrown overboard. Having sailed the seas, Rimsky-Korsakoff pictured in tones. The raging billows in "Scheherazade" and a calm; two widely different tonal seascapes, both eminently successful, far more so than Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony with all its movements now forgotten. The larger portion of "Sadko" is concerned with the wild dancing at the wedding of the sea-king's daughter. Sadko, an uninvited guest of sudden and surprising arrival, plays on his gusli for the dancers until the virtuoso breaks the strings and puts an end to the frenzy of the dancers and of the sympathetic ocean. The music fascinates by its changes of mood, the wildness of the dance, the oriental spirit, the brilliance of the instrumentation.

Saint-Saens' Symphony in A minor—it might be called a sinfonietta—was played in Paris nearly 60 years ago. It has not been heard here at a Symphony concert since 1892 when Mr. Nikisch waved his exquisitely manicured hand and turned the interesting pallor of his romantic face towards the enthralled audience. Saint-Saens has always been an expert assimilator. In this little work we hear at times the voices of Bach, Mozart, and the early Beethoven, but with a Parisian accent. The first movement in spite of its fugal character is entertaining, exciting admiration for the workmanship. The second is charmingly simple. It has a Mozartian flavor. The trio of the Scherzo is peculiarly graceful and piquant, while in the rushing Finale there is towards the end a foretaste of 1919 modernism, an unexpected little episode, that might be compared to the mysterious measures in Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The Symphony contains many effects gained by the utmost economy of means. The music reminds one of Athenaeus's proposition. "Music should excite affability and a gentlemanly like joy." Mr. Rabaud is to be thanked heartily for reviving the long-neglected work.

The concerto of Bach was first heard here Dec. 28 1901. Mr. Gericke then used Felix Mottl's arrangement. Mottl transposed the trumpet part, written extremely high, and divided it between two trumpets. He added wood wind instruments and horns. Other arrangements, or disarrangements, of this concerto have been made.

Mr. Rabaud was anxious that the suite should be played as Bach wrote it. He therefore did away with Mottl's additional instruments, but retained his arrangement of the trumpet part. He also restored the harpsichord.

This reverence paid to Bach is praiseworthy. It is therefore the more surprising that Mr. Rabaud changed the title of the concerto in the program book. Bach wrote the title in Italian on the autograph score. In English it reads: "Second concerto for one trumpet, one flute, one hautbois, one violin."

This concerto has always been known as the trumpet concerto. The chief interest in it has been concerned with the ability of the trumpeter to play the music of his part as written. Neither Mottl, nor Kretzschmar, nor Wolfrum, nor Richard Strauss in their tinkering of the score thought of giving the violin, ute, or oboe priority over the trumpet in the title.

The performance was a spirited one, reflecting credit on all that took part. Boston may well be proud of Messrs. Heim, Laurent, Longy, Fradkin and other virtuosi in the orchestra. It is hardly necessary to speak of the music itself. The Andante is beautiful. The spirited other movements might have been lengthened by Bach, or shortened without essentially changing the character of the music or grieving the hearer.

Florent Schmitt's Suite was played here for the first time. He was born in Lorraine. The mountains of his childhood were the Vosges. Had he come from the south of France, one might think that "the mountain procession" was Biscayan, for the Basques are much given to pilgrimages to hill places, as Richard Ford noted over 70 years ago, but the character of the music forbids this thought, for at these pilgrimages "the chacoli (a poor wine) and shillelah are devoutly used." Schmitt's music suggests a religious procession to a mountain, or one winding its way through a forest at the base of one. This and the succeeding movements show little individuality and a paucity of ideas. The effects are chiefly those gained by instrumentation. The composer is seen groping after something definite. There is, especially at the beginning of the first movement and in certain pages of the third, "atmosphere," to borrow a word from current aesthetic jargon. The music as a whole is pleasantly futile.

The performance of "Espana" was extraordinarily brilliant. The conductors of this orchestra heretofore failed to catch the spirit, the swing of this gorgeously colored, irresistibly rhythmed entrancingly romantic Rhapsody. Beside it the quasi-Spanish music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and even Ravel's and Debussy's seems northern and pale.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will make its final southern trip next week. The program of March 28, 29 is as follows: Gabriel Faure, Prelude to "Penelope;" Beethoven, Concerto No. 5 E flat major, for piano (Harold Bauer, pianist); Hill, "Stevensoniana," four pieces for orchestra after poems from Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verse" (first time at these concerts); Berlioz, Grand Fete at Capulet's House from "Romeo and Juliet."

TRANSCRIPT MARCH 14.

Items of the Day

As some say who are familiar with such matters, conductors having contracts to make with orchestras in the United States for next year are slow to sign them, even when they have agreed to all stipulations. They want, it seems, to learn who will be the leader of the Boston Orchestra next autumn, hoping, perhaps, that choice may alight upon them. Many hereabouts, who are not conductors but only hearers of conductors, wait as eagerly (or impatiently) for the decision of the trustees.

GLOBE—MARCH 16,

More Novelties by the Orchestra Next Week

Mr Rabaud continues to find novelties for the Symphony concerts. After this last Southern trip of the year the orchestra will include in its program next Friday and Saturday a week, the Prelude to Faure's Lyric Poem, "Penelope" and Edward Burlingame Hills' "Four Pieces for Orchestra"—(1) March, (2) Lullaby, "The Land of Nod," (3) Scherzo, (4) "The Unseen Playmate," after "A Child's Garden of Verses." Harold Bauer, as soloist, will play the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto.

Stevensoniana

"Any little boy," wrote Mr. Henderson in the Sun, when Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana," about to be played by the Symphony here, was introduced to New York last spring "who listened attentively to the music would be likely to think that if he had not a good papa of his own he would like to be Mr. Hill's little boy."

Now Mr. Hill, who lives in Boston, has been regarded as one of the modern composers who stands upon the edge of the future and dabbles a curious hand into the unknown sea of "polyharmony." A disciple of Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky is supposed by many to be necessarily complex and sophisticated, by some to be "decadent." Surely he must be inspired by Verlaine or Mallarme, and not by such gems from "A Child's Garden of Verses" as these:

Mary Jane commands the party,
Peter leads the rear;
Feet in time, alert and hearty,
Each a Grenadier.

And:

Green leaves a-floating,
Castles of the foam;
Boats of mine a-boating,
When will all come home?

The music the critics found naive and delightful—entirely in the mood. One of them remarked that two of the best native compositions so far have been about children—"Adventures in a Perambulator" and "Stevensoniana." This, in the latter case, despite muted trumpets and delicate audacities of percussion. There is one explanation at least. Both Mr. Hill and Mr. Carpenter have little boys of their own.

POST MARCH 15

SYMPHONY USES OWN SOLOISTS

Virtuoso Quartet Heard in Bach—Rimsky's "Antar"

BY OLIN DOWNES

Various instrumentalists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Messrs. Fradkin, concertmaster; Laurent, first flute; Longy, first oboe, and Heim, first trumpet—and not a highly advertised visiting virtuoso, were soloists at the concert given by that organization, conducted by Henri Rabaud, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The compositions performed were Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, Bach's concerto No. 2 in F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with accompaniment of strings and harpsichord, Florent Schmitt's "Musiques de plein-air" ("Outdoor Music"), and Chabrier's "Espana."

A TONAL PANORAMA

The performance of Rimsky's beautiful music was highly imaginative, and how imaginative is this composition itself! The ship of Sadko is sunk by the angry waves at the bidding of the sea-king. The minstrel sinks to the palace of the monster. There, a Russian Orpheus, he defends himself by playing on his ancient harp, or gusli, a wild strain, which causes the king and all his court to dance madly. Thanks to his magic, Sadko escapes, with the daughter of the sea-king for his bride. All this is broadly and poetically pictured in the orchestra. A tonal panorama of rolling billows is as simple as it is suggestive; fantastical transformation passages, preluding on a harp, and then the exultant song of the minstrel are heard. There is a return of the sea music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, the magician of the old legends, conjures for us in various works the desert and the fruition of all the desires of man; strange caverns of the sea, the incredible tales of Arabian lore. "Antar" is a comparatively early work, not as substantial in musical material, or at least as advanced and individual in the musical ideas, as more mature compositions by this Russian genius, yet it is music of unique richness of color and of an enchantment which the most sober-minded will hardly resist.

Used by Balakireff

Incidentally, "Sadko" contains measures to which Balakireff, apparently, helped himself bodily for his "Thamar," a work which presumably followed "Sadko," even in the compilation of the early sketches. There is a passage in the latter composition which is almost identical in figuration and harmony with Balakireff's masterpiece. It must be noticed too, that this symphonic poem of "Sadko" is the complete essence of the modern Russian style of orchestration, in which pulsatile instruments give not only rhythm but all sorts of tone-color, in which the old German formula of groups of instruments which hold chords with little significance in themselves for the sake of sheer body of tone is forsaken for an instrumental scheme a hundred times more picturesque, iridescent, pictorial in character.

The material in the tone poem of "Sadko" is identical with the principal thematic material of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera on the same theme.

Saint-Saens' Symphony

Saint-Saens' early symphony, it was composed in 1859, though numbered the fourth in the composer's published works, thus coming next to the fifth symphony, composed in 1886, is remarkable not only for its clearness and economy of means, but for the modesty with which the composer writes, and the spirit and enthusiasm of the writing. Today it appears in large part a French Mendelssohn and Schumann affair, but even in this youthful composition the Gallic wit, sobriety, and love of clear outlines are convincingly shown. Nor does Saint-Saens content himself with filling a preordained symphonic mould. His slow movement is of as modest proportions and pretensions as he chose it to be. His scherzo has a virility in the first part and a folk-like character in the second which set each other off in a finished and original manner.

Nor is the abrupt conclusion of this movement without individuality, while the finale is entertaining in a way of which Saint-Saens is peculiarly the master. Mr. Rabaud's revival of this symphony had thus much more than historical interest.

Bach's Concerto

Another revival of a sort, and thrilling in the extreme, was the Bach concerto, given as consistently with modern scoring as the mechanism of instruments manufactured today permits. The joy and vitality of this music, the ever-fruitful manner in which small rhythmical motives expand and develop themselves; the tender exfoliations of the song of the slow movement, supported by a substantial and unfailing bass, and the heel-tingling vivacity of the finale are the things of which we can remind ourselves in words. But these do not suffice to communicate the marvellous sensations that this music, perennially young, reborn, as it were, from instant to instant, excites in the hearer. Phrase expands into another phrase, and this into two more, just as the most cells of living organism grow out, one from the other, before the eyes of an observer. Nor does there seem any end to the process. When the final chord sounds one feels that it has merely punctuated a pause in this eternally recreative music, which is continuing its life as inevitably as the round of the seasons in sonorities, which have merely passed for a while from the ken of human ears.

The performance of the soloists was admirable in the extreme. Each man of the quartet was distinguishing himself and distracting the attention of the listener from one instrument to another of the group as the performance went on. The musicianly and finished playing of Charles Adams at the harpsichord, loaned for this ocasion by Ernest B. Dane, added materially to the justness of the effect.

Suggests Midnight Oil

At a first hearing we can only honestly commend one movement of Schmitt's suite of "open-air music." "Open-air" it is precisely not, to our thinking. The simplicity is studied, calculated—a matter, it certainly appears, of midnight oil. The first and second movements are outrageously long—an unjustifiable stringing out of poor material. This was an early composition of Schmitt, one of the works he sent back to Paris while enjoying the privileges of his Prix de Rome. It is outrageously unyouthful. The primitive and grotesque in "A Dance Out of Fashion" is strongly accented, but no primitives could have made the awful noises Mr. Schmitt achieved with his immense and skilfully handled modern orchestra. Little boys or young men who produce this sort of thing should be deprived of a pen while there is hope, and turned out to pasture.

A relief was the crackling music of Chabrier, music of indescribable wit and bonheur, of flashing genius, of the broadest and most absurd sallies, all couched in the electrical rhythms of

GLOBE—MARCH 15,

SADKO AND ESPANA BRILLIANTLY PLAYED

In the scenario for his undersea ballet in the Russian legend of "Sadko," performed to Rimsky-Korsakoff's music at the Boston Opera House four years ago, Mr Bolm, who impersonated the hero, caused him to cast such a spell over the undersea wedding festivities by his playing upon his gusli that he was able to carry off the King's daughter in a submarine of his own magic invention resembling a great sea shell.

Mr Rabaud gave a glowing performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous tone picture yesterday, one opulent in imagination and riot with color. The unliegendary but fantastic ending of Mr Bolm's pantomime would have seemed an expected one, could the orgy induced by the less, then most fortunate musician's playing have been interpreted with such taste and ardor.

To make the concert truly symphonic, Mr Rabaud returned to the chief theme of brilliance at the close and conducted Chabrier's "Espana" with an abandon, a sense of its characteristic verve and inspiriting rhythm which made this performance, like so many others of his "first times," the superior of all which have preceded it.

Saint-Saens' second symphony, unheard at these concerts since the days of Nikisch, has at least a curious, if not an inherent interest in revival. A score now 63 years old, it shows the early Saint-Saens, by nature a cosmopolitan, a well-graced man of the world, yet steeped in classic models of form. It is often Haydnish in a mid-19th century guise, as its conservative instrumentation is almost that of the early Beethoven, with no trombone, but a pair of horns, two trumpets, a pair each of flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassoons. If the Conservatoire was shocked by Cesar Franck's English horn in his symphony in the year 1879, what of Saint-Saens' brief use of it here in 1856 in the quaint slow movement, beautifully played yesterday by conductor and men?

Bach's second concerto in F-major for violin, flute, oboe, trumpet with harpsichord (yesterday played by Charles W. Adams) and an orchestra—smaller far than that of yesterday—was another mark of passing time. Bach's parts for trumpet are well-nigh impossible today of their original effect. That in this concerto is for F-trumpet, written very high, even to D above. The modern B-in timbre, is out of character here, even in timber, is out of character here, even in the higher transposition necessary.

Mr Rabaud discarded Mottl's arrangement and gave some of Bach's trumpet part to a second player, Mr Mann. Mr Heim undertook the tremendously difficult solo part commendably. Unfortunately its severe demands induced him to use a cornet, more facile in execution than the trumpet, but out of place with its shallow tone. Could a capable player be found, it might be interesting to hear this music done with the now almost obsolete E flat cornet of the wind bands of a generation ago. Its voice might supply the clarion brilliance of Bach's smaller and higher trumpets.

The calm, lyrical spirit of the andante, in which the other three instruments weave garlands, is as modern as though written in this present year. Messrs Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim were applauded.

Florent Schmitt's "Outdoor Music," op. 44, suite for orchestra, was played for the first time in Boston. It does not add any distinctive honor to the reputation of the admirable French composer of the Psalm of barbaric splendor, of the engaging quartets for four voices and eight hands piano, or of the fantastic and very stimulating "Salome." "The Mountain Procession," evidently to a Wagnerian shrine, would seem to contain Tristans and Parsifals. "The Obsolete Dance" is out of proportion dynamically. The "Momentary Calm" has tranquil moments when it permits the hearer to forget the sol-la-si-la-sol theme which is overdone

GLOBE—MARCH 23.

Symphony Orchestra and Mr Rabaud

With the last Southern trip just completed, and six pairs of concerts remaining for the present season, there is timely interest in the Symphony Orchestra and in its conductor for that to follow.

The superiority of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was no better confirmed or declared than by the alacrity with which the envious raised their voices with the cry of depreciation in this crucial year of uprooting and reamalgamation. It no doubt is galling to some in New York that the Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to give five pairs of concerts each year in that city and to exactly as many people as Carnegie Hall will hold. It is probably more galling to read the New York newspapers the next morning and compare the reviews in general with what is written of the local orchestras.

To remove practically one-fourth of the man power of a machine as intricate and specific in its construction as a symphony orchestra, to supply the vacancies with individuals, many of whom are strange to each other as to the organization, to call a new conductor and set him to welding these elements into one instrument, is a confessed undertaking. If there should be momentary hazard to past standards it reasonably should find casual rather than surprised recognition. To seize upon these stages of transition as the standards of futurity is to show something other than a regard for the truth, much less for the welfare and health of the orchestra.

It has been the privilege of the writer to sit in Symphony Hall through every Friday afternoon concert of the 18 given except one. It was instructive and assuring to have observed Mr Monteux, both in rehearsal and performance. He was an expressionist rather than a repressionist and he was an able musician. Remembering his two weeks here, it is likely that he inspired a gratitude for his services which lead to excessive praise of his actual abilities. His ardor was prone to become hectic. In a concert he was too apt to harry the orchestra as a gust of wind the surface of a pool, but he served intelligently, conscientiously and well in the preliminary labor of organization.

Meeting Mr Rabaud at first casually one might have said, "A scholar, a dreamer, a visionary, but conservative, perhaps academic; a supersensitive and therefore lacking, it may be, in severity of discipline." To the courtly grace of a gentleman of France, Mr Rabaud added at the first concert he conducted, which was in Cambridge, the distinction of an interpretating conductor. His concerts here have only served to deepen and confirm that first impression.

Although a Frenchman, his Beethoven is noble, lofty, majestic, but human. His sense of the dramatic is not confounded with the melodramatic or the theatrical. He respects the formal rites of the classicist, but beneath them glow a romantic ardor and the poetic truth of life. His Schubert was a revelation. When have these imperishable melodies been sung with such primeval joy and freshness as of that unsullied, of the morn of the first day?

So with the old school, so with modern scores. It is only necessary to recall the recent performances of Debussy's "Nocturnes," of Chabrier's "Espana," of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade"—each of them in its own vein incomparable. With an unassuming, unpretentious, almost deprecatory manner, the range of appreciation, style, understanding in racial and individual veins, colors, moods, is amazing, wholly uncommon.

He has played no Tschaikowsky, no Dvorak, as he himself says, no Wagner until after the peace of Paris, and by way of a good example, no Strauss or other of the self-subscribed despoilers of Belgium—Weingartner, Bruch, Humperdinck and Nikisch, although the latter is a condector and not a composer. Otherwise, his programs have been fairly representative in repertory.

Whether or not Mr Rabaud cares to remain another season or more as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has endeared himself to this public and to these audiences as a man, as a program maker with a sense of balance and contrast as of content, as a conductor who week after week would bring to music more or less familiar the distinction of a new and unfounded beauty.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

MUSI

The last local con[illegible] by a visiting orchestra will take pla[illegible] at the Lyric next Wednesday nig[illegible] when the Boston Symphony Orchest[illegible] under M. Rabaud's direction, will ma[illegible] its fifth appearance with Reinald W[illegible]renrath instead of Mme Melba, as [illegible]loist.

The Peabody's regular series of art[illegible] recitals closed last Friday with Ma[illegible] Garrison winning new honors in [illegible] "home town" through her beauti[illegible] singing of an exacting program.

From now on until graduation time [illegible] majority of the Peabody affairs dou[illegible]less will be more or less of the s[illegible]dent variety, with the exception of [illegible] postponed recital by Hilda Leshansk[illegible] soprano, which will take place [illegible] March 28.

Dear me, it seems [illegible] only opened a week or so ago, and he[illegible] it is already winding up. Unless a de[illegible] from some managerial machine or oth[illegible] appears and gets busy, only four mo[illegible] events of real moment will occur.

These are two concerts by the Ba[illegible]timore Symphony, the one closest [illegible]hand being dated March 30, the joint [illegible]cital by Sophie Braslau and Elfr[illegible] Zimbalist on March 29 and the Helfe[illegible] recital on April 10. Interspersed amo[illegible] these will be a number of informal r[illegible]citals, chiefly of a public nature.

Guild Organ Recital.

William J. Kraft, who will give th[illegible]third of the series of Lenten organ re[illegible]citals this evening at Old St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church under the auspices of the Maryland Chapter American Guild of Organists, is organist at Columbia University and is well-known as a virtuoso and lecturer.

His numbers will be Cole's Fantaisie Symphonique, Federlein's Cradle Song and Gavotte; Saint-Saens' "The Swan," Matthews' Scherzo, Callerts' Intermezzo, Schubert's "By the Sea," Jadassohn's Scherzo-Canon and Guilmant's "Marche Religieuse Religieuse."

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The announcement that Mme. Melba would be unable to appear with the Boston Symphony next Wednesday night, sorry to say, had the effect of curtailing somewhat the box-office sale. This is a discouraging proceeding, and is not at all just to the soloist engaged in the diva's place. Reinald Werrenrath is a young American barytone who has won a well-merited place among the leading concert singers of the day and who recently made a highly successful debut at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Mr. Werrenrath's numbers will be the recitative "Tutto e Disposto" and the aria "Aprite un po Quegl 'Occhi," from the fourth act of Mozart's "Figaro," and the "Vision Fugitive," from Massanet's "Herodiade."

No changes have been made in the orchestral numbers. These comprise Saint-Saens' A Minor Symphony No. 2, Op. 55; Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," the overture to Weber's "Freischutz" and Bach's Concerto No. 2, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with harpsichord accompaniment. This will be played by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, with Charles W. Adams as the accompanist.

AND MUS

Reinald Werrenrath

Reinald Werrenrath, the well-known American barytone, who recently made his operatic debut with the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, scoring a decided success, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert next Wednesday night.

POST, MARCH 16

Rabaud Is Muck's Superior

Popularity of New Conductor Does Not Rest on Patriotic Prejudices Against German, Says Mr. Olin Downes—Opinion Based on Rabaud's Leadership

It has been repeatedly stated in these columns and in other places, by the music reviewer of the Post, that Henri Rabaud, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is proving himself in important respects the superior of the formerly lauded Dr. Karl Muck as an interpreter. Some readers, including both pro-German sympathizers and those who are as hot against Germany as any, but apparently unwilling or unable to listen and think for themselves independently of precedent and tradition, have ascribed these statement to anti-German "prejudice" unworthily brought into play in the domain of musical art, and a personal desire to wound a man now in a place where he cannot take up the cudgels in his own defence. This is quite not true. We have our opinions about Dr. Muck, both as man and musician. We have no hesitation in stating them when the occasion arises. But when we discuss Dr. Muck as a musician we discuss him as that and nothing else, and in remembering his performances many of them of great merit and brilliancy, we do so without artistic ingratitude for all that we learned from him, or a personal desire to forget what kind of a debt.

The surprise and pleasure we have had in the musical performances of Mr. Rabaud have been those which, we conceive, every student of music feels when he has been assisted in perceiving new beauties of his art, and surprise that it should have taken so many years and such an upheaval as the great war to make us aware of the existence of so talented a conductor. We now realize the provincialism, imposed from outside, which had persuaded Americans to act very honestly on the assumption that conductors were made only in Germany, and thus to deprive ourselves of great and lasting artistic profit of a kind which, apparently, conductors of Germany could not provide.

We find Mr. Rabaud to be a broader and a deeper musician than Dr. Muck. That is, Mr. Rabaud's conception of a composition, whether of the classic of the modern school, seems to lie deeper. Dr. Muck was an amazing score-reader and an industrious student, though too frequently an officious one, as his ceaseless revisions of and additions to the scores of composers living and dead proved. But he was after all cerebral. He came to the music from the outside. Compared, for example, to Mr. Rabaud's fifth symphony of Beethoven, Dr. Muck's reading was admirable in its formal strength, its balance, its virility in the opening movement in which this conductor's feeling for rythm was strikingly displayed, and its dramatic transition from the third movement to the finale. In the slow movement, requiring simple and lofty sentiment, and in the last movement, a finale of triumph and delirious joy, Dr. Muck undeniably fell short. It was a place where heart and inherent nobility of conception could not be replaced by the mere thinking or planning of effects.

Dr. Muck, we have long felt, was most often at his best in music in which the theatrical element was particularly strong—witness the performance of the "Faust" symphony of Liszt, a type of music in which this conductor excelled, and, as it happened, a work which bore for him certain profound associations which resulted in a state of mind almost of religious ceremonial when he directed its performance. The argument could be continued with many another illustration, as for example, the emotional poverty of Muck's Schumann, and his theatrical and showy conceptions of works like the "Tannhauser" overture or the "Meistersinger" prelude, which became in his later years in Boston show pieces of a brilliant conductor.

Mr. Rabaud's understanding of music of many different composers is more of the heart than Dr. Muck's, and not less of the head. Neither Dr. Muck nor any conductor who has appeared in Symphony Hall in the past 20 years had a profounder comprehension of the great classic spirit and classic grandeur and nobility of form than Mr. Rabaud. In addition to this, however, his Beethoven is greater because of its emotional stress and its spiritual exaltation than the Beethoven of any conductor who has appeared at the head of the Boston Symphony during the period we mention. Nor is this tendency confined to classics, either in or out of France. Mr. Rabaud has given performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" and "Scheherazade"; of works by Saint-Saens, Franck, Ravel, D'Indy and Debussy far more potent in atmosphere, impressionism and poetic quality than those of his predecessor of previous seasons.

The great qualities of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor are illustrated finally in the character of the orchestra's response to his wishes. Dr. Muck commanded that such and such be done, and obtained what he commanded to the breadth of a hair, for he was an admirable, if sometimes brutal, disciplinarian. Mr. Ribaud does not command the orchestra so evidently as he breathes with it, and this understanding on the part of a conductor of the respiration of an orchestra is one of the subtlest and most essential attributes of a really gifted leader. For an orchestra respires, like a singer. This is obviously particularly true of the different wind choirs, but the whole body obeys physical and rhythmical laws, on which musical interpretation is closely dependent. It is this instinct for the respiration of the instruments, as one may well call it, which, as it has always seemed to us, makes Arthur Nikisch so successful a conductor.

He feels the nerves and heartbeats of his men when he conducts, he knows how the music is affecting them, and has the mysterious faculty of marshaling the sub-conscious as well as the conscious forces of interpretation to do his bidding. His tempi are elastic and are partly influenced by the emotional state of his own players. He said once that he took the slow movement of the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony at a different pace on different occasions, this depending partly on the mood of his horn player. Some evenings the player was evidently feeling like a little faster tempo. On other evenings he was fatigued or nervous, and it was natural for him to play the beautiful melody more slowly. Within reasonable limits conformance to his mood meant a better and more eloquent performance of the symphony. We think that Mr. Rabaud has much of this sensitive quality in him, and that he thus acts, by persuasion and emotional telepathy more than by absolute command, on his men. It results in a warmer and more eloquent performance, a performance with broader sweep, with a warmer glow in the tone, with a deeper and more powerful pulse in the music. That Mr. Rabaud exerts authority as a man who knows why and how he wishes a piece of music to be presented is, of course, the companion fact, since without this quality in the leader an orchestra would fall to pieces instead of working together. As it is, the men appear to play more voluntarily than of old, with more personal and musical impulse. And this is reflected in the atmosphere of the concerts. There is a more reciprocal attitude on the part of the audiences, more of what Robert Havens Schauffler once called "creative listening." In all respects the concerts are less formal, perfunctory and more contagiously musical in effect than they were, especially during Dr. Muck's last vexed seasons. In the course of those seasons he gave some very fine performances to which we can look back with much pleasure and profit. In the light of some of Mr. Rabaud's accomplishments, we now feel that we over-praised certain of Dr. Muck's interpretations, but others would doubtless stand as highly today as they did when he gave them. All in all, however, the present effect of Mr. Rabaud's accendancy in Symphony Hall is that of a much needed musical reform, a much more vital and artistic presentation of the musical gospel. We are hearing music from another point of view than that entertained by Symphony conductors and audiences for 30 seasons and more, and a great majority of the listeners are finding the experience is enormously profitable.

Alexander Blackman, violinist.

The performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" revives the old question of whether nationalism in music is a desirable thing. Ernest Newman, the great English critic, argues against it, saying, as most of the opponents of this principal, that what is in the heart of a composer does not rely for expression on nationally conventional formulas of musical speech; that a composer who relies on folk music, as Grieg did, for example, limits the range of his genius, instead of extending it; that music which is universal is for all peoples of the world, and is recognizable as having universal, instead of local characteristics. It seems to us that those who harbor this theory are about as logical as those who fear that a League of Nations will impair the validity of American citizenship. If America belongs to a league, how can she be a free nation, and preserve her own individuality? One could go still farther and say that a republican form of government makes individualism impossible. Whereas it actually promotes the development and the exercise of individualism, by setting individual potencies free and giving them such opportunities and play for development as is impossible under an autocratic form of government. Mutual obligations do not destroy individual initiative. They make individual initiative in all directions, which are constructive stronger than ever before by removing all sorts of arbitrary boundaries and limits to the exercise of that quality. By a similar paradox, we believe, the national element in music gives the composer whose talent is founded in his soil, and who is consciously and convincingly a spokesman of his people, a stronger and cleaner cut individuality than he would otherwise have.

"Sadko" is a case in point. It is the work of Rimsky-Korsakoff, a leader of the Russian nationalistic school, a school which based all of its tenets on the fundamental conception of the genius of the Russian race and the Russian way for the individual composer to express that genius in his works. The result was memorable and an everlasting refutation against those who are afraid that if a composer quotes a folk-tune or writes in the folk-vein he loses his soul. The Russian composers found themselves through an exhaustive study of the song and legend of their land. As M. Calvocoressi notes in his work on Moussorgsky, the Russian composers who became great and world-figures in music were the composers who wrote in a manner based on the characteristics of Russian national art, and those Russian composers who failed to become great and impress their individuality on the world were the composers who remained content to copy the musical formulas of Europe instead of putting their ears to the ground and speaking for their own people. Democracy in music, as in politics, appears in the end to be a fundamental principle of art. The big statesmen, the big artists, are the ones who speak for their race, and in so doing voice the thoughts and feelings which make the world akin.

The expression of these thoughts and feelings in a manner natural and characteristic of the people does not minimize the individuality of the composer, but exalts it as no other force could do.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 17,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE PROPAGANDA FOR ITALIAN COMPOSERS

Their Interesting and Little-Known Symphonic Music Gains a Hearing in America—Mr. Rabaud's Neglect of It—Likening Mme. Galli-Curci to Italian Pictures—Mr. Caruso on Himself and an Anniversary—Plans of "The Flonzaleys" for Next Season—Items and Incidents

IT is a pity that Mr. Rabaud has not yet found room at the Symphony Concerts for any music by the Italian composers of our day. Several such pieces have been submitted to him, but so far, though he has only four more programmes to make, he has announced none for performance. Other conductors of orchestras in the United States have been more open-minded and hospitable to this unknown Italian music. Mr. Stransky and Mr. Damrosch in New York, Mr. Stock in Chicago, Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia have all given it place on their programmes. It is quite true that an energetic propaganda, arranged by the Italian Ministry of Public Instruction, has provided them with the scores and the parts and has urged them to favorable consideration. It is as true that the war-time relations between Italy and the United States are no reason for the playing of Italian symphonic music before audiences in America. Such music is in itself either interesing or uninteresting, deserving or undeserving, and all the Leagues of Nations in the world will not lessen by one jot its demerits or add one tittle to its virtues.

On the other hand, Italian symphonic music has long been neglected in orchestral concerts on this side of the Atlantic. Occasionally pieces by the elder generation of such Italian composers—Martucci, Sgambati, Bossi—have been played hereabouts, because they came to the conductors through Berlin. Once and again out of a younger generation, a piece or two by Casella has been heard in America, because it came to those same conductors through Paris. Zandonai's music-drama, "Francesca da Rimini," brought one or two of his symphonic pieces in its train. Otherwise, until this winter, not one of the living or rising Italian composers—Malespini, Tommasini and their fellows—that cultivate music of the concert-hall rather than music of the theatre, has been heard in America. Now at last, in part through the propaganda aforesaid, in part through their own deserts, they have been heard. None of their music has proved remarkable, but nearly all of it, as disclosed to New York and Chicago, has interested audiences and reviewers; while in Casella in particular, it has revealed an individual and stimulating talent.

somewhat circumscribed Franco-German programmes (with a little Russian vodka and caviare) now habitually served at symphony concerts in the United States. Here in Boston, in particular, it is safe to say that one and anothe of these Italian pieces would prove as interesting and more than, say, the second symphony of Saint-Säens, the operatic preluding of Bruneau or the theatre-music of Fauré. Catholicity of programme has been one of the standards of the Symphony Concerts these thirty years. Now for the first time scores and parts of this tempting Italian music are easily available. Yet with little more than a month of the season remaining, not a measure of it has been heard in Boston. Italian composers, especially the Italians of the concert hall, deserve better of our ears—and our conductor.

Here in Boston

The Symphony Orchestra is making this week the final journey of the season to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. In New York, the women's choir that sang the voice-parts a week ago, in Debussy's Nocturne, "Sirens," will join it for a repetition of that piece. There also, Mr. Rabaud will lead the orchestra in Saint-Saëns's "organ symphony" in which he was eloquent last autumn. On one of the programmes for New York stands, besides, the concerto of Bach, heard here last Friday and Saturday, with Messrs. Heim, Fradkin, Laurent and Longy in the solo parts. In Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, Mr. Werrenrath, and not Mme. Melba, will be the assisting singer, since she was called suddenly to London by the illness of a kinsman.

New Haven, Conn., March 17—Yale has cut loose from the plan of ordering a formal thesis in purely academic studies as a requisite for a doctor's degree. Stamping it as a "Germanized Doctor of Philosophy degree," Professor Wilbur L. Cross, dean of the Graduate School, stated in the Yale Alumni Weekly today that the system was as brutalizing to the study of the fine arts as anything that might be expected of the Prussianized military system. The Weekly today stated editorially that university men everywhere would welcome the chance

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 21,

In the Ears of New York

Hearing the Boston Orchestra, last evening in Carnegie Hall at New York, where it played Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and a suite of dances from Rameau's operas, Mr. Huneker writes today in The Times: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played so brilliantly this season. The audience was in a particularly sympathetic mood and the applause spontaneous. Lalo's overture to 'Le Roi d'Ys' begins to sound 'vieux chapeau.' It is well made, the themes pregnant, and the scoring effective, were it not for the undue preponderance of the drums and other instruments of percussion, and it must be said that Mr. Rabaud did not seek to attenuate their ferocious rataplan. The general performance was rather rough, opaque, and certainly noisy. Not precisely a promising beginning.

"Debussy's Nocturnes cleared the air. The three numbers of this charming group went better than we had dared to hope, as imagination does not largely bulk in the mental make-up of the French conductor. 'Nuages' was not too poetical, but the 'Fêtes' was full of sparkle and rhythmic life. Rabaud is nothing if not rhythmic. 'Sirènes' with its muffled eloquence, its exquisite nuances, was altogether a delight, especially as the female chorus on this occasion happened to have been trained by Stephen Townsend of Boston. They sang artistically. We only heard the first part of the 'Scheherzade' suite, and that was brilliant and richly colored. There can be no manner of doubt as to the superior playing of this famous orchestral organization, since Henri Rabaud has been at the helm. He has proved an admirable drill master."

Willem Mengelberg

In nooks and corners of this town, it is possible to hear the name of Willem Mengelberg as that of a conductor worthy to lead the Symphony Orchestra next year and within the range of choice by the trustees. In fact the gossip that for a few weeks circled about Mr. Toscanini, now plays around him. Fifteen years ago, when he was by no means at his present pitch of reputation, he came for a fortnight to New York as "guest-conductor" of a pair of concerts by the Philharmonic Society. Otherwise his career and his quality are known in the United States only by report. Mr. Mengelberg is a Hollander, born in Utrecht in 1871 and now in the prime of his powers. He came of good family in which there is a considerable mixture of Jewish blood; he was highly educated; early discovered his calling and in his twenty-fifth year became the conductor of the Amsterdam Orchestra. He has now led it for nearly a quarter of a century and in that time established it as one of the noted orchestras of Europe. Each year, it undertakes thirty-two pairs of concerts in Amsterdam—on Thursday evenings and Sunday afternoons from September to June—and pays regular visits, besides, to The Hague, Rotterdam and other Dutch cities. A chorus assists the band at need and occasionally gives concerts of choral music, likewise with Mr. Mengelberg as leader. In spite of all this work at home, he is one of the most sought "guest-conductors" in Europe. As such he has gone from year to year to England, to Italy, to Russia usually to lead a resident orchestra in a few "special concerts." He has been heard also in Frankfort and a few cities of western Germany, but there he has been less admired than elsewhere. By the token of these labors, he is one of the few European conductors to whom the hundred-odd concerts of the Boston Orchestra in a season would not seem a formidable task, who would hold both the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus in the hollow of his hand.

In quality as conductor, Mr. Mengelberg has been variously viewed. By common consent he is diligent and exacting in rehearsal, seeking both power and polish. By common agreement, also, he cultivates with equal zest ancient and modern, classical and "advanced" composers. He is widely read in the music of all schools; his sympathies are catholic; he makes his programmes accordingly. As unanimously, "assisting artists"—pianists, violinists, singers—praise the elasticity of his accompaniments. Reviewers, hearing him conduct, have been diversely minded. When he was heard in New York, fifteen years ago, he was praised for the quiet authority of his conducting, for his insistence upon a "singing tone," for his elasticity of musical line, for his lucidity with all his pieces. He was also reproached with a fondness for slow pace and for an excess of zeal for detail. When he visited Paris, Mr. Lalo, the austere reviewer for Le Temps, judged him a great conductor "tout court"—pervading and dominating both his orchestra and his audience, penetrating deeply into the substance and spirit of the music in hand, bearing both home to his hearers, a master of rhythm and design, puissant but poised—"better balanced than Mr. Nikisch, less rigid than Mr. Weingartner, as warm, as colorful, as vigorous, as faithful to music as any illustrious conductor of the hour." Indeed only in the departed Richter could this Parisian fund a conductor to outrank Mr. Mengelberg.

SUN

NEW YORK CITY

BOSTON PLAYERS END VISIT.

Symphony Orchestra Gives a Delightful Programme.

The fifth and final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme was one of delightful character. It opened with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," after which came Debussy's "Nocturnes." All three were given, the "Sirens" having the necessary female chorus. An excursion into the field of French classic opera brought back the lovely ballet suite from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie." The concert concluded with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

The playing of the musicians from Boston does not ask for scrutinizing consideration when such music is offered. The temptation to make comment upon the general achievements of the season under the direction of Mr. Rabaud must be resisted. Such discussion may fittingly be postponed till a later time. Suffice it to say at present that the conductor has won the esteem, if not the enthusiastic admiration, of this public and his departure will be regretted. It is not yet known who will be his successor.

POST, MARCH 16

Rabaud Is Muck's Superior

Popularity of New Conductor Does Not Rest on Patriotic Prejudices Against German, Says Mr. Olin Downes—Opinion Based on Rabaud's Leadership

It has been repeatedly stated in these columns and in other places, by the music reviewer of the Post, that Henri Rabaud, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is proving himself in important respects the superior of the formerly lauded Dr. Karl Muck as an interpreter. Some readers, including both pro-German sympathizers and those who are as hot against Germany as any, but apparently unwilling or unable to listen and think for themselves independently of precedent and tradition, have ascribed these statement to anti-German "prejudice" unworthily brought into play in the domain of musical art, and a personal desire to wound a man now in a place where he cannot take up the cudgels in his own defence. This is quite not true. We have our opinions about Dr. Muck, both as man and musician. We have no hesitation in stating them when the occasion arises. But when we discuss Dr. Muck as a musician we discuss him as that and nothing else, and in remembering his performances many of them of great merit and brilliancy, we do so without artistic ingratitude for all that we learned from him, or a personal desire to forget what kind of a debt.

The surprise and pleasure we have had in the musical performances of Mr. Rabaud have been those which, we conceive, every student of music feels when he has been assisted in perceiving new beauties of his art, and surprise that it should have taken so many years and such an upheaval as the great war to make us aware of the existence of so talented a conductor. We now realize the provincialism, imposed from outside, which had persuaded Americans to act very honestly on the assumption that conductors were made only in Germany, and thus to deprive ourselves of great and lasting artistic profit of a kind which, apparently, conductors of Germany could not provide.

We find Mr. Rabaud to be a broader and a deeper musician than Dr. Muck. That is, Mr. Rabaud's conception of a composition, whether of the classic of the modern school, seems to lie deeper. Dr. Muck was an amazing score-reader and an industrious student, though too frequently an officious one, as his ceaseless revisions of and additions to the scores of composers living and dead proved. But he was after all cerebral. He came to the music from the outside. Compared, for example, to Mr. Rabaud's fifth symphony of Beethoven, Dr. Muck's reading was admirable in its formal strength, its balance, its virility in the opening movement in which this conductor's feeling for rythm was strikingly displayed, and its dramatic transition from the third movement to the finale. In the slow movement, requiring simple and lofty sentiment, and in the last movement, a finale of triumph and delirious joy, Dr. Muck undeniably fell short. It was a place where heart and inherent nobility of conception could not be replaced by the mere thinking or planning of effects.

Dr. Muck, we have long felt, was most often at his best in music in which the theatrical element was particularly strong--witness the performance of the "Faust" symphony of Liszt, a type of music in which this conductor excelled, and, as it happened, a work which bore for him certain profound associations which resulted in a state of mind almost of religious ceremonial when he directed its performance. The argument could be continued with many another illustration, as for example, the emotional poverty of Muck's Schumann, and his theatrical and showy conceptions of works like the "Tannhauser" overture or the "Meistersinger" prelude, which became in his later years in Boston show pieces of a brilliant conductor.

Mr. Rabaud's understanding of music of many different composers is more of the heart than Dr. Muck's, and not less of the head. Neither Dr. Muck nor any conductor who has appeared in Symphony Hall in the past 20 years had a profounder comprehension of the great classic spirit and classic grandeur and nobility of form than Mr. Rabaud. In addition to this, however, his Beethoven is greater because of its emotional stress and its spiritual exaltation than the Beethoven of any conductor who has appeared at the head of the Boston Symphony during the period we mention. Nor is this tendency confined to classics, either in or out of France. Mr. Rabaud has given performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" and "Scheherazade"; of works by Saint-Saens, Franck, Ravel, D'Indy and Debussy far more potent in atmosphere, impressionism and poetic quality than those of his predecessor of previous seasons.

The great qualities of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor are illustrated finally in the character of the orchestra's response to his wishes. Dr. Muck commanded that such and such be done, and obtained what he commanded to the breadth of a hair, for he was an admirable, if sometimes brutal, disciplinarian. Mr. Ribaud does not command the orchestra so evidently as he breathes with it, and this understanding on the part of a conductor of the respiration of an orchestra is one of the subtlest and most essential [illegible] gifted leader. For an orchestra respires, like a singer. This is obviously particularly true of the different wind choirs, but the whole body obeys physical and rhythmical laws, on which musical interpretation is closely dependent. It is this instinct for the respiration of the instruments, as one may well call it, which, as it has always seemed to us, makes Arthur Nikisch so successful a conductor.

He feels the nerves and heartbeats of his men when he conducts, he knows how the music is affecting them, and has the mysterious faculty of marshaling the sub-conscious as well as the conscious forces of interpretation to do his bidding. His tempi are elastic and are partly influenced by the emotional state of his own players. He said once that he took the slow movement of the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony at a different pace on different occasions, this depending partly on the mood of his horn player. Some evenings the player was evidently feeling like a little faster tempo. On other evenings he was fatigued or nervous, and it was natural for him to play the beautiful melody more slowly. Within reasonable limits conformance to his mood meant a better and more eloquent performance of the symphony. We think that Mr. Rabaud has much of this sensitive quality in him, and that he thus acts, by persuasion and emotional telepathy more than by absolute command, on his men. It results in a warmer and more eloquent performance, a performance with broader sweep, with a warmer glow in the tone, with a deeper and more powerful pulse in the music. That Mr. Rabaud exerts authority as a man who knows why and how he wishes a piece of music to be presented is, of course, the companion fact, since without this quality in the leader an orchestra would fall to pieces instead of working together. As it is, the men appear to play more voluntarily than of old, with more personal and musical impulse. And this is reflected in the atmosphere of the concerts. There is a more reciprocal attitude on the part of the audiences, more of what Robert Havens Schauffler once called "creative listening." In all respects the concerts are less formal, perfunctory and more contagiously musical in effect than they were, especially during Dr. Muck's last vexed seasons. In the course of those seasons he gave some very fine performances to which we can look back with much pleasure and profit. In the light of some of Mr. Rabaud's accomplishments, we now feel that we over-praised certain of Dr. Muck's interpretations, but others would doubtless stand as highly today as they did when he gave them. All in all, however, the present effect of Mr. Rabaud's accendancy in Symphony Hall is that of a much needed musical reform, a much more vital and artistic presentation of the musical gospel. We are hearing music from another point of view than that entertained by Symphony conductors and audiences for 30 seasons and more, and a great majority of the listeners are finding the experience is enormously profitable.

Alexander Blackman, violinist.

The performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" revives the old question of whether nationalism in music is a desirable thing. Ernest Newman, the great English critic, argues against it, saying, as most of the opponents of this principal, that what is in the heart of a composer does not rely for expression on nationally conventional formulas of musical speech; that a composer who relies on folk music, as Grieg did, for example, limits the range of his genius, instead of extending it; that music which is universal is for all peoples of the world, and is recognizable as having universal, instead of local characteristics. It seems to us that those who harbor this theory are about as logical as those who fear that a League of Nations will impair the validity of American citizenship. If America belongs to a league, how can she be a free nation, and preserve her own individuality? One could go still farther and say that a republican form of government makes individualism impossible. Whereas it actually promotes the development and the exercise of individualism, by setting individual potencies free and giving them such opportunities and play for development as is impossible under an autocratic form of government. Mutual obligations do not destroy individual initiative. They make individual initiative in all directions, which are constructive stronger than ever before by removing all sorts of arbitrary boundaries and limits to the exercise of that quality. By a similar paradox, we believe, the national element in music gives the composer whose talent is founded in his soil, and who is consciously and convincingly a spokesman of his people, a stronger and cleaner cut individuality than he would otherwise have.

"Sadko" is a case in point. It is the work of Rimsky-Korsakoff, a leader of the Russian nationalistic school, a school which based all of its tenets on the fundamental conception of the genius of the Russian race and the Russian way for the individual composer to express that genius in his works. The result was memorable and an everlasting refutation against those who are afraid that if a composer quotes a folk-tune or writes in the folk-vein he loses his soul. The Russian composers found themselves through an exhaustive study of the song and legend of their land. As M. Calvocoressi notes in his work on Moussorgsky, the Russian composers who became great and world-figures in music were the composers who wrote in a manner based on the characteristics of Russian national art, and those Russian composers who failed to become great and impress their individuality on the world were the composers who remained content to copy the musical formulas of Europe instead of putting their ears to the ground and speaking for their own people. Democracy in music, as in politics, appears in the end to be a fundamental principle of art. The big statesmen, the big artists, are the ones who speak for their race, and in so doing voice the thoughts and feelings which make the world akin.

The expression of these thoughts and feelings in a manner natural and characteristic of the people does not minimize the individuality of the composer, but exalts it as no other force could do.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 17,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE PROPAGANDA FOR ITALIAN COMPOSERS

Their Interesting and Little-Known Symphonic Music Gains a Hearing in America—Mr. Rabaud's Neglect of It—Likening Mme. Galli-Curci to Italian Pictures—Mr. Caruso on Himself and an Anniversary—Plans of "The Flonzaleys" for Next Season—Items and Incidents

It is a pity that Mr. Rabaud has not yet found room at the Symphony Concerts for any music by the Italian composers of our day. Several such pieces have been submitted to him, but so far, though he has only four more programmes to make, he has announced none for performance. Other conductors of orchestras in the United States have been more open-minded and hospitable to this unknown Italian music. Mr. Stransky and Mr. Damrosch in New York, Mr. Stock in Chicago, Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia have all given it place on their programmes. It is quite true that an energetic propaganda, arranged by the Italian Ministry of Public Instruction, has provided them with the scores and the parts and has urged them to favorable consideration. It is as true that the war-time relations between Italy and the United States are no reason for the playing of Italian symphonic music before audiences in America. Such music is in itself either interesing or uninteresting, deserving or undeserving, and all the Leagues of Nations in the world will not lessen by one jot its demerits or add one tittle to its virtues.

On the other hand, Italian symphonic music has long been neglected in orchestral concerts on this side of the Atlantic. Occasionally pieces by the elder generation of such Italian composers—Martucci, Sgambati, Bossi—have been played hereabouts, because they came to the conductors through Berlin. Once and again out of a younger generation, a piece or two by Casella has been heard in America, because it came to those same conductors through Paris. Zandonai's music-drama, "Francesca da Rimini," brought one or two of his symphonic pieces in its train. Otherwise, until this winter, not one of the living or rising Italian composers—Malespini, Tommasini and their fellows—that cultivate music of the concert-hall rather than music of the theatre, has been heard in America. Now at last, in part through the propaganda aforesaid, in part through their own deserts, they have been heard. None of their music has proved remarkable, but nearly all of it, as disclosed to New York and Chicago, has interested audiences and reviewers; while in Casella in particular, it has revealed an individual and stimulating talent.

The [illegible] diversity into somewhat circumscribed Franco-German programmes (with a little Russian vodka and caviare) now habitually served at symphony concerts in the United States. Here in Boston, in particular, it is safe to say that one and anothe of these Italian pieces would prove as interesting and more than, say, the second symphony of Saint-Säens, the operatic preluding of Bruneau or the theatre-music of Fauré. Catholicity of programme has been one of the standards of the Symphony Concerts these thirty years. Now for the first time scores and parts of this tempting Italian music are easily available. Yet with little more than a month of the season remaining, not a measure of it has been heard in Boston. Italian composers, especially the Italians of the concert hall, deserve better of our ears—and our conductor.

Here in Boston

The Symphony Orchestra is making this week the final journey of the season to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. In New York, the women's choir that sang the voice-parts a week ago, in Debussy's Nocturne, "Sirens," will join it for a repetition of that piece. There also, Mr. Rabaud will lead the orchestra in Saint-Saëns's "organ symphony" in which he was eloquent last autumn. On one of the programmes for New York stands, besides, the concerto of Bach, heard here last Friday and Saturday, with Messrs. Heim, Fradkin, Laurent and Longy in the solo parts. In Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, Mr. Werrenrath, and not Mme. Melba, will be the assisting singer, since she was called suddenly to London by the illness of a kinsman.

New Haven, Conn., March 17—Yale has cut loose from the plan of ordering a formal thesis in purely academic studies as a requisite for a doctor's degree. Stamping it as a "Germanized Doctor of Philosophy degree," Professor Wilbur L. Cross, dean of the Graduate School, stated in the Yale Alumni Weekly today that the system was as brutalizing to the study of the fine arts as anything that might be expected of the Prussianized military system. The Weekly today stated editorially that university men everywhere would welcome the chance

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 21,

In the Ears of New York

Hearing the Boston Orchestra, last evening in Carnegie Hall at New York, where it played Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and a suite of dances from Rameau's operas, Mr. Huneker writes today in The Times: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played so brilliantly this season. The audience was in a particularly sympathetic mood and the applause spontaneous. Lalo's overture to 'Le Roi d'Ys' begins to sound 'vieux chapeau.' It is well made, the themes pregnant, and the scoring effective, were it not for the undue preponderance of the drums and other instruments of percussion, and it must be said that Mr. Rabaud did not seek to attenuate their ferocious rataplan. The general performance was rather rough, opaque, and certainly noisy. Not precisely a promising beginning.

"Debussy's Nocturnes cleared the air. The three numbers of this charming group went better than we had dared to hope, as imagination does not largely bulk in the mental make-up of the French conductor. 'Nuages' was not too poetical, but the 'Fêtes' was full of sparkle and rhythmic life. Rabaud is nothing if not rhythmic. 'Sirènes' with its muffled eloquence, its exquisite nuances, was altogether a delight, especially as the female chorus on this occasion happened to have been trained by Stephen Townsend of Boston. They sang artistically. We only heard the first part of the 'Scheherzade' suite, and that was brilliant and richly colored. There can be no manner of doubt as to the superior playing of this famous orchestral organization, since Henri Rabaud has been at the helm. He has proved an admirable drill master."

Willem Mengelberg

In nooks and corners of this town, it is possible to hear the name of Willem Mengelberg as that of a conductor worthy to lead the Symphony Orchestra next year and within the range of choice by the trustees. In fact the gossip that for a few weeks circled about Mr. Toscanini, now plays around him. Fifteen years ago, when he was by no means at his present pitch of reputation, he came for a fortnight to New York as "guest-conductor" of a pair of concerts by the Philharmonic Society. Otherwise his career and his quality are known in the United States only by report. Mr. Mengelberg is a Hollander, born in Utrecht in 1871 and now in the prime of his powers. He came of good family in which there is a considerable mixture of Jewish blood; he was highly educated; early discovered his calling and in his twenty-fifth year became the conductor of the Amsterdam Orchestra. He has now led it for nearly a quarter of a century and in that time established it as one of the noted orchestras of Europe. Each year, it undertakes thirty-two pairs of concerts in Amsterdam—on Thursday evenings and Sunday afternoons from September to June—and pays regular visits, besides, to The Hague, Rotterdam and other Dutch cities. A chorus assists the band at need and occasionally gives concerts of choral music, likewise with Mr. Mengelberg as leader. In spite of all this work at home, he is one of the most sought "guest-conductors" in Europe. As such he has gone from year to year to England, to Italy, to Russia usually to lead a resident orchestra in a few "special concerts." He has been heard also in Frankfort and a few cities of western Germany, but there he has been less admired than elsewhere. By the token of these labors, he is one of the few European conductors to whom the hundred-odd concerts of the Boston Orchestra in a season would not seem a formidable task, who would hold both the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus in the hollow of his hand.

In quality as conductor, Mr. Mengelberg has been variously viewed. By common consent he is diligent and exacting in rehearsal, seeking both power and polish. By common agreement, also, he cultivates with equal zest ancient and modern, classical and "advanced" composers. He is widely read in the music of all schools; his sympathies are catholic; he makes his programmes accordingly. As unanimously, "assisting artists"--pianists, violinists, singers—praise the elasticity of his accompaniments. Reviewers, hearing him conduct, have been diversely minded. When he was heard in New York, fifteen years ago, he was praised for the quiet authority of his conducting, for his insistence upon a "singing tone," for his elasticity of musical line, for his lucidity with all his pieces. He was also reproached with a fondness for slow pace and for an excess of zeal for detail. When he visited Paris, Mr. Lalo, the austere reviewer for Le Temps, judged him a great conductor "tout court"—pervading and dominating both his orchestra and his audience, penetrating deeply into the substance and spirit of the music in hand, bearing both home to his hearers, a master of rhythm and design, puissant but poised--"better balanced than Mr. Nikisch, less rigid than Mr. Weingartner, as warm, as colorful, as vigorous, as faithful to music as any illustrious conductor of the hour." Indeed only in the departed Richter could this Parisian fund a conductor to outrank Mr. Mengelberg.

[illegible]

ess

BOSTON PLAYERS END VISIT.

Symphony Orchestra Gives a Delightful Programme.

The fifth and final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme was one of delightful character. It opened with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," after which came Debussy's "Nocturnes." All three were given, the "Sirens" having the necessary female chorus. An excursion into the field of French classic opera brought back the lovely ballet suite from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie." The concert concluded with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

The playing of the musicians from Boston does not ask for scrutinizing consideration when such music is offered. The temptation to make comment upon the general achievements of the season under the direction of Mr. Rabaud must be resisted. Such discussion may fittingly be postponed till a later time. Suffice it to say at present that the conductor has won the esteem, if not the enthusiastic admiration, of this public and his departure will be regretted. It is not yet known who will be his successor.

POST, MARCH 16

Rabaud Is Muck's Superior

Popularity of New Conductor Does Not Rest on Patriotic Prejudices Against German, Says Mr. Olin Downes—Opinion Based on Rabaud's Leadership

It has been repeatedly stated in these columns and in other places, by the music reviewer of the Post, that Henri Rabaud, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is proving himself in important respects the superior of the formerly lauded Dr. Karl Muck as an interpreter. Some readers, including both pro-German sympathizers and those who are as hot against Germany as any, but apparently unwilling or unable to listen and think for themselves independently of precedent and tradition, have ascribed these statement to anti-German "prejudice" unworthily brought into play in the domain of musical art, and a personal desire to wound a man now in a place where he cannot take up the cudgels in his own defence. This is quite not true. We have our opinions about Dr. Muck, both as man and musician. We have no hesitation in stating them when the occasion arises. But when we discuss Dr. Muck as a musician we discuss him as that and nothing else, and in remembering his performances many of them of great merit and brilliancy, we do so without artistic ingratitude for all that we learned from him, or a personal desire to forget what kind of a debt.

The surprise and pleasure we have had in the musical performances of Mr. Rabaud have been those which, we conceive, every student of music feels when he has been assisted in perceiving new beauties of his art, and surprise that it should have taken so many years and such an upheaval as the great war to make us aware of the existence of so talented a conductor. We now realize the provincialism, imposed from outside, which had persuaded Americans to act very honestly on the assumption that conductors were made only in Germany, and thus to deprive ourselves of great and lasting artistic profit of a kind which, apparently, conductors of Germany could not provide.

We find Mr. Rabaud to be a broader and a deeper musician than Dr. Muck. That is, Mr. Rabaud's conception of a composition, whether of the classic or the modern school, seems to lie deeper. Dr. Muck was an amazing score-reader and an industrious student, though too frequently an officious one, as his ceaseless revisions of and additions to the scores of composers living and dead proved. But he was after all cerebral. He came to the music from the outside. Compared, for example, to Mr. Rabaud's fifth symphony of Beethoven, Dr. Muck's reading was admirable in its formal strength, its balance, its virility in the opening movement in which this conductor's feeling for rythm was strikingly displayed, and its dramatic transition from the third movement to the finale. In the slow movement, requiring simple and lofty sentiment, and in the last movement, a finale of triumph and delirious joy, Dr. Muck undeniably fell short. It was a place where heart and inherent nobility of conception could not be replaced by the mere thinking or planning of effects.

Dr. Muck, we have long felt, was most often at his best in music in which the theatrical element was particularly strong--witness the performance of the "Faust" symphony of Liszt, a type of music in which this conductor excelled, and, as it happened, a work which bore for him certain profound associations which resulted in a state of mind almost of religious ceremonial when he directed its performance. The argument could be continued with many another illustration, as for example, the emotional poverty of Muck's Schumann, and his theatrical and showy conceptions of works like the "Tannhauser" overture or the "Meistersinger" prelude, which became in his later years in Boston show pieces of a brilliant conductor.

Mr. Rabaud's understanding of music of many different composers is more of the heart than Dr. Muck's, and not less of the head. Neither Dr. Muck nor any conductor who has appeared in Symphony Hall in the past 20 years had a profounder comprehension of the great classic spirit and classic grandeur and nobility of form than Mr. Rabaud. In addition to this, however, his Beethoven is greater because of its emotional stress and its spiritual exaltation than the Beethoven of any conductor who has appeared at the head of the Boston Symphony during the period we mention. Nor is this tendency confined to classics, either in or out of France. Mr. Rabaud has given performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" and "Scheherazade"; of works by Saint-Saens, Franck, Ravel, D'Indy and Debussy far more potent in atmosphere, impressionism and poetic quality than those of his predecessor of previous seasons.

The great qualities of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor are illustrated finally in the character of the orchestra's response to his wishes. Dr. Muck commanded that such and such be done, and obtained what he commanded to the breadth of a hair, for he was an admirable, if sometimes brutal, disciplinarian. Mr. Ribaud does not command the orchestra so evidently as he breathes with it, and this understanding on the part of a conductor of the respiration of an orchestra is one of the subtlest and most essential attributes of a really agreeable diversity. into the gifted leader. For an orchestra respires, like a singer. This is obviously particularly true of the different wind choirs, but the whole body obeys physical and rhythmical laws, on which musical interpretation is closely dependent. It is this instinct for the respiration of the instruments, as one may well call it, which, as it has always seemed to us, makes Arthur Nikisch so successful a conductor.

He feels the nerves and heartbeats of his men when he conducts, he knows how the music is affecting them, and has the mysterious faculty of marshaling the sub-conscious as well as the conscious forces of interpretation to do his bidding. His tempi are elastic and are partly influenced by the emotional state of his own players. He said once that he took the slow movement of the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony at a different pace on different occasions, this depending partly on the mood of his horn player. Some evenings the player was evidently feeling like a little faster tempo. On other evenings he was fatigued or nervous, and it was natural for him to play the beautiful melody more slowly. Within reasonable limits conformance to his mood meant a better and more eloquent performance of the symphony. We think that Mr. Rabaud has much of this sensitive quality in him, and that he thus acts, by persuasion and emotional telepathy more than by absolute command, on his men. It results in a warmer and more eloquent performance, a performance with broader sweep, with a warmer glow in the tone, with a deeper and more powerful pulse in the music. That Mr. Rabaud exerts authority as a man who knows why and how he wishes a piece of music to be presented is, of course, the companion fact, since without this quality in the leader an orchestra would fall to pieces instead of working together. As it is, the men appear to play more voluntarily than of old, with more personal and musical impulse. And this is reflected in the atmosphere of the concerts. There is a more reciprocal attitude on the part of the audiences, more of what Robert Havens Schauffler once called "creative listening." In all respects the concerts are less formal, perfunctory and more contagiously musical in effect than they were, especially during Dr. Muck's last vexed seasons. In the course of those seasons he gave some very fine performances to which we can look back with much pleasure and profit. In the light of some of Mr. Rabaud's accomplishments, we now feel that we over-praised certain of Dr. Muck's interpretations, but others would doubtless stand as highly today as they did when he gave them. All in all, however, the present effect of Mr. Rabaud's accendancy in Symphony Hall is that of a much needed musical reform, a much more vital and artistic presentation of the musical gospel. We are hearing music from another point of view than that entertained by Symphony conductors and audiences for 30 seasons and more, and a great majority of the listeners are finding the experience is enormously profitable.

Alexander Blackman, violinist.

The performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" revives the old question of whether nationalism in music is a desirable thing. Ernest Newman, the great English critic, argues against it, saying, as most of the opponents of this principal, that what is in the heart of a composer does not rely for expression on nationally conventional formulas of musical speech; that a composer who relies on folk music, as Grieg did, for example, limits the range of his genius, instead of extending it; that music which is universal is for all peoples of the world, and is recognizable as having universal, instead of local characteristics. It seems to us that those who harbor this theory are about as logical as those who fear that a League of Nations will impair the validity of American citizenship. If America belongs to a league, how can she be a free nation, and preserve her own individuality? One could go still farther and say that a republican form of government makes individualism impossible. Whereas it actually promotes the development and the exercise of individualism, by setting individual potencies free and giving them such opportunities and play for development as is impossible under an autocratic form of government. Mutual obligations do not destroy individual initiative. They make individual initiative in all directions, which are constructive stronger than ever before by removing all sorts of arbitrary boundaries and limits to the exercise of that quality. By a similar paradox, we believe, the national element in music gives the composer whose talent is founded in his soil, and who is consciously and convincingly a spokesman of his people, a stronger and cleaner cut individuality than he would otherwise have.

"Sadko" is a case in point. It is the work of Rimsky-Korsakoff, a leader of the Russian nationalistic school, a school which based all of its tenets on the fundamental conception of the genius of the Russian race and the Russian way for the individual composer to express that genius in his works. The result was memorable and an everlasting refutation against those who are afraid that if a composer quotes a folk-tune or writes in the folk-vein he loses his soul. The Russian composers found themselves through an exhaustive study of the song and legend of their land. As M. Calvocoressi notes in his work on Moussorgsky, the Russian composers who became great and world-figures in music were the composers who wrote in a manner based on the characteristics of Russian national art, and those Russian composers who failed to become great and impress their individuality on the world were the composers who remained content to copy the musical formulas of Europe instead of putting their ears to the ground and speaking for their own people. Democracy in music, as in politics, appears in the end to be a fundamental principle of art. The big statesmen, the big artists, are the ones who speak for their race, and in so doing voice the thoughts and feelings which make the world akin.

The expression of these thoughts and feelings in a manner natural and characteristic of the people does not minimize the individuality of the composer, but exalts it as no other force could do.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 17,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE PROPAGANDA FOR ITALIAN COMPOSERS

Their Interesting and Little-Known Symphonic Music Gains a Hearing in America—Mr. Rabaud's Neglect of It—Likening Mme. Galli-Curci to Italian Pictures—Mr. Caruso on Himself and an Anniversary—Plans of "The Flonzaleys" for Next Season—Items and Incidents

IT is a pity that Mr. Rabaud has not yet found room at the Symphony Concerts for any music by the Italian composers of our day. Several such pieces have been submitted to him, but so far, though he has only four more programmes to make, he has announced none for performance. Other conductors of orchestras in the United States have been more open-minded and hospitable to this unknown Italian music. Mr. Stransky and Mr. Damrosch in New York, Mr. Stock in Chicago, Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia have all given it place on their programmes. It is quite true that an energetic propaganda, arranged by the Italian Ministry of Public Instruction, has provided them with the scores and the parts and has urged them to favorable consideration. It is as true that the war-time relations between Italy and the United States are no reason for the playing of Italian symphonic music before audiences in America. Such music is in itself either interesing or uninteresting, deserving or undeserving, and all the Leagues of Nations in the world will not lessen by one jot its demerits or add one tittle to its virtues.

On the other hand, Italian symphonic music has long been neglected in orchestral concerts on this side of the Atlantic. Occasionally pieces by the elder generation of such Italian composers—Martucci, Sgambati, Bossi—have been played hereabouts, because they came to the conductors through Berlin. Once and again out of a younger generation, a piece or two by Casella has been heard in America, because it came to those same conductors through Paris. Zandonai's music-drama, "Francesca da Rimini," brought one or two of his symphonic pieces in its train. Otherwise, until this winter, not one of the living or rising Italian composers—Malespini, Tommasini and their fellows—that cultivate music of the concert-hall rather than music of the theatre, has been heard in America. Now at last, in part through the propaganda aforesaid, in part through their own deserts, they have been heard. None of their music has proved remarkable, but nearly all of it, as disclosed to New York and Chicago, has interested audiences and reviewers; while in Casella in particular, it has revealed an individual and stimulating talent—unique in the somewhat circumscribed Franco-German programmes (with a little Russian vodka and caviare) now habitually served at symphony concerts in the United States. Here in Boston, in particular, it is safe to say that one and anothe of these Italian pieces would prove as interesting and more than, say, the second symphony of Saint-Säens, the operatic preluding of Bruneau or the theatre-music of Fauré. Catholicity of programme has been one of the standards of the Symphony Concerts these thirty years. Now for the first time scores and parts of this tempting Italian music are easily available. Yet with little more than a month of the season remaining, not a measure of it has been heard in Boston. Italian composers, especially the Italians of the concert hall, deserve better of our ears—and our conductor.

Here in Boston

The Symphony Orchestra is making this week the final journey of the season to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. In New York, the women's choir that sang the voice-parts a week ago, in Debussy's Nocturne, "Sirens," will join it for a repetition of that piece. There also, Mr. Rabaud will lead the orchestra in Saint-Saëns's "organ symphony" in which he was eloquent last autumn. On one of the programmes for New York stands, besides, the concerto of Bach, heard here last Friday and Saturday, with Messrs. Heim, Fradkin, Laurent and Longy in the solo parts. In Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, Mr. Werrenrath, and not Mme. Melba, will be the assisting singer, since she was called suddenly to London by the illness of a kinsman.

New Haven, Conn., March 17—Yale has cut loose from the plan of ordering a formal thesis in purely academic studies as a requisite for a doctor's degree. Stamping it as a "Germanized Doctor of Philosophy degree," Professor Wilbur L. Cross, dean of the Graduate School, stated in the Yale Alumni Weekly today that the system was as brutalizing to the study of the fine arts as anything that might be expected of the Prussianized military system. The Weekly today stated editorially that university men everywhere would welcome the chance

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 21,

In the Ears of New York

Hearing the Boston Orchestra, last evening in Carnegie Hall at New York, where it played Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and a suite of dances from Rameau's operas, Mr. Huneker writes today in The Times: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played so brilliantly this season. The audience was in a particularly sympathetic mood and the applause spontaneous. Lalo's overture to 'Le Roi d'Ys' begins to sound 'vieux chapeau.' It is well made, the themes pregnant, and the scoring effective, were it not for the undue preponderance of the drums and other instruments of percussion, and it must be said that Mr. Rabaud did not seek to attenuate their ferocious rataplan. The general performance was rather rough, opaque, and certainly noisy. Not precisely a promising beginning.

"Debussy's Nocturnes cleared the air. The three numbers of this charming group went better than we had dared to hope, as imagination does not largely bulk in the mental make-up of the French conductor. 'Nuages' was not too poetical, but the 'Fêtes' was full of sparkle and rhythmic life. Rabaud is nothing if not rhythmic. 'Sirènes' with its muffled eloquence, its exquisite nuances, was altogether a delight, especially as the female chorus on this occasion happened to have been trained by Stephen Townsend of Boston. They sang artistically. We only heard the first part of the 'Scheherzade' suite, and that was brilliant and richly colored. There can be no manner of doubt as to the superior playing of this famous orchestral organization, since Henri Rabaud has been at the helm. He has proved an admirable drill master."

Willem Mengelberg

In nooks and corners of this town, it is possible to hear the name of Willem Mengelberg as that of a conductor worthy to lead the Symphony Orchestra next year and within the range of choice by the trustees. In fact the gossip that for a few weeks circled about Mr. Toscanini, now plays around him. Fifteen years ago, when he was by no means at his present pitch of reputation, he came for a fortnight to New York as "guest-conductor" of a pair of concerts by the Philharmonic Society. Otherwise his career and his quality are known in the United States only by report. Mr. Mengelberg is a Hollander, born in Utrecht in 1871 and now in the prime of his powers. He came of good family in which there is a considerable mixture of Jewish blood; he was highly educated; early discovered his calling and in his twenty-fifth year became the conductor of the Amsterdam Orchestra. He has now led it for nearly a quarter of a century and in that time established it as one of the noted orchestras of Europe. Each year, it undertakes thirty-two pairs of concerts in Amsterdam—on Thursday evenings and Sunday afternoons from September to June—and pays regular visits, besides, to The Hague, Rotterdam and other Dutch cities. A chorus assists the band at need and occasionally gives concerts of choral music, likewise with Mr. Mengelberg as leader. In spite of all this work at home, he is one of the most sought "guest-conductors" in Europe. As such he has gone from year to year to England, to Italy, to Russia usually to lead a resident orchestra in a few "special concerts." He has been heard also in Frankfort and a few cities of western Germany, but there he has been less admired than elsewhere. By the token of these labors, he is one of the few European conductors to whom the hundred-odd concerts of the Boston Orchestra in a season would not seem a formidable task, who would hold both the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus in the hollow of his hand.

In quality as conductor, Mr. Mengelberg has been variously viewed. By common consent he is diligent and exacting in rehearsal, seeking both power and polish. By common agreement, also, he cultivates with equal zest ancient and modern, classical and "advanced" composers. He is widely read in the music of all schools; his sympathies are catholic; he makes his programmes accordingly. As unanimously, "assisting artists"—pianists, violinists, singers—praise the elasticity of his accompaniments. Reviewers, hearing him conduct, have been diversely minded. When he was heard in New York, fifteen years ago, he was praised for the quiet authority of his conducting, for his insistence upon a "singing tone," for his elasticity of musical line, for his lucidity with all his pieces. He was also reproached with a fondness for slow pace and for an excess of zeal for detail. When he visited Paris, Mr. Lalo, the austere reviewer for Le Temps, judge him a great conductor "tout court"—pervading and dominating both his orchestra and his audience, penetrating deeply into the substance and spirit of the music in hand, bearing both home to his hearers, a master of rhythm and design, puissant but poised—"better balanced than Mr. Nikisch, less rigid than Mr. Weingartner, as warm, as colorful, as vigorous, as faithful to music as any illustrious conductor of the hour." Indeed only in the departed Richter could this Parisian fund a conductor to outrank Mr. Mengelberg.

ess

BOSTON PLAYERS END VISIT.

Symphony Orchestra Gives a Delightful Programme.

The fifth and final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme was one of delightful character. It opened with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," after which came Debussy's "Nocturnes." All three were given, the "Sirens" having the necessary female chorus. An excursion into the field of French classic opera brought back the lovely ballet suite from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie." The concert concluded with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

The playing of the musicians from Boston does not ask for scrutinizing consideration when such music is offered. The temptation to make comment upon the general achievements of the season under the direction of Mr. Rabaud must be resisted. Such discussion may fittingly be postponed till a later time. Suffice it to say at present that the conductor has won the esteem, if not the enthusiastic admiration, of this public and his departure will be regretted. It is not yet known who will be his successor.

om EAGLE

dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 9 - 19

Boston Symphony.

The most important number scheduled for the closing Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 21, will be the "Organ Symphony" of Saint-Saens in C minor. This, the noblest and largest orchestral work of Mr. Rabaud's friend and compatriot, Boston found to be one of the French conductor's most sympathetic and monumental achievements. Also of interest will be Bach's Concerto in F major No. 2 for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, which the conductor has restored to its original form, discarding the version, or "perversion" of Felix Mottl. Messrs. Fradkin, Longy, Laurent and Heim, the regular virtuosi, will play the instruments above named, and Charles W. Adams will play the harpischord accompaniment.

The remaining numbers are Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption" and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

n MORNING TELEGRAPH

ress: New York City

MAR 9 - 1919

Last Boston Symphony Programs.

The final pair of Boston Symphony concerts for the season will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22. The most notable number on the program for Thursday will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's masterpiece of Oriental coloring, "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite which depicts in four movements divers episodes from the "Arabian Nights." It will be recalled that Frederic Fradkin, the new concertmaster, who weaves through the work the sinuous theme of "Scheherazade," the narrator, took the same important part when he led the violins at the Russian ballet. Also, for Thursday, Mr. Rabaud will conduct Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" a suite of ballet airs from Rameau's opera, "Hippolyte et Aricie," and Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus."

The program for the Saturday matinee is headed by the "Organ Symphony" in C minor of Mr. Rabaud's confrere, Saint-Saens, the organ to be played by Mr. Albert Snow. Of further interest is Bach's Concerto in F major No. 2 for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, giving circumstantial opportunity, as also in "Scheherazade" on Thursday, to hear the individual virtuosi of the orchestra. The conductor has disregarded Felix Mottl's version and restored the work to its original form. Charles W. Adams will play the harpsichord accompaniment. For the rest, Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

RECORD

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR 9 - 191

* * *

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music will close Monday evening of next week. Madame Melba has arranged to sing only three times in America this year—at this concert, and with the Boston

MADAME MELBA.

Symphony in Baltimore and Washington. She recently arrived from Australia and is on her way to Europe for the first time since the beginning of the war. She will sing here two arias of Mozart, one from the opera "Idomeneo" and the immortal "Voi che sapete," from "Figaro's Wedding," and also Duparc's love song, "Phidyle." For the purely orchestral part of the program there will be Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, No. 2; an excerpt, "Royal Hunt and Storm," from Berlioz's "The Trojans"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical tableaux, "Sadko," of ballet fame, and Lalo's overture to "The King of Ys."

* * *

om PUBLIC LEDGER

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR 1 19

Mme. Nellie Melba, who recently arrived from Australia and who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 17, is said to have devoted more time to war work and given more money to the same purpose than any other operatic celebrity. In fact, Madame Melba's efforts in behalf of war charities has been patriotically pronounced and so productive of good results that she has been the recipient of exceptional honors from the British government.

Madame Melba's appearances in this country at this time will be limited, as she will shortly sail for England and will open the spring season of opera at Covent Garden, London. The approaching season will be, according to the plans of the management, the most brilliant in the history of that great institution. As Madame Melba's position has been, since the night of her debut, one of commanding eminence in the musical world it is natural that she should have been selected for the exceptional honor of inaugurating the season.

Madame Melba's vocal powers are brilliant still, and beautiful. This fact was the subject of discussion recently in New York among a coterie of the singer's friends. Many reasons were advanced as to the cause of Melba's retaining her voice in an unimpaired condition. The prima donna silenced all conjecture by the following statement: "My voice is still youthful because I have never used it to its full power. I always keep a vocal reserve, as it were. As a result, I have never strained my voice or sought to give out astonishing volume of tone. A too prodigal expenditure of the voice is fatal to every singer. I can give the names of many aspiring prima donnas whose hopes have been completely dashed by overenthusiastic singing."

She will sing here two arias of Mozart—one from the opera, "Idomeneo," and the perennial "Voi che sapete," from "Figaro's Wedding," which many claim only she can sing; also Duparc's "Phidyle." The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus"; Saint-Saens's light and charming little symphony in A minor No. 2; an excerpt, "Royal Hunt and Storm," from Berlioz's opera, "The Trojans"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical picture, "Sadko"; finally, Lalo's overture to "The King of Ys."

m NEWS

lress: Baltimore, Md.

MAR 1 19

MELBA NOT TO SING HERE

Diva Cancels Tour And Will Sail To Join Sick Nephew, Says Dispatch

A dispatch to The News from Boston says:

Madame Melba, who expected to sail from Europe following her engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, Baltimore, March 19, has received a cable message from London that her only nephew, an Australian, is dangerously ill with typhoid. On receipt of this message, Madame Melba canceled her American engagement and will sail from New York on the first boat March 12. Madame Melba says she greatly regrets this is necessary, but feels obliged to sail immediately in the hope that she may reach her nephew, a hero of the war, who is entirely without kinsfolk in that part of the world.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Reinald Werrenrath, American barytone, as soloist for its concert March 19. Mr. Werrenrath recently made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, with great success. He is a well-known concert singer.

CITIZEN

ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE TRUE BACH.

Final Boston Symphony Concert of the Season.

Next to Saint-Saen's huge and impressive "Organ Symphony," which Mr. Rabaud is to conduct at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Friday, the most interesting number will probably be Bach's Concerto in F major, No. 2, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, at which the illustrious virtuosi of those instruments may be heard. Now, Mr. Rabaud is a great believer in the sanctity of original scores, and he has accordingly passed over the trumpet-tempering versions of the "Gesellschaft" and the licentious Felix Mottl, restoring the integrity of the master's manuscript. With the harpsichord accompaniment, it is eighteenth century music indeed.

The other numbers are Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

MAR 1 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY

MADAME Melba, the intended soloist for the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, has been forced to cancel her engagement and sail immediately for Europe, her nephew in London having been taken seriously ill with typhoid fever.

The management, however, has been fortunate enough to secure the services of Reinald Werrenrath as soloist in her stead. This young American barytone, of the sonorous and velvety voice, recently ventured to overstep the concert field in which he has long been eminent and try his fortunes as Silvio in "Pagliacci," upon the Metropolitan Opera House stage in New York, trod only by Italian and French barytones. The delight and acclaim of New York was clear indication of the result.

At the Boston Symphony concert to come he will sing two operatic numbers, an aria from the last act of Mosart's "Figaro" and Massenet's love song, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade." The orchestral program will comprise Saint-Saens' A minor symphony No 2, Debussy's Nuages and Fetes and Bach's Concerto No. 2 for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet and harpsichord accompaniment to be played by prominent virtuosi of the orchestra, and the overture to Weber's "Freischutz."

om SUN

dress: New York City.

te

The programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will close their New York season on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22, contain much interest. On Thursday there will be Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens"; an ancient suite of ballet airs from Rameau's opera "Hippolyte et Aricie" and for the last section of the programme Rimsky-Korsakoff's Oriental masterpiece of modern coloring, "Scheherezade."

The principal numbers for the Saturday concert are Saint-Saens's largest orchestral work, the "Organ Symphony," and Bach's second Brandenburg concerto in F major for trumpet, flute, oboe and violin, in which Mr. Rabaud has restored the original score of the master despite the instrumental difficulties and the almost insuperable trumpet part. With the harpsichord accompanying and the four soloists sitting around it it will be eighteenth century music indeed. The other pieces for Saturday are Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Rimsky-Korsako's "Sadke" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." Albert Snow will be the organist in the symphony. The soloists in the concerto will be Messrs. Heim, Laurent, Longy and Fradkin.

om EVENING SUN

dress New York City

te

Exceeding interest attaches to the season's final pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York, to take place next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The large work for Thursday is Nimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," the Arabian Nights suite in four parts, of brilliant and individual orchestral display. Upon the first section of the programme stand Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes ("Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens"), and a Suite of ballet airs from Rameau's opera "Hippolyte et Aricie."

On the programme for Saturday the principal numbers are Saint-Saens's mountainous "Organ Symphony" in C minor and Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto in F major, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Mr. Rabaud, believing in the integrity of original scores, has overlooked the tampering and modernizing versions of the "Gesellschaft" and Felix Mottl and has restored the harpsichord accompaniment and the solo parts as the master wrote them. The other numbers for Saturday are Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadro" and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

MAR 1

A Brass Octette.

The Boston Symphony Brass Octette, under the direction of Gustav Heim, who has been called one of the world's greatest trumpeters, will give a unique musicale Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Club. This is not a public concert, admission being by club membership cards only, but as a matter of record it seems worth while to note the first appearance in Baltimore of this organization, which has given noteworthy concerts in many of the Eastern musical centers.

The Boston Symphony.

The last of the current season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Henri Robaud, will take place at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, when Reinald Werrenrath, the young American barytone, will be the assisting artist, replacing Mme. Melba, who was suddenly called to Europe because of the serious illness of her nephew, whose health has been impaired by service in the war. Since Mr. Werrenrath last appeared here in concert he has become a member of the Metropolitan Opera coterie and recently sang the role of Silvio, in "Pagliacci," with marked success. On Wednesday evening he will be heard in Figaro's aria, "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the famous "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Heroiade."

An interesting feature of the orchestral program will be Bach's second concerto, the one in F major, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with harpsichord accompaniment, played by Charles W. Adams. The work will be presented in its original form. The symphony will be the second, the one in A minor, of Saint-Saens, other orchestral numbers being "Clouds" and "Festivals," by Debussy, and the overture to Weber's "Freischutz."

MORNING TELEGRAPH

s: New York City

MAR 21 191

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE CONCERT

Debussy's Nocturnes, With Female Choir, Feature of Most Artistic Program.

CONDUCTOR RABAUD'S TRIUMPH

Sutro Sisters in Two-Piano Recital and Reuben Davies Please at Aeolian.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fifth concert of the season at Carnegie Hall offered as the principal feature of a singularly eventful program, Debussy's Nocturnes with the female voices singing "Sirenes" for the first time in that strange musical episode. Of the three impressionistic fancies treated in this work, "Nuages" is the most fantastically beautiful and it was never played more effectively than under the Rabaud baton at this concert.

"Sirenes," in spite of the fact that the fine choir of female voices sang it with apparent understanding and with admirable intonation, did not seem at a bettered in a musical sense by the contribution. In fact, this part of the "Preludes," as given by Mr. Rabaud, renewed the impression that Debussy's scoring for voices is never fortuitous or quite natural, and that his truest and best motives and topics are derived from the tonal phenomena of inanimate nature even as in this same "Sirenes," the voice of the sea wind, the timbrel boom of harp chord reiterated like some doomful clock, the wavering voices of mad waters, and the cadences of unseen winds overhead, as they were expressed and suggested by the instruments, are far more precious and memorable than the vocal choir of the sirens.

Rabaud's Inspirational Baton.

"Fetes," too, was wonderfully played in the tenaciously gentle manner which is characteristic of the imaginative Rabaud, and throughout the concert, notably in Lalo's overture to "Le Roy d'Ys" and in the Air en Rondeau out of Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," there prevailed the same wistful, searching, tender poignancy which inheres in these compositions and which Conductor Rabaud reads forthright and impeccably as none of his orchestral contemporaries do. The Rameau Airs de Ballet, notably the Rigaudon en Tambourin, also afforded the Boston band a glorious opportunity to the exposition of its newly perfected versatility and balance, and the number was roundly applauded by the fine audience.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite was the concluding and most pretentious excursion of the evening and served to further impress the audience with the high degree of discipline, esprit and mutual understanding which M. Rabaud has injected and intensified in his splendid orchestra.

Piano Recitals at Aeolian.

Rose and Ottilie Sutro attracted a large and friendly audience to their annual two-piano recital at Aeolian Hall, their best success coming from a capital playing of Brahms's Sonata in its original form as played by the composer and Tausig from the manuscript. Much interest centered, also, in Algernon Ashton's Toccata Brilliante, played by the Sutro sisters for the first time, and cordially applauded by the audience. Chaminade's Valse Carnivalesque and Beethoven's Turkish March were other eminently commendable features of a successful recital.

In the afternoon at Aeolian a considerable audience expressed satisfaction with the excellent playing of a very interesting program by Reuben Davies, a scholarly, earnest and sincere artist, who hails from Kansas. He played Beethoven's Third Sonata with fine technical authority and considerable feeling, and proved himself a studiously, zealous artist in his Chopin numbers. Debussy, Ganz, Blanche

WORLD

s New York City

MAR 21 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT BEST.

Conductor and Orchestra Excel in a Romantic Programme.

It was a romantic programme, with an abundance of color, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered in Carnegie Hall last night for the last concert but one of the current season. There were French and Russian music for the audience, which filled the large auditorium. The orchestra was in excellent condition.

Conductor Henri Rabaud again demonstrated his scholarly attainment and his complete grasp of the uses to which a distinguished orchestra should be put.

Without a doubt the achievement of the evening was M. Rabaud's reading and the orchestra's playing of the three DeBussy nocturnes, "Clouds, Festivals and Sirens," which seldom has been equalled in this city. In these sketches M. Rabaud again

rom TRIBUNE

ddress New York City

MAR 21

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Paying Final Visit of Season to New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The organization will be heard in Brooklyn to-night and again at Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon, and with that concert its New York activities for this season will come to an end. Since the internment of Dr. Mück, the retirement of its founder and supporter, Major Higginson, and its reorganization consequent on the exclusion of enemy aliens from its ranks, the Boston band has labored under disadvantages to which the permanent organizations of this city were not subjected; but the note of distinction which has marked its performances for many years, though less dominant than formerly, has never been wholly extinguished.

It was heard jubilantly last night and made the concert stand out brilliantly and bravely among the scores of meetings of its kind which the people of New York have been asked to attend. This was not because of any new music in the scheme, nor of any effort on the part of M. Rabaud, the conductor, to give new readings to familiar pages. It was due solely to the sound, wholesome, unaffected, convincing, gratifying ear-and-intellect-filling manner in which the music was played.

The programme comprised Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," the three nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages," "Fêtes" and "Sirênes," a set of dance airs from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scherazade," which last number, we believe, has figured in the lists of all the local and visiting organizations.

In the third of the night-pieces by Debussy the orchestra was efficiently assisted by a choir of women, whose voices were nicely blended with those of the instruments and made to serve the composer's poetic purpose admirably.

We doubt if the strange charm of the composition was ever before so alluringly presented to the fancy of a New York audience. The mood in which the composer enveloped the old legend of Ys was eloquently published in the performance of Lalo's overture, especially in the masterly playing of the violoncello episode, and the stately simplicity of the archaic dances was intellectually and æstetically cheering.

H. E. K.

m AMERICAN

dress: New York City.

te

A Symphony Concert Without Symphony

By MAX SMITH.

A SYMPHONY CONCERT without a symphony closed the Boston Orchestra's evening series last night in Carnegie Hall in a manner not exactly exhilarating. As one disappointed listener remarked, it "was like 'Hamlet' without a Hamlet."

Monsieur Henri Rabaud, who, as far as we know, has not been engaged for next season, will appear once more in New York to-morrow afternoon as conductor of the men from the Hub. Happily his programme on that occasion, though somewhat ill-assorted, will not be as spineless as yesterday's, which seemed to have been chosen with a view to making the parting easy.

But it must be confessed that the distinguished French musician has not quite lived up to the unexpectedly good impression he made when he came here on the heels of Pierre Monteux. Certainly his choice of music has shown at times a peculiar lack of respect for the standards maintained here in the past, though never as much so as last night.

Not that the contributions of the evening, taken by themselves, were unworthy of performance; though Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture, heard so often at Sunday night concerts, might surely have been replaced by something else.

Debussy's poetically suggestive Nocturnes, including the "Sirenes," which enlisted the services of a finely trained chorus of women, were more than welcome, even if they had been heard here quite recently, thanks to the Philadelphia Orchestra and Leopold Stokowski.

But why did not Monsieur Rabaud set off those exquisitely atmospheric tone pictures with something more substantial than the quaint and pretty "Airs de Ballett" from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," selected from the two suites arranged by Vincent D'Indy for concert use?

And what could have induced him to conclude his programme with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sheherazade" suite—a work that perhaps has been played more often in this city in the last few years than any other composition.

It must be admitted, though, in all justice to Monsieur Rabaud, that he gave a most impressive reading of the "Sheherazade," presenting the first movement with great breadth, power and vigor. Praise, too, is due to Frederick Fradking, concertmaster, for his excellent performance of the solo violin parts.

om EAGLE

dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

te

Boston Symphony.

The most important number scheduled for the closing Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 21, will be the "Organ Symphony" of Saint-Saens in C minor. This, the noblest and largest orchestral work of Mr. Rabaud's friend and compatriot, Boston found to be one of the French conductor's most sympathetic and monumental achievements. Also of interest will be Bach's Concerto in F major No. 2 for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, which the conductor has restored to its original form, discarding the version, or "perversion" of Felix Mottl. Messrs. Fradkin, Longy, Laurent and Heim, the regular virtuosi, will play the instruments above named, and Charles W. Adams will play the harpsichord accompaniment.

The remaining numbers are Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption" and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

n MORNING TELEGRAPH

ress: New York City

Last Boston Symphony Programs.

The final pair of Boston Symphony concerts for the season will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22. The most notable number on the program for Thursday will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's masterpiece of Oriental coloring, "Scheherazade," the symphonic suite which depicts in four movements divers episodes from the "Arabian Nights." It will be recalled that Frederic Fradkin, the new concertmaster, who weaves through the work the sinuous theme of "Scheherazade," the narrator, took the same important part when he led the violins at the Russian ballet. Also, for Thursday, Mr. Rabaud will conduct Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" a suite of ballet airs from Rameau's opera, "Hippolyte et Aricie," and Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus."

The program for the Saturday matinee is headed by the "Organ Symphony" in C minor of Mr. Rabaud's confrere, Saint-Saens, the organ to be played by Mr. Albert Snow. Of further interest is Bach's Concerto in F major No. 2 for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, giving circumstantial opportunity, as also in "Scheherazade" on Thursday, to hear the individual virtuosi of the orchestra. The conductor has disregarded Felix Mottl's version and restored the work to its original form. Charles W. Adams will play the harpsichord accompaniment. For the rest, Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

RECORD

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

—The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music will close Monday evening of next week. Madame Melba has arranged to sing only three times in America this year—at this concert, and with the Boston

MADAME MELBA.

Symphony in Baltimore and Washington. She recently arrived from Australia and is on her way to Europe for the first time since the beginning of the war. She will sing here two arias of Mozart, one from the opera "Idomeneo" and the immortal "Voi che sapete," from "Figaro's Wedding," and also Duparc's love song, "Phidyle." For the purely orchestral part of the program there will be Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, No. 2; an excerpt, "Royal Hunt and Storm," from Berlioz's "The Trojans"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical tableaux, "Sadko," of ballet fame, and Lalo's overture to "The King of Ys."

* * *

om PUBLIC LEDGER

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

Mme. Nellie Melba, who recently arrived from Australia and who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 17, is said to have devoted more time to war work and given more money to the same purpose than any other operatic celebrity. In fact, Madame Melba's efforts in behalf of war charities has been patriotically pronounced and so productive of good results that she has been the recipient of exceptional honors from the British government.

Madame Melba's appearances in this country at this time will be limited, as she will shortly sail for England and will open the spring season of opera at Covent Garden, London. The approaching season will be, according to the plans of the management, the most brilliant in the history of that great institution. As Madame Melba's position has been, since the night of her debut, one of commanding eminence in the musical world it is natural that she should have been selected for the exceptional honor of inaugurating the season.

Madame Melba's vocal powers are brilliant still, and beautiful. This fact was the subject of discussion recently in New York among a coterie of the singer's friends. Many reasons were advanced as to the cause of Melba's retaining her voice in an unimpaired condition. The prima donna silenced all conjecture by the following statement: "My voice is still youthful because I have never used it to its full power. I always keep a vocal reserve, as it were. As a result, I have never strained my voice or sought to give out astonishing volume of tone. A too prodigal expenditure of the voice is fatal to every singer. I can give the names of many aspiring prima donnas whose hopes have been completely dashed by overenthusiastic singing."

She will sing here two arias of Mozart—one from the opera, "Idomeneo," and the perennial "Voi che sapete," from "Figaro's Wedding," which many claim only she can sing; also Duparc's "Phidyle." The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus"; Saint-Saens's light and charming little symphony in A minor No. 2; an excerpt, "Royal Hunt and Storm," from Berlioz's opera, "The Trojans"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical picture, "Sadko"; finally, Lalo's overture to "The King of Ys."

m NEWS

lress: Baltimore, Md.

MELBA NOT TO SING HERE

Diva Cancels Tour And Will Sail to Join Sick Nephew, Says Dispatch

A dispatch to The News from Boston says:

Madame Melba, who expected to sail from Europe following her engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, Baltimore, March 19, has received a cable message from London that her only nephew, an Australian, is dangerously ill with typhoid. On receipt of this message, Madame Melba canceled her American engagement and will sail from New York on the first boat March 12. Madame Melba says she greatly regrets this is necessary, but feels obliged to sail immediately in the hope that she may reach her nephew, a hero of the war, who is entirely without kinsfolk in that part of the world.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured the services of Reinald Werrenrath, American barytone, as soloist for its concert March 19. Mr. Werrenrath recently made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, with great success. He is a well-known concert singer.

CITIZEN

ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE TRUE BACH.

Final Boston Symphony Concert of the Season.

Next to Saint-Saen's huge and impressive "Organ Symphony," which Mr. Rabaud is to conduct at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Friday, the most interesting number will probably be Bach's Concerto in F major, No. 2, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, at which the illustrious virtuosi of those instruments may be heard. Now, Mr. Rabaud is a great believer in the sanctity of original scores, and he has accordingly passed over the trumpet tempering versions of the "Gesellschaft" and the licentious Felix Mottl, restoring the integrity of the master's manuscript. With the harpsichord accompaniment, it is eighteenth century music indeed.

The other numbers are Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

MADAME Melba, the intended soloist for the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, has been forced to cancel her engagement and sail immediately for Europe, her nephew in London having been taken seriously ill with typhoid fever.

The management, however, has been fortunate enough to secure the services of Reinald Werrenrath as soloist in her stead. This young American barytone, of the sonorous and velvety voice, recently ventured to overstep the concert field in which he has long been eminent and try his fortunes as Silvio in "Pagliacci," upon the Metropolitan Opera House stage in New York, trod only by Italian and French barytones. The delight and acclaim of New York was clear indication of the result.

At the Boston Symphony concert to come he will sing two operatic numbers, an aria from the last act of Mosart's "Figaro" and Massenet's love song, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade." The orchestral program will comprise Saint-Saens' A minor symphony No 2, Debussy's Nuages and Fetes and Bach's Concerto No. 2 for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet and harpsichord accompaniment to be played by prominent virtuosi of the orchestra, and the overture to Weber's "Freischutz."

om SUN

dress: New York City.

te

The programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will close their New York season on Thursday evening, March 20, and Saturday afternoon, March 22, contain much interest. On Thursday there will be Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens"; an ancient suite of ballet airs from Rameau's opera "Hippolyte et Aricie" and for the last section of the programme Rimsky-Korsakoff's Oriental masterpiece of modern coloring, "Scheherezade."

The principal numbers for the Saturday concert are Saint-Saens's largest orchestral work, the "Organ Symphony," and Bach's second Brandenburg concerto in F major for trumpet, flute, oboe and violin, in which Mr. Rabaud has restored the original score of the master despite the instrumental difficulties and the almost insuperable trumpet part. With the harpsichord accompanying and the four soloists sitting around it it will be eighteenth century music indeed. The other pieces for Saturday are Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Rimsky-Korsako's "Sadke" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." Albert Snow will be the organist in the symphony. The soloists in the concerto will be Messrs. Heim, Laurent, Longy and Fradkin.

om EVENING SUN

dress New York City

te

Exceeding interest attaches to the season's final pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York, to take place next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The large work for Thursday is Nimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," the Arabian Nights suite in four parts, of brilliant and individual orchestral display. Upon the first section of the programme stand Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Debussy's Nocturnes ("Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens"), and a Suite of ballet airs from Rameau's opera "Hippolyte et Aricie."

On the programme for Saturday the principal numbers are Saint-Saens's mountainous "Organ Symphony" in C minor and Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto in F major, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Mr. Rabaud, believing in the integrity of original scores, has overlooked the tampering and modernizing versions of the "Gesellschaft" and Felix Mottl and has restored the harpsichord accompaniment and the solo parts as the master wrote them. The other numbers for Saturday are Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadro" and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

A Brass Octette.

The Boston Symphony Brass Octette, under the direction of Gustav Heim, who has been called one of the world's greatest trumpeters, will give a unique musicale Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Club. This is not a public concert, admission being by club membership cards only, but as a matter of record it seems worth while to note the first appearance in Baltimore of this organization, which has given noteworthy concerts in many of the Eastern musical centers.

The Boston Symphony.

The last of the current season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Henri Robaud, will take place at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, when Reinald Werrenrath, the young American barytone, will be the assisting artist, replacing Mme. Melba, who was suddenly called to Europe because of the serious illness of her nephew, whose health has been impaired by service in the war. Since Mr. Werrenrath first appeared here in concert he has become a member of the Metropolitan Opera coterie and recently sang the role of Silvio, in "Pagliacci," with marked success. On Wednesday evening he will be heard in Figaro's aria, "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the famous "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Heroiade."

An interesting feature of the orchestral program will be Bach's second concerto, the one in F major, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with harpsichord accompaniment, played by Charles W. Adams. The work will be presented in its original form. The symphony will be the second, the one in A minor, of Saint-Saens, other orchestral numbers being "Clouds" and "Festivals," by Debussy, and the overture to Weber's "Freischutz."

MORNING TELEGRAPH

s: New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE CONCERT

Debussy's Nocturnes, With Female Choir, Feature of Most Artistic Program.

CONDUCTOR RABAUD'S TRIUMPH

Sutro Sisters in Two-Piano Recital and Reuben Davies Please at Aeolian.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fifth concert of the season at Carnegie Hall offered as the principal feature of a singularly eventful program, Debussy's Nocturnes with the female voices singing "Sirenes" for the first time in that strange musical episode. Of the three impressionistic fancies treated in this work, "Nuages" is the most fantastically beautiful and it was never played more effectively than under the Rabaud baton at this concert.

"Sirenes," in spite of the fact that the fine choir of female voices sang it with apparent understanding and with admirable intonation, did not seem at all bettered in a musical sense by the contribution. In fact, this part of the "Preludes," as given by Mr. Rabaud, renewed the impression that Debussy's scoring for voices is never fortuitous or quite natural, and that his truest and best motives and topics are derived from the tonal phenomena of inanimate nature even as in this same "Sirenes," the voice of the sea wind, the timbrel boom of the harp chord reiterated like some doomful clock, the wavering voices of maidens waters, and the cadences of unseen winds overhead, as they were expressed and suggested by the instruments, are far more precious and memorable than the vocal choir of the sirens.

Rabaud's Inspirational Baton.

"Fetes," too, was wonderfully played in the tenaciously gentle manner which is characteristic of the imaginative Rabaud, and throughout the concert, notably in Lalo's overture to "Le Roy d'Ys" and in the Air en Rondeau out of Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," there prevailed the same wistful, searching, tender poignancy which inheres in these compositions and which Conductor Rabaud reads forthright and impeccably as none of his orchestral contemporaries do. The Rameau Airs de Ballet, notably the Rigaudon en Tambourin, also afforded the Boston band a glorious opportunity to the exposition of its newly perfected versatility and balance, and the number was roundly applauded by the fine audience.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite was the concluding and most pretentious excursion of the evening and served to further impress the audience with the high degree of discipline, esprit and mutual understanding which M. Rabaud has injected and intensified in his splendid orchestra.

Piano Recitals at Aeolian.

Rose and Ottilie Sutro attracted a large and friendly audience to their annual two-piano recital at Aeolian Hall, their best success coming from a capital playing of Brahms's Sonata in its original form as played by the composer and Tausig from the manuscript. Much interest centered, also, in Algernon Ashton's Toccata Brilliante, played by the Sutro sisters for the first time, and cordially applauded by the audience. Chaminade's Valse Carnivalesque and Beethoven's Turkish March were other eminently commendable features of a successful recital.

In the afternoon at Aeolian a considerable audience expressed satisfaction with the excellent playing of a very interesting program by Reuben Davies, a scholarly, earnest and sincere artist, who hails from Kansas. He played Beethoven's Third Sonata with fine technical authority and considerable feeling, and proved himself a studiously, zealous artist in his Chopin numbers. Debussy, Ganz, Blanchet

WORLD

s New York City

MAR 21 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT BEST.

Conductor and Orchestra Excel in a Romantic Programme.

It was a romantic programme, with an abundance of color, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered in Carnegie Hall last night for the last concert but one of the current season. There were French and Russian music for the audience, which filled the large auditorium. The orchestra was in excellent condition.

Conductor Henri Rabaud again demonstrated his scholarly attainment and his complete grasp of the uses to which a distinguished orchestra should be put.

Without a doubt the achievement of the evening was M. Rabaud's reading and the orchestra's playing of the three DeBussy nocturnes, "Clouds, Festivals and Sirens," which seldom has been equalled in this city. In these sketches M. Rabaud again

rom TRIBUNE

ddress New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Paying Final Visit of Season to New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The organization will be heard in Brooklyn to-night and again at Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon, and with that concert its New York activities for this season will come to an end. Since the internment of Dr. Mück, the retirement of its founder and supporter, Major Higginson, and its reorganization consequent on the exclusion of enemy aliens from its ranks, the Boston band has labored under disadvantages to which the permanent organizations of this city were not subjected; but the note of distinction which has marked its performances for many years, though less dominant than formerly, has never been wholly extinguished.

It was heard jubilantly last night and made the concert stand out brilliantly and bravely among the scores of meetings of its kind which the people of New York have been asked to attend. This was not because of any new music in the scheme, nor of any effort on the part of M. Rabaud, the conductor, to give new readings to familiar pages. It was due solely to the sound, wholesome, unaffected, convincing, gratifying ear-and-intellect-filling manner in which the music was played.

The programme comprised Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," the three nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages," "Fêtes" and "Sirènes," a set of dance airs from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," which last number, we believe, has figured in the lists of all the local and visiting organizations.

In the third of the night-pieces by Debussy the orchestra was efficiently assisted by a choir of women, whose voices were nicely blended with those of the instruments and made to serve the composer's poetic purpose admirably.

We doubt if the strange charm of the composition was ever before so alluringly presented to the fancy of a New York audience. The mood in which the composer enveloped the old legend of Ys was eloquently published in the performance of Lalo's overture, especially in the masterly playing of the violoncello episode, and the stately simplicity of the archaic dances was intellectually and æstetically cheering.

H. E. K.

m AMERICAN

dress: New York City.

te

A Symphony Concert Without Symphony

By MAX SMITH.

A SYMPHONY CONCERT without a symphony closed the Boston Orchestra's evening series last night in Carnegie Hall in a manner not exactly exhilarating. As one disappointed listener remarked, it "was like 'Hamlet' without a Hamlet."

Monsieur Henri Rabaud, who, as far as we know, has not been engaged for next season, will appear once more in New York to-morrow afternoon as conductor of the men from the Hub. Happily his programme on that occasion, though somewhat ill-assorted, will not be as spineless as yesterday's, which seemed to have been chosen with a view to making the parting easy.

But it must be confessed that the distinguished French musician has not quite lived up to the unexpectedly good impression he made when he came here on the heels of Pierre Monteux. Certainly his choice of music has shown at times a peculiar lack of respect for the standards maintained here in the past, though never as much so as last night.

Not that the contributions of the evening, taken by themselves, were unworthy of performance; though Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture, heard so often at Sunday night concerts, might surely have been replaced by something else.

Debussy's poetically suggestive Nocturnes, including the "Sirenes," which enlisted the services of a finely trained chorus of women, were more than welcome, even if they had been heard here quite recently, thanks to the Philadelphia Orchestra and Leopold Stokowski.

But why did not Monsieur Rabaud set off those exquisitely atmospheric tone pictures with something more substantial than the quaint and pretty "Airs de Ballett" from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," selected from the two suites arranged by Vincent D'Indy for concert use?

And what could have induced him to conclude his programme with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sheherazade" suite—a work that perhaps has been played more often in this city in the last few years than any other composition.

It must be admitted, though, in all justice to Monsieur Rabaud, that he gave a most impressive reading of the "Sheherazade," presenting the first movement with great breadth, power and vigor. Praise, too, is due to Frederick Fradking, concertmaster, for his excellent performance of the solo violin parts.

114

HERALD
New York City
MAR 21 1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS FIRST OF LAST TWO CONCERTS

Neither Soloist nor Symphony on Programme, Which Is Interesting but Uneven—Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" Heard.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

The sturdy and much occupied present musical season, which in the number if not in the surpassing interest of its events, symphonic, operatic and otherwise, has been not a little hectic and flamboyant. is now surely beginning to wane and dwindle.

The fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Henri Rabaud, gave the first of its last pair of concerts in New York this season in Carnegie Hall last night may well be adduced as convincing evidence. The orchestra was its own soloist—to my thinking an ideal and proper situation and condition for symphony concerts of the best type.

I have long contended that Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys" should be included in the Metropolitan Opera House repertoire; and after the colorful, varied and forceful rendering given the really impressive overture to this work by Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra I venture to hope that my oft expressed opinion may have gained some supporters. Anyway, the applause was hearty enough to warrant some such belief on my part.

The three Debussy nocturnes next on the programme, "Nuages," "Fêtes," and "Sirenes"—with female chorus—have been variously appreciated. All are very Debussy, at his most empirical. In atmosphere and pictorial suggestion "Fêtes" takes rank with "Iberia," one of the best tone paintings ever written. But I do not think any modern Ulysses, or his companions, need stop his ears with wax to avoid the lure of the "Sirenes," although it was exceptionally well sung last night. All three nocturnes were admirably played and interpreted, although I found Mr. Rabaud's readings a trifle obvious, and in so far lacking in mystic Debussy subtlety. But I must say, for all that, that I never heard "Sirenes" sound more plausible and less vocally disconcerting. So, all honor to the sirens who sang it last night.

A group of airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," played with much rhythmic force and real classic elegance and distinction, sounded at first as fresh and sweet as a May morning, but got duller and duller by degrees, so that one could readily trace and recognize the decadence and desuetude of Rameau, Lully, Bocherini, et al., of the period. But, nevertheless, the "Rigandon" had a quite peculiar "snap" and charm.

In conclusion, Rimsky-Korsakoff's scintillating and gorgeously orchestrated symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," played with all possible contrast in orchestral pigments, poetic fancy and fairytale feeling by Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra, with real and uncommon virtuosity in combined delicacy and impressive sonorities.

Altogether a symphony concert, without either soloist or symphony, and none the worse on that account, although of somewhat uneven interest.

REUBEN DAVIES MAKES HIS DEBUT AS PIANIST

At the fourth piano recital of the week in Aeolian Hall Reuben Davies, a local musician, made his first public appearance here yesterday afternoon.

There were many commendable things to be found in his playing. He has a good musical touch and a satisfactory grasp of interpretive matters. His technique, too, is adequate for recital purposes, although it is by no means faultless. But there were seldom any signs of that brilliancy and individuality without which no soloist can hope to raise himself above the general run of pianists. His finger work was often muddy in rapid passages in Beethoven's sonata opus 2 No. 3. In the adaggio movement he was not always precise in his rhythms, and he showed a tendency to hurry over many quick moving passages. He presented, also a group of Chopin's pieces and modern works of Debussy, Ganz and Blanchet.

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

"This will be eighteenth century music in the pure and true sense," the press representatives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., says of Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, in three movements, for solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, which will be one of the compositions the orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, will play in Baltimore on Wednesday night in the Lyric Theater. The work will be additionally unusual to hear in that the solo players will be accompanied by a harpsichord as well as several orchestral instruments.

"Felix Mottl felt moved to modernize it according to the instruments of our day. The trumpet solo in particular was extremely difficult in altitude and speed for the modern player; so he rewrote the part for two trumpets, changed the score about for the sake of space, lowered the highest notes an octave and brought in a horn and clarinet to help them out. He also eliminated the harpsichord, writing the accompaniment into the strings.

"Mr. Rabaud being a firm believer in the sanctity of original scores, has ignored all this. Except that he has had to introduce a second trumpet by absolute necessity, he has revived the music precisely as the master wrote it. There will be a harpsichord before the conductor's stand. Around it will sit the four virtuosi. Then, of course, the 'tutti' and the harpsichord accompaniment reinforced by two violins, viola and 'cello, as Bach wrote it."

Solo parts of the concerto—violin, flute, oboe and trumpet—will be played, respectively, by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, of the orchestra. The harpsichord part will be played by Charles W. Adams, of Boston, not a member of the orchestra.

Reinald Werrenrath, barytone, who will sing at this concert instead of Mme. Melba, will present with orchestra the recitative, "Tutto e disposto" and aria, Aprite un po' queg!' occhi," from the fourth act of Mozart's Le Nozze di Figaro, and the "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

SCENE FROM, LA REINE FIAMMETTE. PHOTO BY WHITE.

REINALD WERRENRATH.

Scene from the new opera "La Reine Fiammette," to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening. Reinald Werrenrath, who will be the soloist at the last of the Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening.

Coming Events

There has been a change of soloist for the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season that befalls tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music. Madame Melba having been unexpectedly compelled to sail for Europe, owing to the serious illness of her nephew, her place will be taken by Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has had more than a large success at his recent debut with the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is to sing Figaro's aria from the garden scene of Mozart's opera, and "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade."

The orchestral part of the program, varied and interesting, stands as originally announced: Beeehoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," Saint-Saens' pretty little symphony in A minor No. 2, Berlioz's orchestral piece, "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from "The Trojans," Rimsky-Korsakoff's strong rhythmed tone picture, "Sadko," and finally, Lalo's brilliant overture to "The King of Ys."

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
MAR 1 1919

Melodies From

BY J. NO

A periscope was used in connectio with music recently when, the Apr number of Popular Mechanics say an orchestra conductor below the footlights of a stage of a New Yor theater solved with it the problem of following a pantomime in orde to conduct the orchestra.

"This will be eighteenth century music in the pure and true sense, the press representatives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., says of Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, in three movements, for solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, which will be one of the compositions the orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor will play in Baltimore on Wednesday night in the Lyric Theater. The work will be additionally unusual to hear in that the solo players will be accompanied by a harpsichord (18th) well as several orchestral instruments.

"Felix Mottl felt moved to modernize it according to the instruments of our day. The trumpet solo in particular was extremely difficult in altitude and speed for the modern player; so he rewrote the part for two trumpets, changed the score about for the sake of space, lowered the highest notes an octave and brought in a horn and clarinet to help them out. He also eliminated the harpsichord, writing the accompaniment into the strings.

"Mr. Rabaud being a firm believer in the sanctity of original scores, has ignored all this. Except that he has had to introduce a second trumpet by absolute necessity, he has revived the music precisely as the master wrote it. There will be a harpsichord before the conductor's stand. Around it will sit the four virtuosi. Then, of course, the 'tutti' and the harpsichord accompaniment reinforced by two violins, viola and 'cello, as Bach wrote it."

Solo parts of the concerto—violin, flute, oboe and trumpet—will be played, respectively, by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, of the orchestra. The harpsichord part will be played by Charles W. Adams, of Boston, not a member of the orchestra.

Reinald Werrenrath, barytone, who will sing at this concert instead of Mme. Melba, will present with orchestra the recitative, "Tutto e disposto

m TIMES
dress New York City MAR 2 1
te

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played so brilliantly this season as it did last night at Carnegie Hall. It was the fifth and final evening concert and the program was devoted to three French composers, Lalo, Debussy, Rameau, and one Russian, the now redoubtable and always fascinating Rimsky-Korsakoff. Henri Rabaud conducted. The audience was in a particularly sympathetic mood and the applause spontaneous. The Lalo overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" begins to sound "vieux chapeau." It is well-made, the themes pregnant, and the scoring effective, were it not for the undue preponderance of the drums and other instruments of percussion, and it must be said that Mr. Rabaud did not seek to attenuate their ferocious rataplan. The general performance was rather rough, opaque, and certainly noisy. Not precisely a promising beginning.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" cleared the air. The three numbers of this charming group went better than we had dared to hope, as imagination does not largely bulk in the mental make-up of the French conductor. "Nuages" was not too poetical, but the "Fêtes" was full of sparkle and rhythmic life. Rabaud is nothing if not rhythmic. "Sirenes," with its muffled eloquence, its exquisite nuances, was altogether a delight, especially as the female chorus on this occasion happened to have been trained by Stephen Townsend of Boston. These sirens came over on a special train from the city of the sacred codfish. They sang artistically. We only heard the first part of the "Scheherazade" suite, and that was brilliant and richly colored. There can be no manner of doubt as to the superior playing of this famous orchestral organizations since Henri Rabaud has been at the helm. He has proved an admirable drill master. Last night was the high water-mark of the season. On next Saturday afternoon the band is to play for the last time.

n RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 16 1919

—There has been a change of soloist for the final Boston symphony concert of the season tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music. Madame Melba having sailed for Europe, owing to the serious illness of her nephew, her place will be taken by Reinald Werrenrath a young American baritone, who has had success at his recent debut with the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is to sing Figaro's aria from the garden scene of Mozart's opera and "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade." The orchestral part of the program stands as originally announced: Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus"; Saint Saens' symphony in A minor, No. 2, Berlioz's orchestral piece, "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from "The Trojans" Rimsky-Korsakoff's strong-rhythmed tone-picture, "Sadko," and finally Lalo's overture to "The King of Ys."

REINALD WERRENRATH.

* * *

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES LAST CONCE

Reinald Werrenrath, Replacing M Melba, Sings Mozart and Massenet Excellently

PROGRAM

"Coriolanus" Overture ..... Beethoven
A Minor (second) Symphony ..... Saint-Saens
"Chasse Royale et Orage" ..... Berlioz
Recitative and Aria, ("Aprite un po' ..."), from "Figaro" ..... Mozart
"Sadko," a musical picture ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Vision fugitive," from "Herodiade" ... Massenet
Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys" ..... Lalo

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a long and very satisfactory concert for the fifth and last of its thirty-fourth local season in the Academy last evening. The first number was Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, whose heroic content was proclaimed with eloquence and dignity under Henri Rabaud's discriminating baton.

The Saint-Saens Symphony in A minor is music eminently respectable, but of no profound depth or weighty substance. The opening allegro is of beautiful correctness—"faultily faultless, splendidly null"—unimpassioned, in spite of the label "appassionato." Here, as so often during the evening, the distinction of M. Longy's presence with the oboe impressed itself. Has he one note for a florid cadenza to utter he does the least thing or the largest with infallible authority.

The adagio, with the emphasis of the English horn, made a profounder appeal; the closing "prestissimo" was a bouyant allopade. Near the end was a chorale-like episode resembling a cadenza, begun by four violins and a viola in sweetest concord. In the Berlioz music, descriptive of the hunting scene of Dido and Eneas, the horns were powerful, and the violins poured like rain in the lively realism of the representation of the tempest.

Reinald Werrenrath was completely successful. Madam Melba was summoned by the illness of a relative to England and Mr. Werrenrath, suddenly called upon to fill her place, gave instead of her chosen Mozart arias (from the operas "Idomeneo" and "Figaro") another Mozart aria from "Figaro"—the "Aprite un po'." Instead of her lyric from Dupaic ("Phydile") he sang Massenet's "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiad Thus, it will be seen, he offered music of a not dissimilar sort, which was in keeping with the program built round Madam Melba's choices.

The same good taste and sense of the fitness of things he showed in every considerate detail of his performance. He "strove with none" in the orchestra; he neither ranted nor bellowed; he stood up and sang with delicate sentiment and a reticent perception, like a man and an artist. The diction was clearly defined, the syllables were well moulded in a voice of most agreeable timbre and the essential ideas of the text were set out in a way that revealed an intellect in control of the execution. The audience very heartily and very often recalled the singer.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and Lalo's "Rio d'Ys" overture have points of dynamic resemblance, and both gave vent to the best work of the evening on the part of the orchestra—especially the latter contribution.

"Sadko," beginning with a tonal painting of marine undulation on the part of the cellos, rose to a vivid climax ere the musician's fiddle-strings of the underlying legend were snapped, and a dramatic pause preluded the hush of the sea-depths at the end. The feature of the finely vigorous conclusive number was Mr. Malkin's playing of the song upon the cello. The audience bade adieu to M. Rabaud and the [illegible] leads with real regret, and satisfaction that in a trying year the new leader has assured the continuity of a glorious tradition.

TIMES
ss: Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

There has been a change of soloists for the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to take place next Tuesday afternoon, at the New National Theater.

Madame Melba having been unexpectedly compelled to sail for Europe, owing to the serious illness of a relative Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, whose recent debut at the Metropolitan Opera is now common musical knowledge, will sing in her stead—Figaro's Aria from the garden scene of Mozart's "Figaro," and the love-song, "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade."

The purely orchestral numbers stand as originally proposed: Franck's Symphonic piece from "The Redemption." Saint-Saens' delicately-wrought symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and for the last part of the program Rimsky-Korsakoff's masterpiece of sensuous and oriental coloring, "Scheherazade," better known in its hashed ballet version. It is in four movements, depicting [illegible] episodes from Arabian Nights.

PUBLIC LEDGER
:88 Philadelphia, Pa.

Madame Melba, the intended soloist for the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Monday evening, has been forced to cancel her engagement and sail immediately for Europe, her nephew in London having been taken seriously ill with typhoid fever.

The management, however, has been fortunate enough to secure the services of Reinald Werrenrath as soloist in her stead. This young American baritone of the sonorous and velvety voice recently ventured to overstep the concert field in which he has long been eminent and try his fortunes as Silvio in "Pagliacci" upon the Metropolitan Opera House stage in New York, trod only by Italian and French baritones. The delight and acclaim of New York was a clear indication of the result. At the Boston Symphony concert to come he will sing two operatic numbers, an aria from the last act of Mozart's "Figaro" and Massenet's love song, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade."

The purely orchestral numbers at this concert are particularly interesting: Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus." Saint-Saens's Second Symphony in A minor, an excerpt from Berlioz's opera, "The Trojans"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's strong-rhythmed "Sadko" and Lalo's brilliant overture to "The King of Ysa."

114

HERALD
New York City
MAR 21 1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS FIRST OF LAST TWO CONCERTS

Neither Soloist nor Symphony on Programme, Which Is Interesting but Uneven—Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" Heard.

By REGINALD de KOVEN.

The sturdy and much occupied present musical season, which in the number if not in the surpassing interest of its events, symphonic, operatic and otherwise, has been not a little hectic and flamboyant. is now surely beginning to wane and dwindle.

The fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Henri Rabaud, gave the first of its last pair of concerts in New York this season in Carnegie Hall last night may well be adduced as convincing evidence. The orchestra was its own soloist—to my thinking an ideal and proper situation and condition for symphony concerts of the best type.

I have long contended that Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys" should be included in the Metropolitan Opera House repertoire; and after the colorful, varied and forceful rendering given the really impressive overture to this work by Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra I venture to hope that my oft expressed opinion may have gained some supporters. Anyway, the applause was hearty enough to warrant some such belief on my part.

The three Debussy nocturnes next on the programme, "Nuages," "Fêtes," and "Sirenes"—with female chorus—have been variously appreciated. All are very Debussy, at his most empirical. In atmosphere and pictorial suggestion "Fêtes" takes rank with "Iberia," one of the best tone paintings ever written. But I do not think any modern Ulysses, or his companions, need stop his ears with wax to avoid the lure of the "Sirenes," although it was exceptionally well sung last night. All three nocturnes were admirably played and interpreted, although I found Mr. Rabaud's readings a trifle obvious, and in so far lacking in mystic Debussy subtlety. But I must say, for all that, that I never heard "Sirenes" sound more plausible and less vocally disconcerting. So, all honor to the sirens who sang it last night.

A group of airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," played with much rhythmic force and real classic elegance and distinction, sounded at first as fresh and sweet as a May morning, but got duller and duller by degrees, so that one could readily trace and recognize the decadence and desuetude of Rameau, Lully, Bocherini, et al., of the period. But, nevertheless, the "Rigandon" had a quite peculiar "snap" and charm.

In conclusion, Rimsky-Korsakoff's scintillating and gorgeously orchestrated symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," played with all possible contrast in orchestral pigments, poetic fancy and fairytale feeling by Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra, with real and uncommon virtuosity in combined delicacy and impressive sonorities.

Altogether a symphony concert, without either soloist or symphony, and none the worse on that account, although of somewhat uneven interest.

REUBEN DAVIES MAKES HIS DEBUT AS PIANIST

At the fourth piano recital of the week in Aeolian Hall Reuben Davies, a local musician, made his first public appearance here yesterday afternoon.

There were many commendable things to be found in his playing. He has a good musical touch and a satisfactory grasp of interpretive matters. His technique, too, is adequate for recital purposes, although it is by no means faultless. But there were seldom any signs of that brilliancy and individuality without which no soloist can hope to raise himself above the general run of pianists. His finger work was often muddy in rapid passages in Beethoven's sonata opus 2 No. 3. In the adaggio movement he was not always precise in his rhythms, and he showed a tendency to hurry over many quick moving passages. He presented, also a group of Chopin's pieces and modern works of Debussy, Ganz and Blanchet.

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

"This will be eighteenth century music in the pure and true sense," the press representatives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., says of Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, in three movements, for solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, which will be one of the compositions the orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, will play in Baltimore on Wednesday night in the Lyric Theater. The work will be additionally unusual to hear in that the solo players will be accompanied by a harpsichord as well as several orchestral instruments.

"Felix Mottl felt moved to modernize it according to the instruments of our day. The trumpet solo in particular was extremely difficult in altitude and speed for the modern player; so he rewrote the part for two trumpets, changed the score about for the sake of space, lowered the highest notes an octave and brought in a horn and clarinet to help them out. He also eliminated the harpsichord, writing the accompaniment into the strings.

"Mr. Rabaud being a firm believer in the sanctity of original scores, has ignored all this. Except that he has had to introduce a second trumpet by absolute necessity, he has revived the music precisely as the master wrote it. There will be a harpsichord before the conductor's stand. Around it will sit the four virtuosi. Then, of course, the 'tutti' and the harpsichord accompaniment reinforced by two violins, viola and 'cello, as Bach wrote it."

Solo parts of the concerto—violin, flute, oboe and trumpet—will be played, respectively, by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, of the orchestra. The harpsichord part will be played by Charles W. Adams, of Boston, not a member of the orchestra.

Reinald Werrenrath, barytone, who will sing at this concert instead of Mme. Melba, will present with orchestra the recitative, "Tutto e disposto and aria, Aprite un po' queg!' occhi," from the fourth act of Mozart's Le Nozze di Figaro, and the [illegible] Fugitive," from Massenet [illegible]

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

Scene from the new opera "La Reine Fiammette," to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening. Reinald Werrenrath, who will be the soloist at the last of the Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

Coming Events

There has been a change of soloist for the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season that befalls tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music. Madame Melba having been unexpectedly compelled to sail for Europe, owing to the serious illness of her nephew, her place will be taken by Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who has had more than a large success at his recent debut with the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is to sing Figaro's aria from the garden scene of Mozart's opera, and "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade."

The orchestral part of the program, varied and interesting, stands as originally announced: Beeehoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," Saint-Saens' pretty little symphony in A minor No. 2, Berlioz's orchestral piece, "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from "The Trojans," Rimsky-Korsakoff's strong rhythmed tone picture, "Sadko," and finally, Lalo's brilliant overture to "The King [illegible]

Melodies From

BY J. NO

A periscope was used in connectio with music recently when, the Ap number of Popular Mechanics say an orchestra conductor below the footlights of a stage of a New Yor theater solved with it the problem of following a pantomime in orde to conduct the orchestra.

"This will be eighteenth century music in the pure and true sense," the press representatives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., says of Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, in three movements, for solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, which will be one of the compositions the orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, will play in Baltimore on Wednesday night in the Lyric Theater. The work will be additionally unusual to hear in that the solo players will be accompanied by a harpsichord as well as several orchestral instruments.

"Felix Mottl felt moved to modernize it according to the instruments of our day. The trumpet solo in particular was extremely difficult in altitude and speed for the modern player; so he rewrote the part for two trumpets, changed the score about for the sake of space, lowered the highest notes an octave and brought in a horn and clarinet to help them out. He also eliminated the harpsichord, writing the accompaniment into the strings.

"Mr. Rabaud being a firm believer in the sanctity of original scores, has ignored all this. Except that he has had to introduce a second trumpet by absolute necessity, he has revived the music precisely as the master wrote it. There will be a harpsichord before the conductor's stand. Around it will sit the four virtuosi. Then, of course, the 'tutti' and the harpsichord accompaniment reinforced by two violins, viola and 'cello, as Bach wrote it."

Solo parts of the concerto—violin, flute, oboe and trumpet—will be played, respectively, by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, of the orchestra. The harpsichord part will be played by Charles W. Adams, of Boston, not a member of the orchestra.

Reinald Werrenrath, barytone, who will sing at this concert instead of Mme. Melba, will present with orchestra the recitative, "Tutto e disposto.

m TIMES
dress New York City
te MAR 2

MUSIC

By James Gibbons Huneker

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played so brilliantly this season as it did last night at Carnegie Hall. It was the fifth and final evening concert and the program was devoted to three French composers, Lalo, Debussy, Rameau, and one Russian, the now redoubtable and always fascinating Rimsky-Korsakoff. Henri Rabaud conducted. The audience was in a particularly sympathetic mood and the applause spontaneous. The Lalo overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" begins to sound "vieux chapeau." It is well-made, the themes pregnant, and the scoring effective, were it not for the undue preponderance of the drums and other instruments of percussion, and it must be said that Mr. Rabaud did not seek to attenuate their ferocious rataplan. The general performance was rather rough, opaque, and certainly noisy. Not precisely a promising beginning.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" cleared the air. The three numbers of this charming group went better than we had dared to hope, as imagination does not largely bulk in the mental make-up of the French conductor. "Nuages" was not too poetical, but the "Fêtes" was full of sparkle and rhythmic life. Rabaud is nothing if not rhythmic. "Sirenes," with its muffled eloquence, its exquisite nuances, was altogether a delight, especially as the female chorus on this occasion happened to have been trained by Stephen Townsend of Boston. These sirens came over on a special train from the city of the sacred codfish. They sang artistically. We only heard the first part of the "Scheherazade" suite, and that was brilliant and richly colored. There can be no manner of doubt as to the superior playing of this famous orchestral organizations since Henri Rabaud has been at the helm. He has proved an admirable drill master. Last night was the high water-mark of the season. On next Saturday afternoon the band is to play for the last time.

n RECORD
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 16 1919

—There has been a change of soloist for the final Boston symphony concert of the season tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music. Madame Melba having sailed for Europe, owing to the serious illness of her nephew, her place will be taken by Reinald Werrenrath, a young American baritone, who has had success at his recent debut with the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is to sing Figaro's aria from the garden scene of Mozart's opera and "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade." The orchestral part of the program stands as originally announced: Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus"; Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, No. 2, Berlioz's orchestral piece, "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from "The Trojans" Rimsky-Korsakoff's strong-rhythmed tone-picture, "Sadko," and finally Lalo's overture to "The King of Ys."

REINALD WERRENRATH.

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES LAST CONCE

Reinald Werrenrath, Replacing M Melba, Sings Mozart and Massenet Excellently

PROGRAM

"Coriolanus" Overture ..... Beethoven
A Minor (second) Symphony ..... Saint-Saens
"Chasse Royale et Orage" ..... Berlioz
Recitative and Aria, ("Aprite un po' "), from "Figaro" ..... Mozart
"Sadko," a musical picture ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Vision fugitive," from "Herodiade" ... Massenet
Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys" ..... Lalo

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a long and very satisfactory concert for the fifth and last of its thirty-fourth local season in the Academy last evening. The first number was Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, whose heroic content was proclaimed with eloquence and dignity under Henri Rabaud's discriminating baton.

The Saint-Saens Symphony in A minor is music eminently respectable, but of no profound depth or weighty substance. The opening allegro is of beautiful correctness—"faultily faultless, splendidly null"—unimpassioned, in spite of the label "appassionato." Here, as so often during the evening, the distinction of M. Longy's presence with the oboe impressed itself. Has he one note or a florid cadenza to utter he does the least thing or the largest with infallible authority.

The adagio, with the emphasis of the English horn, made a profounder appeal; the closing "prestissimo" was a bouyant allopade. Near the end was a chorale-like episode resembling a cadenza, begun by four violins and a viola in sweetest concord. In the Berlioz music, descriptive of the hunting scene of Dido and Eneas, the horns were powerful, and the violins poured like rain in the lively realism of the representation of the tempest.

Reinald Werrenrath was completely successful. Madam Melba was summoned by the illness of a relative to England and Mr. Werrenrath, suddenly called upon to fill her place, gave instead of her chosen Mozart arias (from the operas "Idomeneo" and "Figaro") another Mozart aria from "Figaro"—the "Aprite un po'." Instead of her lyric from Dupaic ("Phydile") he sang Massenet's "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade." Thus, it will be seen, he offered music of a not dissimilar sort, which was in keeping with the program built round Madam Melba's choices.

The same good taste and sense of the fitness of things he showed in every considerate detail of his performance. He "strove with none" in the orchestra; he neither ranted nor bellowed; he stood up and sang with delicate sentiment and a reticent perception, like a man and an artist. The diction was clearly defined, the syllables were well moulded in a voice of most agreeable timbre and the essential ideas of the text were set out in a way that revealed an intellect in control of the execution. The audience very heartily and very often recalled the singer.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and Lalo's "Rio d'Ys" overture have points of dynamic resemblance, and both gave vent to the best work of the evening on the part of the orchestra—especially the latter contribution.

"Sadko," beginning with a tonal painting of marine undulation on the part of the cellos, rose to a vivid climax ere the musician's fiddle-strings of the underlying legend were snapped, and a dramatic pause preluded the hush of the sea-depths at the end. The feature of the finely vigorous conclusive number was Mr. Malkin's playing of the song upon the cello. The audience bade adieu to Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra [illegible] leads with real regret, and satisfaction that in a trying year the new leader has assured the continuity of a glorious tradition.

TIMES
ss: Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

There has been a change of soloists for the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to take place next Tuesday afternoon, at the New National Theater.

Madame Melba having been unexpectedly compelled to sail for Europe, owing to the serious illness of a relative Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, whose recent debut at the Metropolitan Opera is now common musical knowledge, will sing in her stead—Figaro's Aria from the garden scene of Mozart's "Figaro," and the love-song, "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade."

The purely orchestral numbers stand as originally proposed: Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Saint-Saens' delicately-wrought symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and for the last part of the program Rimsky-Korsakoff's masterpiece of sensuous and oriental coloring, "Scheherazade," better known in its hashed ballet version. It is in four movements, depicting [illegible] episodes from Arabian Nights.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Madame Melba, the intended soloist for the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Monday evening, has been forced to cancel her engagement and sail immediately for Europe, her nephew in London having been taken seriously ill with typhoid fever.

The management, however, has been fortunate enough to secure the services of Reinald Werrenrath as soloist in her stead. This young American baritone of the sonorous and velvety voice recently ventured to overstep the concert field in which he has long been eminent and try his fortunes as Silvio in "Pagliacci" upon the Metropolitan Opera House stage in New York, trod only by Italian and French baritones. The delight and acclaim of New York was a clear indication of the result. At the Boston Symphony concert to come he will sing two operatic numbers, an aria from the last act of Mozart's "Figaro" and Massenet's love song, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade."

The purely orchestral numbers at this concert are particularly interesting: Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus." Saint-Saens's Second Symphony in A minor, an excerpt from Berlioz's opera, "The Trojans"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's strong-rhythmed "Sadko" and Lalo's brilliant overture to "The King of Ysa."

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 18 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Final Concert of Season, With Reinald Werrenrath Soloist

There was unusual variety in the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the Academy of Music last evening. The audience filled the auditorium and applause was abundant for the organization, the conductor and the soloist, not only because it was the last concert of the season here, but by reason of the excellence of the selections. Mme. Nellie Melba, having been called to England unexpectedly by the serious illness of her nephew, who is a war hero, Reinald Werrenrath, the American baritone, was heard instead of the Australian songstress and he acquitted himself in a manner to bring joy to the hearts of all admirers of native artists.

The overture to Beethoven's "Coriolanus," which opened the program, was given a splendid rendition. The suave and melodious passages found rythmic interpretation by Henri Rabaud, and they contrasted vividly with the greater tonalities of the Saint-Saen symphony in A minor which followed. This latter work of the great French master afforded the musicians the best opportunity of the evening for the scope of their powers and manifested the intellectual capabilities of conductor Rabaud in a most gratifying fashion.

Tone painting ran riot in the Berlioz number, the musical description of a royal hunt and tempest from "Les Troyens." As in this composer's "Damnation of Faust" there is the graphic use of all the orchestral instruments for the obtaining of the decidedly impressive effects of which Berlioz is master. The strings earned glories in the exposition of the Rimsky-Korsakoff number, the well known "Sadko," nominated a musical picture. These instruments duplicated their triumphs in the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" by Lalo.

Reinald Werrenrath is a rare artist. His vocal equipment is of baritone quality and has been schooled to a finished degree. His tones are resonant and colorful and vibrant with a virile quality that gives forceful appeal to his achievements. His diction was a delight to the ear, whether he sang in French or Italian, and his stage presence is commanding and authoritative. He sang the recitative "Tutto e disposto" and aria "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." The applause was long and enthusiastic. His triumph came in the "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade." This showed Werrenrath at his best. It was a masterly accomplishment.

RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 18

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Reinald Werrenrath Heard as Soloist at Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the Boston Orchestra's thirty-fourth season in Philadelphia, given in the Academy of Music last night, was the best attended since Rabaud assumed the conductorship of the organization. Melba, who was to have appeared on this occasion, made a change in her plans and in place was one of America's leading baritones, Reinald Werrenrath.

The concerts under Rabaud have been enjoyable and will doubtless be even more so a pleasure when the many changes in the orchestra, including the conductorship, have become adjusted by further experience and practice.

As a leader, Rabaud has made a good impression, his main difficulty, apparently, being a tendency toward drawing too strenuous a tone from his musicians. The acoustics of the Academy are perfect. Few conductors seem able to grasp this fact, which is so apparent to the listener. There is no necessity for strain in an orchestra. The easiest quality of tone is always the best and most musical. Rabaud's pianissimo work is beautiful, the piano good and the heavier passages overwhelming in the volume and quality of tone judged necessary by the leader. Even a noisy thing like the Berlioz Chasse Royale et Orage, Symphonie Dramatique," heard last night, is done, the roar becomes deafening and a source of pleasure, instead of interest. Last night's program had a splendid beginning in the dramatic and impressive "Coriolanus" overture of Beethoven. The symphony was the Saint-Saens A minor, which is distinguished by an especially fine adagio in the romanza style. The scherzo is the type of music designed for popular appeal, the waltz movement making an instant bid for approval, while the finale, the Saltarello movement, was also light and airy enough to make a passing impression. In its entirety the symphony was pleasing, without making a lasting impression.

Werrenrath has been coming rapidly to the front as one of our best baritones and a singer of exceptional talent, endowed by good training. His selections were a Mozart aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and the "Vision Fugitive" air from Massenet's "Herodiade." Werrenrath has an unusual sense of interpretation, and sings always in exquisite taste. He made a pronounced success last night.

Address Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last for the Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening

There was plenty of variety in the programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Henri Rambaud at the Academy of Music last evening for the closing concert of the present season. The symphony was the tuneful if inconsequential one by Saint-Saens in A minor No. 2, which was played with much brilliancy and execution and refinement of manner and with a sensitive appreciation of its idiom and psychology. Other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus;" Rimsky-Kosakoff's "Sadko," with its vivid oriental coloring and its sensuous beauty; an excerpt from Berioz's opera of "Les Troyens," and the superb "Roy d' Ys" Overture of Lalo.

The appearance of Mme. Melba as the assisting artist on this occasion had been announced, but she was compelled to leave the country by the illness of a relative and Mr. Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who was engaged in her stead, proved a very satisfactory substitute. He has a fine voice which has been carefully cultivated and is very artistically employed and his delivery of the selections from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Massenet's "Herodiade" were greatly enjoyed.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 18 191

FINAL CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Varied and Meaty Program Marks the End of Its Season

WERRENRATH IS SOLOIST

By Linton P. Martin

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last concert of its season here at the Academy of Music last night, with Reinald Werrenrath, American barytone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as the soloist. The meaty and varied program displayed the catholicity of taste and sympathies which has been one of the most engaging characteristics of Henri Rabaud in this his first season as conductor of the orchestra since the upheaval precipitated last season by the war.

It is to be hoped that next season will bring Mr. Rabaud back again with the orchestra, for Philadelphia has come to like this tall, earnest and unaffected Frenchman very much during recent months. He is a man of varied moods, and last night revealed him as less of the temperamentalist and more of the classicist than at any previous concert. There was metronomic evenness in his reading of the opening Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture, and the same strict formalism marked the playing of Saint-Saens' well-bred and melodious little Symphony in A minor, which followed.

The scherzo of this polished little work is as tuneful as any Johann Strauss waltz, and Mr. Rabaud beat it out with the utmost regard for its infectious rhythm. The pizzacato passages were plucked out with splendid verve, but the double basses were rough and ragged at times. This is the more inexplicable, because their passages present no serious difficulties for the men with the contrabow.

The final half of the program was given over to "program music" of the most pronounced type, except for Reinald Werrenrath's two numbers. It is an anomalous circumstance of our present musical season that Philadelphians are forced to hear the best American singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company in the concert hall, instead of on the operatic stage. Mr. Werrenrath is one of these. A few weeks ago we heard Mabel Garrison's lovely soprano with the New York Symphony, altho the Metropolitan has not given her a chance here.

Last night Mr. Werrenrath, who also has been sidetracked by the Metropolitan here, proved that he possesses a barytone voice of the first order and a splendid stage presence of exceptional dramatic quality. He was heard in the recitative "Tutto e disposto" and aria, "Aprite un po' quegl' cochi," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," as well as in the "Vision Fugitive" number from Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Werrenrath was particularly effective in the latter, and his voice, while somewhat light in timbre, is very pleasing, and he exhibits the musicianship of the real artist.

The other orchestral numbers, all of a descriptive character, were Berlioz's "Royal Hunt and Tempest," which is an ostentatious but wholly meretricious affair; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," a highly atmospheric sea legend, and the very dramatic overture to "The King of Is," by Lalo. The last two were as dramatic and inspiriting as Mr. Rabaud's conventional mood permitted.

RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 19 191

HENRI RABAUD

Whom Philadelphia has heard for the last time this season. This is Mr. Rabaud's first year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EVENING POST
New York City
MAR 20

Boston Orchestra in New York

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra is no longer—if it ever was—better than our best New York orchestras, it is still an organization that gives a great deal of pleasure to the most sensitive and critical listeners. Its performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's glorious "Scheherazade" (which is becoming as popular as Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony) in Carnegie Hall last night, was very beautiful, but the suite seemed longer than usual. There was a certain monotony; the solo parts were not so outstandingly impressive as they have been at other recent performances of this work, and the dissonantal brass climax where the ship goes to pieces was less thrilling. Yet it was worth waiting for.

In the French numbers on the programme, M. Rabaud and his players were more completely satisfactory. While it is foolish, as a rule, to turn a programme into a lesson in musical history, it would have been wiser to have the excerpts from Rameau's "Hippolite et Aricie" precede Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture and Debussy's "Nocturnes," with their modern wealth of harmonies and orchestral tints. The eighteenth century ballet airs sounded thin after these. Yet the "Air des Matelots" and the "Rigaudon en Tambourin" gave much pleasure to the audience.

Debussy, before his death, made changes in these Nocturnes which were heard for the first time here last night. They were unobtrusive. Decidedly, these Nocturnes are dull, even when they are played as delicately as they were on this occasion. These eternal sound wraiths finally arouse one's wrath. Debussy himself uses the expression "gray agony" in speaking of the first of these Nocturnes. There are no red corpuscles in this composer. "Brace up! Be a man!" one feels like shouting. His Sirens, in the third Nocturne, are as far removed from the seductive Sirens of the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale as they are from the warning sirens of Mississippi River steamers. A small women's choir from Boston sang these unsirenic siren strains exquisitely. Boston is a great place for chorus singers.

The most enjoyable number on the programme was the first—Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture; a splendidly melodious, richly colored piece with ruddy cheeks and lots of masculine vigor. M. Rabaud and his men played it superbly and the audience was extremely enthusiastic. If the opera itself is as good as the overture, we cordially endorse Reginald De Koven's suggestion that it should be staged at the Metropolitan.

The Boston Orchestra concludes its season at Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, when Saint-Saëns's Symphony, with organ, will be played, besides Franck's "La Redemption" excerpt, Bach's second concerto for violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and Weber's "Freischütz" overture.

From TELEGRAM
Address New York City
Date MAR 21

At the last evening concert of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall gave a beautiful reading of Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental suite, "Scheherazade," depicting in four movements various episodes of the Arabian Nights.

When Fredric Fradkin, the concert master, unfolded the sensuous theme of Scheherazade, telling the tales to her lord and consort, many recalled that he held the same post in the Russian Ballet Orchestra when they played the same work here.

EVENING WORLD
New York City
MAR 21 1919

Boston Orchestra Under Rabaud Plays Splendidly

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of its New York evening concerts for the season at Carnegie Hall last night. Of course, the auditorium was crowded, and also of course there were grumblers who protested because the programme held no symphony and that most of the numbers were hackneyed. It is true that Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" has been played by every orchestra this season. But when was it played with such virility, such color, such altogether splendid pronouncement? Mr. Rabaud, with more than a score of new men in the ranks, has welded the band together so successfully that there need be no regrets for past glories. It is again an orchestra that may be pitted against any other and not fear to lose its superiority. As for Mr. Rabaud himself, his fine rhythmic sense, his ability to make instant changes in tempo, nuance and dynamics, puts him in the front rank of conductors.

Debussy's three nocturnes, "Nuages," "Fetes" and "Sirenes," the latter with the assistance of a chorus of women, were played deliciously, the singers well drilled and of good voices, becoming absolutely one of the choirs of the orchestra. Then there were a group of ballet airs from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," also charming, and at the beginning, there was the overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys."

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City

THERE is something Olympic about Henri Rabaud, particularly when he steps upon the little platform and gathers up his waiting orchestra with that first benignant gesture. He looks like a dean of the gods.

Last night's Boston Symphony concert was almost a popular programme. Beginning with the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" of Lalo, full of plaintive, tender melody and an impassioned war song, it sang its tuneful way through Debussy, Rameau and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The exquisite delicacy of Debussy's "Nuages," "Fetes" and "Sirenes" could scarcely have a better interpreter than Mr. Rabaud, whose poetic knowledge of clouds, festivals and rhythmic sirens is veiled in a finely distilled mist of glamour. A chorus of women sang the "Sirenes," rather suggesting the "stern and rock-bound coast" of Massachusetts.

The ballet airs from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" were all lighthearted warblings, with a flageolet and tambourine and gentle flute pipings. All these were a mauve background for the glowing scarlets of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade."

Most of Mr. Rabaud's scholarly restraint dissolved and foamed forth into exuberance in the four tales of the Sultana. Certainly no brasses and drums ever crashed with greater magnificence than in the final movement where the ship goes to pieces against a rock. Oriental music flows colorfully beneath the baton of "Marouf's" composer, and the orchestra sounded at times more like the single eloquent voice of other years than like its this season's collection of individual virtuosi.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
MAR 21 1919

Music

Boston Symphony Concert—Recitals Yesterday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final evening concert of its Carnegie Hall series last night. To lead the programme Mr. Rabaud chose the superb overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys"—an opera, by the way, better deserving the attention of our august Metropolitan than many of the operas which that temple honors by production. The overture was performed with great spirit and with particular beauty in the 'cello passage.

Next came the three "Nocturnes" of Debussy. Two of these, "Clouds" and "Festivals," are often heard nowadays in our concert rooms, but the third, "Sirens," has been an infrequent visitor, no doubt because it requires not only an orchestra, but a small chorus of women's voices, very specially trained. It was performed in Carnegie Hall earlier in the season by the visiting Philadelphia Orchestra with rather unsatisfactory results. Yesterday the three "Nocturnes" were given according to a revised version made by Debussy shortly before his death. Perhaps for that reason, perhaps because of the superiority of the participants, the pieces sounded more effective than ever before. The chorus of ladies from Boston, schooled for their difficult task by Stephen Townsend of that city, acquitted themselves most creditably.

A delightful suite of ballet airs from Rameau's archaic opera "Hippolyte et Aricie," edited by Vincent d'Indy, came next. The concert ended with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sheherazade" suite. Familiar as this composition is to our local public, it is safe to say that it was never played here before with richer imaginative expression, greater breadth, or superior technical brilliance. In fact, not one of the many other conductors who have led it for us has worked up the climax of the final movement to such a pitch of thrilling sonority as Mr. Rabaud achieved. The whole magic of the "Arabian Nights" rioted in this performance under the wizardly baton of the composer of "Marouf."

From EVENING SUN
Address New York City

Music

Bostons Play Last Evening.

No startling programme was the last Thursday evening one of the season, played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It had in it nothing that was not familiar and nothing that merited deep thought or hot discussion. Yet it was, from beginning to end, played in splendid style, and the novelty of a symphony concert minus a symphony proved well enough worth while when the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite of "Scheherazade," heard here none too seldom had so spirited a driving under the reins of M. Rabaud. It is doubtful whether the clever continuity of the suite's movements, the colors and climaces—and particularly the last catastrophe—have ever been so well discovered to a New York audience.

Ballet airs from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" were doomed to something of a disappointment. For the Boston Orchestra to give up its strings to such chastened old bits is not quite worth the waste, for all the educative and historical value. The rigaudon of the series was alone quickening. And the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" belongs so wholly by now to the Sunday night "pops" that all romance has been threshed out of its romanticism, even when played and played stirringly by the Bostons.

Debussy's three "Nocturnes," with a chorus of ladies in black jet to sing the "Sirenes," if not to act them, won the evening's heartiest response. "Nuages" and "Fetes" have been played often during this and past years by the two local orchestras, and there is no need of comment on anything excepting the fineness of Mr. Rabaud's carrying out of the composer's thistledown intentions. "Sirenes" was added to the other two this year by the Philadelphia orchestra, with a female chorus from the Schola Cantorum. Heard again there was less wailing to it; less of that rough lugubriousness which characterized it before. There was a seductive loveliness to it last night which should make all mariners of the Back Bay stuff their ears for safety's sake, and, besides the singing, the sketch had a playing equalled only when, in the first of the three, the ragged clouds drifted, massed and drifted again unceasingly across the sky.

Saturday afternoon completes the fifth and last series of Boston Symphony concerts in New York for the year. It has been a season made curious by the change in conductors, difficult through the difficulties in finding a representative successor to Dr. Muck, but it has meant, to some extent, a new outlook, more national, more prohibited, yet never failing in tastefulness. Through M. Rabaud the best that is in French music, modern and ancient, has begun to have keen interpretation here; under him it may soon reach its limitations too, but that's another story—and neither M. Rabaud nor the Boston Symphony nor its authors.

PHILADELPHIA
MAR 18 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Final Concert of Season, With Reinald Werrenrath Soloist

There was unusual variety in the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the Academy of Music last evening. The audience filled the auditorium and applause was abundant for the organization, the conductor and the soloist, not only because it was the last concert of the season here, but by reason of the excellence of the selections. Mme. Nellie Melba, having been called to England unexpectedly by the serious illness of her nephew, who is a war hero, Reinald Werrenrath, the American baritone, was heard instead of the Australian songstress and he acquitted himself in a manner to bring joy to the hearts of all admirers of native artists.

The overture to Beethoven's "Coriolanus," which opened the program, was given a splendid rendition. The suave and melodious passages found rythmic interpretation by Henri Rabaud, and they contrasted vividly with the greater tonalities of the Saint-Saen symphony in A minor which followed. This latter work of the great French master afforded the musicians the best opportunity of the evening for the scope of their powers and manifested the intellectual capabilities of conductor Rabaud in a most gratifying fashion.

Tone painting ran riot in the Berlioz number, the musical description of a royal hunt and tempest from "Les Troyens." As in this composer's "Damnation of Faust" there is the graphic use of all the orchestral instruments for the obtaining of the decidedly impressive' effects of which Berlioz is master. The strings earned glories in the exposition of the Rimsky-Korsakoff number, the well known "Sadko," nominated a musical picture. These instruments duplicated their triumphs in the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" by Lalo.

Reinald Werrenrath is a rare artist. His vocal equipment is of baritone quality and has been schooled to a finished degree. His tones are resonant and colorful and vibrant with a virile quality that gives forceful appeal to his achievements. His diction was a delight to the ear, whether he sang in French or Italian, and his stage presence is commanding and authoritative. He sang the recitative "Tutto e disposto" and aria "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." The applause was long and enthusiastic. His triumph came in the "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade." This showed Werrenrath at his best. It was a masterly accomplishment.

m RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
e MAR 1

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Reinald Werrenrath Heard as Soloist at Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the Boston Orchestra's thirty-fourth season in Philadelphia, given in the Academy of Music last night, was the best attended since Rabaud assumed the conductorship of the organization. Melba, who was to have appeared on this occasion, made a change in her plans and in place was one of America's leading baritones, Reinald Werrenrath.

The concerts under Rabaud have been enjoyable and will doubtless be even more so a pleasure when the many changes in the orchestra, including the conductorship, have become adjusted by further experience and practice.

As a leader, Rabaud has made a good impression, his main difficulty, apparently, being a tendency toward drawing too strenuous a tone from his musicians. The acoustics of the Academy are perfect. Few conductors seem able to grasp this fact, which is so apparent to the listor. There is no necessity for strain in an orchestra. The easiest quality of tone is always the best and most musical. Rabaud's pianissimo work is beautiful, the piano good and the heavier passages overwhelming in the volume and quality of tone judged necessary by the leader. Even a noisy thing like the Berlioz "Chasse Royale et Orage, Symphonie Dramatique," heard last night, is done, the roar becomes deafening and a source of pleasure, instead of interest. Last night's program had a splendid beginning in the dramatic and impressive "Coriolanus" overture of Beethoven. The symphony of the Saint-Saens A minor, which is distinguished by an especially fine adagio in the romanza style. The scherzo is the type of music designed for popular appeal, the waltz movement making an instant bid for approval, while the finale, or the Saltarello movement, was also gay and airy enough to make a passing impression. In its entirety the symphony was pleasing, without making a strong impression.

Werrenrath has been coming rapidly to the front as one of our best baritones as a singer of exceptional talent, endowed by good training. His selections were a Mozart aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and the "Vision Fugitive" air from Massenet's "Herodiade." Werrenrath has an unusual sense of interpretation, and sings always in exquisite taste. It was a pronounced success last night.

m INQUIRER
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
e MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last for the Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening

There was plenty of variety in the programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Henri Rambaud at the Academy of Music last evening for the closing concert of the present season. The symphony was the tuneful if inconsequential one by Saint-Saens in A minor No. 2, which was played with much brilliancy and execution and refinement of manner and with a sensitive appreciation of its idiom and psychology. Other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus;" Rimsky-Kosakoff's "Sadko," with its vivid oriental coloring and its sensuous beauty; an excerpt from Berioz's opera of "Les Troyens," and the superb "Roy d' Ys" Overture of Lalo.

The appearance of Mme. Melba as the assisting artist on this occasion had been announced, but she was compelled to leave the country by the illness of a relative and Mr. Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, who was engaged in her stead, proved a very satisfactory substitute. He has a fine voice which has been carefully cultivated and is very artistically employed and his delivery of the selections from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Massenet's "Herodiade" were greatly enjoyed.

NORTH AMERICAN
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 1

FINAL CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Varied and Meaty Program Marks the End of Its Season

WERRENRATH IS SOLOIST

By Linton P. Martin

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last concert of its season here at the Academy of Music last night, with Reinald Werrenrath, American barytone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as the soloist. The meaty and varied program displayed the catholicity of taste and sympathies which has been one of the most engaging characteristics of Henri Rabaud in this his first season as conductor of the orchestra since the upheaval precipitated last season by the war.

It is to be hoped that next season will bring Mr. Rabaud back again with the orchestra, for Philadelphia has come to like this tall, earnest and unaffected Frenchman very much during recent months. He is a man of varied moods, and last night revealed him as less of the temperamentalist and more of the classicist than at any previous concert. There was metronomic evenness in his reading of the opening Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture, and the same strict formalism marked the playing of Saint-Saens' well-bred and melodious little Symphony in A minor, which followed.

The scherzo of this polished little work is as tuneful as any Johann Strauss waltz, and Mr. Rabaud beat it out with the utmost regard for its infectious rhythm. The pizzacato passages were plucked out with splendid verve, but the double basses were rough and ragged at times. This is the more inexplicable, because their passages present no serious difficulties for the men with the contrabow.

The final half of the program was given over to "program music" of the most pronounced type, except for Reinald Werrenrath's two numbers. It is an anomalous circumstance of our present musical season that Philadelphians are forced to hear the best American singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company in the concert hall, instead of on the operatic stage. Mr. Werrenrath is one of these. A few weeks ago we heard Mabel Garrison's lovely soprano with the New York Symphony, altho the Metropolitan has not given her a chance here.

Last night Mr. Werrenrath, who also has been sidetracked by the Metropolitan here, proved that he possesses a barytone voice of the first order and a splendid stage presence of exceptional dramatic quality. He was heard in the recitative "Tutto e disposto" and aria, "Aprite un po' quegl' cochi," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," as well as in the "Vision Fugitive" number from Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Werrenrath was particularly effective in the latter, and his voice, while somewhat light in timbre, is very pleasing, and he exhibits the musicianship of the real artist.

The other orchestral numbers, all of a descriptive character, were Berlioz's "Royal Hunt and Tempest," which is an ostentatious but wholly meretricious affair; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," a highly atmospheric sea legend, and the very dramatic overture to "The King of Is," by Lalo. The last two were as dramatic and inspiriting as Mr. Rabaud's conventional mood permitted.

m RECORD
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te MAR 19 191

HENRI RABAUD

Whom Philadelphia has heard for the last time this season. This is Mr. Rabaud's first year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

m EVENING POST
dress New York City

Boston Orchestra in New York

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra is no longer—if it ever was—better than our best New York orchestras, it is still an organization that gives a great deal of pleasure to the most sensitive and critical listeners. Its performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's glorious "Scheherazade" (which is becoming as popular as Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony) in Carnegie Hall last night, was very beautiful, but the suite seemed longer than usual. There was a certain monotony; the solo parts were not as outstandingly impressive as they have been at other recent performances of this work, and the dissonantal brass climax where the ship goes to pieces was less thrilling. Yet it was worth waiting for.

In the French numbers on the programme, M. Rabaud and his players were more completely satisfactory. While it is foolish, as a rule, to turn a programme into a lesson in musical history, it would have been wiser to have the excerpts from Rameau's "Hippolite et Aricie" precede Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture and Debussy's "Nocturnes," with their modern wealth of harmonies and orchestral tints. The eighteenth century ballet airs sounded thin after these. Yet the "Air des matelots" and the "Rigaudon en Tambourin" gave much pleasure to the audience.

Debussy, before his death, made changes in these Nocturnes which were heard for the first time here last night. They were unobtrusive. Decidedly, these Nocturnes are dull, even when they are played as delicately as they were on this occasion. These eternal sound wraiths finally arouse one's wrath. Debussy himself uses the expression, "gray agony" in speaking of the first of these Nocturnes. There are no red corpuscles in this composer. "Brace up! Be a man!" one feels like shouting. His Sirens, in the third Nocturne, are as far removed from the seductive Sirens of the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale as they are from the warning sirens of Mississippi River steamers. A small women's choir from Boston sang these unsirenic siren strains exquisitely. Boston is a great place for chorus singers.

The most enjoyable number on the programme was the first—Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture; a splendidly melodious, richly colored piece with ruddy cheeks and lots of masculine vigor. M. Rabaud and his men played it superbly and the audience was extremely enthusiastic. If the opera itself is as good as the overture, we cordially endorse Reginald De Koven's suggestion that it should be staged at the Metropolitan.

The Boston Orchestra concludes its season at Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, when Saint-Saëns's Symphony, with organ, will be played, besides Franck's "La Redemption" excerpt, Bach's second concerto for violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and Weber's "Freischütz" overture.

From TELEGRAM
Address New York City
Date MAR 21

At the last evening concert of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall gave a beautiful reading of Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental suite, "Scheherazade," depicting in four movements various episodes of the Arabian Nights.

When Fredric Fradkin, the concert master, unfolded the sensuous theme of Scheherazade, telling the tales to her lord and consort, many recalled that he held the same post in the Russian Ballet Orchestra when they played the same work here.

EVENING WORLD
New York City
MAR 21 1919

Boston Orchestra Under Rabaud Plays Splendidly

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of its New York evening concerts for the season at Carnegie Hall last night. Of course, the auditorium was crowded, and also of course there were grumblers who protested because the programme held no symphony and that most of the numbers were hackneyed. It is true that Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" has been played by every orchestra this season. But when was it played with such virility, such color, such altogether splendid pronouncement? Mr. Rabaud, with more than a score of new men in the ranks, has welded the band together so successfully that there need be no regrets for past glories. It is again an orchestra that may be pitted against any other and not fear to lose its superiority. As for Mr. Rabaud himself, his fine rhythmic sense, his ability to make instant changes in tempo, nuance and dynamics, puts him in the front rank of conductors.

Debussy's three nocturnes, "Nuages," "Fetes" and "Sirenes," the latter with the assistance of a chorus of women, were played deliciously, the singers well drilled and of good voices, becoming absolutely one of the choirs of the orchestra. Then there were a group of ballet airs from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," also charming, and at the beginning, there was the overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys."

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City

THERE is something Olympic about Henri Rabaud, particularly when he steps upon the little platform and gathers up his waiting orchestra with that first benignant gesture. He looks like a dean of the gods.

Last night's Boston Symphony concert was almost a popular programme. Beginning with the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" of Lalo, full of plaintive, tender melody and an impassioned war song, it sang its tuneful way through Debussy, Rameau and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The exquisite delicacy of Debussy's "Nuages," "Fetes" and "Sirenes" could scarcely have a better interpreter than Mr. Rabaud, whose poetic knowledge of clouds, festivals and rhythmic sirens is veiled in a finely distilled mist of glamour. A chorus of women sang the "Sirenes," rather suggesting the "stern and rock-bound coast" of Massachusetts.

The ballet airs from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" were all lighthearted warblings, with a flageolet and tambourine and gentle flute pipings. All these were a mauve background for the glowing scarlets of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade."

Most of Mr. Rabaud's scholarly restraint dissolved and foamed forth into exuberance in the four tales of the Sultana. Certainly no brasses and drums ever crashed with greater magnificence than in the final movement where the ship goes to pieces against a rock. Oriental music flows colorfully beneath the baton of "Marouf's" composer, and the orchestra sounded at times more like the single eloquent voice of other years than like its this season's collection of individual virtuosi.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
MAR 21 1919

Music

Boston Symphony Concert—Recitals Yesterday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final evening concert of its Carnegie Hall series last night. To lead the programme Mr. Rabaud chose the superb overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys"—an opera, by the way, better deserving the attention of our august Metropolitan than many of the operas which that temple honors by production. The overture was performed with great spirit and with particular beauty in the 'cello passage.

Next came the three "Nocturnes" of Debussy. Two of these, "Clouds" and "Festivals," are often heard nowadays in our concert rooms, but the third, "Sirens," has been an infrequent visitor, no doubt because it requires not only an orchestra, but a small chorus of women's voices, very specially trained. It was performed in Carnegie Hall earlier in the season by the visiting Philadelphia Orchestra with rather unsatisfactory results. Yesterday the three "Nocturnes" were given according to a revised version made by Debussy shortly before his death. Perhaps for that reason, perhaps because of the superiority of the participants, the pieces sounded more effective than ever before. The chorus of ladies from Boston, schooled for their difficult task by Stephen Townsend of that city, acquitted themselves most creditably.

A delightful suite of ballet airs from Rameau's archaic opera "Hippolyte et Aricie," edited by Vincent d'Indy, came next. The concert ended with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sheherazade" suite. Familiar as this composition is to our local public, it is safe to say that it was never played here before with richer imaginative expression, greater breadth, or superior technical brilliance. In fact, not one of the many other conductors who have led it for us has worked up the climax of the final movement to such a pitch of thrilling sonority as Mr. Rabaud achieved. The whole magic of the "Arabian Nights" rioted in this performance under the wizardly baton of the composer of "Marouf."

From EVENING SUN
Address New York City
Date

Music

Bostons Play Last Evening.

No startling programme was the last Thursday evening one of the season, played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It had in it nothing that was not familiar and nothing that merited deep thought or hot discussion. Yet it was, from beginning to end, played in splendid style, and the novelty of a symphony concert minus a symphony proved well enough worth while when the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite of "Scheherazade," heard here none too seldom had so spirited a driving under the reins of M. Rabaud. It is doubtful whether the clever continuity of the suite's movements, the colors and climaces—and particularly the last catastrophe—have ever been so well discovered to a New York audienee.

Ballet airs from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" were doomed to something of a disappointment. For the Boston Orchestra to give up its strings to such chastened old bits is not quite worth the waste, for all the educative and historical value. The rigaudon of the series was alone quickening. And the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" belongs so wholly by now to the Sunday night "pops" that all romance has been threshed out of its romanticism, even when played and played stirringly by the Bostons.

Debussy's three "Nocturnes," with a chorus of ladies in black jet to sing the "Sirenes," if not to act them, won the evening's heartiest response. "Nuages" and "Fetes" have been played often during this and past years by the two local orchestras, and there is no need of comment on anything excepting the fineness of Mr. Rabaud's carrying out of the composer's thistledown intentions. "Sirenes" was added to the other two this year by the Philadelphia orchestra, with a female chorus from the Schola Cantorum. Heard again there was less wailing to it; less of that rough lugubriousness which characterized it before. There was a seductive loveliness to it last night which should make all mariners of the Back Bay stuff their ears for safety's sake, and, besides the singing, the sketch had a playing equalled only when, in the first of the three, the ragged clouds drifted, massed and drifted again unceasingly across the sky.

Saturday afternoon completes the fifth and last series of Boston Symphony concerts in New York for the year. It has been a season made curious by the change in conductors, difficult through the difficulties in finding a representative successor to Dr. Muck, but it has meant, to some extent, a new outlook, more national, more prohibited, yet never failing in tastefulness. Through M. Rabaud the best that is in French music, modern and ancient, has begun to have keen interpretation here; under him it may soon reach its limitations too, but that's another story—and neither M. Rabaud nor the Boston Symphony nor its authors.

Address New York City
Date MAR 2

SYMPHONY BAND FROM BOSTON ENDS SEASON

Series of Thursday Evening Concerts at Carnegie Hall Concluded with Varied Program.

Henri Rabaud yesterday brought to an end the series of Thursday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall with music of Lalo, Debussy, Rameau and Rimsky-Korsakov. Little of it was new to the perfect concertgoer, whilst even the occasional entrant upon the orchestral round in New York must have found some of it familiar. The program as a whole held the overture to Lalo's "Le roi d'Ys," Dubussy's three nocturnes — "Nuages," "Fetes" and "Sirenes," the last with its woman's chorus—a suite of airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and the Russian "Scheherazade."

The last has been played so often in New York in the past two or three years, that every symphonic child should know it as thoroughly as he—and even she—does the "Eroica" symphony. The Debussy pieces have been played here twice within a few weeks by other orchestras. Certainly the only justification for dumping all this coal upon our orchestral Newcastle would lie in its having been the delectable cannel, burning with incandescence in heat and illumination. But it was a tepid and dim evening in Carnegie Hall, a sultry Conservatoire twilight superimposed upon Scheherazade's Arabian Nights' splendors, veiling the sun shimmer in Debussy's "Clouds" touching the "Festival" with a blight as of prohibition and converting the sirenic lure into a Chatauqua salute.

It is perhaps significant comment upon last night's proceedings that Mr. Rabaud should have played the Lalo overture better than anything else, for this music is probably the most elaborately dull to be found in the modern French repertoire.

The Debussy "Clouds" is a wondrously beautiful day dream of wide horizons, Midsummer far niente and floating subjective mood; but "Nuages" almost spells nuances and the piece collapses into monotony unless the most minutely imaginative play of light and shade suffuses it. Mr. Rabaud stuck to his score in true Conservatoire fashion and the "Clouds" evaporated into mist.

The "Fetes" of this suite of nocturnes is a pagan poem and the spirit of Pan himself leaps and cavorts through its mood of sophisticated gayety, through its entrancingly strange, whole-toned melodic outbursts, its uncannily apt instrumental ingenuity. Mr. Rabaud made it a Parisian processional snugly on the hither side of the Seine.

Let us pursue the delinquent still further, for the "Sirenes" was Mr. Rabaud's saddest nocturnal exploit. For one thing, the women's chorus—the program failed to inform one where they came from and, after their performance, it did not seem necessary to seek enlightenment—the chorus loaded down the music with vocal tone as lugubrious as their attire (they formed a pool of black gowns in the midst of the orchestra). Debussy, with a touch of exquisite subtlery, wove the female voices into his orchestral scheme as a single instrument, which should remain orchestral in its employment and still lend its humanly feminine and brilliant color to the allure of his subject. Subtlery was dissipated by this flat, dead, choral tone, so flabby it sagged off the pitch. Mr. Rabaud seemed to be unaware of what was vocally happening in front of him but beat his beat and let the more mechanical of the orchestral instruments again reduce a beautiful thing to monotony.

And who cannot play Debussy makes of Rameau a bore, for the eighteenth century is more difficult of genuine approach and retreat than the twentieth.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony in Last of Season's Concerts at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of this year's series of concerts in the Academy of Music last evening. That the reorganized orchestra has found favor equal to that which it enjoyed during other and earlier regimes was evidenced by the size and enthusiasm of an audience attracted solely by the orchestra itself and without the lure of a popular soloist. Its faith proved well-founded; for last evening Mr. Rabaud and the band outdid their previous achievements.

In the four concerts which he has conducted here this winter Mr. Rabaud has, despite the high standards raised by his forerunners among Boston Symphony conductors, proven himself a musician of profound sympathy and deep understanding and a conductor who can secure excellent results from the orchestra at his command. He has in the course of a few months welded a heterogeneous collection of old and new men into an orchestral body capable of a high degree of homogeneous expression. A master of euphony, Mr. Rabaud has succeeded in maintaining the oldest and best traditions of the Boston Orchestra; in other words, in keeping it the premier orchestra of the country.

For last evening's program the conductor chose works of varying kind and content. Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor, called the Organ Symphony because of its incorporation of that instrument in the body of sound, began the list. It has not been a symphony to win popular appeal, though long recognized as a master effort of the dean of French composers. Last evening, however, it sounded richer and rarer than ever before. This was to be expected, for in the course of the past winter Mr. Rabaud has revealed himself again and again as the single conductor who could make Saint-Saens "sound." He could not eliminate some of its arid stretches, but he did succeed in diminishing their aridness and in making them easily forgotten in the wealth of color and clarity of design that distinguished the reading of the whole composition.

An informed and informing reading of the symphonic excerpt from Franck's "Redemption" followed, and then came the Second Brandenberg Concerto of Bach, with Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim furnishing the solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet respectively. The work is little played because of the difficulties it presents to the modern trumpet-player, and conductors in the past have only sought its interpretation through a rewriting of the trumpet part. Mr. Heim used last evening a smaller trumpet than is heard as a rule in modern orchestras, yet even then had difficulty in maintaining the perfect expression of the Bach line. On the whole, however, he was eminently successful. The composition from first to last is of that sturdy, rugged nature inherent in Bach and its low movement of such searching into the spiritual depths of things as only Bach ever attained.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," with its unearthly harmonies and orchestral greens and grays, and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz" brought the evening to a close. Compositions of contrasting color and compositional method, they served to reveal once more the wide sympathy of the conductor and the virtuosity of the orchestra. Both were nicely planned and thoroughly well executed efforts.

Mary Kent, a young contralto, who had been heard earlier in the season wth the Society of American Singers, gave her first song recital in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. Her program, designed to disclose mastery of varying styles of recital selections, began with Gluck's air, "Che faro senza Euridice," and others by Haydn and Falconiere. In addition there were groups in English and French.

Miss Kent has a voice of excellent natural quality, but more than this, she knows how to use it. Quite true, she still has something to learn of the value and the application of tonal color, and her diction, especially in the French songs, left something to be desired. Yet on the whole, Miss Kent disclosed a singing ability of high degree. She will be heard again with interest and ought to find an assured place in the recital field.

n CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S FAREWELL

The fifth and last of Brooklyn's annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, was held at the Academy of Music last night. The programme, though conservative in trend, nevertheless was marked by a reasonable degree of variety. Of particular and even noteworthy interest was the symphony of the evening, Camille Saint-Saens' third in C minor, infrequently heard, but nevertheless well worthy of a permanent place in orchestral repertoires. Although in two movements, the separate sections are so joined as to form an orthodox continuity, and the contents of the work are quite enjoyable without being exactly profound. The symphony, as a whole, is held toether by reason of its beautiful simplicity of orchestration, masterly in outline and at all times grateful in this era of instrumental complexities. The listener is also carried along by the tide of marked rhythm and to the constant rise and fall of crescendo, both of which were finely achieved by the batonic beat of M. Rabaud. The closing measures, with an unexpected entrance of tympani in great gusto, drew smiles from the audience.

Following the symphony came Cesar Franck's symphonic piece, "La Redemption," which has been heard several times during the current season on the programmes of other organizations. It is a poem of tedious rather than heavenly length, highly flavored with Parsifalian touches, and, during its lyric section, has a melodic turn that draws to mind a much played piano composition by Cecile Chaminade. M. Rabaud gave it a distinctive reading, his intimate knowledge of the score making him independent of its printed notes.

The "sensation" of the evening was Bach's F major concerto for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with string accompaniment including harpsichord. The soloists were Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, with Charles W. Adams at the antiquated keyboard. The concerto is inique though classical, and all concerned in its rendition entered upon their task with an interest that was both scholarly and personal. The audience's enthusiasm ran high at the close, manifesting itself in no uncertain fashion.

Although composed in 1867, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko," was the only number on the programme offering a suggestion of modern exoticism. It afforded a pleasing contrast with the preceding numbers. Weber's "Der Freischutz" brought a liberal programme to a fitting close.

rom TIMES
Address New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Renewals.

With a waiting list for unclaimed seats, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces five Thursday evening concerts and five Saturday matinées entirely different in program next season at Carnegie Hall. Present subscribers have until May 1 to renew their holdings through W. H. Brennan, manager, Symphony Hall, Boston.

n MORNING TELEGRAPH.
ress: New York City

Boston Orchestra Triumphs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fifth concert of the season at Carnegie Hall offered as the principal feature of a singularly eventful program, Debussy's Nocturnes with the female voices singing "Sirenes" for the first time in that strange musical episode. Of the three impressionistic fancies treated in the work, "Nuages" is the most fantatstically beautiful and it was never played more effectively than under the Rabaud baton at this concert.

"Sirenes," in spite of the fact that the fine choir of female voices sang it with apparent understanding and with admirable intonation, did not seem at all bettered in a musical sense by the contribution. In fact, this part of the "Preludes," as given by Mr. Rabaud, renewed the impression that Debussy's scoring for voices is never fortuitous or quite natural, and that his truest and best motives and topics are derived from the tonal phenomena of inanimate nature; even as in this same "Sirenes," the voice of the sea wind, the timbrel boom of a harp chord reiterated like some doomful clock, the wavering voices of many waters and the cadences of unseen wings overhead, as they were expressed and suggested by the instruments, are far more precious and memorable than the vocal choir of the sirens.

Rabaud's Inspirational Baton.

"Fetes," too, was wonderfully played in the tenaciously gentle manner which is characteristic of the imaginative Rabaud, and throughtout the concert, notably in Lalo's overcure to "Le Roy d'Ys" and in the Air en Rondeau out of Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," there prevailed the same wistful, searching, tender poignancy which inheres in these compositions and which Conductor Rabaud reads forthright and impeccably as none of his orchestral contemporaries do. The Rameau Airs de Ballet, notably the Rigaudon en Tambourin, also afforded the Boston band a glorious opportunity to the exposition of its newly perfected versatility and balance, and the number was roundly applauded by the fine audience.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite was the concluding and most pretentious excursion of the evening and served to further impress the audience with the high degree of discipline, esprit and mutual understanding which M. Rabaud has injected and intensified in his splendid orchestra.

m TIMES
dress New York City
te MAR 2 3 1

OPERA

By James Gibbons Huneker

Last Boston Orchestra Matinee.

The last matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was an enjoyable musical function, though the playing of the famous organization was not on a par with its Thursday evening performance. The second movement of the Saint-Saëns C minor Symphony was massive in its tonal beauty and the climax stunning. Conductor Rabaud always waits for a kettledrum climacteric with interest, and the artist who handles the sticks went for his instrument with a demoniacal intensity that must have pleased the French conductor. Saint-Saëns, like Cesar Franck, narrowly escapes genius. His knowledge is enormous, his invention mediocre. When he drops the thread of his musical discourse he resorts to the deadly chorale, or he lightly trips the gay fugato toe. In these things he recalls his venerated master, Franz Liszt.

An excerpt from Franck's "Redemption" followed. In it the string choir has seldom sounded so rich and sonorous. Bach was represented by his second concerto in F for violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet, played by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy, and Heim, and barring a false entrance of the trumpet in the first allegro—which slip, oddly enough, did not dislocate the phrase—the entire composition proved delightful. What music is this which like a pure mountain source, sparkles and upgushes! "Sadko," a tone picture by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is not so eloquent as several of his other suites or poems, yet it is Rimsky, and that says everything. The writer was present at the first Parisian performance in the Cirque d'Hiver, exactly forty years ago this month, (Emma Thursby made a sensational début in the same auditorium that Spring,) and Jacques Pasdeloup was the conductor. A storm of hisses followed the finish of the "new music," and a riot nearly ensued. Today "Sadko" is rather tame to ears attuned to Stravinsky. The music served as a vehicle for some esoteric capering of the Russian Ballet several seasons ago. It is marked by fancy and vivid colors. The reading yesterday was drab rather than kaleidoscopic, though the finesse was admirable. The afternoon closed with a brilliant but not precisely traditional interpretation of the "Freischütz" overture. There was an ovation tendered to the distinguished conductor and composer of "Marouf" and plenty of applause for the orchestra. No official announcement for next season's plans has been made as to conductors, but it might be a good idea to let well enough alone!

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City
Date

Music

Final Concert in New York of Season of Boston Symphony Orchestra

By H. E. Krehbiel

French, Russian and German music made up the programme of the concert arranged by M. Rabaud for the concert with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra said farewell to New York yesterday afternoon. The list was generous and noble in spirit, the performance of a character which compelled admiration quickened with a feeling of respect which is not always or necessarily present as an element of artistic enjoyment.

First there came the Symphony in C minor, by Saint-Saëns, in which the pianoforte and organ are associated with the orchestral forces, a composition which came to New York when it was comparatively young, and which, though it has never become "popular," has periodically challenged the attention of those of our conductors who think seriously of their duty to art. To its performance Mr. Rabaud gave obvious care and devotion, ignoring its possibilities for superficial effect, but laying bare its ingenious structure and its high aims. After the Symphonic piece from César Franck's "Redemption," it was possible to recall it with an additional measure because of the contrast which its strong logic presented to the too attenuate instrumentalities of the master, who, with all his sturdy qualities let his piousness (which is something else than piety) interfere with his sense of proportion. When Franck essays a religious theme we can never rid ourselves of the memory that it was he who set himself the duty of writing three or four score "Ave Marias" and died before he had accomplished the task.

The sentimental ghosts evoked by "La Redemption" were sent gibbering by the fresh wind which blew from Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in F, in which the concertino band is composed of a solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Unfortunately the inflated size of the ripieno band and the size of the room militated against the complete effectiveness of this marvellous old composition. When the tinkling tones of the harpsichord (which was used to fill out the harmonics) could be heard they were of ingratiating charm. But the music needs intimacy, and this was impossible under the circumstances.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," a pretty bit of descriptive music, with which the Russian Ballet associated pictures two or three years ago, followed the concerto, and the overture to "Der Freischütz," always fresh and dewy as its forest home, ended a concert which was heard from beginning to

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City

RABAUD DELIGHTS P

By JOHN H. R

The fifth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Society yesterday was the purely musical festival of a very busy day in grand opera, recital and concert, and the standing of Henri Rabaud and his glorious band from Boston as well as the place of the symphony in the estimation of musical New York were well demonstrated by the crowded audience which packed Carnegie Hall and bombarded the atmosphere with dynamic and vociferous demonstrations of delight. It was a great day for the Bostonians and a memorable feast for the growing multitude of symphony enthusiasts.

Conductor Rabaud's recreative genius was again made manifest in his wonderful reading and projection of Saint-Saens's C minor Symphony which, necessarily, was the important enterprise of the program, and for those who fancied that they had heard the great work in every possible right and wrong way that it can be played, its performance yesterday by the Boston orchestra must have been an exhilarating proof that now, at last, its two beautiful movements are played to the ultimate limit of their great possibilities.

Bach Concerto the Favorite.

The Bach Concerto for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, however, leaped into new and previous significance with the audience yesterday, and as it elicited an extraordinary degree of enthusiasm, it must be named as the salient success of the matinee. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim were the instrumental soloists of the concerto, with Charles W. Adams the harpischord accompanist, and the result was in the nature of a surprising and delightful revelation of new and unsuspected values, glories, feelings and thoughts in this lovely composition, so seldom heard and so sensitively timid of the banal misconceptions and crass man-handling of the average orchestral low-brow.

Franck's Symphonic fragment from "La Redemption," and the Rimsky-Korsakoff Tone Picture "Sadko," played with the indescribable verve, vividness and graphic fluency which distinguished the work of this orchestra under M. Rabaud, filled the generous measure of the concert's success. It ended with Weber's overture to

2 1 1915

usic phony Concert—

Yesterday.

Symphony Orchestra
vening concert of its eries last night. To me Mr. Rabaud chose ture to Lalo's opera
n opera, by the way,
the attention of our litan than many of that temple honors
The overture was per-at spirit and with par-
the 'cello passage.
three "Nocturnes" of f these, "Clouds" and often heard nowadays rooms, but the third, en an infrequent vis-ecause it requires not a, but a small chorus ices, very specially performed in Carne-in the season by the lphia Orchestra with ctory results. Yes-e "Nocturnes" were to a revised version sy shortly before his for that reason, per-the superiority of the pieces sounded more er before. The choom Boston, schooled lt task by Stephen that city, acquitted creditably.
ite of ballet airs from ic opera "Hippolyte
d by Vincent d'Indy, concert ended with f's "Sheherazade"
as this composition public, it is safe to never played here
er imaginative ex-breadth, or superior
ce. In fact, not one her conductors who s has worked up the al movement to such
ing sonority as Mr.
The whole magic Nights" rioted in this der the wizardly nposer of "Mârouf."

ING SUN

ew York City

usic

Last Evening.

gramme was the ning one of the ght by the Boston
in Carnegie Hall. that was not that merited deep
ion. Yet it was, played in splen-novelty of a nus a symphony orth while when suite of "Sche-e none too seldom riving under the
It is doubtful continuity of the the colors and ticularly the last ver been so well
York audience.
Rameau's "Hip-doomed to sometment. For the give up its strings bits is not quite all the educative
The rigaudon of quickening. And Roi d'Ys" belongs the Sunday night
mance has been romanticism, even yed stirringly by Nocturnes," with a lack jet to sing the act them, won the esponse. "Nuages"

been played often years by the two there is no need ing excepting the aud's carrying out histledown inten-added to the
the Philadelphia
emale chorus from Heard again
ing to it; less of thoroughness which fore. There was a to it last night
all mariners of the ears for safety's the singing, the equalled only of the three, the ed, massed and ingly across the n completes the

of Boston Sym-
New York for the season made
e in conductors, difficulties in ve successor to meant, to some more national,
never failing in
M. Rabaud the music, modern n to have keen nder him it may tations too, but
—and neither M.
on Symphony are

Address New York City
Date MAR 2

SYMPHONY BAND FROM BOSTON ENDS SEASON

Series of Thursday Evening Concerts at Carnegie Hall Concluded with Varied Program.

Henri Rabaud yesterday brought to an end the series of Thursday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall with music of Lalo, Debussy, Rameau and Rimsky-Korsakov. Little of it was new to the perfect concertgoer, whilst even the occasional entrant upon the orchestral round in New York must have found some of it familiar. The program as a whole held the overture to Lalo's "Le roi d'Ys," Dubussy's three nocturnes — "Nuages," "Fetes" and "Sirenes," the last with its woman's chorus—a suite of airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and the Russian "Scheherazade."

The last has been played so often in New York in the past two or three years that every symphonic child should know it as thoroughly as he—and even she—does the "Eroica" symphony. The Debussy pieces have been played here twice within a few weeks by other orchestras. Certainly the only justification for dumping all this coal upon our orchestral Newcastle would lie in its having been the delectable cannel, burning with incandescence in heat and illumination. But it was a tepid and dim evening in Carnegie Hall, a sultry Conservatoire twilight superimposed upon Scheherazade's Arabian Nights' splendors, veiling the sun shimmer in Debussy's "Clouds" touching the "Festival" with a blight as of prohibition and converting the sirenic lure into a Chatauqua salute.

It is perhaps significant comment upon last night's proceedings that Mr. Rabaud should have played the Lalo overture better than anything else, for this music is probably the most elaborately dull to be found in the modern French repertoire.

The Debussy "Clouds" is a wondrously beautiful day dream of wide horizons, Midsummer far niente and floating subjective mood; but "Nuages" almost spells nuances and the piece collapses into monotony unless the most minutely imaginative play of light and shade suffuses it. Mr. Rabaud stuck to his score in true Conservatoire fashion and the "Clouds" evaporated into mist.

The "Fetes" of this suite of nocturnes is a pagan poem and the spirit of Pan himself leaps and cavorts through its mood of sophisticated gayety, through its entrancingly strange, whole-toned melodic outbursts, its uncannily apt instrumental ingenuity. Mr. Rabaud made it a Parisian processional snugly on the hither side of the Seine.

Let us pursue the delinquent still further, for the "Sirenes" was Mr. Rabaud's saddest nocturnal exploit. For one thing, the women's chorus—the program failed to inform one where they came from and, after their performance, it did not seem necessary to seek enlightenment—the chorus loaded down the music with vocal tone as lugubrious as their attire (they formed a pool of black gowns in the midst of the orchestra). Debussy, with a touch of exquisite subtlery, wove the female voices into his orchestral scheme as a single instrument, which should remain orchestral in its employment and still lend its humanly feminine and brilliant color to the allure of his subject. Subtlery was dissipated by this flat, dead, choral tone, so flabby it sagged off the pitch. Mr. Rabaud seemed to be unaware of what was vocally happening in front of him but beat his beat and let the more mechanical of the orchestral instruments again reduce a beautiful thing to monotony.

And who cannot play Debussy makes of Rameau a bore, for the eighteenth century is more difficult of genuine approach and retreat than the twentieth.

RE PIANI

GLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony in Last of Season's Concerts at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of this year's series of concerts in the Academy of Music last evening. That the reorganized orchestra has found favor equal to that which it enjoyed during other and earlier regimes was evidenced by the size and enthusiasm of an audience attracted solely by the orchestra itself and without the lure of a popular soloist. Its faith proved well-founded; for last evening Mr. Rabaud and the band outdid their previous achievements.

In the four concerts which he has conducted here this winter Mr. Rabaud has, despite the high standards raised by his forerunners among Boston Symphony conductors, proven himself a musician of profound sympathy and deep understanding and a conductor who can secure excellent results from the orchestra at his command. He has in the course of a few months welded a heterogeneous collection of old and new men into an orchestral body capable of a high degree of homogeneous expression. A master of euphony, Mr. Rabaud has succeeded in maintaining the oldest and best traditions of the Boston Orchestra; in other words, in keeping it the premier orchestra of the country.

For last evening's program the conductor chose works of varying kind and content. Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor, called the Organ Symphony because of its incorporation of that instrument in the body of sound, began the list. It has not been a symphony to win popular appeal, though long recognized as a master effort of the dean of French composers. Last evening, however, it sounded richer and rarer than ever before. This was to be expected, for in the course of the past winter Mr. Rabaud has revealed himself again and again as the single conductor who could make Saint-Saens "sound." He could not eliminate some of its arid stretches, but he did succeed in diminishing their aridness and in making them easily forgotten in the wealth of color and clarity of design that distinguished the reading of the whole composition.

An informed and informing reading of the symphonic excerpt from Franck's "Redemption" followed, and then came the Second Brandenberg Concerto of Bach, with Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim furnishing the solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet respectively. The work is little played because of the difficulties it presents to the modern trumpet-player, and conductors in the past have only sought its interpretation through a rewriting of the trumpet part. Mr. Heim used last evening a smaller trumpet than is heard as a rule in modern orchestras, yet even then had difficulty in maintaining the perfect expression of the Bach line. On the whole, however, he was eminently successful. The composition from first to last is of that sturdy, rugged nature inherent in Bach and its low movement of such searching into the spiritual depths of things as only Bach ever attained.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," with its unearthly harmonies and orchestral greens and grays, and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz" brought the evening to a close. Compositions of contrasting color and compositional method, they served to reveal once more the wide sympathy of the conductor and the virtuosity of the orchestra. Both were nicely planned and thoroughly well executed efforts.

Mary Kent, a young contralto, who had been heard earlier in the season with the Society of American Singers, gave her first song recital in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. Her program, designed to disclose mastery of varying styles of recital selections, began with Gluck's air, "Che faro senza Euridice," and others by Haydn and Falconiere. In addition there were groups in English and French.

Miss Kent has a voice of excellent natural quality, but more than this, she knows how to use it. Quite true, she still has something to learn of the value and the application of tonal color, and her diction, especially in the French songs, left something to be desired. Yet on the whole, Miss Kent disclosed a singing ability of high degree. She will be heard again with interest and ought to find an assured place in the recital field.

n CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S FAREWELL

The fifth and last of Brooklyn's annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, was held at the Academy of Music last night. The programme, though conservative in trend, nevertheless was marked by a reasonable degree of variety. Of particular and even noteworthy interest was the symphony of the evening, Camille Saint-Saens' third in C minor, infrequently heard, but nevertheless well worthy of a permanent place in orchestral repertoires. Although in two movements, the separate sections are so joined as to form an orthodox continuity, and the contents of the work are quite enjoyable without being exactly profound. The symphony, as a whole, is held toether by reason of its beautiful simplicity of orchestration, masterly in outline and at all times grateful in this era of instrumental complexities. The listener is also carried along by the tide of marked rhythm and to the constant rise and fall of crescendo, both of which were finely achieved by the batonic beat of M. Rabaud. The closing measures, with an unexpected entrance of tympani in great gusto, drew smiles from the audience.

Following the symphony came Cesar Franck's symphonic piece, "La Redemption," which has been heard several times during the current season on the programmes of other organizations. It is a poem of tedious rather than heavenly length, highly flavored with Parsifalian touches, and, during its lyric section, has a melodic turn that draws to mind a much played piano composition by Cecile Chaminade. M. Rabaud gave it a distinctive reading, his intimate knowledge of the score making him independent of its printed notes.

The "sensation" of the evening was Bach's F major concerto for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with string accompaniment including harpsichord. The soloists were Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, with Charles W. Adams at the antiquated keyboard. The concerto is inique though classical, and all concerned in its rendition entered upon their task with an interest that was both scholarly and personal. The audience's enthusiasm ran high at the close, manifesting itself in no uncertain fashion.

Although composed in 1867, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko," was the only number on the programme offering a suggestion of modern exoticism. It afforded a pleasing contrast with the preceding numbers. Weber's "Der Freischutz" brought a liberal programme to a fitting close.

rom TIMES
Address New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Renewals.

With a waiting list for unclaimed seats, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces five Thursday evening concerts and five Saturday matinées entirely different in program next season at Carnegie Hall. Present subscribers have until May 1 to renew their holdings through W. H. Brennan, manager, Symphony Hall, Boston.

n MORNING TELEGRAPH.
ress: New York City

Boston Orchestra Triumphs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fifth concert of the season at Carnegie Hall offered as the principal feature of a singularly eventful program, Debussy's Nocturnes with the female voices singing "Sirenes" for the first time in that strange musical episode. Of the three impressionistic fancies treated in the work, "Nuages" is the most fantatstically beautiful and it was never played more effectively than under the Rabaud baton at this concert.

"Sirenes," in spite of the fact that the fine choir of female voices sang it with apparent understanding and with admirable intonation, did not seem at all bettered in a musical sense by the contribution. In fact, this part of the "Preludes," as given by Mr. Rabaud, renewed the impression that Debussy's scoring for voices is never fortuitous or quite natural, and that his truest and best motives and topics are derived from the tonal phenomena of inanimate nature; even as in this same "Sirenes," the voice of the sea wind, the timbrel boom of a harp chord reiterated like some doomful clock, the wavering voices of many waters and the cadences of unseen wings overhead, as they were expressed and suggested by the instruments, are far more precious and memorable than the vocal choir of the sirens.

Rabaud's Inspirational Baton.

"Fetes," too, was wonderfully played in the tenaciously gentle manner which is characteristic of the imaginative Rabaud, and throughtout the concert, notably in Lalo's overcure to "Le Roy d'Ys" and in the Air en Rondeau out of Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie," there prevailed the same wistful, searching, tender poignancy which inheres in these compositions and which Conductor Rabaud reads forthright and impeccably as none of his orchestral contemporaries do. The Rameau Airs de Ballet, notably the Rigaudon en Tambourin, also afforded the Boston band a glorious opportunity to the exposition of its newly perfected versatility and balance, and the number was roundly applauded by the fine audience.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite was the concluding and most pretentious excursion of the evening and served to further impress the audience with the high degree of discipline, esprit and mutual understanding which M. Rabaud has injected and intensified in his splendid orchestra.

m TIMES
dress New York City
te

OPERA

By James Gibbons Huneker

ducted. ... 4 ... tra Re."

Last Boston Orchestra Matinee.

The last matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was an enjoyable musical function, though the playing of the famous organization was not on a par with its Thursday evening performance. The second movement of the Saint-Saëns C minor Symphony was massive in its tonal beauty and the climax stunning. Conductor Rabaud always waits for a kettledrum climacteric with interest, and the artist who handles the sticks went for his instrument with a demoniacal intensity that must have pleased the French conductor. Saint-Saëns, like Cesar Franck, narrowly escapes genius. His knowledge is enormous, his invention mediocre. When he drops the thread of his musical discourse he resorts to the deadly chorale, or he lightly trips the gay fugato toe. In these things he recalls his venerated master, Franz Liszt.

An excerpt from Franck's "Redemption" followed. In it the string choir has seldom sounded so rich and sonorous. Bach was represented by his second concerto in F for violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet, played by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy, and Heim, and barring a false entrance of the trumpet in the first allegro—which slip, oddly enough, did not dislocate the phrase—the entire composition proved delightful. What music is this which like a pure mountain source, sparkles and upgushes! "Sadko," a tone picture by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is not so eloquent as several of his other suites or poems, yet it is Rimsky, and that says everything. The writer was present at the first Parisian performance in the Cirque d'Hiver, exactly forty years ago this month, (Emma Thursby made a sensational début in the same auditorium that Spring,) and Jacques Pasdeloup was the conductor. A storm of hisses followed the finish of the "new music," and a riot nearly ensued. Today "Sadko" is rather tame to ears attuned to Stravinsky. The music served as a vehicle for some esoteric capering of the Russian Ballet several seasons ago. It is marked by fancy and vivid colors. The reading yesterday was drab rather than kaleidoscopic, though the finesse was admirable. The afternoon closed with a brilliant but not precisely traditional interpretation of the "Freischütz" overture. There was an ovation tendered to the distinguished conductor and composer of "Marouf" and plenty of applause for the orchestra. No official announcement for next season's plans has been made as to conductors, but it might be a good idea to let well enough alone!

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City
Date

Music

Final Concert in New York of Season of Boston Symphony Orchestra

By H. E. Krehbiel

French, Russian and German music made up the programme of the concert arranged by M. Rabaud for the concert with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra said farewell to New York yesterday afternoon. The list was generous and noble in spirit, the performance of a character which compelled admiration quickened with a feeling of respect which is not always or necessarily present as an element of artistic enjoyment.

First there came the Symphony in C minor, by Saint-Saëns, in which the pianoforte and organ are associated with the orchestral forces, a composition which came to New York when it was comparatively young, and which, though it has never become "popular," has periodically challenged the attention of those of our conductors who think seriously of their duty to art. To its performance Mr. Rabaud gave obvious care and devotion, ignoring its possibilities for superficial effect, but laying bare its ingenious structure and its high aims. After the Symphonic piece from César Franck's "Redemption," it was possible to recall it with an additional measure because of the contrast which its strong logic presented to the too attenuate instrumentalities of the master, who, with all his sturdy qualities let his piousness (which is something else than piety) interfere with his sense of proportion. When Franck essays a religious theme we can never rid ourselves of the memory that it was he who set himself the duty of writing three or four score "Ave Marias" and died before he had accomplished the task.

The sentimental ghosts evoked by "La Redemption" were sent gibbering by the fresh wind which blew from Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in F, in which the concertino band is composed of a solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Unfortunately the inflated size of the ripieno band and the size of the room militated against the complete effectiveness of this marvellous old composition. When the tinkling tones of the harpsichord (which was used to fill out the harmonics) could be heard they were of ingratiating charm. But the music needs intimacy, and this was impossible under the circumstances.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," a pretty bit of descriptive music, with which the Russian Ballet associated pictures two or three years ago, followed the concerto, and the overture to "Der Freischütz," always fresh and dewy as its forest home, ended a concert which was heard from beginning to

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City

RABAUD DELIGHTS P

By JOHN H. RA

The fifth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Society yesterday was the purely musical festival of a very busy day in grand opera, recital and concert, and the standing of Henri Rabaud and his glorious band from Boston as well as the place of the symphony in the estimation of musical New York were well demonstrated by the crowded audience which packed Carnegie Hall and bombarded the atmosphere with dynamic and vociferous demonstrations of delight. It was a great day for the Bostonians and a memorable feast for the growing multitude of symphony enthusiasts.

Conductor Rabaud's recreative genius was again made manifest in his wonderful reading and projection of Saint-Saens's C minor Symphony which, necessarily, was the important enterprise of the program, and for those who fancied that they had heard the great work in every possible right and wrong way that it can be played, its performance yesterday by the Boston orchestra must have been an exhilarating proof that now, at last, its two beautiful movements are played to the ultimate limit of their great possibilities.

Bach Concerto the Favorite.

The Bach Concerto for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, however, leaped into new and previous signincance with the audience yesterday, and as it elicited an extraordinary degree of enthusiasm, it must be named as the salient success of the matinee. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim were the instrumental soloists of the concerto, with Charles W. Adams the harpischord accompanist, and the result was in the nature of a surprising and delightful revelation of new and unsuspected values, glories, feelings and thoughts in this lovely composition, so seldom heard and so sensitively timid of the banal misconceptions and crass man-handling of the average orchestral low-brow.

Franck's Symphonic fragment from "La Redemption," and the Rimsky-Korsakoff Tone Picture "Sadko," played with the indescribable verve, vividness and graphic fluency which distinguished the work of this orchestra under M. Rabaud, filled the generous measure of the concert's success. It ended with Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz."

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 26

NEWS OF MUSIC

MR. RABAUD MAKES A PROMISING PROGRAMME

Liszt Again and a Strange Young Italian in Prospect at the Symphony Concerts—Questioning Ears for the Conductor's Bach—Concerts Past and Concerts in Prospect

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday, April 4, and Saturday, April 5, Mr. Rabaud proposes interesting matter. At last he has heard the voice of the Italians crying in the land for the performance of symphonic music by their younger composers. From the pieces laid before him, he has chosen "Le Pause del Silenzio," or "The Pauses of Silence," written by the Venetian, Francesco Malipiero, and first heard under Mr. Toscanini at Rome in 1917. Malipiero is not the least "advanced" among his brethren, and censorious persons have accused him of "futuristic" leanings. Possibly, the sub-title of "The Pauses of Silence" hints as much, since it stands: "Seven Symphonic Expressions—Shudders, Songs, Cries, Laments, Breaking the Monotonous, Silent Passing of Time." Fantastic titles do not necessarily imply individual or engrossing music—not a few of Schmitt's pieces have been sore disappointments on that score—but there is no doubting that Malipiero has an imagination and a method of his own. Yet in spite of them or, perhaps, because of them, his music has already made way into the concert-halls of London and Paris.

In this same programme Mr. Rabaud also remembered albeit rather belatedly the non-German composers of central Europe. Hitherto not a piece by the cosmopolitan and semi-classic Liszt, by the Czechs—Smetana, Dvorak, Fibich and the rest—has stood upon his lists. Paris has never set much store by Bohemian music, but the tone-poems of Liszt have appeared and reappeared fairly often at the concerts of Monsieur Chévillard and Monsieur Pierné. Even war-time feuds and fashions have not "banned" them. Accordingly, Mr. Rabaud will offend no French prejudice and will gratify many a Bostonian liking when he plays Liszt's "Mazeppa" at the concerts of next week. With his version of the closing measures of the overture to "The King of Ys" for precedent, he ought again to shake the rafters in the sonorities of Liszt's apotheosis. Whatever the outcome, it is good to see the conductor working away in his programmes from his first formula—the classic German symphony preceded or followed by the French miscellany. For next week, the symphony is Mozart's in D major; while the assisting artist, Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, will be heard in Saint-Saëns's concerto in B minor—not exactly an unhackneyed piece in or out of the Symphony Concerts.

Here in Boston

Half the next concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, April 3, will consists of pieces as yet unheard, this season, in Boston—Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont"; Haydn's concerto for violin in which Mr. Malkin will play the solo part; and the "French Suite" of the young Parisian, Ducasse, unheard hereabouts since Mr. Fiedler's day. In the other half of the concert, the orchestra will repeat Saint-Saëns's pretty little second symphony and Mr. Hill's fanciful suite, "Stevensoniana."

Back to Bach

When the Boston Orchestra played in New York last Saturday, Mr. Rabaud included in the programme Bach's Brandenburg Concerto for trumpet, violin, flute and oboe, heard at home a week before. There as here, the audience was informed that the conductor had eschewed the various adaptations of the score to the conditions of twentieth-century concerts, and that the voice of Bach was to be heard at last unaltered and unclouded. In New York, however, as in Boston, the revelation failed to reveal and provoked the same doubting comment as was written and spoken "in these parts." Mr. Krehbiel, for example, noted in The Tribune the fashion in which the full string choir overwhelmed in the second movement the solo voices; while Mr. Finck in The Evening Post threshes out the whole matter more thoroughly than it has been winnowed elsewhere. He writes: "The press agent's preliminary announcement conveyed the indelicate suggestion that Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto would be exhibited on this occasion stark naked; that is, without any of the draperies and tapestries hung over it by the Bach Gesellschaft and other modern editors. No tampering was to be allowed. Mr. Rabaud was to give the only genuine and original score, and nothing but that.

"Now Mr. Rabaud is known to be a very conservative conductor. He has eliminated from Beethoven the emendations of great German conductors, including Wagner, made in the conviction that Beethoven himself, had he lived later, would have made these changes. But Mr. Rabaud did not present Bach in puris naturalibus. If he had done so he would have had to use only three first and three second violins and everything else in proportion (Bach never used more) instead of the full [string choir] of the Boston Orchestra. There had also to be a considerable amount of 'editing,' especially as regards the impossible trumpet parts, and as Bach, in a number of passages, left nothing but a figured bass, it was necessary to write out a filling-part to correspond with his intentions. Wolfrum used a modern grand piano for this purpose; Rabaud a harpsichord. Undoubtedly the

HERALD, MARCH 26

Conductors

There is naturally a certain amou of curiosity about the conductor of t Boston Symphony Orchestra next se son. The Sinfonia of March 1, a week review, and the official organ of t Pasdeloup concert in Paris, publish this significant paragraph:

"M. Andre Messager has resigned t position of conductor of the Societe d Concerts du Conservatoire. The bat is now in the hand of M. Philip Gaubert, who has already performed t duties of assistant conductor. Will stay there? Will it finally come in the possession, as is whispered, of Henri Rabaud when he returns fro America? This is the secret of t gods."

An American, now in France, long a sociated with musical affairs and m sicians in New York and Boston, experienced judge, attended a Pasd loup concert in Paris early this mont The concert was conducted by Rhen Baton, who was mentioned by some Boston a year ago for the position th has been admirably held by Mr. R baud. Our correspondent writes: was not at all impressed by Rhene-B ton. He is a stout, middle-aged ma decidedly of the Midi. His he is large and copiously thatched wi black hair, shot with gray. His fea ures, such of them as appear abo a bushy beard, are large, heavy a dark. His ears are enormous and cli closely to the side of his head. The is no grace or charm about the ma and musically he did not carry r away. His orchestra is of mediocr quality; for example, in the upwa whirling passage for violins in the Le nore No. 3 overture, just before t coda, he used only two desks of violin He likes contrasts and in exciting pa sages sweats vigorously."

Our correspondent heard a more f mous orchestra. "The Colonne-Lamou eux orchestra is a crackerjack, o of the best I have ever heard, alwa allowing for the unpleasant quality French brass. The strings are silk in quality, the wood-wind is a drea and the orchestra plays with supe precision and spirit. Don't let the Bo ton Symphony orchestra worry abo wood-wind. You can't throw a sto in Paris without hitting a fine obo flute, clarinet or bassoon. The fir oboe of the Colonne- Lamoureux is fine, I think, as Longy. Particular did the English horn intrigue me, we say over here in the provinces. A to Pierne, the conductor, if he is a dea one, he gave no signs of it Sunday. H gave a ripping performance of th 'Fantastique' symphony, his 'March t the Scaffold' and 'Sabbat' being pos tively thrilling."

It may be noted that at this Colonne Lamoureux concert March 2, Henr Danges, baritone, once of the Bosto Opera House, who served gallantly i the French artillery during the war whose charming wife was at the hea of the nurses in the military hospita at Lyons, sang Tiersot's "Rhin Alle mand" (Alfred de Musset's words), whic was then performed for the first time

MONITOR, MARCH 29

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Interest in the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was divided between a well-tried and well-liked artist of the occasion and an unheard and unknown new composition. The artist was Harold Bauer, a pianist admired both by casual and professional hearers, who played the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto. The new work, by Edward Burlingame Hill, of Boston, was entitled "Stevensoniana," a set of four pieces after poems in Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses"—march, lullaby "The Land of Nod," scherzo "Where Go the Boats," and "The Unseen Playmate."

Mr. Bauer, as is his wont, blended the piano part into the orchestra, becoming another member of the band. The customary fluidity and precision of his technique were in evidence; the usual impeccable and authoritative mastery of the music fulfilled expectation. Perhaps with all these things making for a satisfactory performance, it were captious to long for more verve and fire. Such a longing, however, persisted in sneaking in.

Mr. Rabaud made Mr. Hill's music race and flow, soar and float, for like all else that he does he had given it thorough study, consequently the four pieces were pleasant to listen to. They are compactly written, touched with humor, and well suggest the child's point of view. Only a few incorrigibly adult touches jarred, such as the sentimentalism of "The Unseen Playmate," a bit of which also crept into the scherzo. A child is many things, but he is not sentimental. The lullaby is full of admirable childish fancies with no bogey of adult nightmare. The march also was pure childhood, although a suspicion persists that Mr. Hill owes a slight debt to Gabriel Pierné. All children are not gentle, but all Stevenson's are, and likewise so are Mr. Hill's. Good music this, worthy a place on any program.

Fauré's prelude to "Pénélope," large and serene in conception, was heard for the first time in Boston, and was apparently liked. The selection from Berlioz's dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," opus 17, gave the impression of being far more theatrical than dramatic.

HERALD, MARCH 29

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Harold Bauer, Pianist, as Soloist, Played with Great Power

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Gabriel Faure, Prelude to "Penelope" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Piano Concerto, No. 5, E flat major (Harold Bauer, pianist); Hill, "Stevensoniana," four pieces after poems from R. L. Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses" (first time at these concerts); Berlioz, Grand Fete at Capulet's House from "Romeo and Juliet."

It is not easy to find the Gabriel Faure of the songs, the chamber music, the "Requiem" and the stage music for "Pelleas and Melisande" in this prelude. Does it foretell the prevailing mood of the opera? But Ulysses and Penelope are united at the end, after 20 years. Is it expressive of Ulysses's wanderings? But Circe and Calypso were more than kind to him, according to tradition he had sons by the two, and Nausicaa, one of the loveliest maidens in all literature, would gladly have wedded him. Does the prelude tell in tones of Penelope's anxious years, vexed by the suitors? Tradition has not spared her, she has not 'scaped calumny. Is the theme first given to the trumpet the theme of Ulysses? Or is the prelude simply a prelude without definite purpose or plan, only music before the curtain rises? However these questions may be answered this one thing is certain: That the chief musical ideas are not emotional, the chief interest is in the workmanship, although the horn figure at the end, the phrase that apparently has much to say and yet for some reason is half reticent, may haunt the memory for a time. It seems that in this prelude fastidiousness has nearly run into dryness, but Faure was nearly seventy years old when the opera was produced and there has been only one astonishing composer of gray years, the Italian named Verdi, the Verdi of "Otello," "Falstaff" and the four sacred pieces.

Mr. Hill's suite is based on verses for children by Stevenson: Marching Song, The Land of Nod, Where go the Boats? and The Unseen Playmate. The question rises: Do children like this "Garden of Verse," or are the poems better appreciated by older persons? The Alice of the Wonderland, the Alice that went through the looking glass is undoubtedly dearer to men and women than to their children. Not long ago we heard a little girl declare as a matter of course that Lewis Carroll's books were "silly." Possibly, she preferred the later novels of Henry James. In like manner music for children is relished only by thoughtful elders; witness some of Schumann's pages. Would a child one that is not afraid of music, find much pleasure in Mr. Carpenter's Suite, "The Adventures of a Perambulator"? We doubt it; but she might prick up her ears when she heard the xylophones at work. Of course the answer is that Mr. Carpenter's Suite was not written for children. Mr. Hill, too, wrote for mature hearers, but we think that a normal child would like the March, and at the end shout: "Play it again."

This Suite shows fancy, delicate humor, true invention and no mean skill in the instrumentation. A full modern orchestra is employed, but not to stun and dismay. As is the case with Ravel, the modern orchestra is here used to obtain light, tricksy, even gently emotional effects. The March is delightful throughout. In the Lullaby Mr. Hill shuns without too much effort the obvious; it is not an easy task to invent a new form of cradle songs. The Scherzo, without being too realistic suggests the spirit of "Where go the Boats?" and the rippling river; only in the finale do we find a little hesitation, a little vagueness, awakening the wish that this movement were more closely knit together, of more continuous flow. The audience was greatly pleased by the Suite and called on the composer more than once. Mr. Hill was fortunate in his interpreter and the players.

The performance of Beethoven's concerto was a remarkable one, one that may be justly described as noble. Unless there is nobility in the reading of this music the concerto is merely a vain thing. Mr. Bauer, who this season is in the height of his power, played with the finest understanding, with a bravura that was not merely pyrotechnical, with impressive authority and with the classic sentiment that is the poesy of romanticism. Nor can too much be said in praise of the orchestra performance inspired by Mr. Rabaud, a performance wonderful by reason of rhythmic intensity, which was never feverish, an infinite variety of tonal force and color, and a wholly sympathetic, supporting, and relieving relationship with the pianist. Mr. Rabaud with his admirable band and Mr. Bauer here vied, one with the other, in the glorification of the composer. Thus played, this concerto is justly called "The Emperor."

The music for Romeo, alone, sorrowing in the garden, is still beautiful. Mr. Longy still plays the lament poetically. One wishes, however, that Berlioz had written more intoxicating or more sensuous music for Capulet's ball. So one lightly says; but stop; this music was first heard 80 years ago; marvellous music for that period.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in D major (K. 504); Malipiero, "The Pauses of Silence"; Seven Symphonic Expressions (first time in the United States); Saint-Saens, Violin concerto, B minor, No. 3 (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Liszt, Mazeppa, Symphonic poem

AMERICAN, MARCH 29

CHILD'S VERSE A SYMPHONIC POEM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

American composers were recognized by Monsieur Rabaud and his Symphony yesterday when Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana" was played. This is a suite based upon "A Child's Garden of Verses."

In the generation or so that symphonic music has played an important part in American life, not more than a dozen American composers have attained sufficient proficiency in the science of writing for a full orchestra to have their works played with any frequency by the big symphony orchestra.

And in most of these cases it seems that the composers who had the zeal and persistency to learn modern orchestration were not those gifted with the pure medolic vein.

Mr. Hill has a talent for melody and a pretty sense of orchestral color. Therefore his "Stevensoniana" is agreeable to hear and worthy of a place on such a program. Against Faure's "Prelude to Penelope," a much more pretentious piece, it did not show to disadvantage.

Harold Bauer was the soloist, a strong, level-headed pianist, who plays better than most concert pianists and ought to be more popular than he is. He chose the Beethoven concerto for piano, number four. Berlioz's Festival at the House of Capulet, from "Romeo and Juliet" brought the concert to a briliant close.

RECORD, MARCH 29

Symphony Oboeist Will Take Boston Girl as His Bride

Musical circles of Boston are greatly interested in the engagement, just announced, of Louis Speyer, famous oboeist and English horn player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to Miss Camille H. Torno, daughter of Mme. Marianne Burguet of this city. Mr. Speyer, a veteran of the war, came to Boston with the French military band and made a sensational success as soloist at the band's concert at Symphony Hall.

He was, thereupon, engaged for the Boston orchestra. The romance, which will result in his marriage to Miss Torno, started when the French band was in Bosto

TRAVELER, MARCH 29

RABAUD GIVES FIRST NUMBERS

"Penelope" and "Stevensoniana" Please

Two numbers given for the first time here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Faure's "Penelope" prelude and Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana" suite after Robert Louis Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," added special interest to the concert of yesterday afternoon. Then there was Harold Bauer, as soloist, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

Faure's "Penelope" is agreeable music, but without striking merit. Hill's "Stevensoniana" is interesting throughout. At last we have a composer who can see child life naturally, not one who has to force himself to the view. The number was finely given and aroused such enthusiasm that both Mr. Rabaud and the composer were compelled to repeatedly acknowledge the audience's tribute.

Harold Bauer and the Symphony Orchestra make an ideal combination. The playing of the concerto was a treat and fully merited the enthusiastic recognition accorded it. Mr. Bauer was recalled to the stage many times.

Mr. Rabaud gave a notably interesting reading of the orchestral number from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony. Mr. Longy's oboe playing was a feature of the number.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 29

SYMPHONY CONCERT

LIVELY INTEREST AND PLENTIFUL PLEASURE

Faure's Dumb Prelude to His Opera, "Penelope"—Mr. Hill's Fanciful, Dexterous and Playful Suite of Childhood Music—Again the Thrilling Berlioz of "Romeo and Juliet," and the More Thrilling Beethoven of the "Emperor Concerto," with Mr. Bauer for Pianist

FAVORING circumstance swelled the audience, the applause and the interest of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. The "assisting artist" was Mr. Bauer, the pianist, by common consent and by common report, since his recent recital here, in the rich maturity of remarkable powers. The music of his and Mr. Rabaud's choice was the fifth concerto of Beethoven, "The Emperor," acknowledged masterpiece in kind, unheard here these many years in vitalizing and exalting performance. As when Mr. Heifetz came to the orchestra a few months ago, an eminent "soloist" in a concerto by Beethoven filled many a seat that might otherwise have stood empty. A few more, not always filled, were occupied by the friends of Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill the Bostonian composer, whose suite, "Stevensoniana" was played "for the first time at these concerts," preceded, like Mr. Bauer, by warm and widespread report. To whet curiosity further a French piece probably played for the first time in the United States—Fauré's prelude to his opera, "Penelope"—began the programme; while to end it and to promise high pleasure stood Berlioz's music for the fete at Capulet's house from his symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." At every turn, once orchestra and audience were clear or Fauré's prelude, the concert fulfilled anticipation. Mr. Bauer and the band played Beethoven's concerto to a rapt audience that in applause found relaxation as well as gave reward. In turn, the plaudits for Mr. Hill's suite and for the composer himself, when at Mr. Rabaud's call, he rose in his place, were the clappings of general and genuine pleasure. Berlioz—in the Elysian Fields—was not overlooked, even if it were for Beethoven—and not, as often for him—to crown the afternoon. The year at Symphony Hall has brought few more interesting concerts.

For the one cloud upon the bright interest of the afternoon, it is probable that Fauré never contemplated performance of his prelude apart from the opera into which in the theatre it leads. By testimony of the programme-book, Mr. Rabaud added instruments to Fauré's choirs to make the music sound more richly—that "reprehensible" custom (as it has been called) of German conductors, never, never, never to be practised by a good Parisian. By gossip of the lobby, he also rounded the final measures, before the introduction merges into a scene of spinning women. into a closing period. No tinkering, however, much avails the music. It sounded dutiful and dull in the theatre in Paris, six years ago; it sounded no less perfunctory and mechanical yesterday in the concert-hall of Boston. Seemingly, there is a motive to personify the valorous Ulysses, heroic wanderer, to return in the final scene and slay the wasters of his substance, the suitors to his spouse. Seemingly, a second motive personifies the longing, the much-enduring Penelope unravelling by night the web that she wove by day in Ulysses's great hall, scanning the sea from the cliff at sunset (as in the second act) for glimpse of his returning sail. The hearer perceives these motives by exercise of the mind, not by stirring of the imagination. Like Penelope, Fauré weaves the motives into a polyphonic web and by a process as spiritless as hers. Again the mind perceives the music; but only the few strands that the horns color touch the fancy. There is sober progress, grave emphases, discreet climax. Even in the prelude, as through the whole opera, Fauré laboriously declaims. Soon the music wastes and wanes into the measures of Penelope's spinning maidens. Seemingly opera is to Fauré as the bow of Ulysses to the suitors—a weapon too stout to swing and bend. Hardly a suggestion, outside the measures for the horns, of the fine-fingered, fine-eared, finely fanciful composer colors the prelude. It is mere speechifying in tones, after the manner of French composers from Rameau onward when invention, imagination, passion will not stir for them in the theatre.

On the score of dramatizing and picturing eloquence, the Berlioz of 1839 shone beside the Fauré of 1913 and in a symphony ostensibly of the concert-room, but actually far more of the stage than Fauré's scant and static music-drama. Agreed that the purists and the pedants reproach Berlioz's melodies and still more his procedure with them. Yet in this fragment of his symphony to "Romeo and Juliet," one of these melodies evokes the Montague to the ear, summons and sustains his passion for the daughter of the Capulets, opens his tortured heart. serves every dramatic need when his music intrudes into that of the fête, woos there, is thrust away lamenting. What melody so devised and conducted could do more? The academic shortcomings rise up to bless, to heighten it. Nor have the modern artists in tone-picturing much excelled Berlioz in the illusion of the distant fête, of Romeo musing against its echoes and flares, of Romeo cast out and woful while to him it rings Juliet. Possibly, the music of the fête itself has worn a little thin after eighty years but there are still measures in it where the rhythm beats high, the color glows and pulses and the ear hears as the eye sees one of Veronese's canvases of Venetian feasting and revel. By sheer heat of will and imagination Berlioz living burned away a hundred handicaps. The like heat keeps his music molten after nearly a hundred years. Writing a symphony is more truly musical dramatic than Fauré writing a whole opera. And such high rhythmed, high colored

MARCH 26, TRANSCRIPT

NEWS OF MUSIC

MR. RABAUD MAKES A PROMISING PROGRAMME

Liszt Again and a Strange Young Italian in Prospect at the Symphony Concerts—Questioning Ears for the Conductor's Bach—Concerts Past and Concerts in Prospect

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday, April 4, and Saturday, April 5, Mr. Rabaud proposes interesting matter. At last he has heard the voice of the Italians crying in the land for the performance of symphonic music by their younger composers. From the pieces laid before him, he has chosen "Le Pause del Silenzio," or "The Pauses of Silence," written by the Venetian, Francesco Malipiero, and first heard under Mr. Toscanini at Rome in 1917. Malipiero is not the least "advanced" among his brethren, and censorious persons have accused him of "futuristic" leanings. Possibly, the sub-title of "The Pauses of Silence" hints as much, since it stands: "Seven Symphonic Expressions—Shudders, Songs, Cries, Laments, Breaking the Monotonous, Silent Passing of Time." Fantastic titles do not necessarily imply individual or engrossing music—not a few of Schmitt's pieces have been sore disappointments on that score—but there is no doubting that Malipiero has an imagination and a method of his own. Yet in spite of them or, perhaps, because of them, his music has already made way into the concert-halls of London and Paris.

In this same programme Mr. Rabaud also remembered albeit rather belatedly the non-German composers of central Europe. Hitherto not a piece by the cosmopolitan and semi-classic Liszt, by the Czechs—Smetana, Dvorák, Fibich and the rest—has stood upon his lists. Paris has never set much store by Bohemian music, but the tone-poems of Liszt have appeared and reappeared fairly often at the concerts of Monsieur Chévillard and Monsieur Pierné. Even war-time feuds and fashions have not "banned" them. Accordingly, Mr. Rabaud will offend no French prejudice and will gratify many a Bostonian liking when he plays Liszt's "Mazeppa" at the concerts of next week. With his version of the closing measures of the overture to "The King of Ys" for precedent, he ought again to shake the rafters in the sonorities of Liszt's apotheosis. Whatever the outcome, it is good to see the conductor working away in his programmes from his first formula—the classic German symphony preceded or followed by the French miscellany. For next week, the symphony is Mozart's in D major; while the assisting artist, Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, will be heard in Saint-Saëns's concerto in B minor—not exactly an unhackneyed piece in or out of the Symphony Concerts.

Here in Boston

Half the next concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, April 3, will consists of pieces as yet unheard, this season, in Boston—Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont"; Haydn's concerto for violin in which Mr. Malkin will play the solo part; and the "French Suite" of the young Parisian, Ducasse, unheard hereabouts since Mr. Fiedler's day. In the other half of the concert, the orchestra will repeat Saint-Saëns's pretty little second symphony and Mr. Hill's fanciful suite, "Stevensoniana."

[illegible] to Bach

When the Boston Orchestra played in New York last Saturday, Mr. Rabaud included in the programme Bach's Brandenburg Concerto for trumpet, violin, flute and oboe, heard at home a week before. There as here, the audience was informed that the conductor had eschewed the various adaptations of the score to the conditions of twentieth-century concerts, and that the voice of Bach was to be heard at last unaltered and unclouded. In New York, however, as in Boston, the revelation failed to reveal and provoked the same doubting comment as was written and spoken "in these parts." Mr. Krehbiel, for example, noted in The Tribune the fashion in which the full string choir overwhelmed in the second movement the solo voices; while Mr. Finck in The Evening Post threshes out the whole matter more thoroughly than it has been winnowed elsewhere. He writes: "The press agent's preliminary announcement conveyed the indelicate suggestion that Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto would be exhibited on this occasion stark naked; that is, without any of the draperies and tapestries hung over it by the Bach Gesellschaft and other modern editors. No tampering was to be allowed. Mr. Rabaud was to give the only genuine and original score, and nothing but that.

"Now Mr. Rabaud is known to be a very conservative conductor. He has eliminated from Beethoven the emendations of great German conductors, including Wagner, made in the conviction that Beethoven himself, had he lived later, would have made these changes. But Mr. Rabaud did not present Bach in puris naturalibus. If he had done so he would have had to use only three first and three second violins and everything else in proportion (Bach never used more) instead of the full [string choir] of the Boston Orchestra. There had also to be a considerable amount of 'editing,' especially as regards the impossible trumpet parts, and as Bach, in a number of passages, left nothing but a figured bass, it was necessary to write out a filling-part to correspond with his intentions. Wolfrum used a modern grand piano for this purpose; Rabaud, a harpsichord. Undoubtedly the

HERALD, MARCH 26

Conductors

There is naturally a certain amou of curiosity about the conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra next se son. The Sinfonia of March 1, a week review, and the official organ of t Pasdeloup concert in Paris, publish this significant paragraph:

"M. Andre Messager has resigned position of conductor of the Societe d Concerts du Conservatoire. The bat is now in the hand of M. Philip Gaubert, who has already performed t duties of assistant conductor. Will stay there? Will it finally come in the possession, as is whispered, of Henri Rabaud when he returns fro America? This is the secret of t gods."

An American, now in France, long a sociated with musical affairs and m sicians in New York and Boston, experienced judge, attended a Pasd loup concert in Paris early this mont The concert was conducted by Rher Baton, who was mentioned by some Boston a year ago for the position th has been admirably held by Mr. R baud. Our correspondent writes: was not at all impressed by Rhene-B ton. He is a stout, middle-aged ma decidedly of the Midi. His he is large and copiously thatched wi black hair, shot with gray. His fea ures, such of them as appear abo a bushy beard, are large, heavy a dark. His ears are enormous and cli closely to the side of his head. The is no grace or charm about the m and musically he did not carry r away. His orchestra is of mediocr quality; for example, in the upwa whirling passage for violins in the Le nore No. 3 overture, just before t coda, he used only two desks of violin He likes contrasts and in exciting pa sages sweats vigorously."

Our correspondent heard a more f mous orchestra. "The Colonne-Lamou eux orchestra is a crackerjack, o of the best I have ever heard, alwa allowing for the unpleasant quality French brass. The strings are silk in quality, the wood-wind is a dreal and the orchestra plays with supe precision and spirit. Don't let the Bo ton Symphony orchestra worry abo wood-wind. You can't throw a sto in Paris without hitting a fine obo flute, clarinet or bassoon. The fir oboe of the Colonne- Lamoureux is fine, I think, as Longy. Particular did the English horn intrigue me, we say over here in the provinces. A to Pierne, the conductor, if he is a dea one, he gave no signs of it Sunday. H gave a ripping performance of th 'Fantastique' symphony, his 'March t the Scaffold' and 'Sabbat' being posi tively thrilling."

It may be noted that at this Colonne Lamoureux concert March 2, Henr Danges, baritone, once of the Bosto Opera House, who served gallantly i the French artillery during the war whose charming wife was at the hea of the nurses in the military hospita at Lyons, sang Tiersot's "Rhin Alle mand" (Alfred de Musset's words), whic was then performed for the first time

MONITOR, MARCH 29,

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Interest in the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was divided between a well-tried and well-liked artist of the occasion and an unheard and unknown new composition. The artist was Harold Bauer, a pianist admired both by casual and professional hearers, who played the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto. The new work, by Edward Burlingame Hill, of Boston, was entitled "Stevensoniana," a set of four pieces after poems in Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses"—march, lullaby "The Land of Nod," scherzo "Where Go the Boats," and "The Unseen Playmate."

Mr. Bauer, as is his wont, blended the piano part into the orchestra, becoming another member of the band. The customary fluidity and precision of his technique were in evidence; the usual impeccable and authoritative mastery of the music fulfilled expectation. Perhaps with all these things making for a satisfactory performance, it were captious to long for more verve and fire. Such a longing, however, persisted in sneaking in.

Mr. Rabaud made Mr. Hill's music race and flow, soar and float, for like all else that he does he had given it thorough study, consequently the four pieces were pleasant to listen to. They are compactly written, touched with humor, and well suggest the child's point of view. Only a few incorrigibly adult touches jarred, such as the sentimentalism of "The Unseen Playmate," a bit of which also crept into the scherzo. A child is many things, but he is not sentimental. The lullaby is full of admirable childish fancies with no bogey of adult nightmare. The march also was pure childhood, although a suspicion persists that Mr. Hill owes a slight debt to Gabriel Pierné. All children are not gentle, but all Stevenson's are, and likewise so are Mr. Hill's. Good music this, worthy a place on any program.

Fauré's prelude to "Pénélope," large and serene in conception, was heard for the first time in Boston, and was apparently liked. The selection from Berlioz's dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," opus 17, gave the impression of being far more theatrical than dramatic.

HERALD, MARCH 29.

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Harold Bauer, Pianist, as Soloist, Played with Great Power

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Gabriel Faure, Prelude to "Penelope" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Piano Concerto, No. 5, E flat major (Harold Bauer, pianist); Hill, "Stevensoniana," four pieces after poems from R. L. Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses" (first time at these concerts); Berlioz, Grand Fete at Capulet's House from "Romeo and Juliet."

It is not easy to find the Gabriel Faure of the songs, the chamber music, the "Requiem" and the stage music for "Pelleas and Melisande" in this prelude. Does it foretell the prevailing mood of the opera? But Ulysses and Penelope are united at the end, after 20 years. Is it expressive of Ulysses's wanderings? But Circe and Calypso were more than kind to him, according to tradition he had sons by the two, and Nausicaa, one of the loveliest maidens in all literature, would gladly have wedded him. Does the prelude tell in tones of Penelope's anxious years, vexed by the suitors? Tradition has not spared her, she has not escaped calumny. Is the theme first given to the trumpet the theme of Ulysses? Or is the prelude simply a prelude without definite purpose or plan, only music before the curtain rises? However these questions may be answered this one thing is certain: That the chief musical ideas are not emotional, the chief interest is in the workmanship, although the horn figure at the end, the phrase that apparently has much to say and yet for some reason is half reticent, may haunt the memory for a time. It seems that in this prelude fastidiousness has nearly run into dryness, but Faure was nearly seventy years old when the opera was produced and there has been only one astonishing composer of gray years, the Italian named Verdi, the Verdi of "Otello," "Falstaff" and the four sacred pieces.

Mr. Hill's suite is based on verses for children by Stevenson: Marching Song, The Land of Nod, Where go the Boats? and The Unseen Playmate. The question rises: Do children like this "Garden of Verse," or are the poems better appreciated by older persons? The Alice of the Wonderland, the Alice that went through the looking glass is undoubtedly dearer to men and women than to their children. Not long ago we heard a little girl declare as a matter of course that Lewis Carroll's books were "silly." Possibly, she preferred the later novels of Henry James. In like manner music for children is relished only by thoughtful elders; witness some of Schumann's pages. Would a child one that is not afraid of music, find much pleasure in Mr. Carpenter's Suite, "The Adventures of a Perambulator"? We doubt it; but she might prick up her ears when she heard the xylophones at work. Of course the answer is that Mr. Carpenter's Suite was not written for children. Mr. Hill too, wrote for mature hearers, but we think that a normal child would like the March, and at the end shout: "Play it again."

This Suite shows fancy, delicate humor, true invention and no mean skill in the instrumentation. A full modern orchestra is employed, but not to stun and dismay. As is the case with Ravel, the modern orchestra is here used to obtain light, tricksy, even gently emotional effects. The March is delightful throughout. In the Lullaby Mr. Hill shuns without too much effort the obvious; it is not an easy task to invent a new form of cradle songs. The Scherzo, without being too realistic suggests the spirit of "Where go the Boats?" and the rippling river; only in the finale do we find a little hesitation, a little vagueness, awakening the wish that this movement were more closely knit together, of more continuous flow. The audience was greatly pleased by the Suite and called on the composer more than once. Mr. Hill was fortunate in his interpreter and the players.

The performance of Beethoven's concerto was a remarkable one, one that may be justly described as noble. Unless there is nobility in the reading of this music the concerto is merely a vain thing. Mr. Bauer, who this season is in the height of his power, played with the finest understanding, with a bravura that was not merely pyrotechnical, with impressive authority and with the classic sentiment that is the poesy of romanticism. Nor can too much be said in praise of the orchestra performance inspired by Mr. Rabaud, a performance wonderful by reason of rhythmic intensity, which was never feverish, an infinite variety of tonal force and color, and a wholly sympathetic, supporting, and relieving relationship with the pianist. Mr. Rabaud with his admirable band and Mr. Bauer here vied, one with the other, in the glorification of the composer. Thus played, this concerto is justly called "The Emperor."

The music for Romeo, alone, sorrowing in the garden, is still beautiful. Mr. Longy still plays the lament poetically. One wishes, however, that Berlioz had written more intoxicating or more sensuous music for Capulet's ball. So one lightly says; but stop; this music was first heard 80 years ago; marvellous music for that period.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in D major (K. 504); Malipiero, "The Pauses of Silence"; Seven Symphonic Expressions (first time in the United States); Saint-Saens, Violin concerto, B minor, No. 3 (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Liszt, Mazeppa, Symphonic poem

AMERICAN, MARCH 29.

CHILD'S VERSE A SYMPHONIC POEM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

American composers were recognized by Monsieur Rabaud and his Symphony yesterday when Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana" was played. This is a suite based upon "A Child's Garden of Verses."

In the generation or so that symphonic music has played an important part in American life, not more than a dozen American composers have attained sufficient proficiency in the science of writing for a full orchestra to have their works played with any frequency by the big symphony orchestra.

And in most of these cases it seems that the composers who had the zeal and persistency to learn modern orchestration were not those gifted with the pure medolic vein.

Mr. Hill has a talent for melody and a pretty sense of orchestral color. Therefore his "Stevensoniana" is agreeable to hear and worthy of a place on such a program. Against Faure's "Prelude to Penelope," a much more pretentious piece, it did not show to disadvantage.

Harold Bauer was the soloist, a strong, level-headed pianist, who plays better than most concert pianists and ought to be more popular than he is. He chose the Beethoven concerto for piano, number four. Berlioz's Festival at the House of Capulet, from "Romeo and Juliet" brought the concert to a briliant close.

RECORD, MARCH 29.

Symphony Oboeist Will Take Boston Girl as His Bride

Musical circles of Boston are greatly interested in the engagement, just announced, of Louis Speyer, famous oboeist and English horn player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to Miss Camille H. Torno, daughter of Mme. Marianne Burguet of this city. Mr. Speyer, a veteran of the war, came to Boston with the French military band and made a sensational success as soloist at the band's concert at Symphony Hall.

He was, thereupon, engaged for the Boston orchestra. The romance, which will result in his marriage to Miss Torno, started when the French band was in Boste

TRAVELER, MARCH 29

RABAUD GIVES FIRST NUMBERS

"Penelope" and "Stevensoniana" Please

Two numbers given for the first time here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Faure's "Penelope" prelude and Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana" suite after Robert Louis Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," added special interest to the concert of yesterday afternoon. Then there was Harold Bauer, as soloist, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

Faure's "Penelope" is agreeable music, but without striking merit. Hill's "Stevensoniana" is interesting throughout. At last we have a composer who can see child life naturally, not one who has to force himself to the view. The number was finely given and aroused such enthusiasm that both Mr. Rabaud and the composer were compelled to repeatedly acknowledge the audience's tribute.

Harold Bauer and the Symphony Orchestra make an ideal combination. The playing of the concerto was a treat and fully merited the enthusiastic recognition accorded it. Mr. Bauer was recalled to the stage many times.

Mr. Rabaud gave a notably interesting reading of the orchestral number from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony. Mr. Longy's oboe playing was a feature of the number.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

LIVELY INTEREST AND PLENTIFUL PLEASURE

Faure's Dumb Prelude to His Opera, "Penelope"—Mr. Hill's Fanciful, Dexterous and Playful Suite of Childhood Music—Again the Thrilling Berlioz of "Romeo and Juliet," and the More Thrilling Beethoven of the "Emperor Concerto," with Mr. Bauer for Pianist

FAVORING circumstance swelled the audience, the applause and the interest of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. The "assisting artist" was Mr. Bauer, the pianist, by common consent and by common report, since his recent recital here, in the rich maturity of remarkable powers. The music of his and Mr. Rabaud's choice was the fifth concerto of Beethoven, "The Emperor," acknowledged masterpiece in kind, unheard here these many years in vitalizing and exalting performance. As when Mr. Heifetz came to the orchestra a few months ago, an eminent "soloist" in a concerto by Beethoven filled many a seat that might otherwise have stood empty. A few more, not always filled, were occupied by the friends of Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill the Bostonian composer, whose suite, "Stevensoniana" was played "for the first time at these concerts," preceded, like Mr. Bauer, by warm and widespread report. To whet curiosity further a French piece probably played for the first time in the United States—Fauré's prelude to his opera, "Penelope"—began the programme; while to end it and to promise high pleasure stood Berlioz's music for the fete at Capulet's house from his symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." At every turn, once orchestra and audience were clear or Fauré's prelude, the concert fulfilled anticipation. Mr. Bauer and the band played Beethoven's concerto to a rapt audience that in applause found relaxation as well as gave reward. In turn, the plaudits for Mr. Hill's suite and for the composer himself, when at Mr. Rabaud's call, he rose in his place, were the clappings of general and genuine pleasure. Berlioz—in the Elysian Fields—was not overlooked, even if it were for Beethoven—and not, as often for him—to crown the afternoon. The year at Symphony Hall has brought few more interesting concerts.

For the one cloud upon the bright interest of the afternoon, it is probable that Fauré never contemplated performance of his prelude apart from the opera into which in the theatre it leads. By testimony of the programme-book, Mr. Rabaud added instruments to Fauré's choirs to make the music sound more richly—that "reprehensible" custom (as it has been called) of German conductors, never, never, never to be practised by a good Parisian. By gossip of the lobby, he also rounded the final measures, before the introduction merges into a scene of spinning women, into a closing period. No tinkering, however, much avails the music. It sounded dutiful and dull in the theatre in Paris, six years ago; it sounded no less perfunctory and mechanical yesterday in the concert-hall of Boston. Seemingly, there is a motive to personify the valorous Ulysses, heroic wanderer, to return in the final scene and slay the wasters of his substance, the suitors to his spouse. Seemingly, a second motive personifies the longing, the much-enduring Penelope unravelling by night the web that she wove by day in Ulysses's great hall, scanning the sea from the cliff at sunset (as in the second act) for glimpse of his returning sail. The hearer perceives these motives by exercise of the mind, not by stirring of the imagination. Like Penelope, Fauré weaves the motives into a polyphonic web and by a process as spiritless as hers. Again the mind perceives the music; but only the few strands that the horns color touch the fancy. There is sober progress, grave emphases, discreet climax. Even in the prelude, as through the whole opera, Fauré laboriously declaims. Soon the music wastes and wanes into the measures of Penelope's spinning maidens. Seemingly opera is to Fauré as the bow of Ulysses to the suitors—a weapon too stout to swing and bend. Hardly a suggestion, outside the measures for the horns, of the fine-fingered, fine-eared, finely fanciful composer colors the prelude. It is mere speechifying in tones, after the manner of French composers from Rameau onward when invention, imagination, passion will not stir for them in the theatre.

On the score of dramatizing and picturing eloquence, the Berlioz of 1839 shone beside the Fauré of 1913 and in a symphony ostensibly of the concert-room, but actually far more of the stage than Fauré's scant and static music-drama. Agreed that the purists and the pedants reproach Berlioz's melodies and still more his procedure with them. Yet in this fragment of his symphony to "Romeo and Juliet," one of these melodies evokes the Montague to the ear, summons and sustains his passion for the daughter of the Capulets, opens his tortured heart, serves every dramatic need when his music intrudes into that of the fête, woos there, is thrust away lamenting. What melody so devised and conducted, could do more? The academic shortcomings rise up to bless, to heighten it. Nor have the modern artists in tone-picturing much excelled Berlioz in the illusion of the distant fête, of Romeo musing against its echoes and flares, of Romeo cast out and woful while to him it rings Juliet. Possibly, the music of the fête itself has worn a little thin after eighty years but there are still measures in it where the rhythm beats high, the color glows and pulses and the ear hears as the eye sees one of Veronese's canvases of Venetian feasting and revel. By sheer heat of will and imagination Berlioz living burned away a hundred handicaps. The like heat keeps his music molten after many a hundred years. Writing a symphony he is more truly musical dramatist than Fauré writing a whole opera. And [illegible] such high rhythmed, high colored

REDUCTION RATIO 13x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
4.5 mm 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

RECORD MARCH 29 GLOBE MARCH 29

BAUER APPEARS AS SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY

By J. V. CLARK

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henr Rabaud, conductor; Harold Bauer pianist, soloist. Nineteenth concer of the season yesterday at Symphon Hall, program to be repeated thi evening. The program:—

Faure—Prelude to "Penelope."
Beethoven—Concerto for piano, E fla major, No. 5.
Hill—"Stevensoniana."
Berlioz—Fete from "Romeo and Juliet symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra re turned to town yesterday after its las "road" trip of the season. In Ne York and other cities the orchestr and Mr. Rabaud met with much suc cess. There was genuine enthusiasi over the orchestra, admiration for M Rabaud and, of course, great specula tion whether he will be invited to re main as conductor for another seaso

Mr. Hill's suite, the feature of th return concert, was suggested by the composer, an instructor at Harvar University, by four pieces in Steven son's "A Child's Garden of Verses." These pieces were:—

"The Marching Song":—

Mary Jane commands the party,
Peter leads the rear;
Feet in time, alert and hearty,
Each a Grenadier.

"The Land of Nod":—

Far as I like to find the way,
I never can get back by day,
Nor can remember plain and clear
The curious music that I hear.

"Where Go the Boats?":—

Green castles a-floating,
Castles of the foam,
Boats of mine a-boating—
Where will all come home?

"The Unseen Playmate"—

When children are playing alone on the green,
In comes the playmate that never was seen.
When children are happy and lovely and good,
The Friend of the Children comes out of the wood.

Mr. Hill's music made the happiest impression of any American music heard at these concerts this season. These short pieces have much charm, a real feeling for human sentiment, now the pomposness, now the dreaminess of children a-playing or speculating on things too big for their little heads. Of a necessity the full symphonic orchestra is too large an instrument to portray rather delicate sentiments, and possibly Mr. Hill has been a bit too sophisticated in his narrative, but these failings are rather the weakness of his art form than of his material. The music utilizes a very full orchestra with Glockenspiel, celesta, xylophone, etc., thrown in for full measure. The orchestration is that of a hand well trained in writing for an orchestral band rather than of a student of pianoforte key-board harmony, who meddles with a concert orchestra. The work is Rich, and, once or twice in melodic line, suggests now Debussy, now Ravel, now Puccini, but Mr. Hill is not a rank copyist. Rather these hints at other men's work are the natural influence the leaders of musical composition have on the mind of a contemporary, and, presumably, a great admirer. Some will find the traces of other composers, the influence of toy soldier music from Gounod to Victor Herbert, but when all is said and done Mr. Hill's music is essentially his own.

The first two movements (we say this after but one hearing) are the most interesting. The march with its very quick tempo and its shining trumpet and horn is miniature music, almost music box music, but music with a really human touch, the fancy of a child. The second movement, written for strings alone, is graceful, gently emotional. There is a wistfulness in the music that there is in the little poem which inspired it. The scherzo, "Where Go the Boats," has charm. The final movement, with its echoes of preceding pages, did not make quite so satisfactory an impression as the previous movement. Is the theme of the Unseen Playmate given to the oboes a clearly defined as Mr. Hill could wish? The work gave much pleasure and Mr. Hill was heartily applauded.

Mr. Rabaud has proved himself a most fascinating interpreter of Beethoven. The various symphonies, which he gave earlier in the season, and the violin concerto were played with loving enthusiasm. The pages of the master glow under Mr. Rabaud's direction. How often has this or that beloved page seemed finer and nobler as Mr. Rabaud has played it! All of which is to emphasize the fact that yesterday Mr. Rabaud again proved himself a Beethovenist of the first rank and that he, and his men, shared with Mr. Bauer the honors of the performance of the concerto. Mr. Bauer is always the artist. Yesterday he played with his usual skill in all branches of pianism. Possibly his tone was just a little lovelier in pianissimo passages, perhaps his playing of fleet passages was just a little more delicate than formerly; possibly, on the other hand, the auditors heard him with particularly grateful ears. First and last, he played without frills or furbelows, but with eminent sanity and asurance.

Mr. Rabaud, facing popular sentiment, which restricts his repertoire to a marked extent, turns to the opera house for much of his shorter music. Yesterday's choice of a Parisian work was the "Penelope" fragment, which was given for the first time in Boston. It is said that the work was composed at the instigation of M. Gunsbourg of the Monte Carlo opera and Miss Lucienne Breval, the well known opera singer of Paris. The prelude, built on two themes illustrative of Penelope and Ulysses, may well supplement the stage action which it precedes in the opera. It has little to interest the concert attendant.

Berlioz, the grand, is seldom grander than in the "Grand Fete at Capulet's House." The smashing, jubilant music of the Capulet's ball makes it easy for one to visualize the "party" as it would be given in the greatest opera houses with every member of the chorus and ballet on the stage. It was gingery music with which to end a concert that sent the audience out into the white and grey of a belated snow storm.

At next week's concerts Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, will play the Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, No. 3. Mr. Thibaud is a great violinist, one who has never been properly recognized in Boston by concertgoers in general. The orchestra will play Mozart's Symphony in D major, Malipiero's "The Pauses of Silence" (First time in Boston) and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

HILL'S MUSIC GRASPS SPIRIT OF CHILDHOOD

Bauer Plays Brilliantly at Symphony Concert

Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensonia," four pieces for orchestra after poems from Robert Louis Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," played yesterday afternoon for the first time at the Symphony concerts, at last has something grateful to say as music inspired by childhood.

Mr Hill has been more fortunate than some of his fellows, for between certain adult minds and the child consciousness there is a great gulf, and the pretty prattle of babes falls ponderously out of a cobwebbed psychology which ought to know better.

Hearing this music of pure fancy and true charm, one is persuaded that the spirit of play which peoples the imaginative world of the child, which makes its sweet illusions more real than the sordid every day of its elders, need not be mocked by those who, striving to interpret the dreams of little brains, forget their spell if indeed they ever knew it.

Mr Hill has caught the spirit of Stevenson's verses with the skill of an admirable orchestral craftsman, serving ungracefully an imagination which is unwearied, fresh and consistently akin to the realm of play.

There are some who apparently have believed that to record humor, to caper nimbly, is to reflect a mood of childhood. Mr Hill's score, admirable and engrossing as the work of a serious musician, is the more one of remarkable merit since.

This sophisticated equipment, speaking through a modern harmonic and orchestral idiom, overtakes and does not lose a spontaneity as grateful for its unconscious, artless simplicity, as for its happy surprises. The "Lullaby," a poem of wearing strands of far calling stringed instruments is an exquisite piece of writing. The composer, modestly acknowledged warm applause.

Harold Bauer gave a finely considered, and well executed performance of Beethoven's fifth concerto, one of dignity, poetic beauty, and in the last movement of brilliance. He was many times recalled.

Faure's prelude to his lyric poem, "Penelope," played yesterday by Mr Rabaud for the first time in Boston, again shows a composer less happy in orchestral treatment of his subject than in the exquisite miniatures of many of his songs.

The plaint and frenzy of Berlioz' Romeo in his scene at the fete at Capulet's house, in his Dramatic Symphony, is largely autobiographical of the period of Harriet Smithson, the English Shaksperian actress, whom the composer married deliriously and lived with for a time wretchedly. The ballroom scene has brilliance and the brawling is appropriately noisy.

The love music for Romeo is more worthy of Berlioz and some of it again was ennobled by Mr Longy. In all, particularly in Mr Hill's pieces, Mr Rabaud conducted with imagination, Faure's prelude to "Penelope" was good music, if not extremely dramatic. Of course there were a pair of contrasted themes in it, as with Egmont and Claerchen, Florestan and Leonora, Tristan and Isolde, "et id genus omne," "Faure is, thank Heaven, not a modern musical cubist, yet there is a sufficiency of excitement when Ulysses returns home and finds a lot of young gentlemen in white ties and lavender kids, each trying to outsit and outstay the other. Then there is something of rough house which is powerfully portrayed. The end of the prelude is most peculiar, a constant repetition of the tonic and mediant note and the final imperfect end is on the mediant.

Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill has no cause to complain of the manner in which his little Suite on Stevensonian themes was given. The opening march seemed too strongly modulatory and too intensely modern in heavy scoring to be fitting to an infantile picture, but perhaps it was intended for the children of giants. It was, however, quite interesting and in this movement and in the finale Mr. Hill showed that he could ably handle the modern orchestra. There were some striking effects of tone-coloring.

The gentle Lullaby was rather too abstruse for any but the typical Boston intellectual child. The Scherzo had an interesting oboe melody and the string effects picturing the flowing river were poetic.

The finale gave reminiscences of the preceding movements and was worked up to effective climaxes. The work was logical and coherent, although we wished for more directness and simplicity of melody in such pictures, and Mr. Hill's composition was not crushed by being placed between Beethoven and Berlioz. At the close there was much applause and the composer was obliged to acknowledge this from his seat in the audience several times.

ADVERTIS MARCH 30.

Bauer Soloist on Symphony Program

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Faure—Prelude to "Penelope."
Beethoven—Piano Concerto No. 5.
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.
Hill—"Stevensoniana." Four orchestra pieces
Berlioz—"The Fete at the Capulets," from Romeo and Juliet Symphony.

CERTAINLY a well contrasted and rather exciting program. Of course, Mr. Bauer was the chief attraction, a great soloist always is. Sometimes this is out of place, but not when a true symphonic work, such as the "Emperor Concerto" is given with a splendid interpreter. There is only praise to be spoken of the performance, praise of the piano and of the orchestral work. The brilliant ending of the first movement, really a Cadenza with piano and orchestra combined, made a superb climax, while the slow movement had expression without sentimentality. Both of Beethoven's greatest concertos (this and the violin concerto) fall off somewhat in the final rondo, but even this had so much of spirit that the work ended in a blaze of enthusiasm, the audience recalling Mr. Bauer many times, and M. Rabaud should have been associated with him in this triumph. Mr. Bauer played the noble, masculine work in a fitting, straightforward, masculine manner. It was, of course, the star point of the concert.

The second movement of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony is not as great as the third, which contains the "Scene d'Amour" (the balcony scene), but it has some eloquent phrases nevertheless. There are some expressive passages for woodwind in the first portion, and flute, oboe and clarinet each deserve praise for delicate playing. The union of the themes of the Allegro and the Larghetto, in counterpoint, is an ingenious touch, and M. Rabaud balanced the two melodies excellently. The 'cello part also was important, for it must be remembered that Romeo is a melancholy violoncello, while Juliet is a violin through the greater part of this symphony. The fortississimo ending proved that they had rather a noisy time at that social function at the Capulets.

TRANSCRIPT MARCH 31.

CONCERT AND CONDUCTOR

MORE GOSSIP ABOUT MR. RABAUD OR ANOTHER

Mr. Toscanini's Reported "Willingness" to Come to Boston—The Parisian's Position—Mr. Heifetz Discloses New Qualities and Heightens and Deepens the Old—A Remarkable Recital—Mr. Kreisler's Return Next October

THESE are the days in which it is possible to hear any thing and all things about the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for next year. "Day unto to day uttereth speech," but it is hardly true that "night unto night showeth knowledge." Nevertheless it is time to record the saying in New York of a close friend of Mr. Toscanini, hitherto well informed about the conductor's intentions. According to him Mr. Toscanini "expressed his willingness to assume the leadership of the Boston orchestra after an urgent request had been transmitted to Italy by Senator Lodge." Whether these words refer to negotiations in progress last summer or to soundings and bargainings more recently undertaken does not appear. The mention of Senator Lodge tends to imply the earlier quest, since in it the trustees of the orchestra invoked the aid of eminent statesmen and preferred governmental rather than musical channels as a way to their goal.

In either alternative, a wide gap separates Mr. Toscanini, expressing a willingness to become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from Mr. Toscanini visible and audible in Symphony Hall. It is not necessary to know him intimately to know also that he is a man of many minds and many moods over a proposal, gratifying indeed to many of his ambitions as a conductor, yet breaking for the time many of his cherished ties as a man. It was these ties that drew him back to Italy in the years of the war. Now, if he should come next autumn to Boston he must part them again. What his final decision may be, no man knoweth—or at least sayeth—but above and beyond any conductor in Europe, except Mr. Nikisch, whose German affiliations put him out of the question, Mr. Toscanini seems worthy of the new quality and the old prestige of the Symphony Orchestra.

It is even possible to hear in the gossip of the town, though it is impossible to say how truly, that Mr. Rabaud has himself signalled Mr. Toscanini—and Mr. Mengelberg—to the trustees as conductors of the first rank. More interesting, however, to the frequenters of the Symphony Concerts is Mr. Rabaud's own disposition toward another year in Boston. As some say, who profess to be more or less in his confidence, he prefers to return to Paris in the spring and busy himself anew with the writing of music since by profession and inclination, he is composer rather than conductor. Like report also asserts that he has found the hundred concerts that he must lead in a season, in Boston, in New York, in many another city, a severer strain upon his physical and nervous energies than he cares to endure for another year. On the other hand, equally plausible sayings run that he is an eminently reasonable man: that there are arrangements and arrangements afoot "of which we shall soon hear." Meanwhile, no one, apparently, can or will speak with knowledge and authority about the conductorship next year. None the less it is credibly reported that the trustees have several times discussed it. Certainly, also, at the concert of Saturday, Mr. Rabaud, earnest as was his effort, admirable sometimes, as was the outcome, seemed a tired man.

Mr. Warnke of old, the eminent and applauded first violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra, announces a concert of his own for Thursday evening next in Huntington Chambers Hall. He will then play Haydn's concerto; a suite in G major by Bach; two movements of Lalo's concerto, and short pieces and transcrptions of Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Liszt, and Chopin. No resident violoncellist is more deserving than he. No resident German bore himself with more circumspection through trying

NOVELTIES PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Harold Bauer, Soloist, Gives Beethoven's 5th Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Two compositions were heard fo the first time in Boston at the conce of the Boston Symphony Orchestr Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterda afternoon in Symphony Hall: the o chestral prelude to Faure's oper "Penelope," and Edward Burligam Hill's "Stevensonia," consisting of fou pieces for orchestra after Robert Lou Stevenson's "A Child's Garden Verses."

Harold Bauer, pianist, played Bee hoven's fifth concerto for piano a orchestra, and the movement known "Grand Fete at Capulet's House" fro Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Rom and Juliet," brought the concert to end.

eft to Right—Jacques Thibaud, Violinist, Symphony Hall Thursday A

BAUER IN BEETHOVEN

The performances of Beethoven music and the music of Berlioz we of memorable brilliancy and impressiv ness. We find it hard to think so hig ly of Beethoven's fifth concerto as w do of his fourth, despite the eviden grandeur of the thought and the heroic and beautiful quality of the music of the former work, heard yesterday. But Mr. Bauer brought home the essential character of the fifth concerto as very few pianists have who appeared at the Symphony concerts in recent years. In this he was admirably assisted by Mr. Rabaud. The romantic spirit in which the pianist interpreted the noble introduction would not have been felt as it was, had the orchestral rejoinders been less significant.

The towering structure of the opening movement has seemed overlong and overcrowded with detail in the hands of other conductors. Nor has there been, within memory, such a beautiful balance of piano and orchestra and so intimate an appreciation on the part of the pianist of the subtle colors with which Beethoven often enhances his music in this concerto. The concerto of Beethoven, which some had feared was aging, had again its mysterious potency, its Promethean fire. So, too, with the slow movement.

The finale is undoubtedly the weak movement of the work, as is also the case with the violin concerto. But it was superbly played and Mr. Bauer was recalled with great enthusiasm. He is indeed a consummate artist, one of the most individual and distinguished of piantistic interpreters.

Berlioz's Music

Still more astonishing, because the secrets of the music were known to fewer people, was the thrilling performance of the music of Berlioz. The love-music, for once, had all the sensuous and the poetic beauty which the composer intended—the longing of Romeo in the silence of the garden. The distant echo of the ball, the feverish brilliancy of the dance music as the desperate lover is supposed to enter the hall of his enemies, and the tragic instrumental commentary heard through the sounds of festival thrilled one as Berlioz alone, among all the romanticists, seems capable of thrilling an audience today—provided you have so sympathetic and masterly an interpreter as Mr. Rabaud. If Berlioz had had no such exquisite ideas as the love-theme played at first by solo wind instruments, if his music had all and more than the defects attributed to it by the composer's detractors, he would live and grip his hearers as a Temperament—a temperament of such volcanic power and vitality that it would have made itself felt in any period, in any medium of expression. As author, artist, sculptor, dramatist, he would have become the torchlight of an epoch, a commanding figure among the bravest and strongest spirits of the human race. He impressed his image distinctly, gigantically, unforgettably on his art. And yesterday, thanks to the wonderful conducting of Mr. Rabaud, we heard Berlioz, his own compelling voice, and not a sandpapered echo of him.

Faure's prelude to Penelope, has, perhaps, classic feeling. In it the hearer might fancy the winds that took Ulysses on his way, and the longing of the faithful spouse for the return of her hero. For us the music is polished, but lifeless.

Mr. Hill's Pieces

Mr. Hill's music was received with great and evident enthusiasm. It is ingeniously scored, fanciful, and always in good taste, so far as harmony, tonal combination and workmanship are concerned, Regarding this music we are on the fence. At a first hearing we liked best the Scherzo and the final number, "The Unseen Playmate." The lullaby seems sophisticated. The march has humor, but it has this quality in common with other of the four pieces; it seems a very big affair for so modest a subject. In this age of gigantic occurences the sounds of an enormous modern orchestra may be a composer's natural manner of speech, even when he is thinking of child fantasies, but it is hard to reconcile

...ibary capacity audi...

Jacques Thibaud, Week's Soloist at Symphony Concerts

At the Boston Symphony concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday, Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, will be the soloist for the first time at these concerts, playing Saint-Saens' B-minor concerto.

Mr Rabaud will pay his respects to the younger Italian generation in "The Pauses of Silence," by Malipiero, a composer whose works have created considerable interest abroad. The piece to be played is called "Seven Symphonic Expressions," which Malipiero has inscribed as follows: "Shudders, songs, cries, laments breaking the monotonous, silent passing of time. . ."

At the head of the program stands Mozart's Symphony in D-major (Kochel 504), and for the closing piece Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

Conspicuous, perhaps foremost, among the younger and "freer" composers of Italy is Franceso Malipiero. He was born in Venice in 1882. He studied under Bossi, and later under Max Bruch. To his credit are several operas, symphonic and chamber music. Familiar in Europe among his works is "Armenia" (Armenian songs translated symphonically), which has been performed at the Lamoureaux concerts, at La Scala and in London. Toscanini conducted "Le Pause del Silenzio" at the Augusteo in Rome in 1917—also "Impressions from the Real," a "Tragic Dithyramb." "The Pauses of Silence," scored for a variegated orchestra in bold style, was composed in 1917.

...Wiehawsky.

At the Boston Symphony co... the coming Friday and Satu... Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, will be the soloist for the first time at these concerts, playing Saint-Saens' B minor concerto.

Mr. Rabaud will pay his respects to the younger Italian generation in "The Pauses of Silence," by Malipiero, a composer whose works have created considerable interest abroad. The piece to be played is called "Seven Symphonic Expressions," which Malipiero has inscribed as follows: "Shudders, songs, cries, laments, breaking the monotonous, silent passing of time."

G. Francesco Malipiero was born in Venice in 1882. He studied with Enrico Bossi at the Marcello Lyceum of Venice and later became a pupil of Max Bruch. He is author of four dramas, several large "symphonic operas" and considerable chamber music, and is one of the best known among the young composers of the modern Italian school. These works by Malipiero have been given at the Augusteo in Rome: "Impressioni dal Vero" ("Impressions from the Real"), "Ditirambo Tragico" (1917), "Armenia" (1917) (Armenian songs translated symphonically), given at the Lamoureux concerts, at the Scala and in London, and "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence"), given in 1917 at the Augusteo by Toscanini—"Seven Symphonic Expressions"—"shudders, songs, cries, laments, breaking the monotonous, silent passing of time."

At the head of the programme stands Mozart's symphony in D major (Kochel 504), and for the closing piece, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa."

Rosa Raisa, the dramatic soprano of Chicago Opera Company, whose im...

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

119

Symphony Orchestra a Boston Art Treasure

THE chief art treasure of Boston, like that of Rheims, was under heavy fire during the war. Rheims decided to leave its art treasure—the famous cathedral, now in ruins, as a monument to the awfulness of aggressive and unlawful warfare. Boston decided to do a different but equally impressive thing by demonstrating conclusively that its art could be independent of Teutonic influence.

For the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose for its conductor a Frenchman—Henri Rabaud, well known in this country as a musician and composer. Both Rheims and Boston decided wisely in their own way.

The Boston Orchestra to-day comprises 90 musicians—a considerable increase over its membership of 70 in 1881, when it was first organized. The increase in numbers is partly due to natural growth, and also in part to the demands of modern music which requires a greater variety of flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassoons, a larger number of trumpets, trombones, and horns, and more kinds of instruments of percussion.

For many years Boston was thought of as the musical centre of this country. The city showed an early interest in symphony concerts. In 1841, Beethoven's First and Fifth Symphonies were first heard in Boston, performed by the Academy of Music Orchestra with not more than 40 players. This organization gave a few concerts for seven winters and was succeeded (according to "Notes on Music in Old Boston," by W. A. Fisher), by the Musical Fund Society which for eight seasons gave orchestral concerts in the old Tremont Temple until 1855. A travelling orchestra, called the Germania Orchestra, visited Boston frequently during that time and led indirectly to the formation of the Philharmonic Orchestra which was succeeded by the Harvard Musical Association. This latter organization maintained symphony concerts of a high standard for about 17 years. The most important symphony concerts at his time, however, were those by the visiting Thomas Orchestra which held a very important part in the early musical life of America.

In 1881 the Boston Symphony Orchestra was organized under Georg Henschel. The first concert was given in the Old Music Hall Oct. 22, of that year. Mr Henschel remained in Boston for three seasons, when he returned to London, which he then made his home. There he established the London Symphony concerts which were an important feature in the musical life of that city for 11 years.

With the marked exception of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is in Boston to-day little to remind one of the golden age of music in that city, except for the Handel and Haydn Society, which is conducted by Emil Mollenhauer (who was a member of the violin section of the Boston Symphony, 1884 to 1889) and the Cecilia Society, conducted by George Longy, who has been the distinguished first oboe of the Orchestra since 1898. Mr. Longy is also at the head of the club which bears his name and which, like so many other organizations, was the direct outgrowth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One of these organizations was the Kneisel Quartet, brought into existence and made famous through the efforts of Franz Kneisel, who was the concert master of the Boston Symphony for 18 years. Possibly the most famous ex-member of the orchestra is Charles Martin Loeffler, for more than 20 years at the first desk of the first violins, and whose reputation as a composer is universally known.

In the 38 years of the existence of this organization there are nine men whose membership exceeds 30 years, 31 whose membership exceeds 25 years, and more than 45 whose membership exceeds 20 years. Some of these men, notably Mr. Lenom, oboe, also an instructor at the New England Conservatory of Music, Fred Mann, Otto Roth, K. Rissland and G. Theodorowicz, four first violins, are still members of the orchestra.

J. Adamowski, who played in the cello section of the orchestra for 17 years, and Timothee Adamowski, violinist in the orchestra for 22 years, are now both connected with the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music. They, with Madame Szumowska, constitute the Adamowski Trio. Max Zach, from 1886 to 1907, viola of the Boston Symphony, has for several years been the conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Strube, who played the violin for 23 years with the Boston Symphony, is an instructor in the Peabody Institute of Baltimore, where he has organized the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which gives a series of Sunday concerts in that city.

Within the orchestra there always have been and still are many groups that have joined together for the performance of special chamber music, among them the Hoffman Quartet, the Malkin Trio, Mr. Brooke's orchestra of 10 pieces.

Ordinarily a change of membership as great as that made necessary at the beginning of this season would have been a problem fraught with great difficulty. The presence in this country, however, of the French Military Band, under Capt. Pares, and the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris, under Mr. Messager, made available unusual artists from which to choose.

Frenchmen new to the orchestra this year include F. Thillois, leader of the second violins. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatory and saw service in the war. He was formerly a member of the Colinne and Lamoureux Orchestras. Georges Laurent, first flute, won the first prize of the Conservatory in 1905 and recently toured this country under Mr. Messager. Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn, is a splendid addition to one of the most famous wood-wind sections of the orchestra. Mr. Mager, who plays the viola, is also a first prize man and saw active service in the war. He is especially versatile. When the French Military Band appeared at the Pop Concerts in Boston last summer, Mr. Mager, as a member of that band sang very acceptably a baritone solo. G. Miquelle, distinguished 'cellist, is another acquisition. He is also a Conservatory graduate and a veteran of the war.

Other Frenchmen new to the orchestra and no less distinguished are J. Adam, first trombone; Abdon Laus, first bassoon; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet.

The new members of the orchestra this season include Frederic Fradgin, the first American to be the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. He is also the youngest man to hold this post since Franz Kneisel.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
MAR 20

SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA THIS EVENING

Reinald Werrenrath

At his appearance at the last local concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight, Reinald Werrenrath, the American barytone, will sing two big operatic arias, one from Mozart's "Figaro" and the other from Massanet's "Herodiade."

Mr. Werrenrath was engaged for the concert to take the place of Melba, who was forced to cancel her engagement.

M. Rabaud, director of the orchestra, will present Saint-Saens' Second Symphony and Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, as the principal orchestral numbers. The Concerto will be played by prominent virtuosi of the orchestra.

Other numbers on the program are Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes" and the Overture to Weber's "Freischutz."

Last night the brass choir of the orchestra gave a concert at the Metropolitan Club at Lehmann Hall with Messrs. Jaenike and Heim as soloists.

EVENING
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 18 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

Gives Fifth and Last Concert of the Year Here With Reinald Werrenrath as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and concluding concert of the season in Philadelphia last evening and presented a program which, except for the majestic Coriolanus Overture of Beethoven, savored strongly of a post-season "Pop."

The Saint-Saens Symphony in A minor No. 2 (actually the fourth) was the principal number. The work is really not a symphony at all, so markedly does it depart from sonata form in the omission of the second theme from the third part of the first movement, the ending of the Scherzo with the trio in the third and in many other details, to say nothing of the lack of real symphonic feeling throughout the whole composition. It is more like a suite or a "miniature" symphony (if there be such a thing) and the third and last movements are strongly suggestive in melody and in spirit of the light opera stage. It was well played, and probably on account of the abundance of light but pleasing melody seemed to give much pleasure to the audience.

The other orchestra numbers were a descriptive symphony, "Royal Hunt and Tempest," from "Les Troyens," of Berlioz, a work of no especial value musically, except in so far as it showed the marvelous orchestral technique of the composer and "Sadko," an early composition of Rimsky-Korsakoff, described in the program notes as a "Musical Picture." This was a long and, it must be said, uninteresting composition, evidently written too early in the composer's musical life to show him at his best, either melodically or in the sensitive orchestral feeling which he developed later. The well-known overture in Lalo, "Le Roi d'Ys," closed the concert and next to the Beethoven Overture was the most interesting work played.

The orchestra played as it has done all season, unevenly. There were places where its work was all that could be desired and others where the attack and the rhythm were uncertain and wavering, and where the players seemed to be in some doubt as to just what the conductor wanted. The tone quality was good, very fine in places, especially in the Coriolanus Overture, and the tonal balance was better than at the last concert, although there were some spots where the accompaniment overpowered the solo voice.

Reinald Werrenrath was the soloist, taking the place of Madame Melba at the last moment, and he covered himself with glory. He sang the recitative and aria "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and the "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade." In both styles of singing he was equally at ease and gave the numbers not only with fine vocal, but also with fine dramatic effect. His fine voice is equally good in all registers, and colorful throughout, and with his pleasing stage presence and demeanor won him the success with the audience that his excellent performance deserved.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

The final orchestral concert of the season for Washington was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Henri Rabaud, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The capacity audience, that has been the rule for all orchestral concerts this year, seems to disprove for all time that Washington is unappreciative of the best in music.

The program held orchestral works of Franck, Saint-Saens and Rimsky-Karsakoff. Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, took the place of Mme. Melba, who had been called to Europe, and sang parallel selections to those programmed for her, giving a Mozart recitative and aria and a French selection with orchestra.

M. Rabaud displayed the same vital spirit in his conducting; his beat is alive, crisp, clean-cut and decisive; but he draws no rhythmic lure or sinuous appeal from his players, nor is his dramatic and emotianal imagery manifest. This was particularly striking in the "Schererazade" symphonic poem of Rimsky-Korsakoff. It was delineated with admirable detail, [illegible] playing with beauty and brilliancy, but this is a stirring drama of mad abandon, of impassioned love, of real terror in the second part in the midst of the great love scene, and it was all pale in emotion.

The finale alone rose to its full scenic scope. The crosswise themes were depicted graphically; it was alive and admirably wrought, full of orchestral color, and presented some very lovely violin playing by Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster.

Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" was truly notable in the playing of the strings, while a real coquetry pervaded the lyric episodes that were like quaint and whimsical dialogues and scenes against the graceful whirr of the strings. A lovely melody marked the Franck symphonic piece from "La Redemption," the rich orchestration being particularly emphasized in the martial presto. But the cellos seemed heavy, and the winds not free in a significant episode for them. It developed somewhat tediously, but was brought to a forceful finale.

Reinald Werrenrath sings with excellent style and interpretation. One feels in him the "intime" artist rather than a singer for orchestra. He delivered the Mozart "Tutto e disposto" and "Aprite un po quegl' occhi" from the "Marriage of Figaro" quite in the spirit of this [illegible] his voice seemed [illegible]

From HERALD
Address Washington, D. C.
MAR 19 1919

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Reinald Werrenrath, Baritone, Substitutes for Mme. Melba; Program Pleases.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon before a capacity audience. On account of the illness of a relative Mme. Melba was unable to appear as soloist, but in her stead Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, was the soloist.

The program opened with Franck's symphonic piece, from the symphonic poem, "La Redemption," the noble music of which was in decided contrast to the following orchestra number of Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." This descriptive bit of music is a study in tone painting and was rendered with fine feeling and delicacy.

Mr. Werrenrath sang two numbers, recitative, "Tutto e disposto," aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," by Mozart, and Massenet's air, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade." Mr. Werrenrath has a splendid baritone voice with great beauty of tone, but frequently failed to sing above the orchestra.

The last number, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," is a vivid picture in four themes, based on the life of the Sultana Scheherazade. These four themes are divided as follows: "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship." "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and "The Festival at Bagdad." The Sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock. Conclusion.

While the first two movements were read well they lacked fire and dramatic accent. the third and fourth movements, however, reached exquisite climaxes and before the end of this suite the whole orchestra responded to Mr. Babaud's efforts to make it animate, so that probably it was as good as could be given.

Brooklyn Life, March 29, '19.

Wounded Soldiers Entertained at Lunch Club.

On Monday of this week about twenty-five wounded soldiers from General Hospital No. 1 were the guests of Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie at the Business Women's Luncheon Club, 187 Schermerhorn Street, after the Brooklyn parade. The men, who were all members of the 106th Infantry of the Twenty-seventh Division, rode in the parade on top of a Fifth Avenue bus which was ornamented with a placard advertising the Gala Concert which is to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, April eighth, for the benefit of the Vacation Association. The club at 187 Schermerhorn Street is the Brooklyn headquarters of the Vacation Association. Mrs. Zabriskie, who bought the house on Schermerhorn Street and had it remodeled for use as a clubhouse for working women, is chairman of the Vacation Association which is arranging the concert for April eighth, when Geraldine Farrar will sing, the Philadelphia Orchestra will play, and Rachmaninoff, the composer-pianist, will be a soloist. The wounded boys were treated to a hearty, home-cooked luncheon on Monday and were served by Mrs. Herbert Scoville, a daughter of Mrs. Zabriskie, Mrs. James Shaw of Manhattan, Miss Eugenie B. Zaiss and Sergeant Helen McCaldin Getty of the Motor Corps of the Atlantic Division of the Red Cross, wife of Major Lorenzo Todd Getty, who is still overseas.

The "Boston Symphony" Says Au Revoir.

Life would not quite seem like life in Brooklyn without the five visits annually of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They take the place of social, as well as musical, functions of the Philharmonics in the old Academy of Music in Montague Street in the days of Theodore Thomas and, although the famous Boston organization is only one of several orchestras which come to Brooklyn with more or less frequency, it is quite distinct in the matter of its hold upon the public. That hold has been lessened by the circumstances of war, as a few empty seats where once there was a waiting list have borne witness this season, but, no doubt, time will restore the former happy condition. Certainly it ought to, for the "Boston Symphony" has straightened itself out. At the beginning of the season the organization was necessarily weakened by the de-Teutonizing process which had taken place, but time and Henri Rabaud eventually brought it back to form and at the final performance of the season at the Academy of Music, last week, Friday evening, none but the keenest musical observers could distinguish the orchestra of today from that of yesterday. From the house program it appeared that Rabaud was going to follow the route of a part of the German army in its retreat by beginning in France with the Saint-Saëns symphony in C minor, proceeding to Belgium with the symphonic piece from Franck's "La Rédemption," and then marching into the land of the arch-enemy with Bach's concerto No. 2 in F minor for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz." But the analytical program showed that the course was over into Russia, with "Sadko," the Rimsky-Korsakoff tone picture. It was a noble program in character and nobly played. There are decided differences of opinion as to the merits of the Saint-Saëns symphony, but it is a fine work—with an uncommonly good organ part. The Bach number, although with rather too much orchestra for the effect intended, was impressive and "Sadko" was a revelation to many who had not heard this enchanting music when the Ballet Russe gave this tone poem a terpsichorean setting. And the time-honored overture to "Der Freischuetz" again made one wish that this opera could be heard here oftener.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Symphony Orchestra a Boston Art Treasure

THE chief art treasure of Boston, like that of Rheims, was under heavy fire during the war. Rheims decided to leave its art treasure—the famous cathedral, now in ruins, as a monument to the awfulness of aggressive and unlawful warfare. Boston decided to do a different but equally impressive thing by demonstrating conclusively that its art could be independent of Teutonic influence.

For the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose for its conductor a Frenchman—Henri Rabaud, well known in this country as a musician and composer. Both Rheims and Boston decided wisely in their own way.

The Boston Orchestra to-day comprises 102 musicians—a considerable increase over its membership of 70 in 1881, when it was first organized. The increase in numbers is partly due to natural growth, and also in part to the demands of modern music which requires a greater variety of flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassoons, a larger number of trumpets, trombones, and horns, and more kinds of instruments of percussion.

For many years Boston was thought of as the musical centre of this country. The city showed an early interest in symphony concerts. In 1841, Beethoven's First and Fifth Symphonies were first heard in Boston, performed by the Academy of Music Orchestra with not more than 40 players. This organization gave a few concerts for seven winters and was succeeded (according to "Notes on Music in Old Boston," by W. A. Fisher), by the Musical Fund Society which for eight seasons gave orchestral concerts in the old Tremont Temple until 1855. A travelling orchestra, called the Germania Orchestra, visited Boston frequently during that time and led indirectly to the formation of the Philharmonic Orchestra which was succeeded by the Harvard Musical Association. This latter organization maintained symphony concerts of a high standard for about 17 years. The most important symphony concerts at his time, however, were those by the visiting Thomas Orchestra which held a very important part in the early musical life of America.

In 1881 the Boston Symphony Orchestra was organized under Georg Henschel. The first concert was given in the Old Music Hall Oct. 22, of that year. Mr. Henschel remained in Boston for three seasons, when he returned to London, which he then made his home. There he established the London Symphony concerts which were an important feature in the musical life of that city for 11 years.

With the marked exception of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is in Boston to-day little to remind one of the golden age of music in that city, except for the Handel and Haydn Society, which is conducted by Emil Mollenhauer (who was a member of the violin section of the Boston Symphony, 1884 to 1889) and the Cecilia Society, conducted by George Longy, who has been the distinguished first oboe of the Orchestra since 1898. Mr. Longy is also at the head of the club which bears his name and which, like so many other organizations, was the direct outgrowth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One of these organizations was the Kneisel Quartet, brought into existence and made famous through the efforts of Franz Kneisel, who was the concert master of the Boston Symphony for 18 years. Possibly the most famous ex-member of the orchestra is Charles Martin Loeffler, for more than 20 years at the first desk of the first violins, and whose reputation as a composer is universally known.

In the 38 years of the existence of this organization there are nine men whose membership exceeds 30 years, 31 whose membership exceeds 25 years, and more than 45 whose membership exceeds 20 years. Some of these men, notably Mr. Lenom, oboe, also an instructor at the New England Conservatory of Music, Fred Mann, Otto Roth, K. Rissland and G. Theodorowicz, four first violins, are still members of the orchestra.

J. Adamowski, who played in the cello section of the orchestra for 17 years, and Timothee Adamowski, violinist in the orchestra for 22 years, are now both connected with the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music. They, with Madame Szumowska, constitute the Adamowski Trio. Max Zach, from 1886 to 1907, viola of the Boston Symphony, has for several years been the conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Strube, who played the violin for 23 years with the Boston Symphony, is an instructor in the Peabody Institute of Baltimore, where he has organized the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which gives a series of Sunday concerts in that city.

Within the orchestra there always have been and still are many groups that have joined together for the performance of special chamber music, among them the Hoffman Quartet, the Malkin Trio, Mr. Brooke's orchestra of 10 pieces.

Ordinarily a change of membership as great as that made necessary at the beginning of this season would have been a problem fraught with great difficulty. The presence in this country, however, of the French Military Band, under Capt. Pares, and the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris, under Mr. Messager, made available unusual artists from which to choose.

Frenchmen new to the orchestra this year include F. Thillois, leader of the second violins. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatory and saw service in the war. He was formerly a member of the Colinne and Lamoureux Orchestras. Georges Laurent, first flute, won the first prize of the Conservatory in 1905 and recently toured this country under Mr. Messager. Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn, is a splendid addition to one of the most famous wood-wind sections of the orchestra. Mr. Mager, who plays the viola, is also a first prize man and saw active service in the war. He is especially versatile. When the French Military Band appeared at the Pop Concerts in Boston last summer, Mr. Mager, as a member of that band sang very acceptably a baritone solo. G. Miquelle, distinguished cellist, is another acquisition. He is also a Conservatory graduate and a veteran of the war.

Other Frenchmen new to the orchestra and no less distinguished are J. Adam, first trombone; Abdon Laus, first bassoon; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet.

The new members of the orchestra this season include Frederic Fradgin, the first American to be the concert-master of the Boston Symphony. He is also the youngest man to hold this post since Franz Kneisel.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.

SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA THIS EVENING

Reinald Werrenrath

At his appearance at the last local concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight, Reinald Werrenrath, the American baritone, will sing two big operatic arias, one from Mozart's "Figaro" and the other from Massanet's "Herodiade."

Mr. Werrenrath was engaged for the concert to take the place of Melba, who was forced to cancel her engagement.

M. Rabaud, director of the orchestra, will present Saint-Saens' Second Symphony and Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, as the principal orchestral numbers. The Concerto will be played by prominent virtuosi of the orchestra.

Other numbers on the program are Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes" and the Overture to Weber's "Freischutz."

Last night the brass choir of the orchestra gave a concert at the Metropolitan Club at Lehmann Hall with Messrs. Jaenike and Heim as soloists.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

Gives Fifth and Last Concert of the Year Here With Reinald Werrenrath as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and concluding concert of the season in Philadelphia last evening and presented a program which, except for the majestic Coriolanus Overture of Beethoven, savored strongly of a post-season "Pop."

The Saint-Saens Symphony in A minor No. 2 (actually the fourth) was the principal number. The work is really not a symphony at all, so markedly does it depart from sonata form in the omission of the second theme from the third part of the first movement, the ending of the Scherzo with the trio in the third and in many other details, to say nothing of the lack of real symphonic feeling throughout the whole composition. It is more like a suite or a "miniature" symphony (if there be such a thing) and the third and last movements are strongly suggestive in melody and in spirit of the light opera stage. It was well played, and probably on account of the abundance of light but pleasing melody seemed to give much pleasure to the audience.

The other orchestra numbers were a descriptive symphony, "Royal Hunt and Tempest," from "Les Troyens," of Berlioz, a work of no especial value musically, except in so far as it showed the marvelous orchestral technique of the composer and "Sadko," an early composition of Rimsky-Korsakoff, described in the program notes as a "Musical Picture." This was a long and, it must be said, uninteresting composition, evidently written too early in the composer's musical life to show him at his best, either melodically or in the sensitive orchestral feeling which he developed later. The well-known overture in Lalo, "Le Roi d'Ys," closed the concert and next to the Beethoven Overture was the most interesting work played.

The orchestra played as it has done all season, unevenly. There were places where its work was all that could be desired and others where the attack and the rhythm were uncertain and wavering, and where the players seemed to be in some doubt as to just what the conductor wanted. The tone quality was good, very fine in places, especially in the Coriolanus Overture, and the tonal balance was better than at the last concert, although there were some spots where the accompaniment overpowered the solo voice.

Reinald Werrenrath was the soloist, taking the place of Madame Melba at the last moment, and he covered himself with glory. He sang the recitative and aria "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and the "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade." In both styles of singing he was equally at ease and gave the numbers not only with fine vocal, but also with fine dramatic effect. His fine voice is equally good in all registers, and colorful throughout, and with his pleasing stage presence and demeanor won him the success with the audience that his excellent performance deserved.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

The final orchestral concert of the season for Washington was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Henri Rabaud, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The capacity audience, that has been the rule for all orchestral concerts this year, seems to disprove for all time that Washington is unappreciative of the best in music.

The program held orchestral works of Franck, Saint-Saens and Rimsky-Karsakoff. Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, took the place of Mme. Melba, who had been called to Europe, and sang parallel selections to those programmed for her, giving a Mozart recitative and aria and a French selection with orchestra.

M. Rabaud displayed the same vital spirit in his conducting; his beat is alive, crisp, clean-cut and decisive; but he draws no rhythmic lure or sinuous appeal from his players, nor is his dramatic and emotianal imagery manifest. This was particularly striking in the "Scherezade" symphonic suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff. It was delineated with admirable detail, [illegible] with beauty and brilliancy, but this is a stirring drama of mad abandon, of impassioned love, of real terror in the second part in the midst of the great love scene, and it was all pale in emotion.

The finale alone rose to its full scenic scope. The crosswise themes were depicted graphically; it was alive and admirably wrought, full of orchestral color, and presented some very lovely violin playing by Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster.

Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" was truly notable in the playing of the strings, while a real coquetry pervaded the lyric episodes that were like quaint and whimsical dialogues and scenes against the graceful whirr of the strings. A lovely melody marked the Franck symphonic piece from "La Redemption," the rich orchestration being particularly emphasized in the martial presto. But the cellos seemed heavy, and the winds not free in a significant episode for them. It developed somewhat tediously, but was brought to a forceful finale.

Reinald Werrenrath sings with excellent style and interpretation. One feels in him the "intime" artist rather than a singer for orchestra. He delivered the Mozart "Tutto e disposto" and "Aprite un po quegl 'occhi" from the "Marriage of Figaro" quite in the spirit of this music, but his voice seemed muffled [illegible] reach beyond [illegible]

From HERALD
Address Washington, D. C.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Reinald Werrenrath, Baritone, Substitutes for Mme. Melba; Program Pleases.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon before a capacity audience. On account of the illness of a relative Mme. Melba was unable to appear as soloist, but in her stead Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, was the soloist.

The program opened with Franck's symphonic piece, from the symphonic poem, "La Redemption," the noble music of which was in decided contrast to the following orchestra number of Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." This descriptive bit of music is a study in tone painting and was rendered with fine feeling and delicacy.

Mr. Werrenrath sang two numbers, recitative, "Tutto e disposto," aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," by Mozart, and Massenet's air, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade." Mr. Werrenrath has a splendid baritone voice with great beauty of tone, but frequently failed to sing above the orchestra.

The last number, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," is a vivid picture in four themes, based on the life of the Sultana Scheherazade. These four themes are divided as follows: "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship." "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and "The Festival at Bagdad." The Sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock. Conclusion.

While the first two movements were read well they lacked fire and dramatic accent, the third and fourth movements, however, reached exquisite climaxes and before the end of this suite the whole orchestra responded to Mr. Babaud's efforts to make it animate, so that probably it was as good as could be given.

Brooklyn Life, March 29, '19

Wounded Soldiers Entertained at Lunch Club.

On Monday of this week about twenty-five wounded soldiers from General Hospital No. 1 were the guests of Mrs. Cornelius Zabriskie at the Business Women's Luncheon Club, 187 Schermerhorn Street, after the Brooklyn parade. The men, who were all members of the 106th Infantry of the Twenty-seventh Division, [illegible] made on Monday in a Fifth Avenue bus which was ornamented with a placard advertising the Gala Concert which is to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, April eighth, for the benefit of the Vacation Association. The club at 187 Schermerhorn Street is the Brooklyn headquarters of the Vacation Association. Mrs. Zabriskie, who bought the house on Schermerhorn Street and had it remodeled for use as a clubhouse for working women, is chairman of the Vacation Association which is arranging the concert for April eighth, when Geraldine Farrar will sing, the Philadelphia Orchestra will play, and Rachmaninoff, the composer-pianist, will be a soloist. The wounded boys were treated to a hearty, home-cooked luncheon on Monday and were served by Mrs. Herbert Scoville, a daughter of Mrs. Zabriskie, Mrs. James Shaw of Manhattan, Miss Eugenie B. Zaiss and Sergeant Helen McCaldin Getty of the Motor Corps of the Atlantic Division of the Red Cross, wife of Major Lorenzo Todd Getty, who is still overseas.

The "Boston Symphony" Says Au Revoir.

Life would not quite seem like life in Brooklyn without the five visits annually of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They take the place of social, as well as musical, functions of the Philharmonics in the old Academy of Music in Montague Street in the days of Theodore Thomas and, although the famous Boston organization is only one of several orchestras which come to Brooklyn with more or less frequency, it is quite distinct in the matter of its hold upon the public. That hold has been lessened by the circumstances of war, as a few empty seats where once there was a waiting list have been witness this season, but, no doubt, time will restore the former happy condition. Certainly it ought to, for the "Boston Symphony" has straightened itself out. At the beginning of the season the organization was necessarily weakened by the de-Teutonizing process which had taken place, but time and Henri Rabaud eventually brought it back to form and at the final performance of the season at the Academy of Music last week, Friday evening, none but the keenest musical observers could distinguish the orchestra of today from that of yesterday. From the house program it appeared that Rabaud was going to follow the route of a part of the German army in its retreat by beginning in France with the Saint-Saëns symphony in C minor, proceeding to Belgium with the symphonic piece from Franck's "La Rédemption," and then marching into the land of the arch-enemy with Bach's concerto No. 2 in F minor for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz." But the analytical program showed that the course was over into Russia, with "Sadko," the Rimsky-Korsakoff tone picture. It was a noble program in character and nobly played. There are decided differences of opinion as to the merits of the Saint-Saëns symphony, but it is a fine work—with an uncommonly good organ part. The Bach number, although with rather too much orchestra for the effect intended, was impressive and "Sadko" was a revelation to many who had not heard this enchanting music when the Ballet Russe gave this tone poem a terpsichorean setting. And the time-honored overture to "Der Freischuetz" again made one wish that this opera could be heard here oftener.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 3,

"Out of "New Italy" Comes Novel Music

Background and Foreground to Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," to Be Played for the First Time in America at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

IN these days of government by slogan, it must be a sign of the eternal perversity of the artistic mind that many of the ill-considered commonplaces of musical criticism which have done duty—and more than duty!—for a generation or two are being dragged into daylight and there subjected to severe reëxamination. Two or three years ago the man in the street who cared about musical matters at all would have no more thought of doubting the general notion that Italian musicians have no interest or talent for instrumental music than of doubting today that the earth is round, or five centuries ago that it was flat, or five years ago that the French cannot fight, or that Bostonians are all acute Anglomaniacs, or that the millenium is around the corner of the next decade, waiting in sorrowful patience, but ultimate confidence, for the enactment of certain critical legislation by the Congress.

It is true that the symphonic talent of Sgambati has been recognized, probably quite as enthusiastically as it ever will deserve, and that a few Americans who have happened to be in the right place at the right time have realized that in the now elderly Scontrino there abide a wealth of ideas and the power to express them which merit still wider recognition. It has long been suspected, also, that the apparent instrumental silence of Italy might not be wholly independent of a publishing monopoly which has made its successes with operatic works of high rank the excuse for encouraging the composition of inferior operas by printing them and then foisting them upon a bored public as a contractual condition of releasing the superior pieces. That exemplary "house" has confined its orchestral activities chiefly to the publication of luxurious editions of Beethoven in which the viola parts are printed in the treble and bass clefs instead of the viola (alto) clef, so that they may be "easy to read." For two long the drift of American musical curiosity has been to the Northeast, with Paris as a starting point; and it has required the happy conjunction of a world war and Mr. Hugo Ara to awaken our musical public to the notion that Italy has not exclusively confined itself, as Mark Twain once put it, to "the lighter arts of operatic singing, organ-grinding, and assassination."

"New Italy"

There is an excellent reason why Americans are not informed of the national growth of Italy in general, and of its artistic expressions in particular—there has been no propaganda. A tradition of opera has existed since a day when Italy had less to be proud of in this field than it has now; Verdi, Puccini, and the more deserving of the lesser men had only to present their works before a fully prepared public which heard, enjoyed, was ready for more, and asked no questions. A waning musical faith in the infallibility and all-sufficiency of Germany was galvanized into a semblance of its old life by that educational, civic, and industrial propaganda which filled our universities with exchange professors, our journals with regretful and invidious comparisons between American and German efficiency in government and business, our legislatures with paternal socialism, and our metaphorical Little Marys with the east wind generally. England, with traditional ties of blood and real ties of language, has never been backward in advertising its genuine or fancied excellences. What home is complete without the Encyclopedia Britannica, and what more than locally informed person would take it without a considerable dash of salt? The French and the Russian composers, to say nothing of their literary leaders, have surely shown that they understand how little of what they lose by devotion to cliques is missed by the vast audiences that their aggressive actions and antics attract.

During all this period of our undoubted education by rival propaganda little has been heard of the "New Italy" movement outside of Italy itself, probably because it is wholly patriotic, wholly sincere, and rightly devoted to the upbuilding of a noble Italy by improvements at home, and not to the aggrandizement of a party in power by reckless exploitation and unscrupulous deception of outsiders. Beginning in the early seventies, when the principal nations of continental Europe were forced to commence a great era of reconstruction, Italy set about the task of unifying a people separated by centuries of adherence to the system of government by small States, with all the evils which that system entails. As compared with Germany, which faced a like problem at the same time, Italy possessed an ignorant and undisciplined population and corruption and pauperism seemed almost too firmly rooted ever to disappear. Yet, thanks to the moral soundness of the doctrine which Italy's leaders managed presently to evolve, the southern country has for long been committed to a policy of national development as liberally humanitarian as that of its rival has been brutally destructive. Thus the present moment finds Italy with more than a beginning of the fulfilment of its aims realized, to its eternal credit, while a nation which in 1870 gave every promise of magnificent future has just had to be pushed to the verge of extermination in order to be tolerated at all.

Ideals and the Arts

What strikes the foreign visitor who stumbles upon the spirit back of the "New Italy" movement is the sterling loyalty of persons of high and low degree, the happy combination of an optimism which dares attempt anything with a level-headedness which forbids darting off at a tangent, and the astonishingly humanitarian quality of the aims sought and the methods used to attain them. Apparently all are sincere, and all energetic; nobody is lukewarm, and nobody has the spirit of the profiteer; everybody believes devoutly that there is no aim too high to be confidently striven for, yet nobody will listen to a quack; all agree to make Italy preeminent in the world, yet nobody covets another nation's good things, or desires to interfere in another nation's development or happiness.

Naturally so active and invigorating an idealism is bound to seek expression in the arts as surely as anything so flat and flabby as our "uplift" programme is bound to stifle even the first faint stirrings of artistic impulse. Thus there has appeared in Italy a group of artists, including a fair number of composers, who have ceased to cry for the moon but want the earth instead, and will probably in the end get their share of it. At present they are in the state "when a feller needs a friend," and such a friend they seem to have secured in Mr. Ara, not to mention certain critics in those countries which are shrewd enough to set the national energy to work hunting hidden talent instead of hidden sin. So much for background to the first music Boston is to hear from this "New Italy"—Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to be played at the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday.

The Man and the Work

In the London Musical Times for January, 1919, Mr. G. Jean-Aubry published an article concerning this Malipiero under the title, "A Great Artist." Mr. Jean-Aubry apparently feels that so outspoken a tribute needs explanation if not apology, so he begins by recalling to his readers how promptly and outspokenly he championed the several causes in turn of Debussy, Ravel, Sévérac, Roussel, Albeñiz, Falla and Stravinsky; and he sums up as follows: "Which were right, the detractors or myself? Let us proceed!" Let us, indeed.

According to Mr. Jean-Aubry, Malipiero was born at Venice in 1882. He received much of his musical instruction from Enrico Bossi, not unknown here as a composer, and he studied modern French and Russian scores as well as "the researches of the young Hungarian musicians"—possibly Bela Bartok, or the group which recognize Schönberg as guide, philosopher and friend. In his early days he wrote compositions which he now prefers to disavow; Mr. Jean-Aubry does not describe the traits of these pieces, but leaves it to be inferred that they are conventionally modern. A "Sinfonia del Silenzio e della Morte" (1910) is recognized by Mr. Jean-Aubry as a work in which Malipiero's individuality begins to stand out; but even this is rejected as "youthful" by the composer. This critic refers in appreciative terms to the following "mature" or nearly mature works: "Poemetti Lunari" (1910), the aforementioned symphony; "Canossa," a one-act tragedy; "Sogno di un Tramonto di Autonno," a tragic poem founded on one of d'Annunzio's lyrics; a number of songs including "Sonnets des Fées" (d'Annunzio), "Cinq Melodies," and "Keepsake" (all recent, the last 1918); piano pieces, including "Preludi Auttunnali," "Poemi Asiani" (1916), and "Barlumi" (recent); orchestral compositions, "Impressioni dal Vero" (two orchestral suites—the adjectival noun "Vero" is translated "Nature" by Mr. Jean-Aubry), a suite, "Armenia," and two compositions, "Pause del Silenzio" and "Ditirambo Tragico," which Mr. Jean-Aubry, writing in January of this year, says have not been performed; and two mimo-dramatic works, "Sette Canzoni" and "Pantea," both of which evidently are accompanied not only by orchestra, but by singers with text appropriate to the action.

Boston is to hear "Le Pause del Silenzio" at the Symphony Concerts of this week; I am indebted to Mr. Rabaud for the privilege of consulting the manuscript score. To one who has a limited knowledge of Italian, "Pause del Silenzio" may mean much or little more than the dictionary meaning of the words. If pauses in sound are silence, pauses in silence should be sound. Oracles, be they Delphic or local, "break silence" to give their profound ideas to the world, so why should composers be denied a like privilege? Malipiero's titles are often imaginatively vague, even mystical; the present example is merely a fanciful way of announcing that he is about to break his own silence; if he thereby imbues his music at the start with something of an oracular flavor, so much the better for the success of such magic as he may be found to possess. Lord Dunsany is not unaware of the value of this same trick. I find no affectation in the term, nor in the sub-title, "seven orchestral expressions." Rather I rejoice that Malipiero is guiltless of calling his little series (I don't dare refer to it as a suite) "preludes," "intermezzi," or, worse yet, "nocturnes!" At all events, the length of the "expressions" is not such as to give the lie to the name. There are no further titles; the composer prefers to arouse his hearers' curiosity with his general title, and leave the rest to the power of his music to stimulate their imaginations.

Analyses

The first "expression" opens with a readily remembered phrase for four horns in unison; this serves as a sort of motto for the series. Immediately afterward there are spread soft chords for strings, harp, and celesta, over which various woodwind instruments answer each other with little figures of a pastoral character. There is a change of rhythm, and considerable development, culminating in a single measure of chant-like moving chords for strings; then the little pastoral figures are worked over again with new and richer instrumentation. At the close a single muted horn recalls the motto.

The second, agitato, 3—4. A bassoon, the contrabassoon, and the contrabasses commence a running accompaniment figure; the horns enter with a counter-rhythm; then the violins are added to the rest. A snatch of dance music is tossed off by clarinet, English horn, and xylophone; the rest of the orchestra picks it up, and there is rough and savage treatment of this and other material. There is a return to the opening figures, and at the close the motto is again heard, this time in the oboes.

The third "expression" opens with repeated slow chords for strings and harp, in a steady, quiet pulsation. Again the woodwind instruments answer each other back and forth with short figures of a pastoral character. A broad melody is begun by the violins, and completed by other instruments; this is then developed and elaborated, with suggestions of changing keys. The quiet mood of the opening returns, but there is a more pronounced melancholy. The motto makes its reappearance at the end.

The fourth is again lively. Furious runs for strings and woodwind serve as background for a new dance figure, which is developed even more savagely than that of the second movement. After a greatly increased pace has led to a climax, the original tempo is restored; but this time heavily divided trills replace the furious runs of the opening. At the close a loud chord of brass is suddenly cut off, leaving a flute and an oboe, which have entered softly in a totally different key, to complete a reminiscence of the motto.

The fifth begins quietly with mysterious chords for low woodwind, five solo 'cellos, and a solo contrabass, recalling the manner of the chantlike passage for strings in the first movement. A slow rhythmic figure for horns is added, and there is a plaintive melody for oboe. In the middle portion there is more antiphonal calling back and forth among the various instruments; then the opening chords return. The usual reappearance of the motto is this time entrusted to three flutes.

The sixth opens with a martial tune for trumpets in G major, accompanied by a pair of horns in F sharp major; then the keys shift to A flat and G. New rhythmic elements are introduced, first by the trombones, then by the woodwind. Toward the end much is made of the alternation of soft brass chords with sforzando chords for strings and woodwind in altogether different keys. The motto is finally quoted by the trumpets.

The seventh "expression," which serves as emotional and formal climax of the set, opens with formidable crescendos of various sets of instruments, always so arranged that two unrelated chords are sounding simultaneously. An answer is afforded by modal progressions of chords for strings, harp and celesta, which are in keeping with two similar passages in previous movements, albeit not directly quoted from them. Two interruptions in the shape of upward rushes of the strings, the bass clarinet, and the harp lead to an "atmospheric" middle portion, after which the opening measures return and lead to a brilliant polyharmonic climax. The motto reappears in all four horns, as at the beginning of the set; the final chord is an unresolved suspension which melts into a silence the "pauses" of which are now over for the time being.

The foregoing is less an attempt at formal analysis than a bit of description to prepare the way for a hearing by pointing out how the composer presents his material. For formal analysis it is only necessary to take the wind out of the sails of the conservative by assuring them, 'pon honor, that the several movements are in three-part form. They are played without pause, so the unwary may find themselves in the position of the audience at Mr. Ornstein's concert a couple of seasons ago, when only the initiated knew at a certain moment whether the pianist had played all or only one of Schönberg's Six Short Pieces for Piano. As there are still people in the world, even in Boston, who ardently favor or oppose "generative" treatment in works of more than one movement, it may save bloodshed to point out that the motto is not only actually quoted in six of the seven movements, but that several motives are contrived so as to resemble others in harmony, rhythm, outline, or a combination of the three, and that this resemblance is manifestly intended by the composer.

Impression

As to the poetic content of the work, it eludes too close a verbal analysis, lying as much of the most representative modern music does in the fertile middle region between programme and abstract music. Mr. Rabaud is reminded of the vast, hot, hazy, and mysterious landscapes of the Campagna and Sicily, with their strange and vivid colors echoed in sound by snatches of tune from the pipes of unseen shepherds, though of course he absolves the composer of any intention specifically to paint these scenes. Whether the composer had such an intention or not, no son of Italy can fail to have been influenced by these landscapes, off the operatic stage at least. Imaginative sympathy with Nature there surely is in these little pieces, and along with it the kind of more personal response which characterizes the introspective poet of music, such as Debussy and, to a lesser degree, Chopin, not to mention Sibelius in his fourth symphony, which has pleased a fortunate few here in Boston. Malipiero, however, is not exclusively personal, but decidedly Italian as well, even to the expansive gesture, almost a swagger, which we either sympathize with or deplore, according to our prejudices, in Verdi, Puccini, Sgambati, Mascagni—but which kindles our blood whether or no. Also, there is plenty of the sparkle and self-confidence of youth in these little pieces. So we may expect them to delight many by their contagious enthusiasm, while they annoy some of those who are old men in years and of those who are old men by temperament. Matter-of-fact people are welcome to smile as they will; I find these seven "expressions" the embodiment in tones of the passing moods of an energetic and sanguine but sensitive and reflective young man, all of whose thought, even to his idle fancies, is colored by the pride, ambition, and spiritual absorption of such an ideal as the "New Italy" programme.

Means and Methods

For the present, of course, the man in the street is liable to be more impressed with the strangeness of Malipiero's style than with the force or the charm of his ideas. There is no doubting that he uses some very startling dissonances with no more apparent concern for his hearers' tender ears or doubly tender harmonic prejudices than you or I have for the theology of the Mumbo-Jumbo worshippers. The harried concert-goer who has been dragged from Strauss to Ravel and then on to Schönberg and Stravinsky with perhaps a little Ornstein between may even be pardoned for timidly inquiring "What next?" As to this, all strangeness is subject to the cure of familiarity; no work stands or falls by it. Malipiero is in abundant company—we shall all be poly-harmonists in a little while, if only to be conventional. The test will be whether any particular writer has ideas, and expresses them tellingly. For the present I confess to liking many of Malipiero's dissonant effects without in the slightest desiring to listen to them all the time, or even every week.

Of late orchestration has been so successfully cultivated by the profession at large that we have been in danger of being overrun by more experts who can score as well as Wagner than the trade can support. It is therefore a pleasure to find a man who knows some new effects in this field, especially as the effects in question differ from their immediate predecessors in the direction of simplicity. Malipiero's score is plentifully active; yet one is struck by the extreme scarcity of notes on any given page. Probably each instrument has more measures silent than active, except possibly some of the strings. In spite of this extreme economy of forces, there seems not to be a thin-sounding passage in the whole seven movements. A very sure hand has penned these pages, and the results seem not only certain, but effortless.

Malipiero's melodic ideas never lack profile, either in shape or in rhythm. On the other hand, in "The Pauses of Silence" they are mostly motives rather than complete melodies. He surely does not lack the power or the willingness to develop his themes; if he errs in this respect at all it is in a tendency to overwork little accented figures as "ostinato" material. Perhaps his motives have too strong a family resemblance; it is impossible to judge by a single work.

Most surprising trait of all is an extreme brevity; the entire set of "expressions" cannot take much over ten minutes to perform. Here Malipiero is keeping step with a number of the younger men; recall the brevity of Schönberg in his "later manner," of Stravinsky in his songs—to choose two examples at random. For better or for worse, we are about to see brevity as much overdone (or should I say underdone?) as length used to be; the coming men, instead of writing symphonies which take two or three evenings to perform, will prune and clip to the vanishing point. I still expect to see the day when the composer of a single sustained tone for, let us say, the French horn, beginning pianissimo, swelling out to forte (nothing so vulgar as fortissimo, of course), and dying away again to nothing, will be hailed by gushing audiences as the supreme master of the ages, only to sacrifice his championship in a brief space to a disciple with courage enough to compose an entire festival cycle consisting of a solitary double pianissimo tap on the snare drum. How the critics will praise his "reserve" and "economy of material!"

To Conclude

All this may seem a great deal of discussion upon and about a short piece of uncertain merits which is as likely as not destined to be forgotten by Sunday or next week at the latest. Very well; it is easy enough to grant that the "Le Pause del Silenzio" may not prove to be of any particular importance. On the other hand, Malipiero may, and the "New Italy" movement must. One can but wish well to any earnest attempt with so much enthusiasm and so many engaging qualities to commend it. Perhaps it will retain its present individuality and fulfil its high promise, perhaps it will only degenerate into stereotyped eccentricity—but it is only beginning; the end is not yet. The musical "New Italy" has paused in her silence; and, like the wedding guest who was stopped by the Ancient Mariner, we may beat our breasts, yet we cannot choose but hear.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 4,

That part of the Boston Symphony concert at Cambridge, last night, which followed the intermission was new to the season's concerts: Haydn's Violoncello Concerto, in D major, chosen and played by Mr. Joseph Malkin, the excellent virtuoso of the orchestra, a "Little Suite" by Roger-Ducasse in first performance at these concerts, and Beethoven's Overture to Egmont. The first section of the programme, comprised Saint-Säens's Second Symphony in A minor, and Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana," which sounded particularly well in Sanders' Theatre, and which deservedly was the occasion of much applause and acknowledgment.

The diminutive suite of Roger-Ducasse stands in the memory vividly for its six minutes. It has the French aptitude of treating a light, almost a popular, theme in a delicately flavored manner to gratify a fastidious palette. Our native composers have sometimes written in this view, but they have tried to be important and have been lengthy instead. They have missed Roger-Ducasse's gusto of brevity—the fleeting tingle of the here and gone (from all accounts the "French Suite" by the same composer has not this virtue). But the "Petite Suite" is cleverly orchestrated and clevery ordered. "Remembrance," with a song of strings and wood-winds, gives a foundation; "Smiling," which by theme is nothing more than the familiar parlor kind, adds sweetness, and "Trumpeting" ("Clannonneve"), using the full orchestra, of course, gives the piquant "kick." It is all over in a flip and a toss. For its neat serviceableness between two seniors numbers you could scarcely find a coounterpart.

120

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 5,

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM MOZART, THROUGH LISZT, TO MALIPIERO

Mr. Rabaud Freshens a Programme, and Does Both Well and Ill with It — His Eloquence with Liszt, His Stiff Prose with Mozart—Mr. Thibaud Shines with His Own Virtues, and Also Recalls Sarasate—The Italian's Novel and Penetrating Music

THE programme set for orchestra and audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon seemed like happy return to the more catholic and cosmopolitan days of the Symphony Concerts. Only one French piece, and that the "soloist's" concerto, stood upon it—as agreeable a sensation as a single German number used to be in the lists of other years. More than once in the past, the frequenter of the Symphony Concerts (unless he loves routine and has no curiosity about widely different musics) has been sated with German pieces. It is equally possible to be surfeited with French items and with them, as the musical year lengthens some ears and minds are nearing the point of saturation which, in the concert-hall, is also the point of ennui and indifference. It was a respite and pleasure, therefore, to hear an Italian symphonic piece—the first that Mr. Rabaud has put upon a programme in five months in Boston—and also a symphonic poem from Liszt, hitherto, like the other Czechs, an overlooked composer in the conductor's lists. The more widely these range, the better for the interest and the satisfaction of the concerts with open-minded hearers; while, of course, every one in the audiences of Friday and Saturday is, and has long been such. By natural inclination and acquired habit, Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck tended, in the progress of a season, to choose over-much German music. By like impulses Mr. Rabaud has tended to an excess of French items. In all three instances it is hard to believe (as extremists say) in deliberate and calculated propaganda. Each conductor probably followed instinct and custom as missioner for the music of his country, for the music in which he had been bred, in which he believed and with which he made his reputation.

Yet, in an idealistic view—the mode of the moment, is it not?—the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra should be missioner for nothing but the most interesting music that he can assemble, played in the ablest fashion that he can achieve. He should put by his own likings and dislikings; he should know no cults or exclusions or nationalities; he should do no favors, curb every prejudice, work with single mind and heart for the quality of his concerts alike in programme and performance. Then their prestige would be his prestige—a greater and more lasting glory than any other means and any other end might win. The repute of the Symphony Orchestra at home and abroad in these later years has been rooted in the catholicity of its programmes, in the cosmopolitan choice of its personnel according to ability and nothing else, in the breadth of view, actual or acquired, of its conductors. No doubt these are counsels of perfection, bearing hard upon many a human inclination and infirmity, but so far, in the long run, this living tradition, these enkindling standards, have prevailed.

A familiar piece, yet one heard not too often at these concerts—Mozart's symphony in D major, the symphony without a minuet—began the afternoon and another familiar piece—Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa"—ended it. Mr. Rabaud was divining in the pace he chose for the ride of Byron's, Hugo's and Liszt's hero, in the fashion in which he rhythmed it. The orchestra answered him readily, and the measures kept the graphic quality, generated the excitement which is half the virtue nowadays of these "romantics" in the poetry, painting and music of the middle of the nineteenth century. Skilful, too, were conductor and orchestra with the suspensive, quasi-mysterious measures that link the Mazeppa whirled from woe to woe with the Mazeppa exalted to state and power. Presumably they hint the reawakening of a dauntless spirit; certainly they hint at sundry transitional passages in the music-dramas of Wagner. As fortunate were conductor and orchestra in the tonal pomps of the end. They were grandiose as the matter and the manner of the music bade—exuberantly rich of tone and not merely blatant as they were a few weeks ago in the much applauded climax of the overture to "The King of Ys." Yesterday the clapping was less in the auditorium; but the artistic consciences on the stage must have been better. Once more, Mr. Rabaud characterized this highly colored, sharply rhythmed, emphatic and excited romantic music; again he gave it the vitality, the illusion hard to summon in these days of other moods and tempers in the arts. Such pieces, beyond any other that he has played this winter are his trade. It is a pity that what seems to many a superfluous scruple, should deprive audiences of the pleasures of his Wagner.

On the other hand Mr. Rabaud has succeeded ill with the symphonies of Mozart and the other eighteenth-century music that he has thus far played. Manifestly, they have failed to interest audiences as of old; while relatively scanty, in comparison with the applause of the last, have been present plaudits for them. The reason seems not far to seek. The conductor is too stiff, too literal with this [illegible] of line, of patterns in sound, of [illegible] figure and airy arabesque. Such [illegible]ic invites a grace and elegance of [illegible]ance, an aristocratic voice that [illegible]he orchestra may not give it. The [illegible]y of yesterday constantly invites [illegible] modulation of pace and accent, to [illegible]ay of light and shade, to an [illegible]ce in the finale, a pensively [illegible]ncholy in the slow movement, [illegible]imation in the first allegro. [illegible] Rabaud made [illegible] and fire, clear and softly glowing. Mozart's handiwork, as in some of the arabesques of the Andante and the twists and the turns of the finale, is too fine, too supple for such playing. The elegant, the aristocratic note vanishes. Yesterday, Mozart's symphony in D major was little more than restated painstakingly as a fact in the work of the composer, in the history of music.

It was even possible to wish the silly, futile wish that Mr. Thibaud might have played this symphony of Mozart as he has played within easy memory one or another of the composer's violin pieces, as he played, on Friday, the violin part in Saint-Saëns's concerto in B minor. It was music that betrayed none of his limitations as the big voice of Beethoven even in sonatas, occasionally does; it was music that he might merely have set forth to the audience with his usual beauty of flowing and shimmering tone, finesse of shading, inflection, transition, play of intelligence, fancy and elegance. So doing, he would hardly have reaped less applause than that which his hearers heaped upon him. Yet as it happened, he chose to reanimate, to transfigure the hackneyed concerto, stalking-horse and spoil of violinists of all degrees and of none.

Remembering then, it was like revelation to many in listener to hear the show movement played with such curving and recurving loveliness of line, such grace of motion, such charm of melody and melancholy, such insinuating and glamoring modulations as flowed from Mr. Thibaud's bow. Here, though Saint-Saëns wrote the concerto late in the seventies of the nineteenth century was the veritable music of softly glowing air and fire that Mozart's should have been. In the long first movement, came no thought of the composer's readiness and deftness, of the skilful weaving of the symphonic web, of the expertly drawn threads of the violin part. Rather, Mr Thibaud touched all this pattern-weaving with the soft lustres of his tone; set figures in motion by its indulations; with its fineness, penetration and sensibility gave the music such voice as it has hardly known ince Sararate's time.

For the instant, the listeners believed in the beauty of these measures, because he could not doubt the beauty with which Mr. Thibaud was clothing them. In the finale, this two-fold beauty of music and performance sounded richer, flowed more amply, slirring, quickening the ears that the sliw division had caressed. Again under Mr. Thibaud's persuading, the listener was ready to believe that Saint Saëns had written with imagination as well as with skill; that he also was striking fire. Deceitful is memory and comparisons are pitfalls, but there were those in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon who, listening to Mr. Thibaud in this concerto, heard also as thought it was upon the stage, the voice of Sarasate's violin. Mr. Thibaud is indeed himself; but he is like to the Spaniard, finest-textured of all the violinists of his day, as he is no other fiddler of immediate time.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 5,

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Various Unfamiliar Pieces Upon Mr. Rabaud's Programme—Mr. McCormack and Mme. Hudson-Alexander for Singers—Miss Wyman in Kentucky Folk-Tunes—Other Recitals

TWO numbers, played at a single pair of Symphony Concerts and then put by, stand on the programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Mr. Foote's "Four Character Pieces," suggested by the Rubaiyat of Omar, first heard in 1912; and Dubois's overture to his forgotten opera, "Frithiof," dating as far back as 1904. The "Character Pieces" may be recalled as a smooth, pleasing, fanciful music; the overture probably bears witness to Mr. Rabaud's desire to make the round of French composers, old and young, within the compass of a single season. To Dubois, on this particular programme, he adds Magnard, none of whose orchestral pieces have been heard in Boston since Mr. d'Indy was "guest-conductor" twelve years ago. Then he led the Symphony Orchestra in a Dirge; now Magnard will be heard in a "Hymn to Justice," the very title of which suggests the habitual austerity of the composer. All his life his music gained scant hearing; now his death in the late war, as he defended his country house against German raiders, has brought it, for the moment, to performance again. The remaining item of the list is Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. When it has been played, the public of the concerts will have heard in a single season—the third, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth—almost a "cycle" of the more familiar symphonies.

TRAVELER, APRIL 5,

ITALIAN NUMBER WELL RECEIVED

Malipiero Work Creates Favorable Impression

Those who went to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon with the expectation of being shocked by Malipiero's "The Pauses of Silence," given its first hearing at these concerts, were disappointed. It proved a most interesting number, showing a composer who does his own thinking and possesses the ability to clearly set forth those thoughts. The first impresion was a decidedly favorable one. Not very often does a first hearing arouse the enthusiasm that marked the close of this number.

Another feature of the concert was the exceptional playing of Jacques Thibaud, the French voilinist, in the Saint-Saens concerto. Few are those who can approach this master when at his best.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of the Liszt "Mazeppa" symphonic poem was in keeping with the orchestra's best standards.

10 Cyn. 5

MUSIC

The Week in Philadelphia

By special correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

[illegible] too far from its point of origin. Before the concerto came Lalo's ear-inveigling "Rapsodie Norvegienne," and after it came Rabaud's noble second symphony in E minor. The official announcement of the concert said: "After its first performance in this country, on Oct. 24, 1913, the correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor of Boston (the present commentator), wrote to Mr. Stokowski, saying: 'When you found that symphony, yours must have been the rapture of a discoverer into whose ken a new planet swims,' to which he replied: 'You are right. I was overjoyed. All summer long I played the music to myself in a sort of ecstasy.'" This critic is further quoted as saying of the work: "It seemed then, and it seems now, one of the distinctively high-minded and fine-tempered works of modern musical authorship. It bears witness to patrician mentality in the composer. It has not the rugged intellectuality of Brahms or even of Mahler, but it is a work nobly conceived and at the same time easy to [illegible]play."

[illegible]ing the sole

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — On the twentieth Boston Symphony Orchestra program Mr. Rabaud produced, for the first time here, a work of the new Italian school, by G. Francesco Malipiero, entitled "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence"). This is in "Seven Symphonic Expressions," so called, but the work is in one movement. In these movements or episodes, there is a motive, which is supposed to represent songs, shudders, cries and lamentations.

On a first hearing, it is next to impossible to view the composer from his own or, in fact, any especial standpoint, or to say whether Malipiero is an innovator or an imitator; for his expression is strangely reminiscent of Debussy, Strauss, and many another of the latter day impressionists. He uses about every known instrument in the modern orchestra, and scores very cleverly. But does the composer say anything worth while? One hopes he does, but the answer is not favorable at the present moment. Possibly the piece suffered by following a wonderfully clear performance of the Mozart symphony in D, without minuet, which began the program.

Then there was the Liszt "Mazeppa" Symphonic Poem, the closing number of the concert. Once a puzzler to the wise ones, it is now well understood, although it is as blatant as ever, for the most part.

Jaques Thibaud was the soloist, and he played the now well-worn violin concerto in B minor of Saint Saëns for the first time here, although he has been heard in the work with the orchestra in Cambridge, and elsewhere. Saint-Saëns wrote the concerto for Sarasate, and it could also well be said that it was written for Thibaud, for the performance showed a complete understanding between composer and interpreter. In clearness, finish, and general exposition, there was little left to be desired. Such a performance was memorable, a model of its kind.

On the evening of Wednesday, April 2, Sergei Adamsky, tenor, gave a concert, mostly of Russian music, though there were two Spanish songs by Osma, from the cycle "Cretares di mi Tierre" with others by Italian and American writers. Mr. Adamsky showed pleasing voice in purely lyric numbers, but in such as the improviso from Giordano's "Andrea Chenier," an intensely dramatic piece, the singer was not so fortunate, for despite much tonal beauty, his vocal mechanism was hardly adequate. A group of Russian folk songs were sung in well nigh faultless vocal finish and authoritative interpretation. The singer was assisted by Arthur Hadley cellist, and Edna Sheppard, pianist, who played Chevillard's violoncello sonata, with fine ensemble, although the work was one so dry and without musical value, that one regrets that two such excellent artists should have wasted their labor on such a work.

On the evening of Thursday, April 4, there was a concert by Rosa Raisa, soprano, and Giacomo Rimini, baritone, both members of the Chicago Opera Company, which brought to mind the old-fashioned opera "star" concert of long ago. The program included a great variety, from "Casta diva" and the "Largo al factotum" to things of the present moment, and the "extras" were nearly equal to the program itself. Miss Raisa again gave evidence that she has a wonderful voice, but it was also evident that her sphere is in opera, and not as an interpreter of lyric songs. Mr. Rimini sang the "Largo al factotum" in loud voice without a suggestion of dynamic variation, and that was the principal fault in the singing of his other numbers. There was no variety or contrast. The applause was often in inverse ratio to the interpretation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its regular concert in Cambridge on the evening of Thursday, April 3 at which Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. The event of chief interest was the repetition of Edward Burlingame Hill's four pieces for orchestra "Stevensoniana," heard the previous week in Boston. The impression of good writing obtained at the former hearing was strengthened. Cambridge residents have sometimes complained regarding the abilities of the soloists who "assist" the orchestra at these concerts. Such complaint might well be in order now. Mr. Malkin's wobbly intonation and scratchy tone marred an otherwise enjoyable concert.

EVENING STAR

Washington, D. C.

[illegible] 1919

Boston Symphony.

At the National Theater yesterday afternoon a large audience gathered to hear the farewell concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season.

Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, was the soloist. He has a strong voice of wide range and sang with dramatic effect, first, the recitative and aria from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" and later the aria "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade."

If yesterday's concert may be used as a criterion the future work of the orchestra under Mr. Rabaud promises to exceed its achievements of the past. The program yesterday opened with symphonic piece from the symphonic poem "La Redemption," by Cesar Franck, and included Saint-Saens' Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31, and Rimsky-Korsokoff's symphonic suite, "Schererazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35, in four parts.

[illegible]ESDAY, APRIL 2,

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

Mr. Giorgio Polacco, applauded in Boston as an operatic conductor, as a guest conducted the concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on March 24-25. The biographical sketch published in the program book contained this statement: "A similar honor was tendered him since he accepted the engagement with the Chicago opera this season—the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he felt bound to decline because of his previous arrangement with Maestro Campanini."

Was Mr. Polacco offered this position in Boston, or did the trustees only talk about him; as they talked about others; as they are now talking about the conductor for next season?

Mr. Robin H. Legge of the London Daily Telegraph, in a letter dated March 4 and published in the Musical Courier of New York (March 27), writing about the Covent Garden season beginning in May, says: "But the soundest fact so far is the engagement offered to, and, as I have just heard, accepted by Toscanini . . . He has accepted the post of chief conductor, while it may be that Pierre Monteux will come also to conduct the French opera."

Mr. Rabaud added wood-wind instruments in his performance of Gabriel Faure's overture to "Penelope" last week because in conversation with the composer in Paris, the latter advised it. Mr. Rabaud has also taken the liberty of adding instruments to those named in the score of his own symphony. In Paris Ravel assented gladly to similar additions when one of his works was performed by Mr. Rabaud. It is one thing to double parts in this manner; it is another to change harmonies and reorchestrate, as Dr. Muck was fond of doing; as Gustav Mahler did in Vienna and New York.

[illegible]NG SUN

[illegible]imore, Md.

[illegible]19

Lyric.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Parodoxically enough, what might [illegible] called the real novelty on the program with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its season at the Ly[illegible] last night was by far the oldest in po[illegible] of years of any of the six numbers giv[illegible] It was the Bach concerto No. 2 in [illegible] major, for violin, flute, oboe and trump[illegible] which has not been played here wit[illegible] the memory of concert goers of lo[illegible] standing, if ever before, and which m[illegible] have been unfamiliar to all but a few [illegible] last night's audience. Not that the st[illegible] and general atmosphere were new. [illegible] the contrary, those contrapuntal p[illegible]sages, so fauleless in their technical [illegible]pect and so wonderously pure, would [illegible] once have been created to the gr[illegible] masters. But Bach, especially in c[illegible]certo form, does not often get a pl[illegible] on orchestral programs in these days [illegible] florid instrumental effects and invol[illegible] harmonies.

If the number was played with so[illegible] what less of the breadth and emphas[illegible] the profundity which Bach worship[illegible] regard as demanded by tradition. Di[illegible]tor Raband's presentation was dignif[illegible] and scholarly, and the andante or s[illegible]ond movement especially was given w[illegible] an appeal which made those hauntin[illegible] beautiful, albeit, melancholy, passa[illegible] highly effective. Hardly less intere[illegible]ing was the last movement, the alleg[illegible] with its theme first sounded by [illegible] horns and then taken up by the ot[illegible] instruments in turn. It might be s[illegible]posed that an average miscellanous au[illegible]ence would not enthuse over Bach, [illegible] the reception of last night's offering [illegible] all that could be desired in point [illegible] fervor.

A striking feature of Bach presen[illegible]ion was the use of the harpsicho[illegible] which tended, of course, to give an ad[illegible]tional and singularly appropriate to[illegible] to the concerto. The harpsichord [illegible] companist was Charles W. Adams.

Debussy Nocturnes Interesting

Perhaps next in interest were [illegible] Debrussy nocturnes, "Nuages" [illegible] "Fetes," both of them highly charac[illegible]istic of this modern French composer. Both were played in a manner to bring out admirably the subtle qualities of the composer. Especially effective in the first was the insistent note peculiarly suggestive of the dropping of rain so as to make a hollow sound. The nocturnes are rich in instrumental effects, the Oriental touch in the "Fetes," with the harps playing the accompaniment, especially holding the attention. Both compositions were rendered with a nice appreciation of tonal values and fine shading.

The Saint-Saens Symphony in A minor No. 2, with which the concert opened, seemed on the whole somewhat colorless as given last night. Of course, such a master of form as the French composer is always interesting, but the symphony nevertheless makes an impression of lacking background. It is full of felicitous ideas, but the brasses are almost eliminated, so that the general feeling is one of lightness. The Scherzo, oddly enough, is written in a minor key, with its suggestion of a crowd of revelers passing a church and for a moment being turned from their carnival mood to chanting a choral. The fourth movement, prestissimo, is really sprightlier than the scherzo and carries out further the carnival idea. An excellent bit of work was the decrescendo of the Scherzo illustrative of the merry-making crowd disappearing in the distance.

The concluding orchestral number was the well-known overture to Carl Maria von Weber's "Der Freischuetz," with its suggestion of mysticism and its tuneful measures. This also seemed to fall rather short of the fullness and vigor which comport with accepted ideas of the composition.

The soloist was H. Reinald Werrenrath, the well-known American baryone, who sang a recitation and aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" with much finish and in good taste. He accompassed the seemingly simple but reality trying measures of Mozart with an appearance of ease and flexibility and was altogether felicitous in his rendition. He also sang the air, "Fugitive Vision," from Massenet's "Herodiade," in an impressive manner and was rewarded with a number of encores. His voice is fresh and true and his interpretation free from strain.

REDUCTION RATIO

13x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND ITS NEW CONDUCTOR

Photo © Carl J. Horner, Boston

[Continued from page 42]

if there'd be a fight.'" Another line which were "The Terrible Robber Men," by Bryceson Treharne, "Soft from Thy Silvern Dusk-full Dom

of that city. Mr. Slayton wishes to install the organ in the Sailors' and Soldiers' Memorial Bui in memory of donor will place in trust with the city treasurer a $10,000 bond, which upon maturity will be used as directed by an

LOWELL COURIER-CITIZEN, APRIL 2,

BRILLIANT PROGRAM BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Strand Theatre Filled for Second Time in a Month to Hear Famous Organization—Lambert Murphy Was the Soloist.

For the second time in Lowell within a few weeks, thus making the musical season in Lowell a memorable one, the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Henri Rabaud gave a concert which practically filled the Strand theatre last evening. The response to the enterprise of Albert Edmund Brown, who arranged for the concert, was the more gratifying in that he had no organization to back him up as was the case at the earlier appearance of the orchestra here but relied on success of the orchestra on that occasion and possibly on the added attraction of Lambert Murphy as tenor soloist to fill the house. That his judgment was not misplaced was proved by the result.

Furthermore the program which Mr. Rabaud had chosen to present was brighter and more varied than on the first appearance and manifestly interested and enthused the audience to a greater degree. It ran as follows:

Weber...Overture to "Der Freischütz
Schubert..Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
Donizetti..Air, "Una furtiva lagrima," from "L'Elisir d'Amore."
Widor...Incidental music to "Conte d'avril" (after Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night") Comedy by Auguste Dorchain.
Romance.
Guitare.
Massenet...Air, "Voir Grisélidis," from "Grisélidis."
Bizet...Suite No. 1 from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play "L'Arlésienne."
I. Prelude.
II. Minuetto.
III. Adagietto.
IV. Carillon.
Chabrier....."España," Rhapsody for orchestra.

Once more Mr. Rabaud proved his skill alike in classic selections, such as the Schubert symphony, and in music allied to the theatre, as the Weber overture, Bizet's suite, the excerpts from Widor's incidnetal music to an adaptation of "Twelfth Night," and notably in the suave and yet colorful accompaniments the orchestra furnished to the solos by Mr. Murphy.

This instinct for the dramatic side of music was marked in the overture to Der Freischutz which epitomizes the principal motives of the romatic opera. The sinister element was at once suggested by the mysterious introductory measures. The quartet of horns in the familiar hymnlike melody which ensues was admirably done. The subsequent dramatic passages, punctuated by incisive and sonorous chords, were interpreted with telling effort and the orchestra swept on to the stirring finale, the apotheosis of Agathe, with unflagging spirit, bringing the overture to its joyous climax, for Der Freischutz is one of the few operas in the list which has a happy ending for everybody but the villain of the plot.

Probably none of the Schubert symphonies is better liked than that in B minor, of which the composer completed only two movements and part of a scherzo. It is grateful in melody and in sentiment, its occasional plaintive strains being contrasted with more forceful and most ingeniously worked out development of the themes, which are simple in themselves. Basses and violoncellos gave out the sombre measures of the first movement with remarkable effect. The passages for oboe and clarinet demonstrated the beautiful tonal quality attained by the virtuosi on these instruments, and the contrapuntal passages in which the various themes are developed were brought out by Mr. Rabaud with artistic skill in shading and emphasis.

The beautiful melody at the opening of the second movement was nobly sung by the strings and the movement was also notable for the passage played exquisitely by the solo clarinet, a revelation in the possibilities of this instrument.

In these days of complex operatic vocalism it was good to hear again a tenor aria in the old Italian style suave in melody and simple in form. In the "Una furtiva lagrima" from Donizetti's comic opera, Mr. Murphy successfully preserved the traditions of the Italian school, singing smoothly, with an ear tuned to the grace and contour of the melody, sustaining and shading his tones with nice discernment, and phrasing the text skilfully. There was ample power, but it was never unpleasingly obtrusive. The effect of the number was enhanced by the sympathetic accompaniment of the orchestra.

Later in the program Mr. Murphy achieved even more marked success with the number from Massenet's "Grisélidis," and here, too, Mr. Rabaud, evidently at home with the score, abetted him by a singularly beautiful and colorful reading. Mr. Murphy recently sang the aria at his recital in Boston, but to pianoforte accompaniment. Even under those circumstances he won praise for his fine interpretation of the number. Last night, with the orchestra providing the tonal setting, he gave it with warm fervor and passion, evincing at almost every phrase the really beautiful qualities of his voice. He was recalled again and again after both numbers to bow his acknowledgment of the appreciation of the audience, which he justly bade Mr. Rabaud to share with him.

Widor's incidental music to the comedy "Conte d'Avril" was new to the present reviewer and to audiences here, who know the composer chiefly by his works for the organ. It has the French grace of melody and shows that the composer knows the resources of an orchestra, and one can imagine that it suited well the action of the comedy. The Romance was especially notable for the flute solo to harp accompaniment and for the dainty measures for the wood-wind instruments and the airy graces of the strings. The Guitarre gave opportunity for a tuneful imitation of this instrument, with a deftly managed effect on the strings pizzicati.

Bizet's Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlésinne" may always be counted upon to make its appeal. The composer was skilled in music of the sort, as its success proved, in spite of the failure of the play for which it was written. Mr. Rabaud, too, catches its spirit, is alert to mark its changing moods and characteristic rhythms. The unison passage with which the prelude opens was capitally done. The Minuetto went with stately grace, and nothing could well have been more charming than the lightness with which the wood-wind breathed the dance melody. The Adagietto, one of the finest numbe the rare quality of the strings, which played it with all the delicac of a string quartet in tone and shading, although with a firmer but still beautifully subdued body of tone. The horns and brass simulated the effect of the chimes in the Carillon with uncommon skill. The entire suite, making no particular demands on the cerebral side of musical appreciation, played by such an orchestra in the manner in which Mr. Rabaud conceived it last night was nevertheless well worth while.

Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody, familiar to those who frequent the pop concerts in Boston in the early summertime, where it often has a place on the program, is a spirited number in the hands of any first class orchestra, but it is only fair to say that in the memory of the present reviewer it has never gone with more life and vigor than Mr. Rabaud put into it last evening. The two Spanish dances on which it is founded, the Jota and the Malaguena, the one wild and vigorous and the other langorous and sensual, were differentiated with marked skill and one needed little imagination to believe they were actually sounded by the native instruments.

The rapid modulations of harmony, the incisive rhythm of the dance, the sonorous melody for the trombones were all infused with infinite life and movement that almost set the feet atapping here as it starts hands clapping and hips swaying in Andalusia. Chabrier certainly caught the characteristics of the Spanish rhythm and Mr. Rabaud missed not a whit of it all as he reproduced it last night. The audience was enthusiastic in demonstration of its approval of the skill of the conductor and the virtuosity of the band.

S. P. F.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. The program was entirely orchestral, for there was no soloist. The numbers included an excerpt from Franck's "La Redemption;" two orchestral pictures by Debussy, entitled "Clouds" and "Festivals," Airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hyppolyte et Aricie," and Schumann's symphony, No. 2, in C.

The symphonic piece from Franck's "La Redemption," if memory serves, was played at these concerts for the first time, although heard some years ago in the Boston concerts. One is not certain as to the picture intended by the music, yet as absolute music it makes the same lofty appeal that most of Franck's music does, after one fully understands it. The piece heard at this concert, while not ranking with the symphony of the same composer heard at a concert earlier in the season, is for all that something that one can listen to with enjoyment. The performance of this, as well as the two numbers of Debussy, was well nigh ideal. Debussy's orchestral pictures are not absolute music, but a sort of fleeting mental impressions, and when considered as such the music becomes satisfying and pleasureable.

The little pieces from Rameau's well nigh forgotten opera, arranged for concert purposes by Vincent D'Indy, are well done, and made an enjoyable number. These were heard at this concert for the first time.

Schumann's symphony came last on the program, instead of first, as has been usually the case. The work may not be the composer at his best, but for all the faults in the instrumentation it remains something that one would not change if he could, and such a thing has been tried without much success. Schumann stands for what he is, and his individuality is always in evdence, even if the setting is not always the best. The performance of the symphony was admirable in every way.

The seventh in the series will be given on evening April 3d. Joseph M lo

om STAR
ldress: Baltimore, Md.
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LYRIC THEATER

Gives Last Concert of Season; Werrenrath Soloist; New Series Announced.

An excellently arranged program was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, last night, in the Lyric Theater, at its fifth and last Baltimore concert of the season. Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, was special soloist. The management of the orchestra announced five concerts here next season, to be given on the Wednesday nights of November 5 and December 3, 1919, and January 7, February 4 and March 17, 1920.

An especially good performance of Debussy's nocturne Fetes was given by the orchestra and there was particular interest in J. S. Bach's Concerto No. 2, in F major, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with orchestral and harpsichord accompaniment, the soloists in which were, respectively, F. Fradkin, G. Laurent, G. Longy and G. Heim, with Charles W. Adams, of Boston, playing the harpsichord. This composition is distinctive in the instrumental arrangement and in the resulting unusual difficulties of the trumpet part. Mr. Heim, trumpeter, deserves great credit for the skill with which he handled his work. The tone of the harpsichord was lost in the ensemble.

Mr. Werrenrath sang excellently. His work shows continued improvement, both vocally and in dramatic power. His numbers were the recitative, Tutto e disposto, and aria, Aprite un po' quegl' occhi, from Mozart's Le Nozze di Figaro, Act 4, and the air, Vision Fugitive, from Massenet's Herodiade.

Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, opus 55, Debussy's nocturne Nuages, and the overture to Weber's Der Freischutz were the other orchestral numbers.

J. N. H.

CITIZEN
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Its Last Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music.

Conductor M. Henri Rabaud and the Boston Symphony Orchestra completely captured a distinguished audience at the final concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices. A commendable and continuously interesting programme was presented. The orchestra played with decision and the collective tone was inexhaustible in its splendor. Mr. Rabaud seemed to convey to them the intent of his interpretations, so that the artistic result was eminently decisive and satisfactory. He comports himself with dignity and firmness and is happy in securing a hearty response from the orchestra.

The opening number, "Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78" (Saint-Saens), in two movements, which, nevertheless, includes practically the traditional four, was progressive in modern instrumentation, possessing an uncommon technique French in clearness of expression and rhythm, appreciation of tonal color, simplicity in orchestration and orthodox form. It was played with great classic reserve, feeling and finish, which gave ample and convincing evidence of artistic attainments.

Cesar Frank's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," in three parts, a fruitful and traditional composition of tonal architecture, beautiful, sombre harmonies, rich thematic material, worked out with skill and artistic perception, made a deep impression upon every one. Johann Sebastian Bach's "Concerto in F Major," played by the Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, accompanied by the orchestra, was a splendid example of art, and was extremely beautiful, the artists collaborating effectively in obtaining a well-nigh flawless ensemble. "Sadko," a tone picture, Op. 5 (Rimsky-Korsakoff) and overture, "Der Freischutz" (Weber), ended the programme.

Mr. Ribaud, by the sincerity of his demeanor, as well as the fine display of a ripened sensitive musicianship, has left a deep impression on musical Brooklyn. There was a very large audience which showed evident cordiality and appreciation.

m AMERICAN
dress: New York City.
MAR 23

Boston Symphony Ends Its New York Season

THE season of the Boston Symphony went out yesterday afternoon with flying colors. The final concert was given in Carnegie Hall to a capacity audience. The frequent and enthusiastic response of the many auditors might be considered a personal tribute and triumph of Henri Ribaud, who is finishing his first year as director of the orchestra's destiny.

Yesterday's programme was devoted largely to French compositions. It included Saint-Saens's Third Symphony, a selection from Franck's Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption," Bach's concerto for orchestra and solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet; "Sadko," an Oriental tone poem by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

The orchestra's performance reflected the restraining hand of Mr. Ribaud. Many effects, especially in the opening moment of the symphony and in the Franck extract, were veiled, giving the impression of sound coming from behind a heavy gauze curtain. His climaxes, however, were virile and vigorous, and impressed the auditor with the conductor's unusual picturesqueness and power.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND ITS NEW CONDUCTOR

Photo © Carl J. Horner, Boston

[Continued from page 42]

if there'd be a light.'" Another line which were "The Terrible Robber Men," by Bryceson Treharne, "Soft from Thy Silvern Dusk-full Dom

of that city. Mr. Slayton wishes to install the organ in the Sailors' and Soldiers' Memorial Bui in memory of donor will place in trust with the city treasurer a $10,000 bond, which upon maturity will be used as directed by an

LOWELL COURIER-CITIZEN, APRIL 2,

BRILLIANT PROGRAM BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Strand Theatre Filled for Second Time in a Month to Hear Famous Organization—Lambert Murphy Was the Soloist.

For the second time in Lowell within a few weeks, thus making the musical season in Lowell a memorable one, the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Henri Rabaud gave a concert which practically filled the Strand theatre last evening. The response to the enterprise of Albert Edmund Brown, who arranged for the concert, was the more gratifying in that he had no organization to back him up as was the case at the earlier appearance of the orchestra here but relied on success of the orchestra on that occasion and possibly on the added attraction of Lambert Murphy as tenor soloist to fill the house. That his judgment was not misplaced was proved by the result.

Furthermore the program which Mr. Rabaud had chosen to present was brighter and more varied than on the first appearance and manifestly interested and enthused the audience to a greater degree. It ran as follows:

Weber...Overture to "Der Freischütz"
Schubert..Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
Donizetti..Air, "Una furtiva lagrima," from "L'Elisir d'Amore."
Widor...Incidental music to "Conte d'avril" (after Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night") Comedy by Auguste Dorchain.
Romance.
Guitare.
Massenet...Air, "Voir Grisélidis," from "Grisélidis."
Bizet....Suite No. 1 from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play "L'Arlésienne."
I. Prelude.
II. Minuetto.
III. Adagietto.
IV. Carillon.
Chabrier....."España," Rhapsody for orchestra.

Once more Mr. Rabaud proved his skill alike in classic selections, such as the Schubert symphony, and in music allied to the theatre, as the Weber overture, Bizet's suite, the excerpts from Widor's incidnetal music to an adaptation of "Twelfth Night," and notably in the suave and yet colorful accompaniments the orchestra furnished to the solos by Mr. Murphy.

This instinct for the dramatic side of music was marked in the overture to Der Freischutz which epitomizes the principal motives of the romatic opera. The sinister element was at once suggested by the mysterious introductory measures. The quartet of horns in the familiar hymnlike melody which ensues was admirably done. The subsequent dramatic passages, punctuated by incisive and sonorous chords, were interpreted with telling effort and the orchestra swept on to the stirring finale, the apotheosis of Agathe, with unflagging spirit, bringing the overture to its joyous climax, for Der Freischutz is one of the few operas in the list which has a happy ending for everybody but the villain of the plot.

Probably none of the Schubert symphonies is better liked than that in B minor, of which the composer completed only two movements and part of a scherzo. It is grateful in melody and in sentiment, its occasional plaintive strains being contrasted with more forceful and most ingeniously worked out development of the themes, which are simple in themselves. Basses and violoncellos gave out the sombre measures of the first movement with remarkable effect. The passages for oboe and clarinet demonstrated the beautiful tonal quality attained by the virtuosi on these instruments, and the contrapuntal passages in which the various themes are developed were brought out by Mr. Rabaud with artistic skill in shading and emphasis.

The beautiful melody at the opening of the second movement was nobly sung by the strings and the movement was also notable for the passage played exquisitely by the solo clarinet, a revelation in the possibilities of this instrument.

In these days of complex operatic vocalism it was good to hear again a tenor aria in the old Italian style suave in melody and simple in form. In the "Una furtiva lagrima" from Donizetti's comic opera, Mr. Murphy successfully preserved the traditions of the Italian school, singing smoothly, with an ear tuned to the grace and contour of the melody, sustaining and shading his tones with nice discernment, and phrasing the text skilfully. There was ample power, but it was never unpleasingly obtrusive. The effect of the number was enhanced by the sympathetic accompaniment of the orchestra.

Later in the program Mr. Murphy achieved even more marked success with the number from Massenet's "Griselidis," and here, too, Mr. Rabaud, evidently at home with the score, abetted him by a singularly beautiful and colorful reading. Mr. Murphy recently sang the aria at his recital in Boston, but to pianoforte accompaniment. Even under those circumstances he won praise for his fine interpretation of the number. Last night, with the orchestra providing the tonal setting, he gave it with warm fervor and passion, evincing at almost every phrase the really beautiful qualities of his voice. He was recalled again and again after both numbers to bow his acknowledgment of the appreciation of the audience, which he justly bade Mr. Rabaud to share with him.

Widor's incidental music to the comedy "Conte d'Avril" was new to the present reviewer and to audiences here, who know the composer chiefly by his works for the organ. It has the French grace of melody and shows that the composer knows the resources of an orchestra, and one can imagine that it suited well the action of the comedy. The Romance was especially notable for the flute solo to harp accompaniment and for the dainty measures for the wood-wind instruments and the airy graces of the strings. The Guitarre gave opportunity for a tuneful imitation of this instrument, with a deftly managed effect on the strings pizzicati.

Bizet's Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlésinne" may always be counted upon to make its appeal. The composer was skilled in music of the sort, as its success proved, in spite of the failure of the play for which it was written. Mr. Rabaud, too, catches its spirit, is alert to mark its changing moods and characteristic rhythms. The unison passage with which the prelude opens was capitally done. The Minuetto went with stately grace, and nothing could well have been more charming than the lightness with which the wood-wind breathed the dance melody. The Adagietto, one of the finest numbers that Bizet ever wrote, gave evidence of the rare quality of the strings, which played it with all the delicacy of a string quartet in tone and shading, although with a firmer but still beautifully subdued body of tone. The horns and brass simulated the effect of the chimes in the Carillon with uncommon skill. The entire suite, making no particular demands on the cerebral side of musical appreciation, played by such an orchestra in the manner in which Mr. Rabaud conceived it last night was nevertheless well worth while.

Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody, familiar to those who frequent the pop concerts in Boston in the early summertime, where it often has a place on the program, is a spirited number in the hands of any first class orchestra, but it is only fair to say that in the memory of the present reviewer it has never gone with more life and vigor than Mr. Rabaud put into it last evening. The two Spanish dances on which it is founded, the Jota and the Malaguena, the one wild and vigorous, and the other langorous and sensual, were differentiated with marked skill, and one needed little imagination to believe they were actually sounded by the native instruments.

The rapid modulations of harmony, the incisive rhythm of the dance, the sonorous melody for the trombones were all infused with infinite life and movement that almost set the feet a-tapping here as it starts hands clapping and hips swaying in Andalusia. Chabrier certainly caught the characteristics of the Spanish rhythm and Mr. Rabaud missed not a whit of it all as he reproduced it last night. The audience was enthusiastic in demonstration of its approval of the skill of the conductor and the virtuosity of the band.

S. R. F.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. The program was entirely orchestral, for there was no soloist. The numbers included an excerpt from Franck's "La Redemption;" two orchestral pictures by Debussy, entitled "Clouds" and "Festivals," Airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hyppolyte et Aricie," and Schumann's symphony, No. 2, in C.

The symphonic piece from Franck's "La Redemption," if memory serves, was played at these concerts for the first time, although heard some years ago in the Boston concerts. One is not certain as to the picture intended by the music, yet as absolute music it makes the same lofty appeal that most of Franck's music does, after one fully understands it. The piece heard at this concert, while not ranking with the symphony of the same composer heard at a concert earlier in the season, is for all that something that one can listen to with enjoyment. The performance of this, as well as the two numbers of Debussy, was well nigh ideal. Debussy's orchestral pictures are not absolute music, but a sort of fleeting mental impressions, and when considered as such the music becomes satisfying and pleasureable.

The little pieces from Rameau's well nigh forgotten opera, arranged for concert purposes by Vincent D'Indy, are well done, and made an enjoyable number. These were heard at this concert for the first time.

Schumann's symphony came last on the program, instead of first, as has been usually the case. The work may not be the composer at his best, but for all the faults in the instrumentation it remains something that one would not change if he could, and such a thing has been tried without much success. Schumann stands for what he is, and his individuality is always in evdence, even if the setting is not always the best. The performance of the symphony was admirable in every way.

The seventh in the series will be given on evening April 3d, Joseph

Mom STAR
Idress: Baltimore, Md.
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LYRIC THEATER

Gives Last Concert of Season; Werrenrath Soloist; New Series Announced.

An excellently arranged program was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, last night, in the Lyric Theater, at its fifth and last Baltimore concert of the season. Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, was special soloist. The management of the orchestra announced five concerts here next season, to be given on the Wednesday nights of November 5 and December 3, 1919, and January 7, February 4 and March 17, 1920.

An especially good performance of Debussy's nocturne Fetes was given by the orchestra and there was particular interest in J. S. Bach's Concerto No. 2, in F major, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with orchestral and harpsichord accompaniment, the soloists in which were, respectively, F. Fradkin, G. Laurent, G. Longy and G. Heim, with Charles W. Adams, of Boston, playing the harpsichord. This composition is distinctive in the instrumental arrangement and in the resulting unusual difficulties of the trumpet part. Mr. Heim, trumpeter, deserves great credit for the skill with which he handled his work. The tone of the harpsichord was lost in the ensemble.

Mr. Werrenrath sang excellently. His work shows continued improvement, both vocally and in dramatic power. His numbers were the recitative, Tutto e disposto, and aria, Aprite un po' quegl' occhi, from Mozart's Le Nozze di Figaro, Act 4, and the air, Vision Fugitive, from Massenet's Herodiade.

Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, opus 55, Debussy's nocturne Nuages, and the overture to Weber's Der Freischutz were the other orchestral numbers.

J. N. H.

CITIZEN
ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Its Last Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music.

Conductor M. Henri Rabaud and the Boston Symphony Orchestra completely captured a distinguished audience at the final concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices. A commendable and continuously interesting programme was presented. The orchestra played with decision and the collective tone was inexhaustible in its splendor. Mr. Rabaud seemed to convey to them the intent of his interpretations, so that the artistic result was eminently decisive and satisfactory. He comports himself with dignity and firmness and is happy in securing a hearty response from the orchestra.

The opening number, "Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78" (Saint-Saens), in two movements, which, nevertheless, includes practically the traditional four, was progressive in modern instrumentation, possessing an uncommon technique French in clearness of expression and rhythm, appreciation of tonal color, simplicity in orchestration and orthodox form. It was played with great classic reserve, feeling and finish, which gave ample and convincing evidence of artistic attainments.

Cesar Frank's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," in three parts, a fruitful and traditional composition of tonal architecture, beautiful, sombre harmonies, rich thematic material, worked out with skill and artistic perception, made a deep impression upon every one. Johann Sebastian Bach's "Concerto in F Major," played by the Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim, accompanied by the orchestra, was a splendid example of art, and was extremely beautiful, the artists collaborating effectively in obtaining a well-nigh flawless ensemble. "Sadko," a tone picture, Op. 5 (Rimsky-Korsakoff) and overture, "Der Freischutz" (Weber), ended the programme.

Mr. Ribaud, by the sincerity of his demeanor, as well as the fine display of a ripened sensitive musicianship, has left a deep impression on musical Brooklyn. There was a very large audience which showed evident cordiality and appreciation.

m AMERICAN
iress: New York City.
e

Boston Symphony Ends Its New York Season

THE season of the Boston Symphony went out yesterday afternoon with flying colors. The final concert was given in Carnegie Hall to a capacity audience. The frequent and enthusiastic response of the many auditors might be considered a personal tribute and triumph of Henri Ribaud, who is finishing his first year as director of the orchestra's destiny.

Yesterday's programme was devoted largely to French compositions. It included Saint-Saens's Third Symphony, a selection from Franck's Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption," Bach's concerto for orchestra and solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet; "Sadko," an Oriental tone poem by Rimsky-Karsakoff, and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

The orchestra's performance reflected the restraining hand of Mr. Ribaud. Many effects, especially in the opening moment of the symphony and in the Franck extract, were veiled, giving the impression of sounds coming from behind a heavy gauze curtain. His climaxes, however, were virile and vigorous, and impressed the auditor with the conductor's unusual picturesqueness and power.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

123

Henri Rabaud Conducts Final Concerts of Boston Orchestra

French Composer Leaves to Devote His Time to Composition. A Musician of Taste and Intelligence Who Maintained Finest Traditions of the Orchestra—Why Does Not the Metropolitan Subsidize American Composers? — And Now the Mechanical Instrument in Recital Halls.

The week past witnessed the final concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and undoubtedly the final appearances here of Henri Rabaud as a conductor, for while no official word has come from Boston regarding next year it has been understood for some time that Mr. Rabaud would not consent to return for another season. He has found the most congenial conditions in Boston, has had a rare opportunity for musical expression in the orchestra at his command, but the fact of the matter is that he is a composer and prefers to devote all of his time to composition. Certainly the duties of conducting as many concerts as the Boston Symphony gives in the course of a year yields little time for any effort in the field of composition.

Mr. Rabaud's task was not an easy one. Conditions due to the war had disrupted the best orchestra in the land to the extent of its losing twenty-three of its most dependable factors. From the time of Dr. Muck's internment until the fall the reorganized business management of the orchestra had made unsuccessful attempts to secure a conductor. Finally Mr. Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House staff was engaged for the first month of the season. His was the groundwork that was to prepare a foundation upon which Mr. Rabaud was to build.

Yet in spite of the necessarily hasty preparation of the forces under his control, in spite of the traditions which laid a heavy burden upon any conductor who had to follow in the footsteps of the illustrious ones of the past, in spite of a natural tendency on the part of subscribers to draw unfavorable comparisons, Mr. Rabaud won instant favor. He soon welded the individual parts of the orchestral body into a flexible expressive instrument. Upon it he exerted the potent charm and informing skill of his own personality. His readings of classicist and modernist have been distinguished above all else by taste and intelligent musicianship. He has never been a picturesque conductor, never a man to win gallery delight. On the other hand, a sincere, gifted musician, who understands every composition in hand and knows how to reveal its inmost essence with style and euphony.

His finest efforts have been disclosed in the readings of the Beethoven symphonies and in the revelation of the secrets of the contemporary French school of composition. The two represent almost opposite poles of musical thought, yet we have heard noteworthy expression of the Beethoven romantic classicism and of the rich color fabrics of Ravel and Debussy. Nor must there be forgotten his particularly lucid interpretations of the tone poems of Saint-Saens. Probably never had these works been heard in the fullness of their glory until Mr. Rabaud's coming.

His leaving will be a matter of regret. Who his successor will be lies in the lap of the gods and of the Bostonians who speak only to God, as the rhyme has it. Rumor mentions Toscanini, and now that the war is over and there will be little need for that genius of conductors to remain in Italy it may well be that he will next year direct the fortunes of the Boston band. Of course, he is practically unknown here as a symphonic conductor, but a man of his understanding and rare ability could not do less than furnish us with striking and compelling individual ach... Metropolitan

m SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.
MAR 23 1919

British Honored Madame Melba

"MY son shall follow his own bent," said Colonel Newcome in Thackeray's novel. "As long as his calling is honest it becomes a gentleman, and if he were to take a fancy to play on the fiddle—actually on the fiddle—I shouldn't object."

The social status of a musician has risen since those days. Not only may a pianist rule Poland and an English lord compose symphonies—Mme. Melba, a professional singer, with no lineal nobility of descent, has won her way by mere genius and personality to the social pinnacle of England and the warm friendship of the royal family.

To be received by the highest ladies of the land is the smallest part of it—she has now a title of her own. For last March "it pleased his Most Gracious Majesty" to appoint her "Dame Commander of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire" (D. B. E.), an order created "in recognition of manifold services by civilians in connection with the war." She is second only to H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, grand master of the order; H. M. the Queen, Dame of the Grand Cross, and H. R. H. the Duke of Connaught.

"Dame" Melba's services have indeed been "manifold"—the beginning of the great European war found her in Australia, where in recent years she has spent much time with her father. Directly the war began the great Australian singer threw herself heart and soul into the Red Cross movement, and in a year, from the concerts that she organized and in which she sang, she raised over $100,000 for the Red Cross and kindred purposes. Her greatest success came in Melbourne, April 27, when she gave a concert in aid of the Belgian Relief Fund which brought $30,000. About a third of this sum came from the sale of flags of the Allies which Madame Melba herself auctioned off. She received $125 for a Russian naval ensign. The next flag sold was that of Poland, and just before selling it Madame Melba read a telegram she had just received from Paderewski, asking for help for his countrymen. This flag sold for $1,000. Two Australian flags brought the comparatively small sums of $300 and $200. One Union Jack brought $250 and another $150.

"Then," according to the Melbourne Argus, "Madame Melba unfurled and waved a Belgian flag. 'This flag,' she said, 'I hold in deepest reverence. The whole world knows from what it saved us all. It is to be hung in this Town Hall as a memento. On a tablet beside it will be written the names of those who bid £100. To each a replica will be given, and I hope that his Majesty the King of the Belgians will sign it.'"

Mme. Melba made the first bid herself of £100. Her father, David Mitchell, raised it another hundred pounds and finally it sold for the extraordinary sum of £2,100, or $10,500. In December 1917, Mme. Melba joined Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert for the benefit of sufferers from the Halifax disaster, which alone brought more than $10,000.

HERALD
New York City
MAR 23 1919

MUSIC REVIEW

Musical Prohibition—

That sturdy and vigorous plant, the musical season of 1918-19, which has budded, bourgeoned and blossomed into a garden of musical flowers of rather more than usual varied interest, now begins evidently to wane. The Philadelphia Orchestra has completed its series of five concerts without having accomplished anything notable or distinguished beyond their tale of five rather academic programmes, on the whole well contrived and well interpreted by Leopold Stokowski and his very efficient orchestra. To the best of my recollection, he has not chosen to represent the American composer at all, so that these programmes, however artistic in execution, have been distinctly lacking in novel or national interest.

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its season of five pairs of concerts, a season principally remarkable because of its new conductor. In Henri Rabaud the New York concertgoing public was quick to recognize a musician both distinguished and sincere, an appealing personality and a gift of interpretation and conducting as evident as it was effective. In spite of his early expressed attitude in support of American music and the American composer, in these ten concerts Mr. Rabaud has given us but one work by an American composer, and that was a new one, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Frederick S Converse. In this respect, a fact which I regret, Mr. Rabaud's performances, at least so far as New York is concerned, have fallen far below his promises.

Considering the universal acclaim with which French composers, French conductors and French music generally have been greeted this season by the American music loving public, I cannot but feel, as reciprocity is the soul not only of commerce but of reciprocal friendly relations of any kind, that in this respect Mr. Rabaud has been decidedly delinquent. We American musicians who are striving for recognition—striving to do the best we can to give dignity and artistic significance to what we write—can hardly but feel that in this result of Mr. Rabaud's large promises be only, unexpectedly and disappointingly, proves to be a representative of those foreign influences which retard and are really inimical to our national musical development. But, however this may be, the fact that Mr. Rabaud's genuine talents and undoubted aptitude as a conductor have restored a really national institution like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the place in our musical life that its long and successful artistic effort entitles it to hold is one that must be recognized, commended and appreciated at its

om HERALD
dress: New York City

Boston Orchestra, Purged of Germans, in Final Concert

Freed from German domination for the first time in its long career, the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its local season with a concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday. No great symphonic organization has undergone a more thorough housecleaning than that which the men from Boston passed through during the season just ending. Dominated by Doktor Karl Muck, kulturist, and teeming with German musicians for years, it finally turned him out and in France found in Henri Rabaud its new conductor. He is French, and many of the musicians in the orchestra were newly recruited from the ranks of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, which made a tour of the United States last autumn.

The programme of the farewell concert also had as its most pretentious number a French symphony, that in C minor, No. 3, opus 78, of Saint-Saens, known as the "organ symphony." Its graceful melodies were played with true feeling for the French master's ideas. There was more fire and more finesse in the interpretation of Mr. Rabaud tha' he has shown for any of the sym ...ies of Beethoven or other dead Germ... which he has presented during the season.

An unusual number was Bach's concerto No. 2, in F, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. It was played with harpsichord accompaniment, not, as is usually the case with Bach's music, in a modernized version. The audience found its rollicking rhythms infectious and not at all dry.

Franck's "La Redemption," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," completed the programme. Considering the changes in the personnel of the orchestra and the tremendous task of the new conductor in reorganizing everything from programmes to concert meister, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had a remarkable seaso...

INQUIRER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 23

Rachmaninoff With Orchestra

The Philadelphia Orchestra concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next promise to be among the outstanding musical events of the season. "The giant of the Russians," Sergei Rachmaninoff, will be the soloist, playing his own concerto, the first in F sharp minor. The symphony will be the E minor of Henri Rabaud, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Stokowski introduced to American audiences on October 24, 1913, and which met with such popular favor at that time and at subsequent performances.

In New York it is commonly said that this has been a "Rachmaninoff year," and the same might also be said of Philadelphia, for at his several recitals and orchestral appearance the great Russian has been received with rapturous acclaim. Speaking of his first concerto, which he will play at these concerts, Rachmaninoff said in an interview in the Boston Evening Transcript shortly after his quiet and unexpected return to the United States: "It is a work of my youth (I wrote it before I was nineteen); naturally, therefore, it contained many effects, many passages that needed revision. These I have made, and I hope to play the composition in its new form some time this season." This revision was made in Scandinavia, whither Rachmaninoff fled after the new Russian regime had stripped him of his property and deprived him of other sources of income.

Since Mr. Stokowski "discovered" the E minor symphony of Rabaud in the summer of 1913, in Paris, it has had several sympathetic readings under his baton. After its first performance in this country, on October 24, 1913, a correspondent wrote to Mr. Stokowski, saying: "When you found that symphony, yours must have been the rapture of a discoverer into whose ken a new planet swims," to which he replied: "You are right. I was overjoyed. All summer long I played the music over to myself in a sort of ecstasy. It seemed then, and it seems now, one of the distinctively high-minded and fine-tempered works of modern musical authorship. It bears witness to a patrician mentality in the composer. It has not the rugged intellectuality of Brahms or even of Mahler, but it is a work nobly conceived and at the same time easy to play."

As the introductory number, Mr. Stokowski has programmed the "Norwegian Rhapsody" of Lalo, which, since it has not been heard here since 1910, will be somewhat in the nature of a novelty.

EVENING WORLD
New York City
MAR 24 1919

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its farewell to us for the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Mr. Rabaud and his ba... did not reach the high level of Thurs... day night, but their programm... which included Saint-Saens's "Organ... symphony; Bach's concerto for violi... flute, oboe and trumpet; an excer... from Cesar Franck's "Redemptio... and the overture to Weber's "D... Freischutz" was enjoyed by the usu... crowded house.

EVENING MAIL
ess: New York City

LAST BOSTON CONCERT.

THOSE earnest souls who, as Edith Wharton incisively says, "pursue culture in bands, as if afraid to meet it alone," must always go to the Saturday afternoon concerts when the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits us. But into the last programme of the season Mr. Rabaud injected a variety for every musical taste.

He put grandeur into his playing of the Saint-Saens Organ Symphony, a breezy vitality into the Bach Brandenburg concerto, an insinuating fascination into Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," and he drew refreshment from Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." It was a farewell with joy for the spirit and comfort for the arid days ahead of us when the orchestral voices are all silent.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
MAR 24 1919

A MISCELLANEOUS FAREWELL.

The music season, trailing out in enfeebled fashion toward the end of March, customarily gives the reviewer pause wherein to glance backward over the record of what has been listened to, and to cogitate for some few moments thereon. It is a good custom, if the cogitation be brief. And the reviewer scarcely remembers an orchestral season whose record prompts briefer riminiscent rumination than the present one. It held almost nothing that now remains noteworthy in remembrance. One's outstanding impression is that of a veritable jamboree of miscellany, a programmatic olla podrida, a conductorial assemblage of odds and ends. The orchestral leaders made their concerts symphonic vaudeville.

In other years conductors framed their programs, individually and at times collectively, according to some plan. There appeared some definite and coherent aim in selection and arrangement, some attempt at presentation of recognizable contrast in grouped styles and periods of music, some nub of unity, some point in purpose. During the season still current conductors have seemed to be guided chiefly by a curious emulation of one another's lack of thought and design. They have all been almost equally at fault, save only Mr. Stokowski, of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Further contribution to the programatic pot-pourri was thus made on Saturday by Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, at the final concert of its matinee series in Carnegie Hall. Here was the following assortment: Saint-Saens's C minor symphony, with its organ rhodomontade; Bach's second "Brandenburg" concerto; the symphonic excerpt from Cesar Franck's "Redemption"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz."

Perhaps this programme held some plan or purpose other than that known to any manager of vaudeville, but if it did, the reviewer finds it undiscoverable.

It is understood that the Boston Orchestra will have another conductor next season, who, it has not yet been determined. It is, therefore, perhaps not necessary to pursue comment further upon Saturday's concert. Mr. Rabaud has drilled the orchestra into a good symphonic band, but it is to be hoped that its former position will be restored through the choice of a leader next season who is more than a thorough drill master with thorough...

EVENING POST
s New York City
MAR 24 1919

Bach In Puris Naturalibus.

The press agent's preliminary announcements regarding the season's final Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conveyed the indelicate suggestion that Bach's second Brandenburg concerto would be exhibited on this occasion stark naked; that is, without any of the draperies and tapestries hung over it by the Bach Gesellschaft and other modern editors. No tampering was to be allowed. M. Rabaud was to give the only genuine and original Bach score, and nothing but that. Now M. Rabaud is known to be a very conservative conductor. He has eliminated from the Beethoven scores the emendations of great German conductors, including Wagner, made in the conviction that Beethoven himself, had he lived later, would have made these changes. But M. Rabaud did not present Bach in puris naturalibus. If he had done so, he would have had to use only three first and three second violins, and everything else in proportion (Bach never used more) instead of the full Boston Orchestra. One was glad to hear the whole orchestra in this music, but, fortunately, it was not the only genuine and original Bach. There had to be a considerable amount of "editing," especially as regards the impossible trumpet parts; and as Bach, in a number of passages, left nothing but a figured bass, it was necessary to write out a filling-out to correspond with his intentions. Wolfrum used a modern grand piano for this purpose; Rabaud, a harpsichord. Undoubtedly the harpsichord is preferable historically; but its still small voice was on Saturday almost inaudible, and a piano would have been preferable. In the matter of the solo trumpet M. Rabaud followed the example of Mottl of dividing its part between two trumpets; and Mottl was one of the editors and drapers who were to be eliminated.

The performance of the concerto in which solo violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet speak out in meeting was an... which preceded it, the Symphonic Piece from Franck's "Rédemption" and Saint-Saëns's third symphony, with organ, which becomes so superbly inspired and eloquent in its last movement. Saint-Saëns "not a great creator"? Go to! The composer of these symphonies, the violin concertos (second to none), the four symphonic poems, the "Samson et Dalila," not a great creator? Go to!

The concert, which closed with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and Weber's "Freischütz" overture, demonstrated once more M. Rabaud's rare ability as a conductor. His readings of French works in particular, have been a great treat, and he has done wonders in drilling the new Boston Orchestra, which, at the beginning of this season, after losing thirty of its best men, seemed in a discouraging plight. All praise and honor to Henri Rabaud.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

123

Henri Rabaud Conducts Final Concerts of Boston Orchestra

French Composer Leaves to Devote His Time to Composition. A Musician of Taste and Intelligence Who Maintained Finest Traditions of the Orchestra—Why Does Not the Metropolitan Subsidize American Composers? — And Now the Mechanical Instrument in Recital Halls.

The week past witnessed the final concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and undoubtedly the final appearances here of Henri Rabaud as a conductor, for while no official word has come from Boston regarding next year it has been understood for some time that Mr. Rabaud would not consent to return for another season. He has found the most congenial conditions in Boston, has had a rare opportunity for musical expression in the orchestra at his command, but the fact of the matter is that he is a composer and prefers to devote all of his time to composition. Certainly the duties of conducting as many concerts as the Boston Symphony gives in the course of a year yields little time for any effort in the field of composition.

Mr. Rabaud's task was not an easy one. Conditions due to the war had disrupted the best orchestra in the land to the extent of its losing twenty-three of its most dependable factors. From the time of Dr. Muck's internment until the fall the reorganized business management of the orchestra had made unsuccessful attempts to secure a conductor. Finally Mr. Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House staff was engaged for the first month of the season. His was the groundwork that was to prepare a foundation upon which Mr. Rabaud was to build.

Yet in spite of the necessarily hasty preparation of the forces under his control, in spite of the traditions which laid a heavy burden upon any conductor who had to follow in the footsteps of the illustrious ones of the past, in spite of a natural tendency on the part of subscribers to draw unfavorable comparisons, Mr. Rabaud won instant favor. He soon welded the individual parts of the orchestral body into a flexible expressive instrument. Upon it he exerted the potent charm and informing skill of his own personality. His readings of classicist and modernist have been distinguished above all else by taste and intelligent musicianship. He has never been a picturesque conductor, never a man to win gallery delight. On the other hand, a sincere, gifted musician, who understands every composition in hand and knows how to reveal its inmost essence with style and euphony.

His finest efforts have been disclosed in the readings of the Beethoven symphonies and in the revelation of the secrets of the contemporary French school of composition. The two represent almost opposite poles of musical thought, yet we have heard noteworthy expression of the Beethoven romantic classicism and of the rich color fabrics of Ravel and Debussy. Nor must there be forgotten his particularly lucid interpretations of the tone poems of Saint-Saens. Probably never had these works been heard in the fullness of their glory until Mr. Rabaud's coming.

His leaving will be a matter of regret. Who his successor will be lies in the lap of the gods and of the Bostonians who speak only to God, as the rhyme has it. Rumor mentions Toscanini, and now that the war is over and there will be little need for that genius of conductors to remain in Italy it may well be that he will next year direct the fortunes of the Boston band. Of course, he is practically unknown here as a symphonic conductor, but a man of his understanding and rare ability could not do less than furnish us with striking and compelling individual ach[illegible] Metropolitan

om HERALD
dress: New York City

Boston Orchestra, Purged of Germans, in Final Concert

Freed from German domination for the first time in its long career, the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its local season with a concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday. No great symphonic organization has undergone a more thorough housecleaning than that which the men from Boston passed through during the season just ending. Dominated by Doktor Karl Muck, kulturist, and teeming with German musicians for years, it finally turned him out and in France found in Henri Rabaud its new conductor. He is French, and many of the musicians in the orchestra were newly recruited from the ranks of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, which made a tour of the United States last autumn.

The programme of the farewell concert also had as its most pretentious number a French symphony, that in C minor, No. 3, opus 78, of Saint-Saens, known as the "organ symphony." Its graceful melodies were played with true feeling for the French master's ideas. There was more fire and more finesse in the interpretation of Mr. Rabaud tha he has shown for any of the sym nies of Beethoven or other dead Gern. which he has presented during the season.

An unusual number was Bach's concerto No. 2, in F, for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. It was played with harpsichord accompaniment, not, as is usually the case with Bach's music, in a modernized version. The audience found its rollicking rhythms infectious and not at all dry.

Franck's "La Redemption," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," completed the programme. Considering the changes in the personnel of the orchestra and the tremendous task of the new conductor in reorganizing everything from programmes to concert meister, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had a remarkable seaso

m SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.

MAR 2 3 19

British Honored Madame Melba

"MY son shall follow his own bent," said Colonel Newcome in Thackeray's novel. "As long as his calling is honest it becomes a gentleman, and if he were to take a fancy to play on the fiddle—actually on the fiddle—I shouldn't object."

The social status of a musician has risen since those days. Not only may a pianist rule Poland and an English lord compose symphonies — Mme. Melba, a professional singer, with no lineal nobility of descent, has won her way by mere genius and personality to the social pinnacle of England and the warm friendship of the royal family.

To be received by the highest ladies of the land is the smallest part of it—she has now a title of her own. For last March "it pleased his Most Gracious Majesty" to appoint her "Dame Commander of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire" (D. B. E.), an order created "in recognition of manifold services by civilians in connection with the war." She is second only to H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, grand master of the order; H. M. the Queen, Dame of the Grand Cross, and H. R. H. the Duke of Connaught.

"Dame" Melba's services have indeed been "manifold"—the beginning of the great European war found her in Australia, where in recent years she has spent much time with her father. Directly the war began the great Australian singer threw herself heart and soul into the Red Cross movement, and in a year, from the concerts that she organized and in which she sang, she raised over $100,000 for the Red Cross and kindred purposes. Her greatest success came in Melbourne, April 27, when she gave a concert in aid of the Belgian Relief Fund which brought $30,000. About a third of this sum came from the sale of flags of the Allies which Madame Melba herself auctioned off. She received $125 for a Russian naval ensign. The next flag sold was that of Poland, and just before selling it Madame Melba read a telegram she had just received from Paderewski, asking for help for his countrymen. This flag sold for $1,000. Two Australian flags brought the comparatively small sums of $300 and $200. One Union Jack brought $250 and another $150.

"Then," according to the Melbourne Argus, "Madame Melba unfurled and waved a Belgian flag. 'This flag,' she said, 'I hold in deepest reverence. The whole world knows from what it saved us all. It is to be hung in this Town Hall as a memento. On a tablet beside it will be written the names of those who bid £100. To each a replica will be given, and I hope that his Majesty the King of the Belgians will sign it.'"

Mme. Melba made the first bid herself of £100. Her father, David Mitchell, raised it another hundred pounds and finally it sold for the extraordinary sum of £2,100, or $10,500. In December 1917, Mme. Melba joined Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert for the benefit of sufferers from the Halifax disaster, which alone brought more than $10,000.

HERALD
New York City

MUSIC
BY REGINALD DE KOVEN

Musical Prohibition-

That sturdy and vigorous plant, the musical season of 1918-19, which has budded, bourgeoned and blossomed into a garden of musical flowers of rather more than usual varied interest, now begins evidently to wane. The Philadelphia Orchestra has completed its series of five concerts without having accomplished anything notable or distinguished beyond their tale of five rather academic programmes, on the whole well contrived and well interpreted by Leopold Stokowski and his very efficient orchestra. To the best of my recollection, he has not chosen to represent the American composer at all, so that these programmes, however artistic in execution, have been distinctly lacking in novel or national interest.

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its season of five pairs of concerts, a season principally remarkable because of its new conductor. In Henri Rabaud the New York concertgoing public was quick to recognize a musician both distinguished and sincere, an appealing personality and a gift of interpretation and conducting as evident as it was effective. In spite of his early expressed attitude in support of American music and the American composer, in these ten concerts Mr. Rabaud has given us but one work by an American composer, and that was a new one, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Frederick S Converse. In this respect, a fact which I regret, Mr. Rabaud's performances, at least so far as New York is concerned, have fallen far below his promises.

Considering the universal acclaim with which French composers, French conductors and French music generally have been greeted this season by the American music loving public, I cannot but feel, as reciprocity is the soul not only of commerce but of reciprocal friendly relations of any kind, that in this respect Mr. Rabaud has been decidedly delinquent. We American musicians who are striving for recognition—striving to do the best we can to give dignity and artistic significance to what we write—can hardly but feel that in this result of Mr. Rabaud's large promises he only, unexpectedly and disappointingly, proves to be a representative of those foreign influences which retard and are really inimical to our national musical development. But, however this may be, the fact that Mr. Rabaud's genuine talents and undoubted aptitude as a conductor have restored a really national institution like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the place in our musical life that its long and successful artistic effort entitles it to hold is one that must be recognized, commended and appreciated at its

INQUIRER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.

Rachmaninoff With Orchestra

The Philadelphia Orchestra concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next promise to be among the outstanding musical events of the season. "The giant of the Russians," Sergei Rachmaninoff, will be the soloist, playing his own concerto, the first in F sharp minor. The symphony will be the E minor of Henri Rabaud, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Stokowski introduced to American audiences on October 24, 1913, and which met with such popular favor at that time and at subsequent performances.

In New York it is commonly said that this has been a "Rachmaninoff year," and the same might also be said of Philadelphia, for at his several recitals and orchestral appearance the great Russian has been received with rapturous acclaim. Speaking of his first concerto, which he will play at these concerts, Rachmaninoff said in an interview in the Boston Evening Transcript shortly after his quiet and unexpected return to the United States: "It is a work of my youth (I wrote it before I was nineteen); naturally, therefore, it contained many effects, many passages that needed revision. These I have made, and I hope to play the composition in its new form some time this season." This revision was made in Scandinavia, whither Rachmaninoff fled after the new Russian regime had stripped him of his property and deprived him of other sources of income.

Since Mr. Stokowski "discovered" the E minor symphony of Rabaud in the summer of 1913, in Paris, it has had several sympathetic readings under his baton. After its first performance in this country, on October 24, 1913, a correspondent wrote to Mr. Stokowski, saying: "When you found that symphony, yours must have been the rapture of a discoverer into whose ken a new planet swims," to which he replied: "You are right. I was overjoyed. All summer long I played the music over to myself in a sort of ecstasy. It seemed then, and it seems now, one of the distinctively high-minded and fine-tempered works of modern musical authorship. It bears witness to a patrician mentality in the composer. It has not the rugged intellectuality of Brahms or even of Mahler, but it is a work nobly conceived and at the same time easy to play."

As the introductory number, Mr. Stokowski has programmed the "Norwegian Rhapsody" of Lalo, which, since it has not been heard here since 1910, will be somewhat in the nature of novelty.

EVENING WORLD
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its farewell to us for the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Mr. Rabaud and his band did not reach the high level of Thursday night, but their programme, which included Saint-Saens's "Organ" symphony; Bach's concerto for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet; an excerpt from Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz" was enjoyed by the usual crowded house.

EVENING MAIL
ess: New York City

LAST BOSTON CONCERT.

THOSE earnest souls who, as Edith Wharton incisively says, "pursue culture in bands, as if afraid to meet it alone," must always go to the Saturday afternoon concerts when the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits us. But into the last programme of the season Mr. Rabaud injected a variety for every musical taste.

He put grandeur into his playing of the Saint-Saens Organ Symphony, a breezy vitality into the Bach Brandenburg concerto, an insinuating fascination into Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," and he drew refreshment from Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz." It was a farewell with joy for the spirit and comfort for the arid days ahead of us when the orchestral voices are all silent.

EVENING JOURNAL
s New York City

A MISCELLANEOUS FAREWELL.

The music season, trailing out in enfeebled fashion toward the end of March, customarily gives the reviewer pause wherein to glance backward over the record of what has been listened to, and to cogitate for some few moments thereon. It is a good custom, if the cogitation be brief. And the reviewer scarcely remembers an orchestral season whose record prompts briefer riminiscent rumination than the present one. It held almost nothing that now remains noteworthy in remembrance. One's outstanding impression is that of a veritable jamboree of miscellany, a programmatic olla podrida, a conductorial assemblage of odds and ends. The orchestral leaders made their concerts symphonic vaudeville.

In other years conductors framed their programs, individually and at times collectively, according to some plan. There appeared some definite and coherent aim in selection and arrangement, some attempt at presentation of recognizable contrast in grouped styles and periods of music, some nub of unity, some point in purpose. During the season still current conductors have seemed to be guided chiefly by a curious emulation of one another's lack of thought and design. They have all been almost equally at fault, save only Mr. Stokowski, of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Further contribution to the programatic pot-pourri was thus made on Saturday by Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, at the final concert of its matinee series in Carnegie Hall. Here was the following assortment: Saint-Saens's C minor symphony, with its organ rhodomontade; Bach's second "Brandenburg" concerto; the symphonic excerpt from Cesar Franck's "Redemption"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz."

Perhaps this programme held some plan or purpose other than that known to any manager of vaudeville, but if it did, the reviewer finds it undiscoverable.

It is understood that the Boston Orchestra will have another conductor next season, who, it has not yet been determined. It is, therefore, perhaps not necessary to pursue comment further upon Saturday's concert. Mr. Rabaud has drilled the orchestra into a good symphonic band, but it is to be hoped that its former position will be restored through the choice of a leader next season who is more than a thorough drill master, with thorough

EVENING POST
s New York City

Bach In Puris Naturalibus.

The press agent's preliminary announcements regarding the season's final Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conveyed the indelicate suggestion that Bach's second Brandenburg concerto would be exhibited on this occasion stark naked; that is, without any of the draperies and tapestries hung over it by the Bach Gesellschaft and other modern editors. No tampering was to be allowed. M. Rabaud was to give the only genuine and original Bach score, and nothing but that. Now M. Rabaud is known to be a very conservative conductor. He has eliminated from the Beethoven scores the emendations of great German conductors, including Wagner, made in the conviction that Beethoven himself, had he lived later, would have made these changes. But M. Rabaud did not present Bach in puris naturalibus. If he had done so, he would have had to use only three first and three second violins, and everything else in proportion (Bach never used more) instead of the full Boston Orchestra. One was glad to hear the whole orchestra in this music, but, fortunately, it was not the only genuine and original Bach. There had to be a considerable amount of "editing," especially as regards the impossible trumpet parts; and as Bach, in a number of passages, left nothing but a figured bass, it was necessary to write out a filling-part to correspond with his intentions. Wolfrum used a modern grand piano for this purpose; Rabaud, a harpsichord. Undoubtedly the harpsichord is preferable historically; but its still small voice was on Saturday almost inaudible, and a piano would have been preferable. In the matter of the solo trumpet M. Rabaud followed the example of Mottl of dividing its part between two trumpets; and Mottl was one of the editors and drapers who were to be eliminated.

The performance of the concerto in which solo violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet speak out in meeting was ad-

[illegible] works which preceded it, the Symphonic Piece from Franck's "Rédemption" and Saint-Saëns's third symphony, with organ, which becomes so superbly inspired and eloquent in its last movement. Saint-Saëns "not a great creator"? Go to! The composer of these symphonies, the violin concertos (second to none), the four symphonic poems, the "Samson et Dalila," not a great creator? Go to!

The concert, which closed with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and Weber's "Fleischütz" overture, demonstrated once more M. Rabaud's rare ability as a conductor. His readings of French works, in particular, have been a great treat, and he has done wonders in drilling the new Boston Orchestra, which, at the beginning of this season, after losing thirty of its best men, seemed in a discouraging plight. All praise and honor to Henri Rabaud.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Naturalibus.

's preliminary anrding the season's concert of the Boshestra conveyed the n that Bach's sec-concerto would be casion stark naked;
ny of the draperies ng over it by the
and other modern ring was to be al-was to give the only al Bach score, and Now M. Rabaud is y conservative con-liminated from the
the emendations of nductors, including the conviction that had he lived later, these changes. But t present Bach in
If he had done so,
d to use only three second violins, and proportion (Bach
instead of the full
One was glad to hestra in this music,
t, was not the only al Bach. There had derable amount of lly as regards the et parts; and as er of passages, left red bass, it was necut a filling-part to his intentions. Wolern grand piano for baud, a harpsichord,
harpsichord is pref-
; but its still small aturday almost in-ano would have been e matter of the solo aud followed the ex-dividing its part be-pets; and Mottl was rs and drapers who
nated.
ce of the concerto in n, flute, oboe, and in meeting was ad-

EVENING GLOBE

dress New York City

ate

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The local series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the current season came to an end with the concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The programme chosen by Mr. Rabaud for this occasion consisted of Saint-Saëns's symphony in C minor (with organ), the symphonic piece from César Franck's "Redemption," Bach's second "Brandenburg" concerto, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," and the overture to "Der Freischütz." Though this programme looked dangerously long on paper, it did not prove so in the performance.

The afternoon was one of admirable orchestral playing. The C minor symphony of Saint-Saëns, performed continually in Paris, is rarely given in this country, perhaps because our makers of symphonic programmes are a little shy of the organ. The performance Saturday had feeling, finesse, and in some pages imposing speed and power. Hearing the symphony played so, one realizes that it deservedly ranks among the best of its author's compositions.

For the Bach concerto Mr. Rabaud did not employ the Mottl version, but returned to something much nearer Bach's original, including the harpsichord. The poetic andante, and the brilliant concluding allegro were particularly effective. The remaining feature of the concert was the remarkably rich, sonorous, and romantically felt performance of Weber's familiar overture. As Mr. Rabaud conducted it one could almost imagine that the orchestration had been done by Richard Strauss!

So ended the first New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under French direction. Mr. Rabaud, it is an open secret, has had no easy time of it with the local public. But being a conductor of imagination, energy, finesse, and a cunning a bit diabolical, as well as a musician of superior accomplishment, he has won the favor of all discriminating and unbiassed listeners. Whether or not he is to return to the Boston orchestra another season has not been divulged, but he has proved himself a conductor entirely worthy to lead the best orchestra of the world.

Let no one suppose that the Boston Symphony Orchestra—as some ill-informed or prejudiced persons have busily reported—has fallen away from its standard of other years. At the beginning of the present season the necessity of replacing a third of the members by new men showed its effect in an ensemble appreciably less near to perfection than the well-nigh flawless fusion of the band as previously constituted. But even then the orchestra was one of high distinction and the elements were present to lift it to still higher distinction. Under the expert drilling of Mr. Monteux at the beginning and of Mr. Rabaud later on, the reconstructed orchestra has reached a pitch of excellence even higher than before the change. The second violins, which were an appreciable weakness of the old orchestra, are now clearly fortified. The first violins have resumed the golden transparency which at the beginning of the season had been temporarily clouded. The 'cellos never sounded so rich and vital.

Altogether, the present season, opening with new problems to solve, has been one of signal triumph for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for its accomplished French conductors.

AMERICAN

New York City

Toscanini to Head the Coming Season at Covent Garden

ACCORDING to reports from London, Arturo Toscanini is to be the musical director-in-chief of the annual opera season in Covent Garden, to open in May.

The great Italian conductor's decision to accept an engagement, which was offered to him repeatedly in the past, but which he consistently refused, makes it all the more plausible that he will cross the Atlantic next Fall.

There is little likelihood at present that Maestro Toscanini will return to the Metropolitan Opera House. But it is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is more than anxious to procure his services for a term of years.

Financially, it would seem, the famous organization's record this season has been far from satisfactory; there is talk of a large deficit, and the new directors have reached the conclusion that they need a man of supreme ability to re-establish the band in the position it held formerly in the esteem of the public.

As Toscanini expressed his willingness to assume the leadership of the Boston Orchestra after an urgent request had been transmitted to Italy by Senator Lodge, there is nothing apparently to prevent a definite agreement unless it be the conditions he demands.

Those who know the indomitable Italian musician are fully aware that he would not be satisfied with a remunerative salary alone, but would insist on having a free hand in the choice of programmes—a privilege which seemingly was not extended to Henri Rabaud, who felt much hampered by limitations imposed upon him.

In the midst of the war, last year, Toscanini would not conduct con-

EVENING POST

ess New York City

APR 29 1919

MY friend Max Smith, who seems to be in telegraphic, telephonic, telephotographic and telepathic communication with Signor Arturo Toscanini every hour of the day, makes the interesting announcement, in the American, that that great maestro of the bâton is to be the conductor of the Covent Garden opera season in London, beginning in May. It is not likely that he will return to our Metropolitan next season; but the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, it is rumored, very anxious to secure his services for a term of years, and he "expressed his willingness to assume the leadership of the Boston Orchestra after an urgent request had been transmitted to Italy by Senator Lodge."

Patrons of the Boston Orchestra's concerts in New York would be sorry to part so soon with Henri Rabaud, whose racy readings of French works have been relished so much this season. Would Toscanini feature Italian works on his programmes? No, for there are none worth talking about. Music in Italy still means opera first, opera second, and opera last. Where the sympathies of Italy's chief conductor lie is well known to those familiar with his career. If he could have had a monopoly of the Wagner operas he would probably not have left New York. Last year, in the midst of the war, says Max Smith, "Toscanini would not conduct concerts save with the understanding that he could present such works of German origin as he saw fit to select." Like all true patriots and sensible people, he sees no more reason for not enjoying German music than for not demanding part payment of war indemnities in the form of German works of art in general. And that seems to be the general attitude in Italy. I read the other day that the largest attendance at a series of concerts in Rome was on the day when Beethoven was on the programme.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 8,

At the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra on April 18 and 19, Mr. Stock will repeat Mr. Carpenter's symphony, heard also in Boston a year ago. Admittedly, no symphony comparable with it, except Mr. Loeffler's, has yet been written by an American composer. None the less, it has enjoyed only five performances, one at Norfolk, where it was produced; two at Chicago in the autumn of 1917, and two in Boston in the spring of 1918. It is a pity that Mr. Rabaud has not found room for it, for Mr. Loeffler's symphony and for d'Indy's second symphony on his programmes this year. All three deserve first performance here; while d'Indy's masterpiece has not been heard in Boston for at least eight years. If there is place at the Symphony Concerts for Mr. Hadley and Mr. Foote, there surely ought to be room—and many times over—for Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Carpenter.

At the Symphony Concert—Mme. Ixe (reading from the programme). Mozart, Symphony in D major (Köchel, 504). What does Köchel mean?

Mme. Zed.—Oh, that's the man who arranged it for orchestra.

Now, as a matter of fact, Köchel was the diligent scholar who first catalogued Mozart's music and gave numbers to his pieces that they have ever afterward borne. Besides, Mozart himself had a pretty knack at "arranging his music for orchestra."

HERALD, APRIL 5,

SYMPHONY IN 20TH CONCERT

Malipiero's "The Pauses of Silence" Given for First Time in Boston

JACQUES THIBAUD, VIOLINIST, ASSISTS

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in D major (K. 504); Malipiero, "The Pauses of Silence" (first time in Boston); Saint-Saens, Concerto in B minor No. 3 for violin (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Liszt, "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6 (after Victor Hugo's poem).

Malipiero, whose composition, "Pauses of Silence," was performed here yesterday probably for the first time in this country, belongs to a young Italian group that includes Tommasini, Respighi, Pizzetti, Casella and some others. Tommasini is known here by a string quartet played some years ago by the Kneisels. An orchestral piece by him was recently performed in Chicago; one by Respighi in New York. It is said that Malipiero has studied attentively the music of Moussorgsky, Stravinsky and young Hungarian composers. The orchestral piece heard yesterday reveals him as an original thinker, a man of pronounced individuality, not only a thinker but a doer.

"The Pauses of Silence." What does the title mean? The composer has sensibly offered no public explanation. Some one gave the sub-title: "Shudders, Songs, Cries, Laments," but we prefer the simpler "Seven Symphonic Expressions"; for these little pieces joined together by a motive, which, at once announced, calls attention, are evidently expressions of moods. If the hearer's moods happen to be in sympathy with the composer's, he may dilate with the fitting emotion. These short pieces suggest mental conditions, but fortunately there is no printed program or argument.

Mr. Philip Greeley Clapp in his interesting article about Malipiero and the "Pauses," published in the Evening Transcript of Thursday says: "Mr. Rabaud is reminded of the vast, hot, hazy and mysterious landscapes of the Campagna and Sicily, with their strange and vivid colors echoed in sound by snatches of tune from the pipes of unseen shepherds; though, of course, he absolves the composer of any intention specifically to paint these scenes." Certain pages of music lead one to think that this conjecture is not unreasonable, but other pages suggest the tonal portraiture of mental conditions, as we have said; or the music might borrow a title from Walt Whitman: "Sleep Chasings."

The seven "expressions" are interesting in many ways. Not only do they appeal to the student and the mature musician by the harmonic structure and the instrumentation, but they make a sensorial appeal to the unprofessional. The boldness of the man, a boldness that does not seem affected, but is natural to his speech; striking orchestral effects and equally striking contrasts in mood; passages of the utmost wildness following those of unconventional but genuine beauty—these impress, even at one hearing.

Mr. George Moore knew in his sojourn in Paris a strange musician, one Cabaner, poor but wearing silk shirts, generous, talking magnificently about his art. The music by Cabaner that we have seen is most commonplace, but he should be remembered by a remark to Mr. Moore: "To express silence in music, I should need at least three brass bands." This saying is not so paradoxical as it seems at first. There were moments yesterday when one might be pardoned for thinking that Malipiero had pondered Cabaner's theory.

Strange as the music is, it made its way, for it was applauded with greater fervor than is customary when a new composition, not by a local musician, is brought before the public. Mr. Rabaud is again to be thanked for acquainting us with contemporaneous works.

Mr. Thibaud first visited Boston in November, 1903, yet he played here with the orchestra yesterday for the first time. He was famous throughout Europe before he came to this city. The neglect of this thrice admirable violinist for so many years is unaccountable. We believe, however, that he was once engaged, five or six years ago, but he was obliged to return unexpectedly to Paris. Yesterday he played Saint-Saens' concerto with the elegance that characterizes the music itself; he played with the purity and finesse in the phrasing with the beauty of tone, with, in a word, the consummate art that long ago put him in the very front rank of the world's violinists.

Mozart-Liszt-Malipiero. The stubborn reactionaries might insist that these three illustrate the gradual debasement of music. Nearly every composer is of his own period. In the 18th century there was little or no feverish emotional expression. Liszt was pre-eminently a man of his day and generation, but he foresaw much that is even now hailed as modern. For a time he was overshadowed by Wagner, who stole unblushingly from his scores. "Mazeppa" still quickens the blood. It is not without circus-pomp, but this is preferable to Liszt's occasional excursions in the field of childish, rank sentimentalism. The superb interpretation of "Mazeppa" by Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra should have convinced even the stubborn that Liszt has not been ejected by Time from the hall of the imortals.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Magnard, Hymn to Jus- (first time in Boston); Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Foote, Four Characteristic Pieces; Dubois, overture,

RABAUD CONDUCTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

Thibaud Justly Acclaimed in Saint-Saens Concerto

Mr Rabaud conducted another program of more than ordinary interest at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. Mozart's D major symphony was played with true distinction. It was followed by a new symphonic voice out of Italy which laid lurid emphasis upon the interval of a century and a third between the composers. Jacques Thibaud, playing for the first time at these concerts, ennobled Saint-Saens' third concerto with an art which holds something more than violinistic skill. Last of all, Liszt's sturdy old war horse, "Mazeppa," in which the galloping beast blazed a path for later symphonic poems.

Although in this symphony Mozart wrote no minuet, there is the courtly manner of the dance. A patrician elegance marks every bar; music which no plebeian soul could have made or played. And yet it is free from snobbery. Following the dignity of the introductory adagio the allegro is like a psalm of thanksgiving. All life is aglow, yet without boisterousness, without the hint of excess. The beauty of the song of the slow movement, with less of the melancholy of Mozart than some, was appropriately sung, and the last movement played with a spirit which, in attaining ardor, did not mar clearness or proportion.

Composer of New School

"The Pauses of Silence, Seven Symphonic Expressions," played for the first time in Boston, is by a young Italian, G. Francisco Malipiero, who is a member of a new school of composition demanding recognition in that country. The article reprinted in the program book from an address delivered in New York in February, by Ugo Ara, returning violist of the Flonzaley Quartet, is singularly interesting and informing.

In it he fixes the position of the group of young idealists of which Malipiero is a member as between the futuristic Bolsheviki, who enthrone violence and noise, and the conservatives, such as the established Sgambati, Martucci and Bossi, the last of whom was Malipiero's teacher.

Malipiero's score commands instant attention, at first perhaps by its fearless, daringly aggressive individuality, but it is an individuality which speaks for itself, as from a desire for bold expression, made in sincerity rather than merely with the intent of occasioning amazement or uplifted eyebrows. Whether or not the ascribed subtitle: "Shudders, songs, cries, laments," be accepted as a program, the insatiate, hectic unrest makes its effect. It plays about and returns to the first theme of mingled protest and questioning, and all ends with the question unanswered.

Work Well Worth Hearing

There are moments when the poignant outcry best betokens the anguish of silence in the soul which it may have broken. And there are moments, as in the piling of one tonality clashing in the brass upon another near the close, when the effect is more crass than stupendous, and the tragedy becomes pathos. All in all, a work well worth hearing.

Mr Thibaud's art is of a finer fiber than is to be associated ordinarily with the polished exterior of Saint-Saens' concerto. While he played it with something more than an urbane, well-bred elegance, he did not attempt to give its graceful contours or rhapsodical brilliance an emotional depth which would have been incongruous.

He is not a man for the multitude, but his skill is ever commanding—yesterday superb in strength and ardor—and his spirit is one which communes with the loftiest beauty.

In all Mr Rabaud conducted with the discrimination, the poetic insight and warmth which he has taught us to expect. Liszt's spavined old steed, with his luckless rider, raced head and tail in air down the course with a new gait.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL APRIL 9,

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SEASON'S FINAL

Chilean Pianist Soloist in Last Concert of Series.

FINE PROGRAMME GIVEN

Miss Rosita Renard Makes Initial Appearance in Providence with Celebrated Orchestra and Scores Big Hit.—Americanized Organization Heard to Advantage.

The fifth and last of the Boston Symphony concerts given in Infantry Hall last evening was notable for its introduction to a Providence audience of Miss Rosita Renard, the young and gifted Chilean pianist, and also for the magnificent performance of Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-Minor.

It was a fitting close to a successful season—one in which the Americanized orchestra showed that its powers have been increased rather than diminished by the exclusion of an undesirable element. This season's concerts have, in fact, been of musical interest. The programmes were up to the very best symphony standards and their performance under Henri Rabaud has been a revelation to many. If to the hypercritical there has seemed to be a falling off of the supreme technical finish of past years, there has been a more than counterbalancing increase in the spirit of the organization, and it is certain that the orchestra has never given more inspiring renditions of great works than has been accomplished under Henri Rabaud during the present season.

Witness, for example, the playing of the Cesar Franck symphony last evening. This noble work, one of the richest and best of modern orchestral works, was interpreted with a nobility and elevation of style that will remain long in the memory of those who heard it. The men played as if inspired by its grandeur. To hear this massive symphony under such favorable conditions one marvels at the story of its lukewarm acceptance at the time of its first performance in Paris in 1889.

The programme was played last evening as follows:

Mozart.....Symphony in D-major (Koechel, 504)
Adagio; Allegro.
Andante.
Finale: Presto.
Liszt.....Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1
For pianoforte.
Cesar Franck.....Symphony in D-minor
Lento; Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppo

The Mozart Symphony in D-major, recognized as one of his best, was played with bright, vivacious style; simply, and in keeping with its melodious, fresh character. In this work M. Rabaud with unerring artistic judgment evolved from the score the spirit of the genius that lived long years ago.

This excellent director, laboring under the disadvantage of assuming his duties at a time of reorganization has proved most worthy of the task and is entitled to full credit. The audience last evening recognized the splendid results achieved and undoubtedly much of the spontaneous and hearty applause was bestowed in his honor.

The soloist of the evening Miss Rosita Renard, received an ovation at the close of her number. The Liszt Concerto No. 1, in E-flat major, is a big work for a girl of such youthful appearance to select. Her playing, however, dispelled any doubts of her ability to cope with it successfully. It was, indeed, a remarkably brilliant, vital performance. This young lady has the true spark of genius. A virile and beautiful tone, a splendidly developed technique and a world of temperament combined to make her playing of the difficult concerto one of gripping interest. At its close there was a great outburst of applause, which was continued until the charming young artist had been recalled five times.

GLOBE APRIL 9,

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL FOR APRIL 25 POSTPONED

The parade of the 26th Division, which has been set for Friday afternoon, April 25th, coincides with the regular 23d Boston Symphony Orchestra matinee. Therefore the management has decided, in honor of the returning troops and for the convenience of the subscribers, to postpone the concert until the following (Saturday) afternoon, April 26. The Saturday evening concert taking place as usual, the pair will fall upon the same day. Subscribers' tickets marked April 25 will therefore serve for Saturday afternoon, April 26, at 2:30 o'clock. Miss Sophie Braslau, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, is to be the soloist at this pair of concerts, which is the last but one of the season.

TRANSCRIPT APRIL 9,

Items and Announcements

A Symphony Concert on the afternoon of the day in which the returned New England troops are parading is obviously out of the question. Symphony Hall would be difficult to approach, the procession would be passing the doors, while the concert was in progress; the interest of the usual audience would be elsewhere than in music and orchestra. Accordingly the twenty-third afternoon concert, dated for Friday, April 25, will take place on Saturday afternoon, April 26. In the evening the regular concert of Saturday will follow it. Seldom, if ever before, has the Symphony Orchestra undertaken two concerts on a single day. To shift the afternoon concert to Thursday was impossible, because of the engagements of the assisting singer, Miss Braslau.

From several quarters the suggestion comes to this column that, before the end of the season, Mr. Rabaud repeat at a pair of Symphony Concerts, Malipiero's piece, "The Pauses of Silence," first heard last week and then applauded beyond any other novel music at Symphony Hall within recent memory. It is so short that it would not much lengthen any programme into which it would becomingly fit; while beyond question it stirred curiosities and yielded satisfactions that a repetition would gratify.

At a semi-private concert of the MacDowell Club at Jordan Hall this afternoon, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Monsieur Gedalge, the French composer and eminent teacher at the Conservatory, will be played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Félix Fox is the pianist and Mr. Longy leads the orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT APRIL

SYMPHONY CONCERT

INTERESTING MUSIC, BECOMINGLY PLAYED

Mr. Rabaud Finds Fresh and True Voice for Beethoven, Pastoral—A Large and Eloquent Piece by Magnard—Mr. Foote's Pleasant Suite and Applauding Neighbors—Old Dubois Resuscitated for Ten Minutes

WHEN, toward the middle of May, Mr. Rabaud, returning from Boston through Bordeaux to Paris, alights in the Gare d' Orléans—or is it the Gare Montparnasse?—his fellow-composers are in gratitude bound to assemble in numbers on the arrival-platform to salute him. Scarcely one of them writing symphonic music—old, young or of the middle generation, academic or advanced, eminent or believing himself eminent—has he overlooked in the twenty-two programmes of the Boston Orchestra under his leadership. The sallow and chubby Saint-Saëns, yellow and smooth as a billiard ball should be there to greet him. Never before in a single season have so many of his pieces been played in a series of Symphony Concerts in America. Beside him may hobble the venerable Dubois now in his eighty-third year. Did he not have an inning yesterday, the first he has won in a decade or two at Symphony Hall, with his overture to the Scandinavian saga of "Frithjof"? Why should he not propose his songful motive in the clarinet for the yearning heroine, set another stalking through the violoncellos for the fated but valorous hero, and let a third thunder in two choirs for the wrath of the gods, pursuing our Frithjoff? Old, safe formulas these, as safe the "working-out"—Allegro Appassionato ed Agitato—according to the good old rules applied by a skilful technician who has studied "the best models." As free from peril the measures of lamentation, the episodes of tumult. Cher Vieux! Who dares say "old hat"? Why should he not receive from his colleague of the Institute the privilege—if it is so to be named—of a hearing in Boston town? He should and he did, and for a dozen minutes an audience listened to this music by formula and process, gave it a polite round of applause—and departed.

To return to the arrival platform on that "May Night"—as composers like to entitle their pieces—of Mr. Rabaud's return to Paris. There also should be gathered the next younger generation of French music-makers—D'Indy, Fauré, Bruneau. Often has the repatriated conductor set their music in his lists. Modestly in the middle distance the eye of the imagination descries the youngest of the established composers—Ravel, Schmitt, Roger-Ducasse. Mr. Rabaud, catholically minded, has "recognized" them all. With courtesy, on the outskirts, might wait the representatives of the dead—of Debussy, Magnard, Lalo, of Franck, most of all, since our conductor has given him such place on the programmes of a season as in Boston, he never enjoyed before. And at the very door of the railway carriage—if Monsieur Ravel will let him pass and Monsieur d'Indy make a little room—should be at least an under-secretary from the Ministry of Fine Arts. Truly Mr. Rabaud has been loyal and efficient apostle with French music to the Bostonian Gentiles. There are poignées des mains, perhaps baisers according to masculine French custom. The Under-Secretary cries "Well done!" Detached voices are heard asking "How many performances?" Members of the Institute intone the melody of a new hymn to fraternity—but the eye and the ear of fancy can bear the spectacle no longer. An even-handed and discriminating man in the choice and the performance of the music of his Parisian brethren, Mr. Rabaud need dread no home-coming.

And Dubois was not the only "Vieux" of whom the conductor was considerate. Mr. Foote is no octogenarian to make a Bostonian third in a triad with Messieurs Saint-Saëns and Dubois. Indeed, he rose sprightly in his place to acknowledge the clapping of a whole audience of neighbors, bestowed not only upon the four Character-Pieces they had just heard but upon all his life and works these sixty-six years among us. The music, dating no more than twenty years back was as fresh-sounding to the ear as the composer was lively to the eye. Programmes at Symphony Hall are not over-blessed with such short, light, amusing numbers. Mr. Rabaud has diligently sought them. After seven years of silence, Mr. Foote's suite, which is of them, found voice again "at these concerts." Perhaps, it will not hereafter lie mute so long. Quatrains of Omar, as often as not celebrating the wine-cup—shameless Foote in these "dry" days!—suggested the music and more than once the composer tinges it with readily recognized but not too exotic Oriental color. Ingeniously, fancifully, he paints a tone-picture, suggests a mood by the working of melodic figures. Again a more sustained melody serves the design. In many a measure, these are the happy turns in modulation, transition, contrast, background of a well-practised composer, working con amore at a light task. Mr. Foote is as brief as though we were one of the "new men"—what an anticipating habit these old fellows have?; in its modest kind his music charms, diverts; while orchestra and conductor played it as though they were sharing the pleasure of their hearers.

Indeed, it was Mr. Rabaud's day for the lightly running touch and the band's day for clear, pliant, songful tone. Discerning was he in the swift, elastic pace at which he took all four movements—the episode of the storm necessarily excepted—of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; in the rhythmic verve and the light accent that he laid upon the music; in the easy flow that he lent to progression and climax; in the smoothness of phrasing and the limpidity of tone that he enjoined upon the

he fall into the "apparent" literalness that has been known to dull his versions of the classics; as seldom did the band fall into the raggedness of tone, the roughness of phrasing, known also to beset them in those pieces. And that, too, in a symphony in which Beethoven is prone by design or by idiosyncrasy to reiterated figures.

So played, the first division became anew fresh and sunny instrumental song, endless in fancy; the slow division wrought afresh its charm of brookside solitude and revery, sentimental, as it should be but Gallically free from every dripping languor. The dexterous detailing of the scherzo enhanced the composer's playful fancy; the finale was not inflated into a species of congregational singing, but kept, like the rest of the symphony at Mr. Rabaud's hands, its intimacy, its lyric quality of sensation and expression.

The conductor not only perceived but felt; not only released the music to his hearers but clothed it with heightening fancy and brightening voice. It is not necessary to take the Pastoral Symphony too seriously; it is not even essential to believe that Beethoven wrote it to fulfill the theories and gratify the prejudices, ninety odd years later, of Monsieur d'Indy, sometimes reputed an opinionated man. Enough that it is hard to remember when the music has sounded with such voice of bright sunshine, fresh air, blue and white sky dappled woodland and flowing brook and with such illusion of the sensations these pleasures of the open breed in quickened man. Of nature and of man stirred by nature but inarticulate in his pleasure, Beethoven has made a tone-poetry, light, lyric, glowing. Down from its classic pedestal at last came the Pastoral Symphony, to sound as human as Beethoven's self when he wandered through the Vienna woods. Out of the "standard repertory," it slipped to charm afresh. Mr. Rabaud has seemed the last conductor from whom to expect this good deed. Yet he did it.

Benefactor was the leader likewise to Magnard, as yet a composer barely heard in Boston in symphonic pieces and even dreaded there by those who have made acquaintance with a fragment of his chamber music. When "The Flonzaleys" played two months ago that Serenade from a string quartet, a more meditated, a more desiccated music seemed seldom to have fallen in dry and flavorless powder from a composer's pen. Of another quality, however, was Magnard's "Hymn to Justice," as conductor and orchestra played it yesterday—the first of the composer's symphonic numbers to be heard here since the forgotten, but eloquent, "Dirge" of 1905 and Mr. d'Indy's visit. Magnard hymns the retributive power of Justice in long and large measures of propulsive and puissant energy. Magnard hymns the solace that justice may also bestow in briefer, gentler, softer colored, more songful measures. The two motives out of which, accordingly, he fertilizes the music, may not arrest the ear or wear too significant a profile. Seemingly there is Wagnerian process as well as Wagnerian color in the periods in which he develops, contrasts, enriches them. Little, however, does the hearer take thought of these shortcomings—if shortcomings they be—before the fiery energy with which the music runs its course and the exalted voice in which it speaks Magnard's passion and imagery. As technician, as colorist, in this "Hymn to Justice," he may be this, that, or the other; but there is no hearing without clear impresion that he could write nobly of the abstractions that take life in the souls and the speech of men—and music.

H. T. P.

HERALD, APRIL 12.

MAGNARD HYMN AT SYMPHONY

Boston Hears Impressive Work of French Composer for First Time

FOUR CHARACTER PIECES BY FOOTE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon.

The program was as follows: Magnard, "Hymn to Justice" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, "Pastorale" Symphony in F major, No. 6; Foote, four character pieces (after the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam); Dubois, Overture to "Frithjof."

"Hymn to Justice" Impressive

The "Pastorale" was the fifth of Beethoven's symphonies to be played this season. Mr. Rabaud brought forth two more French composers, and in the music of Arthur Foote completed the list of our local composers, to all of whom he has paid his impartial respects.

When the Flonzaleys played the serenade from Magnard's quartet this season it seemed as if the proud and terrible event of his death in defending his home against the Germans would make more of an impression upon the world than his music. Yesterday it seemed otherwise. The "Hymn to Justice" requires no outer tragedy to emphasize its nobility, and Magnard could scarcely have left a finer monument.

To his friends it must breathe to the life the nature of this austere idealist, but susceptible artist. Justice shows an alternately grim and merciful aspect, which finally ascends to the triumphant hymn. From the standpoint of style and workmanship it is sonorous, straightforward and conventional music. There is even a hint of galloping Valkyries in the strings. Commonplace music has often taken similar lines. A hymn tune is only a hymn tune—unless there is a Bach or Beethoven or Franck to transfuse it with devout beauty. And Magnard may be added to the list. It is not hard to perceive in Magnard Franck via d'Indy. Not by skilful dispensation of brass did Magnard become impressive, but by the sheer force of passionate sincerity. To conceive the rugged theme which the basses give out was in itself a rare creative stroke, and in that phrase the work with three-quarters written, for songfully it unfolds of its own accord and carries all with it. Of the handful of French works which Mr. Rabaud may be eagerly thanked for acquainting us with, this is surely one, just as surely as Dubois's vapid overture to "Frithjof" is not one.

Mr. Foote's Four Pieces

Mr. Foote's four characteristic pieces are as pleasantly unpretentious as any one could wish. For the most part simple melody and accompaniment, with nice orchestral effects in plucked strings or piquant percussion, ever neat and lucid—never new. It is music that always gratefully takes the expected turn. It is neither distinctive on the one hand nor "catchy" on the other, but keeps a fastidious middle ground. It only lightly touches orientalism now and then, but oriental or otherwise, it remains innocuous.

For some of us at least, and we may count ourselves fortunate, the Pastoral symphony is as fresh and lovely as ever, unantiquated by later effects in temposts simply because it is the marvelous and self-sufficient Pastorale symphony. Mr. Rabaud conducted it with an understanding born of his close and particular affection for the music of Beethoven. For serene music of even flow he has also an aptitude. What might have been a slight stiffness and lack of detailed clarity on some of the earlier pages rose to fine and lilting animation in the country dances and a warmly sympathetic reading in the music of the storm.

Next Week's Program

The program for next week is as follows: Cesar Franck, Symphony in D minor (repeated by request); Laparra, "A Basque Sunday poem for orchestra with pianoforte (first performance), soloist, Raoul Laparra; Glinka, "Kamarinskaya," fantasy for orchestra on two Russian folk songs; Weber, overture to "Der Freischutz."

HERALD, APRIL 19

LAPARRA POEM AT SYMPHONY

Enthusiastic Audience Recalls Composer Several Times

RABAUD SYMPHONY NEXT SATURDAY

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor (by request); Laparra, first performance of "A Basque Sunday"; poem on four folk songs for orchestra and piano (Mr. Laparra, pianist); Glinka, Kamarinskaya; Weber, overture to "Der Frieschuetz."

Mr. Laparra is not unknown here. His opera "La Habanera," produced in December, 1910, at the Boston Opera House, won the admiration of a few. The grim story and the absence of any celebrated singers no doubt accounted for the apathy of the general public. On some the opera exerted a peculiar fascination, by reason of the originality and the individuality of the music. Although the composer was a prix de Rome, there was no evidence that he had worshipped in any Parisian chapel, neither it had been dedicated to Massenet, Franck, d'Indy or Debussy. The music was wedded to the text; it served as commentary; it emphasized situations and strengthened moods; it was now appropriately melodramatic; it was now intensely tragic; it was always dramatic. As the murderer in the play was haunted by the spectre of his victim, slain while the habanera was sounding in the square, so the hearer after the passing years still sees the awful apparition, remembers the silent group in the second act, hears again the habanera, also the music in the churchyard. The opera brought a region of Spain and a phase of Spanish life and customs vividly before the spectators. They that had traveled in Spain recognized the realism of the composer, a realism still more vivified and heightened by the necessary imaginative, poetic touch.

Mr. Laparra was also known here before yesterday by some songs heard in concert halls, by piano pieces played by Mr. Bauer, and by the concert of last November in which his "Musical Journey Through Spain" was performed by him and the singer, Mme. Helen Stanley.

Familiar with Biscay and the Biscayans, Mr. Laparra in his "Basque Sunday" has not deliberately taken thematic material from folk-tunes, he has not slavishly followed Biscayan rhythms, but, as Grieg in Norway, he has written in music his impressions, shaped and colored by the region, its people, its life and customs. As depicted by him in tones the Biscayan village would not be a desirable resort for the nervous and would the Biscayan Sunday win the approval of any "League for Preserving the Sabbath." Not even the sound of the organ and the mention of church in the first movement would recommend the members of this league to the yels accompanying the game of pelote in the Scherzo, and the drinking, brawling, delirious dancing in the finale. The disapproval should not keep one from enjoyment of the music itself.

Again we find the strong and pure note of individuality. Again we find refreshing audacity in musical development. Again we find boldness in melody, in the harmonious scheme, in the employment of orchestral instruments. The first movement, "Towards the Church," is curiously fashioned with its mixture of ecclesiastical feeling and roughness in living. The tonal scheme of the Game of Pelote, which [illegible] the scherzo, is singularly striking, with its mad theme for the [illegible] citing background for the [illegible] piano. The third movement, "At the White House," the home where Biscayan's forefathers fathers born and died, has a strange, romantic beauty; full of [illegible] sentiment, pressed by the solo [illegible] quartet, ment that is sincerely affecting. Finale, "At the Fair," is a [illegible] page of maddening rhythms.

The "Poem" met immediately with favor. The audience evidently pressed deeply by the beauty of the music. At a White House, it called the composer at the end several times, heard a [illegible] first concert of the season led by Monteux, was yesterday [illegible] quest. The performance was a [illegible] impressive one, with [illegible] to the more salient [illegible] fires of the noble [illegible] but by reason of [illegible] that had escaped [illegible] vious conductors [illegible] by them. Yet the [illegible] by Mr. Rabaud, [illegible] discoverer, but [illegible] been recognized [illegible] sensitive musician [illegible] as fortunate in [illegible] munion with [illegible] with other composers [illegible] school, as he has [illegible] for it is not [illegible] Beethoven at the [illegible] revealed in all [illegible] strength, his [illegible] Yesterday after [illegible] thrice recalled [illegible] or merely courteously [illegible] enthusiastically [illegible]

Hearing Glinka's [illegible] sian folk songs [illegible]

praise bestowed on [illegible] Tschaikowsky, [illegible] self would have [illegible] could have read [illegible] wrote about the [illegible] forget that "Kamarinskaya" was composed in 1848 and [illegible] less of an amazing [illegible] Is the overture [illegible]

GLOBE APRIL 12.

MAGNARD'S NOBLE NEW "HYMN TO JUSTICE"

Rabaud and Orchestra Win Long Applause

Arthur Foote Given Ovation After His Omar Khayyam Music

Mr Rabaud is to be thanked for bringing to its first performance here yesterday afternoon Alberic Magnard's "Hymn to Justice," op 14. Compared with his music in smaller forms—songs, arias, pieces for piano and chamber music—it is more impressive, more individual.

This score is arresting, because of its well-defined ideas, the cohesion and balance in their development and because of the deep inspirational character of the lofty and noble sentiment it embodies. With what a sense of the dramatic irony of life does one hear this "Hymn of Justice"—not a Hymn of Hate—and recall the tragic manner of the composer's death 12 years after it was written, one of his country's first defenders against the Boche.

This is such a score as we should have expected a French patriot to write who was an accomplished musician, had he composed it after the war begun, a score representing a people whose place is not one primarily of vengeance, whose Premier—his name as his acts is synonymous with mercy—can repay his would-be assassin with life and a tempered term.

Two Fundamental Themes

Magnard uses two fundamental musical themes. Out of the first, short, aggressive, belligerent, snarling voices of discord are heard at the outset. The succeeding pages seethe with violence, incrimination, conflict. Out of this embroilment emerges the chorale-like theme which speaks of peace and humanity. One era has been to destroy, the other to build, conserve, forgive. The close is one of majestic beauty with the rapt note of ecstasy and of the triumph of the spirit.

Following it, Mr Rabaud gave a performance of Beethoven's sixth symphony, which matched those of the seventh, the third, the fifth, the "Coriolanus" overture. How modern this "program" music sounded, this forerunner in many a bar of the modern symphony poem. Here was Beethoven at ease among companions, telling the story of the country festival or partaking in it, in jovial mood, untroubled for the time by any tragic conflict, except that of the passing storm, its thunder and lightning.

How euphonious, how clear and how delightful in the folk vein of it all. Here were the groups of merry-making, dancing peasants, German peasants, but given to innocent pastoral pleasures, and of a day long before. They were told their destiny was to be linked with the domination of the world.

The storm music as played in so dramatic a manner made one question if this actually were not music of the early 20th rather than early 19th century.

Recall Conductor Repeatedly

Mr Rabaud was recalled a number of times. When he had brought the orchestra to its feet, he was kept bowing upon the stand by the increasing applause of the audience, which spoke plainly enough the admiration in which it holds him.

Of Arthur Foote's expressive Four Character Pieces after quotations from the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, the last is particularly happy in suggestion of Oriental sensuousness and imagery. The theme heard in first horn—beautifully played by Mr Jaenicke—and the first stand of cellos, is richly, hauntingly exotic, and the hearer awaits its return. Has Mr Foote transcribed it into a song? If not will he not consider so doing? He was given what is an unusual reception to local composers, being obliged four times to rise from his seat on the floor and bow.

A brilliant performance of Dubois' somewhat conventional overture to "Frithjof" brought the concert to a close. It wil be repeated tonight. But concerts week after next will occur on Saturday, April 26, on account of the parade.

TRAVELER, APRIL 17

PIERRE MONTEUX FOR SYMPHONY

Succeeds Henri Rabaud Next Season as Conductor

Pierre Monteux has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony concerts for next year, succeeding Henri Rabaud, who refused an extension of his contract and who will devote his time to composition. Monteux conducted the opening of the concerts last fall.

A distinguished career also commends him for the new post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, he studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. Later he conducted at several concert halls in Paris. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and conducted at the Boston Opera House.

In the summer of 1917 he conducted a series of concerts in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed regular French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company. At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan, he conducted "Le Coq d'Or," "The Dance in Place Congo," and "Samson and Delilah." Thus, his destiny has led him three times to Boston, and his fourth visit seems almost a natural sequence of events.

NEW YORK TIMES, APRIL 17.

MONTEUX SUCCEEDS RABAUD

Metropolitan Opera Conductor to Lead the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, April 16.—Henri Ribaud who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition, and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last Fall, will succeed him next season.

Metropolitan Opera officials confirmed last night the announcement of Mr. Monteux's release for next season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A similar request last year came too late for a successor to be found for French opera here. Though Monteux's contract had another year to run, Mr. Gatti-Casazza has now waived any further rights, as the Boston offer of $20,000 salary is higer than the Metropolitan ever paid any conductor but Toscanini. Mr. Monteux came to this country originally with the Russian Ballet.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT APRIL 12

SYMPHONY CONCERT

INTERESTING MUSIC, BECOMINGLY PLAYED

Mr. Rabaud Finds Fresh and True Voice for Beethoven, Pastoral—A Large and Eloquent Piece by Magnard—Mr. Foote's Pleasant Suite and Applauding Neighbors—Old Dubois Resuscitated for Ten Minutes

WHEN, toward the middle of May, Mr. Rabaud, returning from Boston through Bordeaux to Paris, alights in the Gare d' Orléans—or is it the Gare Montparnasse?—his fellow-composers are in gratitude bound to assemble in numbers on the arrival-platform to salute him. Scarcely one of them writing symphonic music—old, young or of the middle generation, academic or advanced, eminent or believing himself eminent—has he overlooked in the twenty-two programmes of the Boston orchestra under his leadership. The sallow and chubby Saint-Saëns, yellow and smooth as a billiard ball should be there to greet him. Never before in a single season have so many of his pieces been played in a series of Symphony Concerts in America. Beside him may hobble the venerable Dubois now in his eighty-third year. Did he not have an inning yesterday, the first he has won in a decade or two at Symphony Hall, with his overture to the Scandinavian saga of "Frithjof"? Why should he not propose his songful motive in the clarinet for the yearning heroine, set another stalking through the violoncellos for the fated but valorous hero, and let a third thunder in two choirs for the wrath of the gods, pursuing our Frithjof? Old, safe formulas these, as safe the "working-out"—Allegro Appassionato ed Agitato—according to the good old rules applied by a skilful technician who has studied "the best models." As free from peril the measures of lamentation, the episodes of tumult. Cher Vieux! Who dares say "old hat"? Why should he not receive from his colleague of the Institute the privilege—if it is so to be named—of a hearing in Boston town? He should and he did, and for a dozen minutes an audience listened to this music by formula and process, gave it a polite round of applause—and departed.

To return to the arrival platform on that "May Night"—as composers like to entitle their pieces—of Mr. Rabaud's return to Paris. There also should be gathered the next younger generation of French music-makers—D'Indy, Fauré, Bruneau. Often has the repatriated conductor set their music in his lists. Modestly in the middle distance the eye of the imagination descries the youngest of the established composers—Ravel, Schmitt, Roger-Ducasse. Mr. Rabaud, catholically minded, has "recognized" them all. With courtesy, on the outskirts, might wait the representatives of the dead—of Debussy, Magnard, Lalo, of Franck, most of all, since our conductor has given him such place on the programmes of a season as in Boston, he never enjoyed before. And at the very door of the railway carriage—if Monsieur Ravel will let him pass and Monsieur d'Indy make a little room—should be at least an under-secretary from the Ministry of Fine Arts. Truly Mr. Rabaud has been loyal and efficient apostle with French music to the Bostonian Gentiles. There are poignées des mains, perhaps baisers according to masculine French custom. The Under-Secretary cries "Well done!" Detached voices are heard asking "How many performances?" Members of the Institute intone the melody of a new hymn to fraternity—but the eye and the ear of fancy can bear the spectacle no longer. An even-handed and discriminating man in the choice and the performance of the music of his Parisian brethren, Mr. Rabaud need dread no home-coming.

And Dubois was not the only "Vieux" of whom the conductor was considerate. Mr. Foote is no octogenarian to make a Bostonian third in a triad with Messieurs Saint-Saëns and Dubois. Indeed, he rose sprightly in his place to acknowledge the clapping of a whole audience of neighbors, bestowed not only upon the four Character-Pieces they had just heard but upon all his life and works these sixty-six years among us. The music, dating no more than twenty years back was as fresh-sounding to the ear as the composer was lively to the eye. Programmes at Symphony Hall are not over-blessed with such short, light, amusing numbers. Mr. Rabaud has diligently sought them. After seven years of silence, Mr. Foote's suite, which is of them, found voice again "at these concerts." Perhaps, it will not hereafter lie mute so long. Quatrains of Omar, as often as not celebrating the wine-cup—shameless Foote in these "dry" days!—suggested the music and more than once the composer tinges it with readily recognized but not too exotic Oriental color. Ingeniously, fancifully, he paints a tone-picture, suggests a mood by the working of melodic figures. Again a more sustained melody serves the design. In many a measure, these are the happy turns in modulation, transition, contrast, background of a well-practised composer, working con amore at a light task. Mr. Foote is as brief as though we were one of the "new men"—what an anticipating habit these old fellows have?; in its modest kind his music charms, diverts; while orchestra and conductor played it as though they were sharing the pleasure of their hearers.

Indeed, it was Mr. Rabaud's day for the lightly running touch and the band's day for clear, pliant, songful tone. Discerning was he in the swift, elastic pace at which he took all four movements—the episode of the storm necessarily excepted—of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; in the rhythmic verve and the light accent that he laid upon the music; in the easy flow that he lent to progression and climax; in the smoothness of phrasing and the limpidity of tone that he enjoined upon the orchestra. Rarely [illegible] he fall into the "reverent" literalness that has been known to dull his versions of the classics; as seldom did the band fall into the raggedness of tone, the roughness of phrasing, known also to beset them in those pieces. And that, too, in a symphony in which Beethoven is prone by design or by idiosyncrasy to reiterated figures.

So played, the first division became anew fresh and sunny instrumental song, endless in fancy; the slow division wrought afresh its charm of brookside solitude and revery, sentimental, as it should be but Gallically free from every dripping languor. The dexterous detailing of the scherzo enhanced the composer's playful fancy; the finale was not inflated into a species of congregational singing, but kept, like the rest of the symphony at Mr. Rabaud's hands, its intimacy, its lyric quality of sensation and expression.

The conductor not only perceived but felt; not only released the music to his hearers but clothed it with heightening fancy and brightening voice. It is not necessary to take the Pastoral Symphony too seriously; it is not even essential to believe that Beethoven wrote it to fulfill the theories and gratify the prejudices, ninety odd years later, of Monsieur d'Indy, sometimes reputed an opinionated man. Enough that it is hard to remember when the music has sounded with such voice of bright sunshine, fresh air, blue and white sky dappled woodland and flowing brook and with such illusion of the sensations these pleasures of the open breed in quickened man. Of nature and of man stirred by nature but inarticulate in his pleasure, Beethoven has made a tone-poetry, light, lyric, glowing. Down from its classic pedestal at last came the Pastoral Symphony, to sound as human as Beethoven's self when he wandered through the Vienna woods. Out of the "standard repertory," it slipped to charm afresh. Mr. Rabaud has seemed the last conductor from whom to expect this good deed. Yet he did it.

Benefactor was the leader likewise to Magnard, as yet a composer barely heard in Boston in symphonic pieces and even dreaded there by those who have made acquaintance with a fragment of his chamber music. When "The Flonzaleys" played two months ago that Serenade from a string quartet, a more meditated, a more desiccated music seemed seldom to have fallen in dry and flavorless powder from a composer's pen. Of another quality, however, was Magnard's "Hymn to Justice," as conductor and orchestra played it yesterday—the first of the composer's symphonic numbers to be heard here since the forgotten, but eloquent, "Dirge" of 1905 and Mr. d'Indy's visit. Magnard hymns the retributive power of justice in long and large measures of propulsive and puissant energy. Magnard hymns the solace that justice may also bestow in briefer, gentler, softer colored, more songful measures. The two motives out of which, accordingly, he fertilizes the music, may not arrest the ear or wear too significant a profile. Seemingly there is Wagnerian process as well as Wagnerian color in the periods in which he develops, contrasts, enriches them. Little, however, does the hearer take thought of these shortcomings—if shortcomings they be—before the fiery energy with which the music runs its course and the exalted voice in which it speaks Magnard's passion and imagery. As technician, as colorist, in this "Hymn to Justice," he may be this, that, or the other; but there is no hearing without clear impression that he could write nobly of the abstractions that take life in the souls and the speech of men—and music.

H. T. P.

HERALD APRIL 12

MAGNARD HYMN AT SYMPHONY

Boston Hears Impressive Work of French Composer for First Time

FOUR CHARACTER PIECES BY FOOTE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon.

The program was as follows: Magnard, "Hymn to Justice" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, "Pastorale" Symphony in F major, No. 6; Foote, four character pieces (after the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam); Dubois, Overture to "Frithjof."

"Hymn to Justice" Impressive

The "Pastorale" was the fifth of Beethoven's symphonies to be played this season. Mr. Rabaud brought forth two more French composers, and in the music of Arthur Foote completed the list of our local composers, to all of whom he has paid his impartial respects.

When the Flonzaleys played the serenade from Magnard's quartet this season it seemed as if the proud and terrible event of his death in defending his home against the Germans would make more of an impression upon the world than his music. Yesterday it seemed otherwise. The "Hymn to Justice" requires no outer tragedy to emphasize its nobility, and Magnard could scarcely have left a finer monument.

To his friends it must breathe to the life the nature of this austere idealist, but suspectible artist. Justice shows an alternately grim and merciful aspect, which finally ascends to the triumphant hymn. From the standpoint of style and workmanship it is sonorous, straightforward and conventional music. There is even a hint of galloping Valkyries in the strings. Commonplace music has often taken similar lines. A hymn tune is only a hymn tune—unless there is a Bach or Beethoven or Franck to transfuse it with devout beauty. And Magnard may be added to the list. It is not hard to perceive in Magnard Franck via d'Indy. Not by skilful dispensation of brass did Magnard become impressive, but by the sheer force of passionate sincerity. To conceive the rugged theme which the basses give out was in itself a rare creative stroke, and in that phrase the work with three-quarters written, for songfully it unfolds of its own accord and carries all with it. Of the handful of French works which Mr. Rabaud may be eagerly thanked for acquainting us with, this is surely one, just as surely as Dubois's vapid overture "Frithjof" is not one.

Mr. Foote's Four Pieces

Mr. Foote's four characteristic piece are as pleasantly unpretentious as any one could wish. For the most part simple melody and accompaniment, with nice orchestral effects in plucked string or piquant percussion, ever neat and lucid—never new. It is music that always gratefully takes the expected turn. It is neither distinctive on the one hand nor "catchy" on the other, but keeps a fastidious middle ground. It only lightly touches orientalism now and then, but oriental or otherwise, it remains innocuous.

For some of us at least, and we may count ourselves fortunate, the Pastoral symphony is as fresh and lovely as ever, unantiquated by later effects in tempests simply because it is the marvelous and self-sufficient Pastorale symphony. Mr. Rabaud conducted it with an understanding born of his close and particular affection for the music of Beethoven. For serene music of even flow he has also an aptitude. What might have been a slight stiffness and lack of detailed clarity on some of the earlier pages rose to fine and lilting animation in the country dances and a warmly sympathetic reading in the music of the storm.

Next Week's Program

The program for next week is as follows: Cesar Franck, Symphony in D minor (repeated by request); Laparra, "A Basque Sunday poem for orchestra with pianoforte (first performance), soloist, Raoul Laparra; Glinka, "Kamarinskaya," fantasy for orchestra on two Russian folk songs; Weber, overture to "Der Freischutz."

HERALD APRIL 19

LAPARRA POEM AT SYMPHONY

Enthusiastic Audience Recalls Composer Several Times

RABAUD SYMPHONY NEXT SATURDAY

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor (by request); Laparra, first performance of "A Basque Sunday"; poem on four folk songs for orchestra and piano (Mr. Laparra, pianist); Glinka, Kamarinskaya; Weber, overture to "Der Frieschuetz."

Mr. Laparra is not unknown here. His opera "La Habanera," produced in December, 1910, at the Boton Opera House, won the admiration of a few. The grim story and the absence of any celebrated singers no doubt accounted for the apathy of the general public. On some the opera exerted a peculiar fascination, by reason of the originality and the individuality of the music. Although the composer was a prix de Rome, there was no evidence that he had worshipped in any Parisian chapel, neither it had been dedicated to Massnet, Franck, d'Indy or Debussy. The music was wedded to the text; it served as commentary; it emphasized situations and strengthened moods; it was now appropriately melodramatic; it was now intensely tragic; it was always dramatic. As the murderer in the play was haunted by the spectre of his victim, slain while the habanera was sounding in the square, so the hearer after the passing years still sees the awful apparition, remembers the silent group in the second act, hears again the habanera, also the music in the church yard. The opera brought a region of Spain and a phase of Spanish life and customs vividly before the spectators. They that had traveled in Spain recognized the realism of the composer, a realism still more vivified and heightened by the necessary imaginative, poetic touch.

Mr. Laparra was also known heretofore yesterday by some songs heard in concert halls, by piano pieces played by Mr. Bauer, and by the concert of last November in which his "Musical Journey Through Spain" was performed by him and the singer, Mme. Helen Stanley.

Familiar with Biscay and the Biscayans, Mr. Laparra in his "Basque Sunday" has not deliberately taken thematic material from folk-tunes, he has not slavishly followed Biscayan rhythms; but, as Grieg in Norway, he has written in music his impressions, shaped and colored by the region, its people, its life and customs. As depicted by him in tones the Biscayan village would not be a desirable resort for the nervous; nor would the Biscayan Sunday win the approval of any "League for Preserving the Sabbath." Not even the sound of the organ and the mention of church in the first movement would reconcile the members of this league to the yells accompanying the game of pelote in the Scherzo, and the drinking, bawling and delirious dancing in the finale. This disapproval should not keep one from enjoyment of the music itself.

Again we find the strong and poignant note of individuality. Again we find refreshing audacity in a musical argument. Again we find boldness in melody and in the harmonious scheme, in the employment of orchestral instruments. The first movement, "Towards the Church," is curiously fashioned with its mixture of ecclesiastical feeling and rought joy in living. The tonal picture of the Game of Pelote, which may be taken as a scherzo, is singularly picturesque, with its mad theme for the violins solo and its editing background for the violins solo and piano. The third movement, "Before the White House," the house where the Biscayan's forefathers lived, loved, begot children and died, has strange, romantic beauty; full of simple sentiment, it is pressed by the solo string quartet, a movement that is sincerely affecting. The Finale, "At the Fair," is a fierce page of maddening dance rhythms. The "Poem" was immediately a favorite. The audience evidently was pressed deeply by the beauty of "Before the White House," called the composer at the end several times and heartily.

Francks's Symphony, heard at the first concert of the season, led by Mr. Monteux, was played yesterday by request. The performance was a most impressive one; it dealt with the more sublime and familiar moods of the noble composition, but by reason of the action of some that had escaped the keen lash of previous conductors it was worse than by them. Yet there is the same music by Mr. Rabaud, the same musical discoverer, but a soldier who has been recognized as a sincere and sensitive musician who is as fortunate in enjoying communion with Franck the master with other composers of the school, as he has been unfortunate for it is not the fault of Mr. Rabaud that Beethoven at times is not revealed in all his strength, his entirety. Yesterday after the Pastorale he was thrice recalled. He was applauded or mercily complimented, but not enthusiastically.

Hearing Glinka's two Russian folk songs, [illegible] praise bestowed on Tschaikowsky. [illegible] self would have [illegible] could have read [illegible] wrote about the [illegible] forget that "Kama[illegible] posed in 1848 and [illegible] less of an amateur [illegible]

Is the overture [illegible] fast? Yes [illegible]

GLOBE APRIL 12

MAGNARD'S NOBLE NEW "HYMN TO JUSTICE"

Rabaud and Orchestra Win Long Applause

Arthur Foote Given Ovation After His Omar Khayyam Music

Mr Rabaud is to be thanked for bringing to its first performance here yesterday afternoon Alberic Magnard's "Hymn to Justice," op 14. Compared with his music in smaller forms—songs, arias, pieces for piano and chamber music—it is more impressive, more individual.

This score is arresting, because of its well-defined ideas, the cohesion and balance in their development and because of the deep inspirational character of the lofty and noble sentiment it embodies. With what a sense of the dramatic irony of life does one hear this "Hymn of Justice"—not a Hymn of Hate—and recall the tragic manner of the composer's death 12 years after it was written, one of his country's first defenders against the Boche.

This is such a score as we should have expected a French patriot to write who was an accomplished musician, had he composed it after the war begun, a score representing a people whose place is not one primarily of vengeance, whose Premier—his name as his acts is synonymous with mercy—can repay his would-be assassin with life and a tempered term.

Two Fundamental Themes

Magnard uses two fundamental musical themes. Out of the first, short, aggressive, belligerent, snarling voices of discord are heard at the outset. The succeeding pages seethe with violence, incrimination, conflict. Out of this embroilment emerges the choraie-like theme which speaks of peace and humanity. One era has been to destroy, the other to build, conserve, forgive. The close is one of majestic beauty with the rapt note of ecstasy and of the triumph of the spirit.

Following it, Mr Rabaud gave a performance of Beethoven's sixth symphony, which matched those of the seventh, the third, the fifth, the "Coriolanus" overture. How modern the "program" music sounded, this forerunner in many a bar of the modern symphony poem. Here was Beethoven at ease among companions, telling the story of the country festival or partaking in it, in jovial mood, untroubled for the time by any tragic conflict, except that of the passing storm, its thunder and lightning.

How euphonious, how clear and how delightful in the folk vein of it all. Here were the groups of merry-making, dancing peasants, German peasants, but given to innocent pastoral pleasures, and of a day long before. They were told their destiny was to be linked with the domination of the world.

The storm music as played in so dramatic a manner made one question if this actually were not music of the early 20th rather than early 19th century.

Recall Conductor Repeatedly

Mr Rabaud was recalled a number of times. When he had brought the orchestra to its feet, he was kept bowing upon the stand by the increasing applause of the audience, which spoke plainly enough the admiration in which it holds him.

Of Arthur Foote's expressive Four Character Pieces after quotations from the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, the last is particularly happy in suggestion of Oriental sensuousness and imagery. The theme heard in first horn—beautifully played by Mr Jaenicke—and the first stand of cellos, is richly, hauntingly exotic, and the hearer awaits its return. Has Mr Foote transcribed it into a song? If not will he not consider so doing? He was given what is an unusual reception to local composers, being obliged four times to rise from his seat on the floor and bow.

A brilliant performance of Dubois' somewhat conventional overture to "Frithjof" brought the concert to a close. It wil be repeated tonight. But concerts week after next will occur on Saturday, April 26, on account of the parade.

TRAVELER, APRIL 17

PIERRE MONTEUX FOR SYMPHONY

Succeeds Henri Rabaud Next Season as Conductor

Pierre Monteux has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony concerts for next year, succeeding Henri Rabaud, who refused an extension of his contract and who will devote his time to composition. Monteux conducted the opening of the concerts last fall.

A distinguished career also commends him for the new post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, he studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthaller was awarded a first prize for violin playing. Later he conducted at several concert halls in Paris. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and conducted at the Boston Opera House.

In the summer of 1917 he conducted a series of concerts in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed regular French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company. At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan, he conducted "Le Coq d'Or," "The Dance in Place Congo," and "Samson and Delilah." Thus, his destiny has led him three times to Boston, and his fourth visit seems almost a natural sequence of events.

NEW YORK TIMES, APRIL 17.

MONTEUX SUCCEEDS RABAUD

Metropolitan Opera Conductor to Lead the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, April 16.—Henri Ribaud who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition, and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last Fall, will succeed him next season.

Metropolitan Opera officials confirmed last night the announcement of Mr. Monteux's release for next season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A similar request last year came too late for a successor to be found for French opera here. Though Monteux's contract had another year to run, Mr. Gatti-Casazza has now waived any further rights, as the Boston offer of $20,000 salary is higer than the Metropolitan ever paid any conductor but Toscanini. Mr. Monteux came to this country originally with the Russian Ballet.

[illegible] playing on the clarinet [illegible] move us. Would we be excited [illegible] scene in the Wolf's Glen, even with the excellent pyrotechnical display at the Dresden Royal Opera House? Romanticism, though attacked at the time for its extravagance, has its day. When a romantic work is purest, it becomes classic. Witness Beethoven, Berlioz, Chopin, Schumann.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The concert of Friday next, on account of the parade, will take place on Saturday afternoon, April 26. The program of that concert and of the one in the evening of the 26th is as follows: Rabaud, Symphony No. 2, E minor (first time at these concerts); Mehul, "O des Amants, le plus fidele" from "Ariodant" (Sophie Braslau); Bach, Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite in B minor, No. 2, for flute and strings (Mr. Laurent, flutist); Moussorgsky, Songs with orchestra: Death's Serenade, The Banks of the Don, On the River Dnyeper (Miss Braslau); Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

The Very Heads and Fronts of Their Playing

126

Members of the String Choir of the Symphony Orchestra, Plus a Noted Oboist, as Listeners in the Parquet Weekly Look Upon Them

(Sketches, Made From Various Points of 'Vantage, by Gluyas Williams)

POST. APRIL 13

SYMPHONY MEN MAY JOIN UNION

Orchestra Management Is Opposed to Move

Certain members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are considering joining the Musical Union at the end of the present Boston Symphony season, which comes to an end on July 12. This has given rise to stories which appear periodically, like those of the [illegible] at the seaside that [illegible] to join the Musical Union its existence as an orchestra will come to an end. It is said that considerable propaganda for leaving the orchestra is being attempted by former German members of the organization, who were discharged because of their nationality during the war.

ORCHESTRA OPPOSED

It can be authoritatively stated that the management of the Boston Symphony takes the same stand on the union matter at this time that it has in the past. It has neither criticism nor objection to make to any of its members who wish to become union men. That is their right at any time when it does not abrogate signed contracts. On the other hand, after again considering the proposition of union leaders very carefully last fall, the management will not consent to its members becoming union men, principally, it is understood, because the union rule is that only American musicians, or at least musicians in America who are members of the Musical Union, can be engaged.

The management of the orchestra proceeds on the basis that it is doing business solely for the purpose of giving the public the best performances of orchestral music possible, whatever the cost, and with this object in view does not wish to give up its present system of engaging the best players it can find, whether they exist in Boston or in Timbuctoo. The directors cite the past and present musical standards of the Boston Symphony as ample ground and justification for its policies. As a matter of fact there are more Americans in the orchestra this season than ever before, including the new concert master, Frederick Fradkin.

Incidentally, funds for meeting all conceivable deficits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three seasons were subscribed in advance last fall. It can afford to pay the best players in America and Europe and its present intention is to use its own judgment in doing so.

It is also stated from an unimpeachable source that the number of men who contemplate leaving the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season is nowhere near 30, as has been stated.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

HENRI RABAUD RESIGNS FROM BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, April 16.—Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening oncerts of the orchestra last fall, will succeed him next season.

[illegible] Holds Up Harbor Strike

AMERICAN APRIL 17.

PICK MONTEUX AS SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

New Directors Overlook Several American Leaders in Making Choice

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having declined to remain another year at this honorable but arduous post, the directors of the orchestra have elected Pierre Monteux, as conductor for next season.

This is the biggest piece of news in the musical world for some time and it will be commented upon widely and not entirely in a complimentary fashion.

By their procrastination, lack of decision, and inability to keep from meddling in a business they did not understand, the four or five wealthy gentlemen who relieved Henry L. Higginson of the burden of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his declining years nearly wrecked that great institution last season.

HUNDREDS OF VACANT SEATS.

That there have been hundreds of vacant seats at the concerts in Boston this year was due entirely to their failure to select a conductor until after the season had actually started.

In their anxiety not to repeat that mistake, the directors have now grabbed the first man in sight and he happens to be the stopgap who conducted the first three concerts of this season, Pierre Monteux.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives 100 concerts a season, of which only forty-eight are held in Boston. Twenty are given in New York, where two enterprising symphony orchestras are strong competitors for the music lover's trade.

Now it happens that Pierre Monteux utterly failed to deliver in his first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this year. He tried to read without a score, got lost, muddled the orchestra up, and secured for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the first poor notices it had ever received in New York.

BOOM FOR OPPOSITION.

Incidentally it boomed the stock of opposition orchestras until today a union labor delegate has the boldness to assert right here in Boston that the Boston orchestra no longer ranks first, but third among American orchestras.

Now the only possible excuse for putting an alien at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is that he is better than any possible American conductor. It happens that there are several men conducting orchestras in America who know ten times as much about this kind of work as Pierre Monteux.

By placing Monteux at the head of the Boston orchestra the directors are deliberately giving up their preeminent position in New York, Philadelphia and other cities they visit.

Furthermore, there are several cities, notably Detroit, where very wealthy and liberal patrons of music are determined to secure the finest orchestra players in the world. They have declared their intention of raiding the Boston Symphony, and the Boston directors will have to meet this kind of competition, or lose some of their best men.

BOSTON UNFORTUNATE.

This city has been very unfortunate in that it has many men of great wealth but few liberal patrons of the arts.

In a bidding contest for musicians w th the automobile millionaires of Detroit you don't have to guess which city will win.

The attitude of the directors towards union labod is making the Symphony situation more and more difficult. The Boston Symphony is the the only great non-union symphony orchestra in America. Union labor is more and more coming into its own, and it won't be very long before the Boston Orchestra will have to make a decision on this matter.

Major Higginson maintained that a union orchestra could not possibly be as good as a band selected as he selected his orchestra. Nevertheless, other cities have demonstrated that union orchestras can play pretty well. And if it happens that there are men in the Boston Symphony who are paid less than the union scale of wages, then they should get a raise in pay.

In the meantime, Pierre Monteux appears to be inevitable. By no means understand that he is not a good conductor. It merely happens that we need the greatest conductor in the world for the Boston Symphony Orcestra and the new directors didn't go out and get him.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

POST, APRIL 13

Laparra's Startling Music

"Brutally Direct, Not Kid-Gloved," Says Olin Downes of Spanish Genius Who Will Play His Own Compositions Here Next Week

An uncommon work, by a composer of uncommonly individual and picturesque tendencies, will be heard at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is the suite for orchestra and piano, "A Basque Sunday," in the performance of which the composer will play the solo instrument.

The music of Laparra is known and admired by those who believe that neither life nor art is a kid-glove affair. His opera, "La Habanera," given at the Boston Opera House in 1912, startled the conservatives and made an indelible impression on the receptive, because of its enormous virility and its combination of realism and the extravagant romanticism at which most modern composers of today sniff superciliously. The country portrayed was Castile, a tremendous and gloomy land, the ghost of Spain's mighty past, and a thousand years removed from the brilliancy and gayety of the Seville of which Bizet wrote in "Carmen." Another opera was "The Jota," the principal musical and dramatic theme founded, as in the case of the "Habanera," on the rhythm of the Spanish dance. Last October Mr. Laparra and Mme. Helen Stanley gave a concert of compositions strongly Spanish in character in Symphony Hall. It will be seen that Spain has obsessed the imagination of this composer.

Mr. Laparra himself claims that this is a result of atavism. He was born in Bordeaux, near the Spanish border. His parentage is part French and part Spanish. Even as a small boy he often galloped over to "the other side" and found himself in a country which appealed to him more than his own home. Look at the man and you see a Latin, not a Gaul. He has the dark olive complexion of a Spaniard, black hair and black eyes of almost feverish brilliancy. He is rather small in stature. The physique is not powerful, but one has the impression of an exceptionally virile and sensitive temperament.

Laparra has wandered far and wide over the earth. He knows the Orient and the Occident. He is acquainted with the primitive music of Turkey and of the North American Indian, and the more primitive the music, one is inclined to think, the more interesting to him. But Spain remains his spiritual if not his actual birthplace. The genius of this strange land possesses him.

Excels in Color

Laparra's music is the most brutally direct, the most crudely and vigorously colored, perhaps, of an opera composer of the day. He is not, perhaps, a lover of art for art's sake. He has always observed life at first hand, lived with the simple people, recorded his impressions, musically, in his own way. He is no follower of the schools or of any artistic clique or group of theorists. The heart, not the head, must lead the way. Laparra has gone his own way with a naive enthusiasm and an unconscious courage, and his artistic end appears to make him oblivious of obstacles.

Not that he lacked schooling in his art. His precocity as a child alarmed his parents. Fortunately it was balanced from the beginning by his almost primitive love and craving for nature. He studied the piano at six and entered the Paris Conservatoire at 11. In 1900 a violent illness sent him to Spain to recuperate for two years. It was at this time, and in this place, that "La Habanera" was conceived. Paris forgets quickly. When Laparra returned he found the conservatory had as good as forgotten him. Nevertheless, he set to work with characteristic energy and in 1903 took the Prix de Rome.

Laparra in interested in several other arts than his own. He loves architecture, poetry, painting. A series of lively sketches made by himself recall his days in the Eternal City.

There are also drawings by fellow students, and a few of them are signed by Andre Caplet, who was French conductor at the Boston Opera House for several seasons. In the second year of his scholarship Laparra visited Greece, Turkey and Armenia gathering material for the score of an opera, "Amphytrion," which has not been performed.

He went to Bayreuth in 1906, and lived not with the tourists, but with a peasant's family in Dusseldorf. "La Habanera" was produced in Paris in 1908. It frightened many of the critics, and drew attention to a rising talent. A second opera, "La Jota," was given in 1911. In 1913 Laparra came to America under the auspices of the French government to study the landmarks of the early Spanish settlers on the Pacific coast. He went first to Mexico, then to Arizona and California, where he spent much time about the old missions which dot that State. An opera on a Mexican theme has been sketched. Mr. Laparra also studied, very curiously, the music of the American Indians. In 1913, he married the former Miss Mary Sharafelt of Omaha, Neb.

Composes Wherever Mood Moves Him

Laparra has noted down his musical ideas in cabs, on trains, on shipboard, and muleback. As may be seen, he is temperamentally a nomad. Money to him means opportunity to travel. He has also the literary temperament, and his libretti and manifestos remind one strongly of the pronouncements of the romantic composers like Berlioz, with whom Mr. Laparra has not a little in common "[illegible] belated romanticist," said Mr. Caplet). He writes himself into his music. "It seems to me that from my earliest days," he once said, "I knew that I would find my true inspiration in Spain."

The suite "A Basque Sunday" was composed in the country of which the music speaks. It is thus described, for the Post, by Mr. Laparra:

On the two western slopes of the Pyrenees Mountains, part in France, part in Spain, lives a mysterious race whose origin has never been established. It is the Basque people.

Its language has nothing in common with any other idiom in the world. Its customs are strongly different from those of its French and Spanish neighbors. It resisted the Arabs and the Romans, and though now divided between two of the European powers, has never been absorbed by them and has remained a people, in spite of the conventional limitations.

It has been a frequent mistake to confound the Basques with the Spaniards, from whom in all regards they are as remote as the Yankees from the Patagonians. The bull fights, though practised, are as foreign there as they are in the south of France. So are the "flamenco" songs and dances.

The people are deeply religious, but without the passionate expressions of the Spanish Catholicism. It is a calm faith, robust like those chants of the Basque church, which the ox-drivers sing again on the road while leading their heavy beasts hitched to the full wheeled carts, which resemble the chariots of the early migrations.

The national game is athletic and full of wild excitement, but without the red drama of the Spanish bull fight. One village sends its three best players against the three best ones of another town. They meet on a rectangle before eht high wall, against which the ball is thrown with strength by the batter, to rebound to a point where he hopes that the adversary will not be at hand to the high wall, against which the ball is augmented by the special glove they use, or "chisters," a long, cone-shaped crescent basket, which is used to catch as well as to throw the ball. A crier calls the points in long modulations, which are real songs in themselves. The girls, in the graded stone seats, wear the color of their favorite teams, and when the points are hotly disputed one hears the ancestral calls, in which are expressed either the furor or the joy. This game, called "Pilota," has spread all over Spain and South America.

The dances are also typical of the country. Among them shines particularly the energetic "zortzico," with a splendid rhythm in 5-8 time.

Composed in Tower

The houses, whitewashed anew every year on St. John's Day, seem, in spite of their old age, eternally young, and sprinkle the landscape with their clear spots on top of the green hills against the higher Pyrennees. For, in contrast again with Spain, the country is a laughing one, traversed by so many brooks running down from the mountains to the sea.

One of the points from which the Basque land might be embraced in one of its broadest and most inspiring aspects is the hill of Bordegaine, above the little port of Ciboure in France. From there, beyond a succession of valleys, an extraordinary development of mountains is perceived from th "Rhune" in France to the colossally proportioned "Three Crowns" in Spain, while the sea flees from cape to cape to the fading distances of the Cantabric coast. And before these immensities you are, on the top of Bordegaine, in the most intimate and romantic corner—a church, ruined by the quasi-forgotten battle of Napoleonic times..

Against it a rustic shed has been erected by the peasants with blocks of granite and gigantic beams to protect a shrine where the miraculously preserved virgin of the ruined church has been placed. A few steps away stands a cross of the 14th century and a strange building without age, color of rain, a sort of tower overtopping still higher this commanding place. It was between these three things, the tower, the cross and the church, that much of the "Basque Sunday" was written. The supreme peace of that spot, as though against the sky, was necessary to express with a freer and clearer mind the intense joy of the valley. Only on rainy days shelter had to be sought in the deserted tower, and it was not without a certain thrill that one could enter that dwelling, in remembering the dark story which developed there some years before.

An old bachelor, an "American," as they call in that country the Basques who have returned from the new continent, retired there with a coffer containing the fortune amassed over seas, a gay fellow, a good singer and a hearty drinker. No one, however, had any access to his tower, until one day there came another "American" unknown in the country, and whom the people of Ciboure nicknamed "Don Carlos."

From that time the life of the solitary tower became particularly animated. Echoes of songs and of laughter used to escape from it until a late hour. But on a certain night of violent tempest, the joyous noise, which had been more boisterous than ever, was succeeded by a shrill scream, so long and so terrible that the owner of the next [illegible] awakened in spite of the distance [illegible] the gale, did not dare to open his w[illegible] dow.

But in the morning he said to his w[illegible] "Woman, something queer happe[illegible] last night toward the tower. Let us [illegible] and see." They went. Around [illegible] tower everything was silent. T[illegible] knocked; no answer. They entered [illegible] little kitchen, always silence, the sh[illegible] ters closed. They climbed the stairs [illegible] the landing where the "American" [illegible] ways slept. No one there, and s[illegible] darkness everywhere! They went to [illegible] third and last floor, but before reach[illegible] it the man was arrested by two [illegible] upon his head, while the woman beh[illegible] him exclaimed, "Andre Maria! Th[illegible] he hangs!" They roused up the to[illegible] and amidst the exclamations of am[illegible] ment, the prayers and the imprecati[illegible] it was found that the famous coffer [illegible] disappeared. So had "Don Carlos," [illegible] never to return.

Since then the old tower had [illegible] mained closed until a musician, to [illegible] astonishment of the town, asked [illegible] key, to make of it his working ret[illegible]

Thus, stories which become lege[illegible] legends which are believed to be sto[illegible] the whole Basque country is ful[illegible] them, with the added charm of its [illegible] mystery, that never to be found o[illegible] which enhances the poetry of its l[illegible] scapes and the haughty beauty o[illegible] humanity.

The idea of "a Basque Sunday" [illegible] express musically the principal [illegible] sodes of a Basque holiday:

1. Toward the church, which sup[illegible] a kind of auroral prelude with the [illegible] of the organ and bells of the di[illegible] mass.

2. At the Pelote game, which is [illegible] national game of the Basques, [illegible] takes place in the afternoon. It is [illegible] pressed by a lively scherzo.

3. Before a white house gives [illegible] Andante. It relates to the rest [illegible] which one enoys in those ancestral [illegible] always smiling homes of the Ba[illegible] pountry, about sunset.

Raoul Laparra, composer of "A Basque Sunday," to be performed at [illegible] Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Where "A Basque Sunday" was composed. The church of Bordegain, [illegible] stroyed in a battle between Wellington and Soult, a relic of the 14th c[illegible] tury, and the old Spanish tower which Mr. Laparra made his workroom

POST APRIL 12

AFTER-WAR MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

"Hymn to Justice" for First Time Here

BY OLIN DOWNES

Alberic Magnard's "Hymn to Justice" was performed for the first time here at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The other compositions were Beethoven's sixth ("Pastoral") symphony; Four Character Pieces after the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, and Dubois' overture to "Frithjof."

PUPIL OF D'INDY

There are different versions of the tragic story of Magnard's end. At the outbreak of the war he sent his wife and two daughters to Paris. He remained in his country home. It is said that, seeing a group of Uhlans, on Sept. 3, 1914, approaching his house he fired and killed two of the troopers. A volley was the answer and Magnard fell. Others tell it differently as regards details. Magnard was one of the most conscientious and independent of modern French composers, careless of public success, devoted to his art. Pierre de Breville said that d'Indy's two greatest works were his opera "Fervaal" and his pupil Magnard.

The "Hymn to Justice" was composed in 1902. Therefor it had nothing to do with the war. But it might have, because of its dramatic spirit and its singular significance at this time. No longer is Magnard disdainful of the people, as one might well infer from more recondite and complicated of his [illegible]

the 22d pair of Boston Symphony [illegible]chestra concerts, to take place next Friday, April 18, and Saturday, April 19, Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-minor, which, as the master work of the French school, naturally came upon the opening programme of the season under Mr. Monteux, will be repeated by request. Mr. Rabaud has conducted the symphony in other cities but not in Boston.

Also Mr. Raoul Laparra, native of France and impressionable poet of many races, will play the piano part of his orchestral poem, "A Basque Sunday," which is to have its first performance. (See leading article.)

There will be two other numbers—Glinka's "Komarinskaia," a fantasy in typical Russian rhythms, unheard at these concerts since Paur conducted them in 1894, and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

The Easter concert by the Handel and Haydn Society, Emil Mollenhauer con[illegible]

ADVERTISER APRIL 13

TEACHING BEETHOVEN TO BOSTON

M. Rabaud Earnestly Trying to Acquaint Us With His Symphonies

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Magnard—Hymn to Justice.
Beethoven—Pastoral Symphony.
Foote—Four character pieces from "Omar Khayyam."
Dubois—Overture to "Frithjof."

There was no soloist and from an artistic standpoint the symphony concert needs none. From a box office point of view, however, the great prima donna, the celebrated pianist, the pyrotechnical violinist, is quite essential and there never is a long waiting line when they are absent:

Magnard's martyrdom in the war has caused his music to be played more frequently than it otherwise would have been. Intrinsically it is scarcely up to the level of Debussy, Ravel, Chabrier and other modern Frenchmen. But his "Hymn to Justice" is distinctly above his average work. It is well developed and logical as well as original. It has good contrasts and much use is made of a plaintive figure of three notes. But the work has not the serene majesty one would imagine in a portrayal of justice. It has passages which seem to speak of vengeance and the rather savage chorale towards its ending might suggest a Hymn of Hate. It ends seemingly with exhaustion. We were glad to see the composition heartily applauded. It was worthy of the tribute. All through this concert the enthusiasm was much above the average and recalls were astonishingly numerous.

THE PASTORAL AGAIN.

M. Rabaud is devoting himself to the task of making Boston acquainted with a certain composer named Beethoven, but we can assure him that we have often heard this man's symphonies before and perfectly given, and we do not need them with such frequency. The first movement of the Pastoral symphony pictures joyous feelings on coming into the country, but whether it is the joy of the Summer boarder or the joy of the farmer at seeing him is somewhat doubtful. As the advertisement said "fishing, bathing and picnic facilities," these are sketched in the subsequent movements. In the second movement the boarder is "by the brook." The stream has evidently been fished out, judging by the length of time he stays without a single bite except that of a mosquito (oboe). He, however, solaces himself as best he can (two horns) in pre-prohibition times.

The third movement is devoted to picturing a picnic. The keen observer will notice the spread upon the grass, the driving away of the bugs, the ants that lodge themselves securely in the boarder's trousers, and finally the dance on the green. Of course, there is a heavy shower, and equally, of course, there is not an umbrella in the party. This is proved by there being nothing descriptive of an umbrella in the music, which pictures everything else. The boarder comes to a sudden resolution (shown by the resolution of the dominant into the tonic) and breathes a hymn of thanksgiving as he buys a ticket back to the city.

Of the performance of the work there is nothing new to say. No one can read anything new into the Pastoral symphony and no good conductor can fail to grasp its general effects and meaning. But M. Rubaud read th[illegible] symphony very conscien[illegible]

FOOTE'S MELODIC THOUGHTS.

Arthur Foote's four orchestral sketches inspired by the Rubaiyat are among the best American works which have been given at these concerts. Mr. Foote has as much contrapuntal learning as any of the natives, but he does not chase after complexities, he does not juggle with rythms he does not strive for gigantic size nor does he make his score overwhelming to prove that he is "modern" in tone-coloring. Per contra, he leads his voices easilyl, he has melodic thoughts and he stops when he has delivered his message.

No. 2 of the set seemed the most successful; in this harp and flute did excellent work and the form was of crystal clearness. Its fiery chief theme contrasted well with the gentle episode which followed it. It pictures departed glory in the Courts of Jamshyd. No. 3 was a more delicate picture, referring to the "Jug of Wine loaf of Bread,—and Thou" which every reader recalls.

No. 4 had a beautiful horn melody which was very well played and was very prominent in the first and last parts of the number. It was somewhat too homophonic for the excellent master of counterpoint whom we possess in Mr. Foote, but it was bound to make a success with any publi and the work was applauded to th echo until the composer had rise from his seat in the audience an bowed many times.

VIKING IN KID GLOVES.

When it comes to the portrayal o the old viking, Frithjof, there is composer named Bruch who has tol his story in tones so eloquently tha all other attempts seem weak besid his cantata. Dubois gives us a vi ing in kid gloves (No. 11s), who o casionally gets angry upon the tron bones. It is a polite and gentlema ly sea-rover that we get here, spite of the occasional explosions a the forcible chromatic ending. It however, good music, well-construc ed even if it does not quite rise to i subject. This topic belongs to t northern composers by inheritan and we doubt whether any Gal composer can handle it adequately.

Last Sunday John McCormack ca back to the scene of his triumphs Symphony Hall and again show that combination of classical and po ular in which his vocalism is un proachable. There was a McCorma audience which means that the h was crowded and that there wa frenzied applause and many enco The heavy season does not leave voice untouched. An eminent vo teacher once said—"The voice is l a cistern, the more you take out less there is left."

MISS CHURCH'S RECITAL.

On Thursday afternoon in Steinert Hall Miss Marjorie Church gave a piano recital. A program which gave selections by Bach, Brahms, Weber, Chopin, Scriabine Rachmaninoff, Godowsky, Faure, Ravel and Ebell may be considered as adequate to display versatility and certainly Miss Church showed a good comprehension of various schools. We liked her least in Weber's Rondo Brillante in which a more dashing abandon was necessary, but her playing of Chopin was poetic and she caught the spirit of the modern works well. Her graceful poise at the piano, free from all unnecessary motion and gesture, her clear work in all passages of finger action, and her discreet use of the damper pedal, were all to be commended. She is evidently an intelligent and versatile artist. A good-sized audience was present and there was much applause.

On Thursday evening, in Symphony Hall, the Paulist Choir gave a concert. They were billed as "Tthe Greatest Choir in the World," but they did not need such flamboyant advertising. In these days of perfervid music of straining and cacophony, it was delightful to come back to the pure old school of counterpoint and of religious composition.

WONDERFUL EXECUTION.

As the concert was for the benefit of the Knights of Columbus it [illegible] an occasion for criticism. There was a large and enthusiastic audience present and encores and double-encores were frequent. The program was a long one and it began [illegible] an hour later than the advertised time. The most wonderful execution was done in a Bach fugue which was of amazing difficulty and sung "a capella" (without accompaniment). Most of the choral numbers were given in this style and the security of intonation was remarkable, although the ensemble was not as marvellous as when the choir last appeared in this city.

Rossini's "Inflammatus" which received great applause does not please us when the solo part is given by the "White Voice" of a treble instead of by a dramatic soprano. But the boys and men in their solos were received with tumultous applause and deserved it. Masters McManus, Dolan, Probst and Mr. Finnegan received most cordial welcomes. Father Finn appeared as director, composer, organist, piano accompanist and orator (he explained some of the works) a very "Admirable Crichton" of music. He is a Bostonian (a Roxbury boy) which accounts for his attainments. He has good cause to be proud of his choir.

TIGHT BINDING

mosphere.

I knew that som
few moments, as the light artillery and the
the heavens growl wit
canny shrieks and wh
hundred quarters at o
This kept up until
"A MILLIO
Then, after a few
lull before a storm, it
rage thrown at 2:30 a.
101st Infantry and 27 1
up two platoons of tro defensive works, to the
what a noise!
The whole front w as though the ground
exploding shells shook Realizing the dang
took my detail off the Rambucourt with only
In the town the sho
ings were going up and
However, we escap
rations to the mess offi
a nap, as the excitement
seemed as peaceful as
Then on Dead Man
experience that I shall ration detail to visit som
We were on the w
of caissons approaching.
reached the famous cu
cut loose with shrapne
bursting overhead and
ened mule managed to
out of the fire.
Then a man from
on a horse, and said th
of his battery was wou
We went back for h

AN ELEPHANT IN THE WITNESS

On July 18, 1879, an elepha brought into court as a witne action arose out of the visit of a
the Alexandra Palace, where a encampment was attracting cro people.
She went there in a pony c
and after the conclusion of the p
once a baby elephant came out,
keeper, and frightened the pon pony bolted, and the plaintif thrown out and injured.
Counsel for the defence said t elephant was willing to go in witness box to show its harmle
position; and, the judge consenti
animal walked in, with bells head, and threaded its way throu gazes of the law as though it ha
used to courts of justice all its l
Counsel for defence having no

'S RECITAL.

afternoon in Steinert rjorie Church gave a
A program which gave
Bach, Brahms, Weber,
ne Rachmaninoff, God-
Ravel and Ebell may
as adequate to display
certainly Miss Church
comprehension of va-
We liked her least in Brillante in which a bandon was necessary,
g of Chopin was poetic
the spirit of the mod-
il. Her graceful poise
free from all unneces-
and gesture, her clear
ssages of finger action,
eet use of the damper
all to be commended.
tly an intelligent and
t. A good-sized audint and there was much evening, in Symphony list Choir gave a cone billed as "Tthe Greate World," but they did flamboyant advertising.

of perfervid music, of cacophony, it was de-me back to the pure counterpoint and of re-sition.

EXECUTION.

ert was for the benefit s of Columbus it is not r criticism. There was enthusiastic audience
encores and double enrequent. The program
one and it began half
r than the advertised
st wonderful execution
Bach fugue which was difficulty and sung "a thout accompaniment).
choral numbers were style and the security was remarkable, alsemble was not as mar-hen the choir last aps city.
Inflammatus" which re-
applause does not please solo part is given by the
of a treble instead of by prano. But the boys and solos were received with plause and deserved it anus, Dolan, Probst and n received most cordial
ather Finn appeared as di-ser, organist, piano accom-rator (he explained some
a very "Admirable Crich-
c. He is a Bostonian (a ) which accounts for his
He has good cause to be choir.

RECORD, APRIL 11

MONTEUX NEXT CONDUCTOR OF OUR SYMPHONY

HENRI RAB

Present conductor of the phony Orchestra, who Boston stay with some novelties.

By J. V. CLARK

From Symphony Hall today unexpected announcement t trustees of the Boston Symphon chestra have selected their cond for the following season. While musical section of the town has lit on weighing every bit of gossip th an pointed chiefly at Toscanini or Ma gberg as the next conductor, th of trustees have selected Pierre Monteu on to succeed Henri Rabaud, the presendia conductor, next winter.
Mr. Rabaud, like Mr. Rachmannoff, among persons under consideration as symphony leaders, in these latter days, cares more for composition than for conducting. Therefore he does not care to keep the Boston post for another year. For his final concerts he has prepared some interesting programs—and right here it is well to mention that in spite of his limited choice of music, owing to war troubles,
Mr. Rabaud has made generally effective, well balanced programs.
At the concerts tomorrow and Saturday he will present for the first time "A Basque Sunday," a suite by Raoul Laparra, the Spanish composer-pianist, who appeared here earlier in the winter in concert. Mr. Laparra will play the piano part of his new work. Mr. Rabaud will repeat, by request, Cesar Franck's great symphony which was given earlier in the season.
At the concerts of the following week
he will conduct his own Second Symphony which with his opera "Marouf" is generally accepted as his best work.
On the program will also stand
Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Bach's suite in E minor No. 2 for flute (Mr.
Laurent), and string and solos by Sophie Braslau, alto. For the last concert of the year Saint-Saens's ode,
"The Lyre and the Harp," will have its first American performance. There will be a special chorus of 150 voices and these soloists: Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath.
Mr. Monteux will be remembered from his appearances in Boston first as conducted with the Russian Ballet and more recently as conductor of the first sets of this year's Symphony programs. After leaving Boston this winter he has held the post of French conductor with the Metropolitan Opera Co.
Mr. Monteux was born in Paris
April 4, 1875. He studied at the Conservatory, Paris, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded the first prize for violin playing. He played with the Colonne Orchestra, at the Opera Comique, and later in chamber music. He conducted at several Russian concert halls and introduced much of the interesting modern Russian music to Paris. He came to the United States with the Russian Ballet. His work, since then, is familiar to all Boston concert goers.
Mr. Rabaud, in leaving the audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leaves many sincere friends and admirers. His program making, his conducting, in a word the Symphony season under him, will be fully considered in these columns before the musical season is over. Apparently he hopes to end his Boston engagement in a blaze of glory, for his last programs are exceptionally interesting, programs that are not to be missed.
The rapidly ending musical season has two interesting concerts on its calendar. This Easter, Sunday
Symphony Hall the Handel and Haydn Society will present "The Messiah," with these soloists, Marie Rappolius, Arthur Hackett and Fred-ric Martin, and a special orchestra Ernestine Schumann-Heink will give her second and last concert at Symphony Hall, Sunday, April 27, when she will be assisted by Ernesto
Berumen, a Brazilian pianist, and Frank La Forge, the admirable accompanist.

ADVERTISER, APRIL 13

SYMPHONY LOSES 35 TO LABOR UNION

Cannot Join Federation and Remain in Orchestra, Says Judge Cabot

Boston Symphony Orchestra players are at perfect liberty to join the American Federation of Musicians, but if they do they cannot remain members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, declared Judge Frederick Cabot, of the Symphony Corporation, last evening.

There is a serious difference of opinion between Judge Cabot, the American Federation of Musicians, and some of the Symphony players, since the Symphony players requested the American Federation of Musicians to come to Boston and unionize the musicians.

Speaking of the situation last night, A. E. Brenton, national organizer, said:

"There are two serious points of difference between Judge Cabot and the Federation of Musicians. The first [illegible] this season, so that they difrence is that of nationality. The federation cannot take foreigners into its membership. It insists that all its members be citizens. With the authorities of the orchestra, however, a man is hardly eligible to play in the orchestra unless he comes from some country other than the United States.

MINOR DIFFERENCE.

"The second difference is theoretical, more than real. The Symphony management insists that the orchestra leader be the sole judge as to when a man is to be discharged. We cannot agree to that, for, if we did, it would apply to all bodies of musicians all over the country. But as no member of the orchestra in Boston is ever discharged before his contract has expired, that is a very minor difference.

"So the affair resolves itself into this: if members of the Boston Symphony join the American Federation, they automatically leave that organization, for by the rules our members must play in orchestras where there are only Americans playing. If they all join then Judge Cabot says the orchestra will disband.

35 IN UNION NOW.

"As a matter of fact, thirty-five orchestra members have joined the union already. Others may join at the expiration of their contracts. The Symphony management, last season, when there was prospect of their players joining, gave them a $250 bonus and $10 a week for the Summer months, to sign their contracts immediately. They did. But it was the agitation of the American Federation of Musicians that got them that bonus, whether they realize it or not. It is probable that some other cash inducement may be offered the will refuse to join. It is even possible that the management might offer the players a salary for fifty-two weeks in the year, making them able to live on a self-respecting basis all Summer, which they cannot do at present.

"The whole cause of dissatisfaction among Symphony players, that induced them to call in the union mediation, is that members of the Symphony Orchestra are used not as human beings but as machines. They are not allowed to have a grievance committee. No one complaint is listened to. In every other orchestra all over the country there is a chance given for members to air their troubles with a view to remedy.

LOWEST SALARIES.

"Boston Symphony, thirteen years ago, was the best in the country. Now it is a poor third. Now, far from paying the best salaries, it pays the lowest in the country. Our salary schedule provides for a minimum of $55 a week; the minimum in the Boston Symphony is $40. The Boston organization is a large part foreign in its membership; the New York Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the symphony orchestras of Philadelphia and Cincinnati, are all American.

"Yet Judge Cabot solemnly assured me that he would disband the Boston Symphony before he would allow it to be run as the New York Symphony is run. This, when the Boston organization is rapidly losing ground each season."

* * *

Speaking of Wagner, the agitation for the presentation of the great master's works in English continues to grow. Of that, more later. In the meantime, there is no practical reason why the plan should not prove feasible.

WORLD, APRIL 13

There is great rhythmical vigor. The themes are virile and well contrasted. The finale choral-like passage is simple and unlabored. The orchestration is not ultra refined, but it sounds. Most of the instruments are working most of the time, but they are employed with skill and without thickness or muddiness of the tone. The "Hymn to Justice" has the character of a brilliant composition for a public occasion very well done. "Magnard," said Henri Lichtenberger when this composition was first performed at Nancy in 1903, "evoked with great emotional intensity the impression of justice, the avenger and the peacemaker, warlike and formidable when arrayed against evil but redolent of peace and concord when in a final chorale she draws the hearts of men together." Nothing could have been a more fitting testimony to the composer than Mr. Rabaud's fiery performance of his work, which was received with great enthusiasm.

In the Pastorale Symphony, a work which ages, Mr. Rabaud surprised his hearers by calling attention now and again to a detail other conductors who have been heard in this city have missed, and in treating certain passages with unconventional tonal balances which were not only interesting but appeared as the intention of the composer. The reverence, enthusiasm and scholarship with which this conductor has interpreted Beethoven's music has been one of the great features of the Boston Symphony season.

It was a pleasure to hear again the music of Mr. Foote. It is simple, it is short, it says less rather than more, and all with excellent taste, with ideas developed logically and according to their deserts. Would that more composers wrote so simply, honestly and well. This entertaining music was applauded so long that the composer had several times to rise and bow his acknowledgments.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, THURSDAY, APRIL 17, 1919

PIERRE MONTEUX TO BE CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Has Been Named to Succeed Henri Rabaud Who Has Held Post Since Last October and Declines to Renew His Contract

orge S. Mathews announcements
Mrs. Henry I. programme of who ar-months ending a
Mr. and

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS NEW DIRECTOR

Henri Rabaud Declines to Accept Proffered Re-appointment.

MONTEUX MADE SUCCESSOR

New Director Known for Famous Musical Organizations in Both Europe and America.—Conducted Preliminary Concerts of His New Charge Last Fall.

Henri Rabaud, who has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra since its arrival from France last October, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract, and Pierre Monteux has been named as his successor.

While Mr. Rabaud's work as conductor was of the highest order, his preference is to devote his time to composition and a season of 100 concerts leaves neither opportunity nor energy for the work he likes best.

He was the first French conductor to lead Boston's foremost musical organization and the music lovers of Providence will not forget him.

It would be hard to find a more experienced successor than Pierre Monteux for he has conducted orchestras and chamber music, opera, ballet and concerts both in this country and Europe, and prior to the arrival of Mr. Rabaud last fall, conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra which he has now been chosen to lead, in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York.

To his preliminary work, was due the credit for the splendid work of the organization, for it was he who trained the new personnel and welded it into the unity that has always characterized the orchestra and his success was surprising to the musical coterie. Much was expected, but more was realized in his interpretation of modern music and his sympathetic and comprehensive readings of the classics as well as the versatility of his choice and the tonal balance and qualities of ensemble, elicited from a strange organization.

Like his predecessor, he is French. Born in Paris, April 4, 1875, he studied at the conservatory in that city and while still a pupil of Berthalia, was awarded a first prize for violin playing.

He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra and with the orchestra of the Theatre Comique, also with several ensembles whose purpose was to introduce music little heard. In concert work, his name appeared on the programme of several of the leading producers.

He conducted at several of the Paris concert halls and was the conductor who instituted the Sunday afternoon "Concerts Monteux" at which he introduced music that created violent demonstrations by the audiences. As conductor of the Russian Ballet, he made four tours of Europe before coming to the United States in 1916 in the same capacity. He was the conductor of the Civic Orchestra of New York city in 1917 and the following autumn was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

TRAVELER, APRIL 17.

PIERRE MONTEUX FOR SYMPHONY

Succeeds Henri Rabaud Next Season as Conductor

Pierre Monteux has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony concerts for next year, succeeding Henri Rabaud, who refused an extension of his contract and who will devote his time to composition. Monteux conducted the opening of the concerts last fall.

A distinguished career also commends him for the new post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, he studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. Later he conducted at several concert halls in Paris. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and conducted at the Boston Opera House.

In the summer of 1917 he conducted a series of concerts in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed regular French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company. At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan, he conducted "Le Coq d'Or," "The Dance in Place Congo," and "Samson and Delilah." Thus, his destiny has led him three times to Boston, and his fourth visit seems almost a natural sequence of events.

TRAVELER, APRIL 19

LAPARRA SCORES WITH NEW WORK

"Basque Sunday" Pleases Symphony Audience

The enthusiastic reception accorded Mr. Rabaud at every opportunity and the first hearing of Raoul Laparra's "A Basque Sunday," with the composer at the piano, featured yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. The Laparra work proved decidedly interesting, unusually so for a first hearing. He portrays impressions which enable the hearer to share the pleasure he actually enjoyed. The composer was deservedly recalled to the stage many times.

NORTH AMERICAN
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
APR 20

* * *

The sweeping changes brought about by the war last season in the ranks of opera companies and the personnel and conductors of symphony orchestras have not yet ceased to seethe. The upheaval in the Boston Symphony Orchestra was particularly acute. It has again come into the limelight during the past week in the official information that the first season of the new French conductor, Henri Rabaud, is also to be his last with the Boston musicians, and that he will be succeeded by Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan opera. This move was foreshadowed when the season was half over in the news that Rabaud and the Boston Symphony held no contract with each other beyond the present season, and that no steps would be taken to have such a contract signed.

According to the orchestra's publicity man, the tall and well-liked Frenchman is returning to France because he "prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of more than 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation." This declaration, at any rate, is calculated to set at rest the persistent rumors that Rabaud did not find conditions in the orchestra to his liking; that there were occasional rubs with the trustees of the organization, and that he took exception to some of the adverse comments made about his conducting and charges of lack of discipline, uttered by a small and by no means representative minority. His departure certainly will be sincerely regretted here, for during his four visits he quickly earned an enviable reputation both as a musician and as a charming, polished gentleman.

His successor, Pierre Monteux, will come to Philadelphia as an old friend and one highly esteemed for he is familiar here not only as French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, but also as a symphony conductor, since it will be recalled that he led the Boston Orchestra thru its initial program of the season here, a program that was played under circumstances that were trying and difficult for all concerned. Monteux is just 44 years old, and, like Rabaud, his distinguished reputation rests very largely upon his success as a Wagnerian conductor in Paris, both in the concert halls and at the opera.

TIGHT BINDING

128

mosphere.

I know that som
few moments, as the
light artillery and the
the heavens growl wit
canny shrieks and wh
hundred quarters at o
This kept up until
"A MILLIO
Then, after a few
lull before a storm, it
rage thrown at 2:30 a.
101st Infantry and 27 1
up two platoons of tre
defensive works, to the
what a noise!
The whole front w as though the ground
exploding shells shook Realizing the dang
took my detail off the Rambucourt with only
In the town the she ings were going up and
However, we escap
rations to the mess offi
a nap, as the excitement
seemed as peaceful as
Then on Dead Man
experience that I shall ration detail to visit som
We were on the w
of caissons approaching.
reached the famous cu
cut loose with shrapne
bursting overhead and
ened mule managed to
out of the fire.
Then a man from
on a horse, and said th
of his battery was wou
We went back for h

AN ELEPHANT IN THE WITNESS

On July 18, 1879, an elepha brought into court as a witnes action arose out of the visit of a
the Alexandra Palace, where a circumpment was attracting cro
people.
She went there in a pony c
and after the conclusion of the p
once a baby elephant came out,
keeper, and frightened the pon pony bolted, and the plainti
thrown out and injured.
Counsel for the defence said t elephant was willing to go i witness box to show its harmle
position; and, the judge consenti
animal walked in, with bells head, and threaded its way thro
gazes of the law as though it ha
used to courts of justice all its l
Counsel for defence having no

HN'S RECITAL.

y afternoon in Steinert arjorie Church gave a
A program which gave
Bach, Brahms, Weber,
pine Rachmaninoff, God-
Ravel and Ebell may
as adequate to display
d certainly Miss Church
d comprehension of va-
We liked her least in o Brillante in which a abandon was necessary,
g of Chopin was poetic
the spirit of the mod-
ell. Her graceful poise
free from all unneces-
and gesture, her clear
ssages of finger action,
rect use of the damper
all to be commended.
atly an intelligent and
st. A good-sized audi-sent and there was much y evening, in Symphony alist Choir gave a cone billed as "Tthe Great-he World," but they did

flamboyant advertising,
of perfervid music, of
cacophony, it was deome back to the pure counterpoint and of re-
ition.

L EXECUTION.

cert was for the benefit ts of Columbus it is not for criticism. There was enthusiastic audience
encores and double en-frequent. The program
one and it began half er than the advertised ost wonderful execution a Bach fugue which was difficulty and sung "a ithout accompaniment).
e choral numbers were s style and the security
n was remarkable, alnsemble was not as mar-when the choir last ap-is city.
"Inflammatus" which re-
applause does not please
solo part is given by the
of a treble instead of by prano. But the boys and solos were received with pplause and deserved it.
Manus, Dolan, Probst and n received most cordial
ather Finn appeared as di-
ser, organist, piano accom-
rator (he explained some
a very "Admirable Crichic. He is a Bostonian (a
y) which accounts for his
He has good cause to be choir.

RECORD, APRIL 1

ONTEUX NEXT CONDUCTOR OF OUR SYMPHONY

HENRI RABAUD

Present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will end his Boston stay with some interesting novelties.

By J. V. CLARK

From Symphony Hall today comes the unexpected announcement that the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have selected their conductor for the following season. While the musical section of the town has been weighing every bit of gossip that pointed chiefly at Toscanini or Mangelberg as the next conductor, the trustees have selected Pierre Monteux to succeed Henri Rabaud, the present conductor, next winter.

Mr. Rabaud, like Mr. Rachmannoff, among persons under consideration as symphony leaders, in these latter days, cares more for composition than for conducting. Therefore he does not care to keep the Boston post for another year. For his final concerts he has prepared some interesting programs—and right here it is well to mention that in spite of his limited choice of music, owing to war troubles, Mr. Rabaud has made generally effective, well balanced programs.

At the concerts tomorrow and Saturday he will present for the first time "A Basque Sunday," a suite by Raoul Laparra, the Spanish composer-pianist, who appeared here earlier in the winter in concert. Mr. Laparra will play the piano part of his new work. Mr. Rabaud will repeat, by request, Cesar Franck's great symphony which was given earlier in the season. At the concerts of the following week he will conduct his own Second Symphony which with his opera "Marouf" is generally accepted as his best work. On the program will also stand Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Bach's suite in E minor No. 2 for flute (Mr. Laurant), and string and solos by Sophie Braslau, alto. For the last concert of the year Saint-Saens's ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," will have its first American performance. There will be a special chorus of 150 voices and these soloists: Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath.

Mr. Monteux will be remembered from his appearances in Boston first as conducted with the Russian Ballet and more recently as conductor of the first sets of this year's Symphony programs. After leaving Boston this winter he has held the post of French conductor with the Metropolitan Opera Co.

Mr. Monteux was born in Paris April 4, 1875. He studied at the Conservatory, Paris, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded the first prize for violin playing. He played with the Colonne Orchestra, at the Opera Comique, and later in chamber music. He conducted at several Russian concert halls and introduced many of the interesting modern Russian music to Paris. He came to the United States with the Russian Ballet. His work, since then, is familiar to all Boston concert goers. Mr. Rabaud, in leaving the audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leaves many sincere friends and admirers. His program making, his conducting, in a word the Symphony season under him, will be fully considered in these columns before the musical season is over. Apparently he hopes to end his Boston engagement in a blaze of glory, for his last programs are exceptionally interesting, programs that are not to be missed.

The rapidly ending musical season has two interesting concerts on its calendar. This Easter, Sunday Symphony Hall the Handel and Haydn Society will present "The Messiah," with these soloists, Marie Rappold, Arthur Hackett and Frederic Martin, and a special orchestra. Ernestine Schumann-Heink will sing her second and last concert in Symphony Hall, Sunday, April 27, when she will be assisted by Ernesto Berumen, a Brazilian pianist, and Frank La Forge, the admirable accompanist.

ADVERTISER, APRIL 13

SYMPHONY LOSES 35 TO LABOR UNION

Cannot Join Federation and Remain in Orchestra, Says Judge Cabot

Boston Symphony Orchestra players are at perfect liberty to join the American Federation of Musicians, but if they do they cannot remain members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, declared Judge Frederick Cabot, of the Symphony Corporation, last evening.

There is a serious difference of opinion between Judge Cabot, the American Federation of Musicians, and some of the Symphony players, since the Symphony players requested the American Federation of Musicians to come to Boston and unionize the musicians.

Speaking of the situation last night, A. E. Brenton, national organizer, said:

"There are two serious points of difference between Judge Cabot and the Federation of Musicians. The first [illegible] this season, so that they will refuse to join. It is even possible that the management might offer the players a salary for fifty-two weeks in the year, making them able to live on a self-respecting basis all Summer, which they cannot do at present.

"The whole cause of dissatisfaction among Symphony players, that induced them to call in the union mediation, is that members of the Symphony Orchestra are used not as human beings but as machines. They are not allowed to have a grievance committee. No one complaint is listened to. In every other orchestra all over the country there is a chance given for members to air their troubles with a view to remedy.

LOWEST SALARIES.

"Boston Symphony, thirteen years ago, was the best in the country. Now it is a poor third. Now, far from paying the best salaries, it pays the lowest in the country. Our salary schedule provides for a minimum of $55 a week; the minimum in the Boston Symphony is $40. The Boston organization is a large part foreign in its membership; the New York Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the symphony orchestras of Philadelphia and Cincinnati, are all American.

"Yet Judge Cabot solemnly assured me that he would disband the Boston Symphony before he would allow it to be run as the New York Symphony is run. This, when the Boston organization is rapidly losing ground each season."

difference is that of nationality. The federation cannot take foreigners into its membership. It insists that all its members be citizens. With the authorities of the orchestra, however, a man is hardly eligible to play in the orchestra unless he comes from some country other than the United States.

MINOR DIFFERENCE.

"The second difference is theoretical, more than real. The Symphony management insists that the orchestra leader be the sole judge as to when a man is to be discharged. We cannot agree to that, for, if we did, it would apply to all bodies of musicians all over the country. But as no member of the orchestra in Boston is ever discharged before his contract has expired, that is a very minor difference.

"So the affair resolves itself into this: if members of the Boston Symphony join the American Federation, they automatically leave that organization, for by the rules our members must play in orchestras where there are only Americans playing. If they all join then Judge Cabot says the orchestra will disband.

35 IN UNION NOW.

"As a matter of fact, thirty-five orchestra members have joined the union already. Others may join at the expiration of their contracts. The Symphony management, last season, when there was prospect of their players joining, gave them a $250 bonus and $10 a week for the Summer months, to sign their contracts immediately. They did. But it was the agitation of the American Federation of Musicians that got them that bonus, whether they realize it or not. It is probable that some other cash inducement may be offered the

* * *

Speaking of Wagner, the agitation for the presentation of the great master's works in English continues to grow. Of that, more later. In the meantime, there is no practical reason why the plan should not prove feasible.

APRIL 17, 1919 THURSDAY, APRIL 17, 1919

MONTEUX TO BE CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Named to Succeed Henri Rabaud Who Has Held Post Since Last October and Declines to Renew His Contract

TRAVELER, APRIL 19

LAPARRA SCORES WITH NEW WORK

"Basque Sunday" Pleases Symphony Audience

The enthusiastic reception accorded Mr. Rabaud at every opportunity and the first hearing of Raoul Laparra's "A Basque Sunday," with the composer at the piano, featured yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. The Laparra work proved decidedly interesting, unusually so for a first hearing. He portrays impressions which enable the hearer to share the pleasure he actually enjoyed. The composer was deservedly recalled to the stage many times.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS NEW DIRECTOR

Henri Rabaud Declines to Accept Proffered Re-appointment.

MONTEUX MADE SUCCESSOR

New Director Known for Famous Musical Organizations in Both Europe and America.—Conducted Preliminary Concerts of His New Charge Last Fall.

Henri Rabaud, who has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra since its arrival from France last October, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract, and Pierre Monteux has been named as his successor.

While Mr. Rabaud's work as conductor was of the highest order, his preference is to devote his time to composition and a season of 100 concerts leaves neither opportunity nor energy for the work he likes best.

He was the first French conductor to lead Boston's foremost musical organization and the music lovers of Providence will not forget him.

It would be hard to find a more experienced successor than Pierre Monteux for he has conducted orchestras and chamber music, opera, ballet and concerts both in this country and Europe, and prior to the arrival of Mr. Rabaud last fall, conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra which he has now been chosen to lead, in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York.

To his preliminary work, was due the credit for the splendid work of the organization, for it was he who trained the new personnel and welded it into the unity that has always characterized the orchestra and his success was surprising to the musical coterie. Much was expected, but more was realized in his interpretation of modern music and his sympathetic and comprehensive readings of the classics as well as the versatility of his choice and the tonal balance and qualities of ensemble, elicited from a strange organization.

Like his predecessor, he is French. Born in Paris, April 4, 1875, he studied at the conservatory in that city and while still a pupil of Berthalia, was awarded a first prize for violin playing.

He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra and with the orchestra of the Theatre Comique, also with several ensembles whose purpose was to introduce music little heard. In concert work, his name appeared on the programme of several of the leading producers.

He conducted at several of the Paris concert halls and was the conductor who instituted the Sunday afternoon "Concerts Monteux" at which he introduced music that created violent demonstrations by the audiences. As conductor of the Russian Ballet, he made four tours of Europe before coming to the United States in 1916 in the same capacity. He was the conductor of the Civic Orchestra of New York city in 1917 and the following autumn was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

TRAVELER, APRIL 17.

PIERRE MONTEUX FOR SYMPHONY

Succeeds Henri Rabaud Next Season as Conductor

Pierre Monteux has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony concerts for next year, succeeding Henri Rabaud, who refused an extension of his contract and who will devote his time to composition. Monteux conducted the opening of the concerts last fall.

A distinguished career also commends him for the new post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, he studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. Later he conducted at several concert halls in Paris. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and conducted at the Boston Opera House.

In the summer of 1917 he conducted a series of concerts in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed regular French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company. At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan, he conducted "Le Coq d'Or," "The Dance in Place Congo," and "Samson and Delilah." Thus, his destiny has led him three times to Boston, and his fourth visit seems almost a natural sequence of events.

NORTH AMERICAN
ss Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

The sweeping changes brought about by the war last season in the ranks of opera companies and the personnel and conductors of symphony orchestras have not yet ceased to seethe. The upheaval in the Boston Symphony Orchestra was particularly acute. It has again come into the limelight during the past week in the official information that the first season of the new French conductor, Henri Rabaud, is also to be his last with the Boston musicians, and that he will be succeeded by Pierre Monteux, of the Metropolitan opera. This move was foreshadowed when the season was half over in the news that Rabaud and the Boston Symphony held no contract with each other beyond the present season, and that no steps would be taken to have such a contract signed.

According to the orchestra's publicity man, the tall and well-liked Frenchman is returning to France because he "prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of more than 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation." This declaration, at any rate, is calculated to set at rest the persistent rumors that Rabaud did not find conditions in the orchestra to his liking; that there were occasional rubs with the trustees of the organization, and that he took exception to some of the adverse comments made about his conducting and charges of lack of discipline, uttered by a small and by no means representative minority. His departure certainly will be sincerely regretted here, for during his four visits he quickly earned an enviable reputation both as a musician and as a charming, polished gentleman.

His successor, Pierre Monteux, will come to Philadelphia as an old friend and one highly esteemed, for he is familiar here not only as French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, but also as a symphony conductor, since it will be recalled that he led the Boston Orchestra thru its initial program of the season here, a program that was played under circumstances that were trying and difficult for all concerned. Monteux is just 44 years old, and, like Rabaud, his distinguished reputation rests very largely upon his success as a Wagnerian conductor in Paris, both in the concert halls and at the opera.

POST, APRIL 20

Rabaud's Farewell Work

Boston Symphony Conductor, on Eve of Returning to France, Will Conduct Orchestra in His Own Composition This Week—Olin Downes Discusses Precedents

The performance of Mr. Henri Rabaud's E minor symphony, which will be played by the Boston Symphony under his direction this week, will have more than ordinary interest, partly because of the fact that this will be one of the signs of Dr. Rabaud's leavetaking—he sails for France immediately after the final Symphony concerts of next week—and more for the reason that we shall hear a man who is an important figure both as a composer and a conductor interpret his own work.

Composers have conducted and conductors have composed their own works many times ere this in Boston. What makes Mr. Rabaud's position unique is the soundness of his accomplishment in both fields. As a rule a man either conducts well or composes well, but seldom makes significant contributions in the two capacities. The composer who has appeared most impressively as composer-conductor in Boston in the last 20 years is undoubtedly Richard Strauss. He conducted unforgettable performances of his "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Tod und Verklarung" with the Philadelphia orchestra, and his "Don Juan" and "Don Quixote" at a pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony. Vincent d'Indy was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a brief tour. He was a composer rather than a brilliant conductor.

Before his coming. Pietro Mascagni, who, it seems, will be known by one work, "Cavalleria Rusticana," electrified small Boston audiences by his interpretation of his own work. Gustav Mahler's symphonies have been played, but not by him, in Boston. Mahler has conducted here in opera and in concert, and in the belief of a majority in America he is greater as a conductor, as an inspired and lofty-spirited interpreter of the music of great masters, than as a personal creator of music.

This is still truer of Felix Weingartner, who is also well known as a conductor of opera and symphony in this city. Arturo Toscanini, possibly the greatest operatic conductor in the world today, whose performances of "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," will live forever in the memories of Bostonians who heard them, does not compose.

If you should ask Mr. Rabaud what he thought of himself as a composer, he would be very modest indeed about it. Yet his "Procession Nocturne" is practically a part of the modern standard orchestral repertoire in France and is fast assuming the same position in orchestral music here. Rabaud's second symphony was played at Worcester two years ago. It is not as modern as the "Procession Nocturne," nor perhaps as mature in conception, but it is a beautiful and romantic work, possibly tinged with Schumanish sentiment, and bespeaking Mr. Rabaud's fine balance and self-possession as a composer. As a composer he has been well content to write down to the very best of his ability what is in him, without imitating or following any particular fad of the time. No one, probably, is better acquainted with the works of all modern composers than Mr. Rabaud. He, as well as many others who are far more vocal, can also discourse from Ravel and Strawinsky, and quote them on the keyboard. But he has neither intentionally nor unintentionally emulated them. He has been neither doctrinaire nor propagandist for his ideas about music of the present or future. He has not been discontented to stand on one side and commune with himself in his scores. Composing is a passion with him—not a protestation. A man of means, he works in music absolutely for music's sake, and always sanely, always nobly, always for a high ideal.

To some men it is given to be sweepingly individualistic, to ride over everybody and everything because of the relentless purpose of the genius within. Intent on accomplishing objects so particularly their own that they have no room in their minds or time for anything else, these men go on their way, either fail utterly or succeed in changing the musical map. In the latter case they stand out, lonely, isolated, torchbearers of an epoch ahead of that in which they live. Others drone on in the way appointed and paved out for them, well content to tread lightly in other men's footsteps, suspicious of innovation, fearful and indignant at these wild fellows who no sooner see something solidly established than they wish to knock it over and invite the chaos from which man and the whole solid world have emerged.

There are still others, and their value to their art and their public is incommensurable, who see ahead and behind, who, standing in the present, foretell the future by the shadow thrown forward from the past. They cherish everything that is great in their sympathize with all true expressions of the spirit of the race. They are in and they are outside of their epoch. The very breadth of their appreciation and the keenness of their critical faculty may make impossible the driving energy, the consuming concentration on a single point, which is the strength and the weakness of many men of creative genius. But this light of the broad mind and the big soul shines everywhere, illuminates and kindles whatever it falls on, and this breadth, this fineness this nobility of spirit, seem to us the dominating and invaluable characteristics of Mr. Rabaud as a musician, as a composer, as an orchestral interpreter.

Nothing that he has done in a whole season has been, musically speaking, small, sensational or merely effective. It would be disillusioning in the extreme for those who do not follow constantly musical performances to realize of how very few conductors this could be said. Mascagni, Muck, Weingartner, Mahler—this gate would be too small for one of them to pass through.

We hasten to add that each and everyone of these men have done great things, musically in this city. But it does not reduce them to the level of ordinary leaders to say that not one of them has been wholly guiltless of emphasizing the outside instead of the inside of music, on occasion. It might be rejoined that all men are human. Mr. Rabaud, too, is human. It is human to fall short, to err. But in this particular direction it is to the lasting glory of this noble-minded musician that he has never for an instant deflected from the line of absolute sincerity, self-effacement, purity of purpose. There is only one other musician of international fame of whom we would feel confident to say the same thing. That is Mr. Vincent d'Indy.

The astonishing thing is the manner in which this unalterable spirit on the part of the most kindly and modest conductor in the world has made itself felt in the Boston orchestra and on the part of the audience. Mr. Rabaud is anything but a martinet, in rehearsal. Other conductors have drawn the reins much tighter, and in some respects this is advisable. Like other mortals, orchestra players are human, which means childish at times, conceited, petty. They need a firm hand and an ungentle reminder when necessary, and even the orchestra of this saintly city is no exception to the rule. But in this same orchestra, where there is bound to be a certain percentage inclined to obstinacy and self-opinion, the enthusiasm and the profound knowledge of Mr. Rabaud have made their way. The dullest player has responded to his enthusiasm. Most orchestras have dead spots in them, because of the routine and lifeless attitude of certain players. The Boston Orchestra has not only been improved in its personnel since last season, it has felt new life circulating through it. The tone is getting back some of the glow and the vitality which it had years ago and then lost to a certain extent more lately. The players may not jump and tremble under the eye and the tongue of an notable slave-driver, but they respond voluntarily, in performance, to the spirit of the music.

Those who play under Mr. Rabaud speak constantly of the inspiration in his face and eyes. The audience does not see this, but the atmosphere in the hall is unmistakable. It is the atmosphere of those who play and those who listen, thrilled by the presence of art.

To enumerate composition by composition the admirable accomplishments of Mr. Rabaud in the course of the season would be tedious and unnecessary. It may be said briefly that he has won in greater and greater degree as the season progressed the confidence, enthusiasm and personal friendship of his audiences. He and Mr. Monteux have done much to illume the darkness of those who held to the old and provincial notion that only conductors are made in Germany and only Germans can conduct German music. Mr. Rabaud's interpretations of Beethoven, for one example, are too recent and too impressive to need recapitulation at this time. His revelations (constituting in Boston tardy justice to the composers concerned) in interpreting modern French and Russian music have been equally notable, if more expected, than his masterly treatment of music of the German school. His programmes have been carefully and wisely selected from a repertoire already, in greater part, familiar to him. Modern English composers, Scandinavian composers, the Russian Tschaikowsky have been conspicuous by absence. Mr Rabaud would probably reply that he had but 24 programmes for one season as leader of the Boston Symphony, that in such a space of time, consistent with reasonable variety and balance of content, he wished to give his audience the best possible results of his musical knowledge and experience. As it is, with the exceptions noted, the programmes have been broad and catholic as the anti-German sentiment engendered by the war made possible, and even with the enforced restrictions far more interesting, varied and vital and colorful in performance than the programmes of Mr. Rabaud's predecessor of former years.

Mr. Rabaud will take with him to France not only the kindly sentiments of his audiences, but their keen appreciation of all he has done for them musically, in vitalizing and raising the quality of the orchestral performances, in giving the Boston public the benefit of the feeling and artistic traditions of the French people, an element which has not been sufficiently strong in the past in orchestral music.

MARIE SUNDELIUS,
Soprano of Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist with Handel and Hayden Society this afternoon in Symphony Hall.

SOPHIE BRASLAU,
Contralto of Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist at Symphony concerts of next Saturday afternoon and evening.

MONITOR, APRIL 19

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra furnished much musical thought, about equally divided between the pleasurable and the profitable. There was another opportunity given to hear the D minor symphony of César Franck, which Mr. Rabaud gave so impressively at Cambridge earlier in the season. One again it showed its worth, if it needed to do so, and, from the manner in which it was received, there is no doubt that the symphony has come into its own. That is to say, it has a permanent niche in the standard orchestral repertory.

Then followed a work of the impressionist sort, entitled "A Basque Sunday," by Raoul Laparra. The performance was the first on any occasion. The work is for orchestra and piano, and on this occasion, the solo part was taken by the composer.

As one has often said, first impressions are not only uncertain, but as a rule unfair to the work itself. "A Basque Sunday" is in four short movements: "Toward the Church," "The Pelote Game," "In Front of a White House," and "At the Fair." The general idea of the work is to express musically the principal episodes of a Basque holiday.

To any not acquainted with the local color, the impressions must be on the musical side only. This is in no sense a piano concerto, but for the most part purely orchestral, with the piano in a very subordinate position. The orchestration is full, with addition of organ in the first movement suggestive of ecclesiastical atmosphere. One notes much noise in the first and last movements, with the third movement pleasing for its quiet mood, well contrasted. The composer knows his orchestra and the Basque idiom so far as the piano is concerned, it might as well have been left out, and the celesta or harp substituted. Mr. Laparra, on the creative side, has imagination and ingenuity, with evidence of adequate training. As a pianist, he did not furnish himself with opportunity for display, but the ensemble passages was acceptable. Further than that we do not judge, except to say that the performance was most brilliant.

Glinka's orchestral fantasy, "Kamarinskaya," heard here several times in the early years of the symphony, has not been heard, however, in concerts for 25 years until last night. Probably it was new to almost every one that heard it, and a very pleasing number. The evening's "Freischütz" overture made a brilliant ending.

ADVERTISER, APRIL 20,

SYMPHONY BY FRANCK WINS PRAISE

Elson Finds Much Merit in Work of French Composer

ONE OF BEST FROM FRANCE, SAYS CRITIC

Efforts of Artists Samaroff and De Gogorza Cause Favorable Comment

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE PROGRAM.

Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Laparra—"A Basque Sunday," orchestral poem with piano.
Soloist—M. Raoul Laparra.
Glinka—"Kamarinskaia," Russian fantasy.
Weber—"Freischuetz Overture."

Passion week is not specially noted for musical activity except in the churches, nor did the Symphony program reflect the holy season in any of its selections. We cannot have Franck's symphony too often. It is one of the finest works that has come from modern France, and we are astonished that Gounod ever dared to speak slightingly of its composer. Its first movement is largely developed from a figure of three notes, a figure that has been used by Beethoven in a sonata, and gloriously by Wagner as the "Fate motif" in the Trilogy, but Franck does not plagiarize and manages to glean new effects in spite of two great composers having been before him.

There is much of sadness in the work, yet not a trace of sentimentality, nor, on the other hand, of the morose ugliness which many moderns give when they wish to express dissatisfaction with the general state of the universe.

All is dignied and attractive in spite of the great amount of learning displayed, more recondite and complicated than is ordinarily direct.

The omission of the regular Scherzo (the work is in three movements) adds to the earnest effect, and the second movement is a slow and brooding one, like the second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

The instrument of melancholy, the English Horn, is prominently used here, and it was excellently played.

READING ELOQUENT.

The reiteration of the preceding matter in the Finale makes that movement a climax and summing up of the whole work. The reading of this was eloquent, and all the skilful contrapuntal touches were finely brought out.

This symphony does not grow tiresome by repetition but gains constantly by closer acquaintance. The first movement has never been so heroically read in Boston. The work created great enthusiasm, and M. Raboud was recallled over and over again.

M. Laparra's work suffered somewhat by comparison. Our own opinion of the matter of Spanish music must be given modestly, for we confess but a slight acquaintance with its subleties, but Spanish musicians whom we have interviewed on the subject, doubt whether this composer gives voice to the true national spirit. This refers chiefly to his recent Spanish concert, but it may be that the Basque type is different from the spirit of more southern parts of the nation.

Picturesque it all was, beyond a doubt, and the movements were well-contrasted. The first, "to the Church," had bells and organ and a hymn-like theme, which is much interwoven later on. M. Laparra is led astray by his own ingenuity, and he cares more for skilful combinations than for preserving the folk-song spirit. He is in strong contrast with Glinka in this.

In the second movement there is a portrayal of a popular game, Pelota, and there is much spirit. Again the skill of the composer is displayed, and even canonic treatment is present, the spirit of the symphonic suite is preserved and this may be called the Scherzo.

The next movement is the slow one, a siesta before a country home, with the piano rather prominent in some parts, while the finale has the usual brilliancy of this movement in symphony.

We do not find the atmosphere well preserved in this work, any more than in the composer's "Habanera" or in his Spanish entertainment. He lacks simplicity and directness. He treats folk-themes, or what should be folk-themes, as Richard Strauss treats "Funicoli-Funicola" in his Italian symphony, so that they become artificial.

SPICY AND SHORT.

The trick of having a sudden ending is used constantly by the composer. But the whole is spicy and short. The piano is used sometimes as an orchestral color, an integral part of the score, and sometimes with solo effect. This last is especially the case in the third movement, the most poetic part of the work.

There are rhythmic juggleries in the finale, and sudden pauses in alplenty of piccolo pepper, and the work is certainly exciting. M. Laparra's skill in the use of the modern orchestra was everywhere apparent.

What with the skill of the composition, and the brilliancy of his own piano playing, he certainly deserved the triple recall which came at the end of the work. With the reservations above made it certainly was worth hearing, and will probably hold its place in the modern repertoire.

After basking in the Basque music we made an excursion into Russia. Not to the Bolsheviki, but in the times when that country was somewhat happier than it is today. In the old days the moujiks (the male peasants) used to dance the Kamarinskaia by forming a large circle, hooking elbows all around and jumping, kicking and singing to a very emphatic rhythm.

Glinka, the very father of modern Russian music, has preserved this style and added another theme to it to give artistic contrast. He preserves the Russian spirit in all of its naive simplicity, which is better than M. Laparra's idealization.

The character of the work is bacchanalian, the words belonging to the dance are unquotable, and it is all a very good picture of a merry-making before vodka was abolished and the moujiks were obliged to take to drinking furniture polish.

It was given with the heartiest spirit, but can scarcely be fully appreciated by any one who is unfamiliar with the Russian peasantry and their potation capabilities. The work has a certain monotony of repetition which is not out of place in such a folkdance, but which might seem tame to those who do not understand this school.

After the Basque and the Russian folk-music, there came a touch of the German, for Weber's Freischuetz is absolutely founded on the folk-music of his native land. The dramatic touches were well attended [illegible] The horn quartette was [illegible] by played, the ominous pizzicato "A" upon the contrabasses which follows, was impressive, the trombone gave its touch of evil in the midst of rejoicing, and the triumphant coda brought the concert to a successful ending. How healthy all such folk-music is in these artificial days! It will be a great boon to music when the composers begin again to draw their inspiration from the people and give their message with more simplicity.

And so M. Pierre Monteux is to be our next symphonic conductor. It is not derogatory to M. Monteux if we say that he has not yet achieved anything like M. Rabaud's success with our symphony concerts. But there were many reasons why this may have been the case. He took the men just after the Summer vacation. He found some lack of discipline because of the enforced changing of conductors. He had no chance to become familiar with his Boston public in his very few performances. He is likely to be much less conservative than M. Rabaud has been. Every welcome will be given to the newcomer and undoubtedly Boston will enjoy his modern tastes and will have somewhat less of Beethoven and of St. Saens than heretofore.

RASLAU,
tropolitan Opera
at Symphony
Saturday aftercessor of former take with him to kindly sentiments

ut their keen ap-
has done for them
zing and refining orchestral perform-
Boston public the
g and artistic tra-
h people, an ele-
t been sufficiently orchestral music

PRIL 19
IC

Boston
an Science Monitor
usetts—The twen-
of the Boston
furnished much ut equally divided urable and the
as another oppor-
r the D mino
Franck, which Mr
pressively at Cam
the season. Onc
orth, if it neede
the manner i
ed, there is n phony has com
is to say, it has the standard or

work of the im-
itled "A Basque aparra. The perirst on any occa-
for orchestra and occasion, the solo
he composer.
n said, first im-
ly uncertain, but he work itself.
is in four short
the Church,"
"In Front of a t the Fair." The ork is to express
al episodes of a

ted with the local must be on the
is in no sense or the most part h the piano in osition. The or-with addition of ement suggestive tmosphere. One
the first and last third movement mood, well con-
r knows his ore idiom, but so ncerned, it might eft out, and the substituted. Mr.
tive side, shows
enuity, with evitraining. As a furnish himself display, but in s was most ac-n that one can-ay that the perrilliant.
fantasy "Kamaseveral times in ymphony series, wever, at these until the pres-
new to almost
t, and proved a e ever-popular made a happy

E SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, APRIL 20,

ICAL REVIEW

BOSTON'S CONDUCTOR

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose symphony will be played this week.

Notes About Mr. Rabaud's Symphony Played Here This Week

Mr. Rabaud's second symphony will be performed here at the Symphony concerts this week. It has been played here only once, at Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral concert on Jan. 21, 1908, when Mr. Longy conducted. The symphony was produced in Paris at a Colonne concert on Nov. 12, 1899, when the composer, then 29 years old, conducted it. For this symphony he was awarded the Prix Monbinne.

The symphony has been performed with marked success in several cities of this country. When it was performed at Chicago last November Mr. Hackett wrote in the Chicago Evening Post:

"Mr. Rabaud is related in his mode of thought to those men who have always written music in the sense that music is the expression of beauty through tone. He is able to create a melody, and the underlying thought of this symphony is melodic. . . . Mr. Rabaud can bring forth from his inner consciousness a melody of strength and beauty—therefore he does. He develops his themes with an exquisite sense of proportion which knows as well where to curtail as where to elaborate. . . . There is all through the music the sense of clarity and balance that is the mark of the man with the feeling for art. Mr. Rabaud used his learning to express his meaning and not to heap up great masses of tone interwoven with endless complications just because he had a modern orchestra to play with. The second movement was very beautiful and the third charming with its sparkling brilliance."

The symphony was by no means new to Philadelphia. Mr. Waldo of the Public Ledger reviewed its performance on last March 28 as follows:

"The masterwork of Rabaud has won the enthusiasm of our audiences on more than one occasion. It is a well-spring undefiled and constant of symphonic inspiration. The full value of the Andante was brought out with the chorale, like strains that revert to Bach of old and Franck in recent times and still are far from slavish imitation. The Scherzo is the happiest little skeedaddle of strings and flute and oboe and harp that ever was, and the Finale is a noble climax indeed."

RABAUD'S FAREWELL CONCERTS

There remain only two pairs of concerts (this week and next) in the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and at them Henri Rabaud will bid his farewell to the American public. The program for this week will be memorable to many on account of Mr. Rabaud's own Second Symphony in E minor which he will conduct, acting on a petition signed and sent by a number of our composers early in the season. This work, which is considered Mr. Rabaud's masterpiece, has been heard frequently in the various cities of the United States, and this season in Chicago and Philadelphia.

The soloist at the same concerts will be Miss Sophie Braslau, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing an air from "Ariodant," by Mehul, and three songs of Moussorgsky, "Death's Serenade," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the Dnieper." The other numbers will be three movements—"Polonaise," "Rondo" and "Badinerie," from Bach's Suite in B minor No. 2 for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent, the new French first flutist, as soloist. Finally, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Attention is called to the postponement of the Friday afternoon concert to the following (Saturday) afternoon, April 26, in order that it may not conflict with the parade of the 26th division. The two concerts will therefore fall on the same day, subscribers' tickets marked April 25, to be used Saturday afternoon, April 26, at 2:30.

EVENING POST New York City APR 19 1919

Pierre Monteux, who has been chosen to conduct the Boston Symphony next season

GLOBE—APRIL 20

Mr Rabaud as Program Maker

Much has been said of Mr Rabaud as conductor during his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will end, in so far as his personal direction is concerned, a week from Saturday night, but something remains to be said about him as a program builder. It is known that Saint-Saens cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," for four solo voices, chorus and orchestra, will be given as a novelty at the last pair of concerts, May 2 and 3. The program for next week is printed below, making known Mr Rabaud's entire choice of music played during his season as conductor.

Mr Rabaud, while believably not opposed to the performance of music from the Wagner operas in the concert room, has made clear his present position as one not favoring such performance at least until the peace of Paris is signed, a position which he will find liberally shared by those in his audience.

Not in the history of the orchestra has its conductor undertaken to choose the 24 pairs of programs from a symphonic literature excluding all German composers after Brahms, who in this instance Mr Rabaud drew upon for one symphony. Has the result been one to incur restraint, narrowness or loss? Have the patrons had occasion to complain of infrangement upon their pleasure or of any self-protesting chauvinism?

In Mr Fiedler's time the most conspicuous loss among those on the Index would have been Richard Strauss, whom he played much and regorously, and it usually sounded imposing. To Dr Muck, as some said for personal reasons, Richard the second was chosen for the concert room with scarcely less willingness than Richard I. Was it not he who gave us Strauss' Festival Prelude, than which a more bombastic, futile and turgid piece of din is not at this moment recalled?

So for certain of the tone poems—the "Hero's Life," "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan"—there probably are few who would wish them stricken from the repertory of the orchestra indefinitely, notwithstanding what the profession of their author as an eminent disciple of Prussianism may have been.

But who has greatly missed the name and works of Max Reger? Who has felt a lack of modern German scores patterned after the manner of Noren's symphony, a work remembered chiefly for its noise and length? The resourceful label, "Made in Germany," a self-explanatory judgment, had been periodically in demand, and to such extent that even before the war, and before the possible accusation of prejudice could be brought for its self-sufficient causes, it was a common observation that there was little of significance in the modern German output. Reasons in part explaining that since have been made clear.

Mr Rabaud has bored his audiences very seldom. He has refrained with a gentlemanly good taste from the unmitigated dreariness, for example, either the first or the second symphony of Elgar, National affiliations of the time notwithstanding. Either of these scores is worse than the other. He has refrained with even more commendable grace from perpetrating pretentious works by young American composers, who, granting that they should hear their scores, hardly have the right to ask a symphony audience to sit them through or to foist them upon an orchestra which should be engaged with better things.

There are unheard and unknown compositions by Americans which should be heard, works which have some claim to be called representative, but as long as conductors choose some of the scores which Dr Muck chose for exploitation, and as long as a great pianist like Josef Hofmann can bring together such a grievous compilation of mediocrity as his "All-American" program, just so long will "The American Composer" as a class need coddling.

Remembering Mr Rabaud's gorgeous performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff and of Borodine, it would have been interesting to have heard him play some of Tschaikowsky—by birth their countryman, but less National than they—more a cosmopolitan. Some Frenchmen, it is said, find him coarse, with a hybric individuality, and do not understand him. In the "fate" symphony, in the tone poems, the "Tempest," "Manfred," the "Francesca da Rimini" or "Romeo and Juliet," there would have been material for Mr Rabaud's insight and taste. Then there was Sibelius. And there are some no doubt who gladly would have heard more from Berlioz perhaps even his youthful "artist's life" symphony, for Berlioz was a man far beyond the recognition of his day, the pioneer with the modern orchestra.

But the season needed only 24 programs, and there was Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert and Schumann to remember—we got on well enough without a Haydn symphony—and, besides, Berlioz was a Frenchman.

Himself a Frenchman, and trained in his own school, it is not strange that Mr Rabaud was conversant with the works of his countrymen and colleagues. Compositions by 17 Frenchmen have appeared, counting Franck, who was a Belgian by birth. This does not include works involving a soloist with the exception of Mr Laparra's novelty, "A Basque Sunday," last week.

Including his cantata yet to come Saint-Saens leads with Franck. His early second symphony, a curious commentary upon the man, was well worth reviving. The symphonic poems gave pleasure to some older hearers to whom Saint-Saens, in the days of the Thomas or the Harvard Musical Concerts, was a modern.

Of course there were fillers—as Dubois' recent overture, as Faure's suite, as Schmitt's open air music, by no means representative of the man of the "Psalm" and the "Salome," or as the excerpts from Franck's "Redemption."

But there was never a program which left the hearer disconsolate, utterly cast down, as one in a desert. There was usually something inspirational in content, and there was concert after concert which not only invited praise and gave pleasure, but touched true, often incomparable, destruction.

Mr Rabaud made his programs with that happy catholicity of taste, that happy eclecticism, that fortunate sense of contrast and of reacting values which made the schools intimate, yet did not permit one to do violence to another. He had no notions about an all-classic, all-modern French or all this or that program. He never killed a fine individual mood by putting a variant alongside of it.

That his taste in program making makes up a large element, together with the rare pleasure he has given as a conductor and the esteem he compels as a gentleman, of the cause for admiration and gratitude, which his audience has shown increasingly—in a signal manner Friday and Saturday—none can doubt.

Rabaud to Play His Own Symphony—Braslau Soloist

There remain but two pairs of concerts (this week and next) in the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at them Henri Rabaud will bid farewell to the American public. The program for this week will be memorable to many on account of Mr Rabaud's own Second Symphony in E minor which he is to conduct, acting on a petition signed and sent by a number of our composers early in the season. This work, which is considered Mr Rabaud's masterpiece, has been heard in the various cities of the United States, and this season in Chicago and Philadelphia.

The soloist at the same concerts will be Miss Sophie Braslau, the favorite young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, singing an air from the opera "Ariodant" of the early French composer, Mehul, and three songs of Moussorgsky—"The Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the Dniper." The other numbers will be three movements, "Polonaise," "Rondo" and "Badinerie" from Bach's Suite in B minor, No. 2, for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent, the new French first flutist, as soloist. Finally, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Attention is called to the postponement of the Friday afternoon concert

AMERICAN APRIL 12,

SYMPHONY MEN DEFY ORDERS; SEEK UNION

Over 30 Apply for Membership in American Federation; Higgins on Rules Scored

Boston Symphony Orchestra players for the first time in the history of the orchestra are defying the known rule against union organization and are flocking to the headquarters of the musicians to join.

This action is in defiance of the order issued by Major Henry L. Higginson and repeated recently by Judge Frederick Cabot of the board of directors of the orchestra, that any member of the famous organization who joins a union must leave the orchestra.

H. E. Brenton of New York, a member of the International Executive Board of the American Federation of Musicians, is at the headquarters of the Musicians Union on St. Botolph street receiving applications from members of the symphony.

30 APPLICATIONS IN.

More than 30 men have applied for membership. The action on the part of the members may, it is said, result in the disbanding of the orchestra as statements attributed to Judge Sears that this result would follow the organization of the musicians are being quoted at union headquarters today.

All applications are being received to await final action and completion after the end of the musical season on July 12, as it is not the policy of the union to ask men to break their contracts with the Symphony management, according to Mr. Brenton.

The plain case is," said Brenton, "that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is trying to maintain a European organization on American soil. They will not agree to the organization of their players unless the union agrees to waive its rule which would allow the Symphony Orchestra to import players from Europe when American musicians of equal merit can be had in this country.

"This attitude on their part is mistaken because the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ten years ago was supreme in the world, is now a poor third. The New York Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the Symphony Orchestras of Philadelphia, St. Louis, Minneapolis and San Francisco are all in the union and there is no question concerning the yuality of their work. The position of the management is untenable."

CONDITIONS "UNFAIR."

This contract, made with the players by Major Higginson, contains clauses which the players say are unfair.

Players also object to the refusal of Major Higginson to allow them to play for phonograph records.

At this time Major Higginson said that it was an "unworthy use of their talents," and the players lost the money they were to have been paid by a phonograph company. Later, they complain, the entire orchestra was taken to Camden, N. J., where they were obliged to play for a certain phonograph company.

They also object to the restriction which prevents them from playing outside the orchestra except as soloists.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Rosita Renard, Pianist, Assisted in an Entertaining Program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its local season last evening in Infantry Hall, playing the following program: Mozart, Symphony in D major; Liszt, Concerto in E-flat major; No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra; Franck, Symphony in D minor. Miss Rosita Renard, pianist, was the assisting artist.

For the second time here this season, M. Raboud elected to place two symphonies on an evening's program in lieu of the customary smaller numbers. The first in the order of playing was the Mozart in D major, which was heard here for the first time in a number of years. While in a measure interesting, the impression remained that it is not altogether music after M. Rabaud's own heart, although it should be said that he was painstaking and considerate to a degree with it.

In striking contrast, the second part of the program was given over to the familiar Symphony in D minor of Cesar Franck, which Providence has been fortunate enough to hear twice this year. It has been said of Franck that he just missed greatness, but listening to this noble music, it is not easy to understand why any qualification of his genius should be made. Surely, no symphony that has come out of France in recent years, unless one excepts that of Chausson, is comparable to this beautiful and moving work. It is one of the things which seem to accord perfectly with the conductor's own temperament, and it seemed hardly possible that Franck himself could have led it with a greater degree of felicity or lavished upon it more loving pains. It received a magnificent rendering by the orchestra.

The concert served to bring Miss Renard before a Providence audience for the first time. Still a very young women, she at once arrested the attention by virtue of her uncommon fleetness and dexterity in music that is essentially "effective" and calculated to display a player's virtuosity. Miss Renard gave evidence of abundant technical resource, and won for herself no small triumph. It is difficult, if not impossible, to pass upon a pianist's qualities upon a single hearing, especially when the medium is the Liszt concerto of last night, as almost no opportunity is given for the display of the finer qualities, but Miss Renard is undoubtedly an artist of great talent, and Providence music lovers were interested to hear her in a recital program. She was enthusiastically recalled four times in succession.

The season just closed has been attended with unusual interest ,the greater part of which has quite naturally centered upon the new conductor. M. Rabaud, coming at a time when the very existence of the orchestra seemed precarious, has been called upon to meet conditions calculated to tax the resources of the most patient and accomplished. The fusion of what was, to a great degree, a new organization, the establishment of a repertoire more in accord with current conditions and sentiment, the preparation and performance of more than one hundred concerts—all this has M. Rabaud had to cope with, and he has met the situation with conspicuous success.

Already there is discussion of next season's plans, and several conductors have been named as possibilities, among them Arturo Toscanini. It is understood that as yet the outcome is uncertain. M. Rabaud may continue on for another year, notwithstanding the fact that he himself is reported as somewhat loth to forego the attention to study and composition which his present position makes necessary. If he does not return ,he is sure to be remembered by local audiences with pleasurable recollection and is assured beforehand of a cordial welcome when he does pass this way again. Plans for next season's concerts here are still in the formative stage, though the dates are already announced.

WED.
Loges

Boston Post Tribune April 4th 1919

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.
1919

MONTEUX WILL LEAD BOSTON'S SYMPHONY

Henri Rabaud Retires to Pursue His Chosen Vocation of Composition

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation to extend his contract and will devote his time to composition. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him.

Mr. Monteux at the beginning of this season conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. As a brilliant conductor of ballet and opera he was already known to the Philadelphia public. His single concert last autumn with the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed his fuller talents as a cultured and discriminate interpreter of the symphonic classics. A varied career as musician and conductor also commends him for the post.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.

RABAUD TO LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Benjamin Monteux, to Succeed Him; Is Former Frenchman.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will not be conducted next season by Henri Rabaud, the organization announces, and Pierre Benjamin Monteux, also born in France and now residing in the Uited States, has been engaged to succeed him.

Mr. Monteux conducted the first of the orchestra's Baltimore series of concerts last season, before Mr. Rabaud took up the work. The orchestra recently announced another series of concerts for Baltimore next season.

RASLAU,
ropolitan Opera
at Symphony
Saturday after-essor of former

ake with him to kindly sentiments
t their keen ap-
has done for them
ing and refining rchestral perform-
Boston public the
and artistic tran people, an ele-been sufficiently orchestral music

RIL 19
C

Boston
n Science Monitor
usetts—The twen-
of the Boston
furnished much ut equally divided surable and the
as another oppor-
ar the D mino
Franck, which Mr
pressively at Cam
the season. Onc worth, if it neede
the manner i ved, there is n
phony has com
is to say, it has
the standard or

work of the im-titled "A Basque Laparra. The per-first on any occa-
for orchestra and occasion, the solo
he composer.
n said, first im-
nly uncertain, but the work itself.
is in four short
d the Church,"
"In Front of a
At the Fair." The work is to express
al episodes of a

nted with the local s must be on the his is in no sense for the most part
th the piano in sition. The or-
with addition of rement suggestive tmosphere. One
the first and last
e third movement
mood, well con-er knows his or-que idiom, but so ncerned, it might left out, and the substituted. Mr.
tive side, shows
genuity, with evitraining. As a furnish himself
display, but in
was most ac-than one can-say that the per-brilliant.
fantasy "Kama-
several times in symphony series, however, at these
until the pres-
new to almost
it, and proved a the ever-popular
made a happy

E SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, APRIL 20,

ICAL REVIEW

BOSTON'S CONDUCTOR

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose symphony will be played this week.

Notes About Mr. Rabaud's Symphony Played Here This Week

Mr. Rabaud's second symphony will be performed here at the Symphony concerts this week. It has been played here only once, at Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral concert on Jan. 21, 1908, when Mr. Longy conducted. The symphony was produced in Paris at a Colonne concert on Nov. 12, 1899, when the composer, then 2[illegible] years old, conducted it. For this symphony he was awarded the Prix Monbinne.

The symphony has been performed with marked success in several cities of this country. When it was performed at Chicago last November Mr. Hackett wrote in the Chicago Evening Post:

"Mr. Rabaud is related in his mode of thought to those men who have always written music in the sense that music is the expression of beauty through tone. He is able to create a melody, and the underlying thought of this symphony is melodic. . . . Mr. Rabaud can bring forth from his inner consciousness a melody of strength and beauty—therefore he does. He develops his themes with an exquisite sense of proportion which knows as well where to curtail as where to elaborate. . . . There is all through the music the sense of clarity and balance that is the mark of the man with the feeling for art. Mr. Rabaud used his learning to express his meaning and not to heap up great masses of tone interwoven with endless complications just because he had a modern orchestra to play with. The second movement was very beautiful and the third charming with its sparkling brilliance."

The symphony was by no means new to Philadelphia. Mr. Waldo of the Public Ledger reviewed its performance on last March 28 as follows:

"The masterwork of Rabaud has won the enthusiasm of our audiences on more than one occasion. It is a well-spring undefiled and constant of symphonic inspiration. The full value of the Andante was brought out with the chorale, like strains that revert to Bach of old and Franck in recent times and still are far from slavish imitation. The Scherzo is the happiest little skeedaddle of strings and flute and oboe and harp that ever was, and the Finale is a noble climax indeed."

RABAUD'S FAREWELL CONCERTS

There remain only two pairs of concerts (this week and next) in the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and at them Henri Rabaud will bid his farewell to the American public. The program for this week will be memorable to many on account of Mr. Rabaud's own Second Symphony in E minor which he will conduct, acting on a petition signed and sent by a number of our composers early in the season. This work, which is considered Mr. Rabaud's masterpiece, has been heard frequently in the various cities of the United States, and this season in Chicago and Philadelphia.

The soloist at the same concerts will be Miss Sophie Braslau, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing an air from "Ariodant," by Mehul, and three songs of Moussorgsky, "Death's Serenade," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the Dnieper." The other numbers will be three movements—"Polonaise," "Rondo" and "Badinirie," from Bach's Suite in B minor No. 2 for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent, the new French first flutist, as soloist. Finally, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Attention is called to the postponement of the Friday afternoon concert to the following (Saturday) afternoon, April 26, in order that it may not conflict with the parade of the 26th division. The two concerts will therefore fall on the same day, subscribers' tickets marked April 25, to be used Saturday afternoon, April 26, at 2:30.

Pierre Monteux, who has been chosen to conduct the Boston Symphony next season

New York City
APR 19 1919

GLOBE—APRIL 20

Mr Rabaud as Program Maker

Much has been said of Mr Rabaud as conductor during his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will end, in so far as his personal direction is concerned, a week from Saturday night, but something remains to be said about him as a program builder. It is known that Saint-Saens cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," for four solo voices, chorus and orchestra, will be given as a novelty at the last pair of concerts, May 2 and 3. The program for next week is printed below, making known Mr Rabaud's entire choice of music played during his season as conductor.

Mr Rabaud, while believably not opposed to the performance of music from the Wagner operas in the concert room, has made clear his present position as one not favoring such performance at least until the peace of Paris is signed, a position which he will find liberally shared by those in his audience.

Not in the history of the orchestra has its conductor undertaken to choose the 24 pairs of programs from a symphonic literature excluding all German composers after Brahms, who in this instance Mr Rabaud drew upon for one symphony. Has the result been one to incur restraint, narrowness or loss? Have the patrons had occasion to complain of infrangement upon their pleasure or of any self-protesting chauvinism?

In Mr Fiedler's time the most conspicuous loss among those on the Index would have been Richard Strauss, whom he played much and regorously, and it usually sounded imposing. To Dr Muck, as some said for personal reasons, Richard the second was chosen for the concert room with scarcely less willingness than Richard I. Was it not he who gave us Strauss' Festival Prelude, than which a more bombastic, futile and turgid piece of din is not at this moment recalled?

So for certain of the tone poems—the "Hero's Life," "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan"—there probably are few who would wish them stricken from the repertory of the orchestra indefinitely, notwithstanding what the profession of their author as an eminent disciple of Prussianism may have been.

But who has greatly missed the name and works of Max Reger? Who has felt a lack of modern German scores patterned after the manner of Noren's symphony, a work remembered chiefly for its noise and length? The resouceful label, "Made in Germany," a self-explanatory judgment, had been periodically in demand, and to such extent that even before the war, and before the possible accusation of prejudice could be brought for its self-sufficient causes it was a common observation that there was little of significance in the modern German output. Reasons in part explaining that since have been made clear.

Mr Rabaud has bored his audiences very seldom. He has refrained with a gentlemanly good taste from the unmitigated dreariness, for example, either the first or the second symphony of Elgar, National affiliations of the time notwithstanding. Either of these scores is worse than the other. He has refrained with even more commendable grace from perpetrating pretentious works by young American composers, who, granting that they should hear their scores, hardly have the right to ask a symphony audience to sit them through or to foist them upon an orchestra which should be engaged with better things.

There are unheard and unknown compositions by Americans which should be heard, works which have some claim to be called representative, but as long as conductors choose some of the scores which Dr Muck chose for exploitation, and as long as a great pianist like Josef Hofmann can bring together such a grievous compilation of mediocrity as his "All-American" program, just so long will "The American Composer" as a class need coddling.

Remembering Mr Rabaud's gorgeous performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff and of Borodine, it would have been interesting to have heard him play some of Tschaikowsky—by birth their countryman, but less National than they—more a cosmopolitan. Some Frenchmen, it is said, find him coarse, with a hybric individuality, and do not understand him. In the "fate" symphony, in the tone poems, the "Tempest," "Manfred," the "Francesca da Rimini" or "Romeo and Juliet," there would have been material for Mr Rabaud's insight and taste. Then there was Sibelius. And there are some no doubt who gladly would have heard more from Berlioz perhaps even his youthful "artist's life" symphony, for Berlioz was a man far beyond the recognition of his day, the pioneer with the modern orchestra.

But the season needed only 24 programs, and there was Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert and Schumann to remember—we got on well enough without a Haydn symphony—and, besides, Berlioz was a Frenchman.

Himself a Frenchman, and trained in his own school, it is not strange that Mr Rabaud was conversant with the works of his countrymen and colleagues. Compositions by 17 Frenchmen have appeared, counting Franck, who was a Belgian by birth. This does not include works involving a soloist with the exception of Mr Laparra's novelty, "A Basque Sunday," last week.

Including his cantata yet to come Saint-Saens leads with Franck. His early second symphony, a curious commentary upon the man, was well worth reviving. The symphonic poems gave pleasure to some older hearers to whom Saint-Saens, in the days of the Thomas or the Harvard Musical Concerts, was a modern.

Of course there were fillers—as Dubois' recent overture, as Faure's suite, as Schmitt's open air music, by no means representative of the man of the "Psalm" and the "Salome," or as the excerpts from Franck's "Redemption."

But there was never a program which left the hearer disconsolate, utterly cast down, as one in a desert. There was usually something inspirational in content, and there was concert after concert which not only invited praise and gave pleasure, but touched true, often incomparable, destruction.

Mr Rabaud made his programs with that happy catholicity of taste, that happy eclecticism, that fortunate sense of contrast and of reacting values which made the schools intimate, yet did not permit one to do violence to another. He had no notions about an all-classic, all-modern French or all this or that program. He never killed a fine individual mood by putting a variant alongside of it.

That his taste in program making makes up a large element, together with the rare pleasure he has given as a conductor and the esteem he compels as a gentleman, of the cause for admiration and gratitude, which his audience has shown increasingly—in a signal manner Friday and Saturday—none can doubt.

Rabaud to Play His Own Symphony—Braslau Soloist

There remain but two pairs of concerts (this week and next) in the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at them Henri Rabaud will bid farewell to the American public. The program for this week will be memorable to many on account of Mr Rabaud's own Second Symphony in E minor which he is to conduct, acting on a petition signed and sent by a number of our composers early in the season. This work, which is considered Mr Rabaud's masterpiece, has been heard in the various cities of the United States, and this season in Chicago and Philadelphia.

The soloist at the same concerts will be Miss Sophie Braslau, the favorite young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, singing an air from the opera "Ariodant" of the early French composer, Mehul, and three songs of Moussorgsky—"The Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the Dniper." The other numbers will be three movements, "Polonaise," "Rondo" and "Badinerie" from Bach's Suite in B minor, No. 2, for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent, the new French first flutist, as soloist. Finally, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Attention is called to the postponement of the Friday afternoon concert

AMERICAN APRIL 12,

YMPHONY MEN DEFY ORDERS; SEEK UNION

Over 30 Apply for Membership in American Federation; Higgins on Rules Scored

Boston Symphony Orchestra players for the first time in the history of the orchestra are defying the known rule against union organization and are flocking to the headquarters of the musicians to join.

This action is in defiance of the order issued by Major Henry L. Higginson and repeated recently by Judge Frederick Cabot of the board of directors of the orchestra, that any member of the famous organization who joins a union must leave the orchestra.

H. E. Brenton of New York, a member of the International Executive Board of the American Federation of Musicians, is at the headquarters of the Musicians Union on St. Botolph street receiving applications from members of the symphony.

30 APPLICATIONS IN.

More than 30 men have applied for membership. The action on the part of the members may, it is said, result in the disbanding of the orchestra as statements attributed to Judge Sears that this result would follow the organization of the musicians are being quoted at union headquarters today.

All applications are being received to await final action and completion after the end of the musical season on July 12, as it is not the policy of the union to ask men to break their contracts with the Symphony management, according to Mr. Brenton.

"The plain case is," said Brenton, "that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is trying to maintain a European organization on American soil. They will not agree to the organization of their players unless the union agrees to waive its rule which would allow the Symphony Orchestra to import players from Europe when American musicians of equal merit can be had in this country.

"This attitude on their part is mistaken because the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ten years ago was supreme in the world, is now a poor third. The New York Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the Symphony Orchestras of Philadelphia, St. Louis, Minneapolis and San Francisco are all in the union and there is no question concerning the yuality of their work. The position of the management is untenable."

CONDITIONS "UNFAIR."

This contract, made with the players by Major Higginson, contains clauses which the players say are unfair.

Players also object to the refusal of Major Higginson to allow them to play for phonograph records.

At this time Major Higginson said that it was an "unworthy use of their talents," and the players lost the money they were to have been paid by a phonograph company. Later, they complain, the entire orchestra was taken to Camden, N. J., where they were obliged to play for a certain phonograph company.

They also object to the restriction which prevents them from playing outside the orchestra except as soloists.

8:45. Relatives and friends are invited to attend. Automobile cortege.
VOGEL, MICHEL—In Pawtucket, on the 8th inst., Michel Vogel, in his 53rd year.
WATERMAN, EMILY—In Arlington, the 8th inst., Emily, widow of Royal Waterman, aged 83 years.

MACNAIR, FLORIST, 2 Broad St.

RIVERSIDE

Boy Scouts to Hold First Annual Dance To-night.

major; Franck, Symphony in D minor. Rosita Renard, pianist, was the assisting artist.

For the second time here this season, M. Rabaud elected to place two symphonies on an evening's program in lieu of the customary smaller numbers. The first in the order of playing was the Mozart in D major, which was heard here for the first time in a number of years. While in a measure interesting, the impression remained that it is not altogether music after M. Rabaud's own heart, although it should be said that he was painstaking and considerate to a degree with it.

In striking contrast, the second part of the program was given over to the familiar Symphony in D minor of Cesar Franck, which Providence has been fortunate enough to hear twice this year. It has been said of Franck that he just missed greatness, but listening to this noble music, it is not easy to understand why any qualification of his genius should be made. Surely, no symphony that has come out of France in recent years, unless one excepts that of Chausson, is comparable to this beautiful and moving work. It is one of the things which seem to accord perfectly with the conductor's own temperament, and it seemed hardly possible that Franck himself could have led it with a greater degree of felicity or lavished upon it more loving pains. It received a magnificent rendering by the orchestra.

The concert served to bring Miss Renard before a Providence audience for the first time. Still a very young women, she at once arrested the attention by virtue of her uncommon fleetness and dexterity in music that is essentially "effective" and calculated to display a player's virtuosity. Miss Renard gave evidence of abundant technical resource, and won for herself no small triumph. It is difficult, if not impossible, to pass upon a pianist's qualities upon a single hearing, especially when the medium is the Liszt concerto of last night, as almost no opportunity is given for the display of the finer qualities, but Miss Renard is undoubtedly an artist of great talent, and Providence music lovers were interested to hear her in a recital program. She was enthusiastically recalled four times in succession.

The season just closed has been attended with unusual interest, the greater part of which has quite naturally centered upon the new conductor. M. Rabaud, coming at a time when the very existence of the orchestra seemed precarious, has been called upon to meet conditions calculated to tax the resources of the most patient and accomplished. The fusion of what was, to a great degree, a new organization, the establishment of a repertoire more in accord with current conditions and sentiment, the preparation and performance of more than one hundred concerts—all this has M. Rabaud had to cope with, and he has

WED.
Loges

Pro Sons Tribune
Aug 4th 1919

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

MONTEUX WILL LEAD BOSTON'S SYMPHONY

Henri Rabaud Retires to Pursue His Chosen Vocation of Composition

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation to extend his contract and will devote his time to composition. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him.

Mr. Monteux at the beginning of this season conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. As a brilliant conductor of ballet and opera he was already known to the Philadelphia public. His single concert last autumn with the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed his fuller talents as a cultured and discriminate interpreter of the symphonic classics. A varied career as musician and conductor also commends him for the post.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.

RABAUD TO LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Benjamin Monteux, to Succeed Him; Is Former Frenchman.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will not be conducted next season by Henri Rabaud, the organization announces, and Pierre Benjamin Monteux, also born in France and now residing in the Uited States, has been engaged to succeed him.

Mr. Monteux conducted the first of the orchestra's Baltimore series of concerts last season, before Mr. Rabaud took up the work. The orchestra recently announced another series of concerts for Baltimore next season.

- PHOTOGRAPH -
ORIGINAL STORED
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

HERALD
New York City
APR 20 1919

New Works of Interest to Musicians and Thrills and New Singers to Satisfy the Occasional Opera Goer.

By PAUL MORRIS.

For the opera going public, the season of serious music is at an end. The Metropolitan Opera Company has sent its artists to Atlanta to sing a final week before Southern audiences. It is a time for jazz bands and golf, for dancing and sports. Only the memories of the opera season remain.

But there have been thrills—a few for the music gorged critic, many more for the occasional opera goer. For the professional musician, new music takes precedence over new artists. Both go to make an operatic season worth while. But the public puts its faith in personalities, not in abstractions.

"Does Caruso sing to-night?"

That is the all important question of the man who sits in an orchestra chair or the man who leans over the railing of the gallery to get a clear view of the far-off stage. Thus in reviewing the season of opera at the Metropolitan it seems reasonable to treat of the new artists first. Let the public have its fling at the very start.

It is a well known fact that in deciding whether to raise or lower the status of his artists Mr. Giulio Gatti-Casazza keeps his eyes on the public first and reads the criticisms in the newspapers later.

Two new singers have caught hold of the public beyond a question of doubt. Both are American; both are first rank artists—Miss Rosa Ponselle and Charles Hackett. Other native singers like Miss Sophie Braslau and Mme. Mabel Garrison have had to climb over almost impossible obstacles in raising themselves from minor rôle artists to prima donnas. But these two were "starred" from the beginning of their Metropolitan careers.

Miss Ponselle sang only three rôles, appearing in one novelty, Joseph Breil's "The Legend," and two revivals, Verdi's "La Forza del Destino" and Weber's "Oberon." She has a marvellously full and rich dramatic soprano voice. She has not yet reached the zenith of her career vocally or artistically. But, coming to the Metropolitan without previous operatic training, she has accomplished much.

Mr. Hackett filled a long felt want at the Metropolitan—that of a tenor who can do light rôles artistically. A beautiful lyric voice, a polished style and a distinguished stage presence have made his presence in the opera house very valuable. He can also sing some dramatic rôles well, but there are other tenors for those things. He stands alone in the light parts.

Another tenor, Giulio Crimi, within certain limitations has also had real success. He is a good actor, which is, for some strange reason, unusual in a tenor. He was often miscast in exacting rôles like Rhadames, but necessity and not a singer's volition often determines such matters.

Miss Margaret Romaine, another American soprano in near prima donna rôles, made in her few appearances a very satisfactory record. Three barytones—Reinald Werrenrath, American; Robert Couzinou, French, and Luigi Montesanto, Italian—also made creditable appearances.

French Conductor Retires.

Among the conductors there were no changes, but next season a new French musical director will be engaged. Pierre Monteux has resigned to become leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and French opera has become such an important factor at the Metropolitan that Italian conductors will not be able to handle all the French works. Gennaro Papi, Roberto Moranzoni and Artur Bodanzky all gave good account of themselves in the conductor's stand.

While the Metropolitan Opera Company is too much under Italian influence to be a truly American institution, it is now more nearly American than any great operatic company in New York ever has been. Of the nine new singers engaged for principal rôles six were Americans. There are twenty-one names on the list of Metropolitan sopranos. Australia, Spain, England (married to an American), Holland, Germany (married to an American) and Italy can claim one each. That leaves fifteen Americans.

Mr. Gatti-Casazza desires to make the Metropolitan an international institution. French, Russian, Italian, American and even German works were sung. While no operas were sung in German, three old works—"Marta," sung in Italian; "Le Prophetè," sung in French, and "Oberon," sung in English—were written by German composers.

Every novelty and revival promised for the season was produced. By far the most important of the new productions was the triple bill of Puccini's operas, "Il Tabarro," "Suor Angelica" and "Gianni Schicchi." The first is gripping melodrama, a real "thriller," and the last a bubbling opera comique, a masterpiece. "Suor Angelica" was a disappointment.

Two revivals, "La Forza del Destino" and "Oberon," were much worth while and there were good and sufficient reasons for the other new productions, two American operas, Briel's "The Legend" and Hugo's "The Temple Dancer;" Leroux's "La Reine Fiammette," Gounod's "Mireille," "Crispino e la Comare," by F. and L. Ricci, and Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka."

Enough has been said of old singers and old music. A season is judged by its novel features, its discoveries, its unusual offerings, the thrills that stick in the memory.

The Metropolitan has finished an eventful season and has upheld a high artistic standard. It is rumored, although there has been no official confirmation, that the box office returns have been satisfactory to those financially concerned in the business of opera giving.

AMERICAN
New York City.

Boston Orchestra to Miss Its Leader, Henri Rabaud

By MAX SMITH.

THE announcement that Henri Rabaud has decided to return to France and that Pierre Monteux will be his successor as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can hardly fail to cause regrets here in New York. Monsieur Monteux is not rated by connoisseurs in this city as a leader who can live up to standards established in the past by an organization which for years was acclaimed as the finest body of musicians in America. His activities in the Metropolitan Opera House have offered plenty of opportunity for forming a just estimate of his calibre, and what he accomplished—or failed to accomplish—as temporary head of the band from the Hub in no way altered the opinion of local observers.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

NEITHER is Monsieur Rabaud, perhaps, a great wielder of the baton. Certainly he cannot be described as a man of compelling will, of irresistible authority, of fiery temperament, of big imagination. Yet between Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux the former is surely to be preferred. If not a master of supreme attainments, he is at least the most satisfactory conductor among living musicians of his nationality whom we have had the privilege to see and hear.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

QUITE apart from the individual abilities of the two Frenchmen, however, the engagement of Monsieur Monteux came as a thunderbolt to some of us, because it disposed effectually of the hope that Arturo Toscanini might be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a hope which a few, if not all, of those who have in their hands the future of the orchestra had also entertained.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

PRESUMABLY, Arturo Toscanini either refused absolutely to undertake the directorship of the Boston Orchestra—for it had been offered formally to him—or made conditions which the Board of Directors did not think it could meet. Only recently the famous Italian maestro broke off negotiations with Covent Garden, London, after definite arrangements had almost been completed. And it is barely possible that some of the bitter feelings engendered among the Allies at the peace table in Paris may have played a part in his decision. Toscanini is Italian to his finger tips and a man of strongly emotional nature.

Continued on Page 7.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

Symphony Hall April 25
26th Div, Parade

1919

ADVERTISER APRIL 27

Waitresses at Pops This Season

JUST as surely as the flowers show their heads at the beginning of May, the Pops take possession of Symphony Hall, and make Spring a reality. Next week the tables will be hauled forth, the cuisine installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. The Pops orchestra includes eighty players. Agide Jacchia, who has long been famous as a conductor of Italian opera, is to be here again after two conspicuously successful seasons as leader of the Pops. The program for the opening night, Monday, May 5, follows:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Pastorale for wind octett.....D. Scarlatti
Capriccio for strings.....D. Scarlatti
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capricciosco .....Mendelssohn
Harp solo, "Idyll".....Holy
"Spanish Dance" .....Holy
Enfantillage .....Van Westerhot
Finale of "Scheherazade"...Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea" .....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

The innovation of the year will be a small army of fair waitresses in dainty uniforms and colored ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted upon to please the eye, and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamt of achieving.

TRANSCRIPT APRIL 14

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MR. RABAUD AND HIS BOSTONIAN PUBLIC

The Timely Word That the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Owe to Him and to It, Yet Still Overlook—Mr. de Gogorza and Mme. Samaroff in Wide Range of Their Distinctive Abilities—Programmes and Plans in Prospect

IF Mr. Rabaud, having completed the term for which he was engaged as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is quitting the post at the end of the present season, it seems only fair to him and to the public of the Symphony Concerts, that the Trustees should make announcement accordingly, however uncertain as yet may be their choice of a new leader. Only three pairs of concerts in the current schedule remain. In the past, when a conductor was about to leave the orchestra after able and familiar service, it has been the custom of the audiences to make these final concerts the occasion of signal evidence of good will; while at the last concerts of all, there have usually been some special rites. Opinions may and do differ as to Mr. Rabaud's abilities as a conductor; but there is none to question the disinterestedness and the devotion with which he has served the orchestra and its public in a difficult hour. Many admire him warmly as a musician; not a few are kindly disposed to him as a man; all agree that to the utmost of his powers and with no thought of himself he has filled the post to which he came reluctantly, which he has found taxing beyond expectation.

If Mr. Rabaud is about to leave the orchestra, he deserves every sign in appreciation of this virtue that the public of Fridays and Saturdays may give in these final concerts; while as certainly those audiences would welcome the opportunity to testify to the esteem in which they hold him. As circumstances now are, they know not what to believe. From week to week Mr. Rabaud continues as conductor; the trustees let fall no word as to the future, and the inference is that the leader will remain in his present post. From week to week the air buzzes with gossip about Mr. Rabaud's intention to return permanently to Paris and to the composing he prefers to conducting; and the inference is that in the remaining concerts of the year he is leading the orchestra for the last times. From week to week a like gossip names this or that, the other conductor as his successor, and present and future become yet more clouded. It is quite true that the Trustees of the orchestra and sundry guarantors of their deficit dwell on Olympian heights

Where no frost nor storm is, in clear blue windless abysses,
High in the home of the summer, the seats of the happy immortals,
Shrouded in keen deep blaze, unapproachable . . .

Yet from those august silences, they might let down upon the waiting ears and the petitioning eyes of the mere terrestrial mortals of Fridays and Saturdays at Symphony Hall a word as to Mr. Rabaud's fate or Mr. Rabaud's decision. His hearers, his orchestra, his audiences, above all he himself, deserve as much. Thereafter, if he is departing, the summer, the indispensable, the saving summer stretches before the Olympians for new choice.

GLOBE—APRIL 27

"Pop" Concerts Begin May 5

A new season of "Pop" concerts, tempered by soft drinks and by the graces of soft-footed waitresses to fetch them, "beribboned and uniformed to match appropriately the occasion of the night," as sings the press agent, will open Monday evening a week from tomorrow.

Next week, the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been pronounced, the tables will be hauled forth, the cuisine installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now busily under way. The "Pops" Orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—most orchestral scores ask for no more.

Agide Jacchia, skilled as a conductor of Italian opera in Italy and the Americas, is to be with us again after two conspicuously successful seasons as leader of the "Pops." He is in town now, highly enthusiastic over some new scores, which are "bound to please."

The good old operas, the Rondo Capriccioso, Czibulka's dreamy waltz, the most gorgeous music that was ever made on Oriental and Spanish themes—these are but a taste of a great variety to come. For Mr Jacchia is an indefatigable program maker, and counted the unprecedented repertory of 306 different pieces on his combined programs of last year. Mr Jacchia has worked consistently for three things: quality of performance, variety of programs, and popularity of choice. A proof of his success is an increased interest in the musical side of the "Pops," which, after all, is paramount. He has worked to engage the attention rather than force it, and that is just what he has done.

Many special nights are being planned—for instance, a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "milliners'" night, and a "Liberty Loan" night. The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Mr Stephen Townsend leading the songs of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The doughboy will be given every consideration, and Y-D nights dedicated to him.

As usual, the Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, for 10 weeks. The sale of table reservations and seats for the opening week will begin tomorrow at the Symphony Hall boxoffice.

APRIL

RABAUD RENDITION BRILLIANT

Beethoven's Overture Features Next to Last Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the last Boston Symphony concert, but one, of the season, given yesterday afternoon, Henri Rabaud conducting, was as follows: Symphony No. 2 in E minor, op. 5, Rabaud; recitative and aria, "Odes Amants," from Méhul's "Adriodant"; Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie, from Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings; three songs by Moussorgsky, with orchestral accompaniment, "Death's Serenade," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the River Dnieper"; overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Beethoven. Miss Sophie Braslau, contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera company, was soloist.

OUTSTANDING FEATURE

The overwhelming feature of a brilliant concert was the performance of Beethoven's overture. In at least years it has not been so impressively interpreted in Boston, nor is it easy to conceive of a nobler, more dramatic conception than Mr. Rabaud's. It is astonishing, indeed almost incredible, but the fact not to be fairly or logically denied is that in the passage of years mentioned no German conductor has so thrilled and at least momentarily ennobled his hearers in performing the works of the great master. Beethoven, too, was a man who loved freedom. There has never been in the experience of the writer such an opening of this overture, so moving a treatment of the second theme, such a grim and heroic o'ershadowing of fate through the allegro, so exultant and uplifting a conclusion. Nor is it the least praise of the conductor that during the performance one forgot him and felt the beat of the wings of a mighty spirit above the gathering.

Music Utterly Sincere

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was written by a youth of 25 or thereabouts in 1898 or 1899. It is not the symphony of an innovator. The structure, firm, logical, well-knit, is on conventional symphonic lines. There is felt the Mendelssohn-Schumann romanticism of years gone by in the first and second movements. The wonder is that after these years the music is so pleasing. The scherzo, with its passing reminiscences of themes from other moments and the captivating touches of orchestral color such as the episode for harp and certain wind instruments, appears to owe something to Saint-Saens. And it is more Gallic than the preceding two movements in idom. Themes of the earlier movements again recur in the finale.

The music is utterly sincere, poetic, retrospective in character. We personally find too much of the string choir and not enough variety of combination of wood and brass in the instrumental scheme. Nevertheless, because of the sincerity and fineness of feeling, the well-contrasted themes, of lyrical or dramatic character, and the substantial structure, this symphony gave much pleasure. The audience, which was very enthusiastic, stood at the end of its performance, to honor the composer-conductor whom it has come to so greatly admire and esteem in the course of the season. It was the last demonstration which could fitly be made to one who has rendered such distinguished service as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Choice Is Excellent

Miss Braslau is to be congratulated on choosing songs and an aria of worth and not fatiguingly familiar in concert-goers. The aria of Méhul is old-fashioned but dramatic, demanding both technical brilliancy and considerable interpretive ability of the singer. Miss Braslau made an excellent impression both in the recitative and in the aria which followed. She has a superb voice, which has filled out and developed greatly in its different registers and in its capacity for singing, for the flexible expression of feeling. This was shown not only in the Bach but also in the songs of a composer incomparable among all his colleagues, Modest Moussorgsky.

The wild song of the Cossack settler with the Polish and Jewish horde on the banks of the Dnieper is peculiarly suited to the noble quality of this singer and the breadth of style which Miss [illegible] can obtain. "The Banks of the Don" is as charming as it is inimitable, Russian idyllic in its spirit. "Death's Serenade," one of the series of "Songs and Dances of Death," which Moussorgsky composed under the inspiration of the death of his friend and close companion, in the early '70s, Count Golinitschev-Kutusoff, is a song to freeze the blood, a song in the macabre mood, and representative of one of the phases of Moussorgsky's genius. The dying man, in the night sweet-scented with the [illegible] of June, hears the voice of the Death, who plunks his guitar ever nearer, and at last triumphantly folds her in his arms.

Next Concert

These are not songs for [illegible] Miss Braslau, singing them in the original Russian, interpreted them intelligently, with vocal resources which at times, and rightly, sacrificed sheer tonal loveliness to rhetorical and dramatic intent. She was warmly applauded and recalled. An admirable foil to this [illegible]

- PHOTOGRAPH -
ORIGINAL STORED
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

HERALD
New York City

New Works of Interest to Musicians and Thrills and New Singers to Satisfy the Occasional Opera Goer.

By PAUL MORRIS.

For the opera going public, the season of serious music is at an end. The Metropolitan Opera Company has sent its artists to Atlanta to sing a final week before Southern audiences. It is a time for jazz bands and golf, for dancing and sports. Only the memories of the opera season remain.

But there have been thrills—a few for the music gorged critic, many more for the occasional opera goer. For the professional musician, new music takes precedence over new artists. Both go to make an operatic season worth while. But the public puts its faith in personalities, not in abstractions.

"Does Caruso sing to-night?"

That is the all important question of the man who sits in an orchestra chair or the man who leans over the railing of the gallery to get a clear view of the far-off stage. Thus in reviewing the season of opera at the Metropolitan it seems reasonable to treat of the new artists first. Let the public have its fling at the very start.

It is a well known fact that in deciding whether to raise or lower the status of his artists Mr. Giulio Gatti-Casazza keeps his eyes on the public first and reads the criticisms in the newspapers later.

Two new singers have caught hold of the public beyond a question of doubt. Both are American; both are first rank artists—Miss Rosa Ponselle and Charles Hackett. Other native singers like Miss Sophie Braslau and Mme. Mabel Garrison have had to climb over almost impossible obstacles in raising themselves from minor rôle artists to prima donnas. But these two were "starred" from the beginning of their Metropolitan careers.

Miss Ponselle sang only three rôles, appearing in one novelty, Joseph Breil's "The Legend," and two revivals, Verdi's "La Forza del Destino" and Weber's "Oberon." She has a marvellously full and rich dramatic soprano voice. She has not yet reached the zenith of her career vocally or artistically. But, coming to the Metropolitan without previous operatic training, she has accomplished much.

Mr. Hackett filled a long felt want at the Metropolitan—that of a tenor who can do light rôles artistically. A beautiful lyric voice, a polished style and a distinguished stage presence have made his presence in the opera house very valuable. He can also sing some dramatic rôles well, but there are other tenors for those things. He stands alone in the light parts.

Another tenor, Giulio Crimi, within certain limitations has also had real success. He is a good actor, which is, for some strange reason, unusual in a tenor. He was often miscast in exacting rôles like Rhadames, but necessity and not a singer's volition often determines such matters.

Miss Margaret Romaine, another American soprano in near prima donna rôles, made in her few appearances a very satisfactory record. Three barytones—Reinald Werrenrath, American; Robert Couzinou, French, and Luigi Montesanto, Italian—also made creditable appearances.

French Conductor Retires.

Among the conductors there were no changes, but next season a new French musical director will be engaged. Pierre Monteux has resigned to become leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and French opera has become such an important factor at the Metropolitan that Italian conductors will not be able to handle all the French works. Gennaro Papi, Roberto Moranzoni and Artur Bodanzky all gave good account of themselves in the conductor's stand.

While the Metropolitan Opera Company is too much under Italian influence to be a truly American institution, it is now more nearly American than any great operatic company in New York ever has been. Of the nine new singers engaged for principal rôles six were Americans. There are twenty-one names on the list of Metropolitan sopranos. Australia, Spain, England (married to an American), Holland, Germany (married to an American) and Italy can claim one each. That leaves fifteen Americans.

Mr. Gatti-Casazza desires to make the Metropolitan an international institution. French, Russian, Italian, American and even German works were sung. While no operas were sung in German, three old works—"Marta," sung in Italian; "Le Prophetè," sung in French, and "Oberon," sung in English—were written by German composers.

Every novelty and revival promised for the season was produced. By far the most important of the new productions was the triple bill of Puccini's operas, "Il Tabarro," "Suor Angelica" and "Gianni Schicchi." The first is gripping melodrama, a real "thriller," and the last a bubbling opera comique, a masterpiece. "Suor Angelica" was a disappointment.

Two revivals, "La Forza del Destino" and "Oberon," were much worth while and there were good and sufficient reasons for the other new productions, two American operas, Briel's "The Legend" and Hugo's "The Temple Dancer;" Leroux's "La Reine Fiammette," Gounod's "Mireille," "Crispino e la Comare," by F. and L. Ricci, and Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka."

Enough has been said of old singers and old music. A season is judged by its novel features, its discoveries, its unusual offerings, the thrills that stick in the memory.

The Metropolitan has finished an eventful season and has upheld a high artistic standard. It is rumored, although there has been no official confirmation, that the box office returns have been satisfactory to those financially concerned in the business of opera giving.

AMERICAN
New York City.

Boston Orchestra to Miss Its Leader, Henri Rabaud

By MAX SMITH.

THE announcement that Henri Rabaud has decided to return to France and that Pierre Monteux will be his successor as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can hardly fail to cause regrets here in New York. Monsieur Monteux is not rated by connoisseurs in this city as a leader who can live up to standards established in the past by an organization which for years was acclaimed as the finest body of musicians in America. His activities in the Metropolitan Opera House have offered plenty of opportunity for forming a just estimate of his calibre, and what he accomplished—or failed to accomplish—as temporary head of the band from the Hub in no way altered the opinion of local observers.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

NEITHER is Monsieur Rabaud, perhaps, a great wielder of the baton. Certainly he cannot be described as a man of compelling will, of irresistible authority, of fiery temperament, of big imagination. Yet between Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux the former is surely to be preferred. If not a master of supreme attainments, he is at least the most satisfactory conductor among living musicians of his nationality whom we have had the privilege to see and hear.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

QUITE apart from the individual abilities of the two Frenchmen, however, the engagement of Monsieur Monteux came as a thunderbolt to some of us, because it disposed effectually of the hope that Arturo Toscanini might be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a hope which a few, if not all, of those who have in their hands the future of the orchestra had also entertained.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

PRESUMABLY, Arturo Toscanini either refused absolutely to undertake the directorship of the Boston Orchestra—for it had been offered formally to him—or made conditions which the Board of Directors did not think it could meet. Only recently the famous Italian maestro broke off negotiations with Covent Garden, London, after definite arrangements had almost been completed. And it is barely possible that some of the bitter feelings engendered among the Allies at the peace table in Paris may have played a part in his decision. Toscanini is Italian to his finger tips and a man of strongly emotional nature.

Continued on Page 7.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

Symphony Hall April 25
26th Div, Parade

1919

ADVERTISER APRIL 27

Waitresses at Pops This Season

JUST as surely as the flowers show their heads at the beginning of May, the Pops take possession of Symphony Hall, and make Spring a reality. Next week the tables will be hauled forth, the cuisine installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. The Pops orchestra includes eighty players. Agide Jacchia, who has long been famous as a conductor of Italian opera, is to be here again after two conspicuously successful seasons as leader of the Pops. The program for the opening night, Monday, May 5, follows:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Pastorale for wind octett.....D. Scarlatti
Capriccio for strings.....D. Scarlatti
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capricciosco .....Mendelssohn
Harp solo, "Idyll".....Holy
"Spanish Dance" .....Holy
Enfantillage .....Van Westerhot
Finale of "Scheherazade"...Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea" .....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

The innovation of the year will be a small army of fair waitresses in dainty uniforms and colored ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted upon to please the eye, and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamt of achieving.

TRANSCRIPT APRIL 14, PO

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MR. RABAUD AND HIS BOSTONIA PUBLIC

The Timely Word That the Trustees o the Symphony Orchestra Owe to Him and to It, Yet Still Overlook—Mr. de Gogorza and Mme. Samaroff in Wide Range of Their Distinctive Abilities—Programmes and Plans in Prospect

IF Mr. Rabaud, having completed the term for which he was engaged as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is quitting the post at the end of the present season, it seems only fair to him and to the public of the Symphony Concerts, that the Trustees should make announcement accordingly, however uncertain as yet may be their choice of a new leader. Only three pairs of concerts in the current schedule remain. In the past, when a conductor was about to leave the orchestra after able and familiar service, it has been the custom of the audiences to make these final concerts the occasion of signal evidence of good will; while at the last concerts of all, there have usually been some special rites. Opinions may and do differ as to Mr. Rabaud's abilities as a conductor; but there is none to question the disinterestedness and the devotion with which he has served the orchestra and its public in a difficult hour. Many admire him warmly as a musician; not a few are kindly disposed to him as a man; all agree that to the utmost of his powers and with no thought of himself he has filled the post to which he came reluctantly, which he has found taxing beyond expectation.

If Mr. Rabaud is about to leave the orchestra, he deserves every sign in appreciation of this virtue that the public of Fridays and Saturdays may give in these final concerts; while as certainly those audiences would welcome the opportunity to testify to the esteem in which they hold him. As circumstances now are, they know not what to believe. From week to week Mr. Rabaud continues as conductor; the trustees let fall no word as to the future; and the inference is that the leader will remain in his present post. From week to week the air buzzes with gossip about Mr. Rabaud's intention to return permanently to Paris and to the composing he prefers to conducting; and the inference is that in the remaining concerts of the year he is leading the orchestra for the last times. From week to week a like gossip names this or that, the other conductor as his successor, and present and future become yet more clouded. It is quite true that the Trustees of the orchestra and sundry guarantors of their deficit dwell on Olympian heights

Where no frost nor storm is, in clear blue windless abysses,
High in the home of the summer, the seats of the happy immortals,
Rounded in keen deep blaze, unapproachable . . .

Yet from those august silences, they might let down upon the waiting ears and the petitioning eyes of the mere terrestrials of Fridays and Saturdays at Symphony Hall a word as to Mr. Rabaud's fate or Mr. Rabaud's decision. His hearers, his orchestra, his audiences, above all he himself, deserve as much. Thereafter, if he is departing, the summer, the indispensable, the saving summer stretches before them Olympians for new choice.

GLOBE—APRIL 27

"Pop" Concerts Begin May 5

A new season of "Pop" concerts, tempered by soft drinks and by the graces of soft-footed waitresses to fetch them, "beribboned and uniformed to match appropriately the occasion of the night," as sings the press agent, will open Monday evening a week from tomorrow.

Next week, the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been pronounced, the tables will be hauled forth, the cuisine installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now busily under way. The "Pops" Orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—most orchestral scores ask for no more.

Agide Jacchia, skilled as a conductor of Italian opera in Italy and the Americas, is to be with us again after two conspicuously successful seasons as leader of the "Pops." He is in town now, highly enthusiastic over some new scores, which are "bound to please."

The good old operas, the Rondo Capriccioso, Czibulka's dreamy waltz, the most gorgeous music that was ever made on Oriental and Spanish themes—these are but a taste of a great variety to come. For Mr Jacchia is an indefatigable program maker, and counted the unprecedented repertory of 306 different pieces on his combined programs of last year. Mr Jacchia has worked consistently for three things: quality of performance, variety of programs, and popularity of choice. A proof of his success is an increased interest in the musical side of the "Pops," which, after all, is paramount. He has worked to engage the attention rather than force it, and that is just what he has done.

Many special nights are being planned—for instance, a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "milliners'" night, and a "Liberty Loan" night. The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Mr Stephen Townsend leading the songs of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The doughboy will be given every consideration, and Y-D nights dedicated to him.

As usual, the Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, for 10 weeks. The sale of table reservations and seats for the opening week will begin tomorrow at the Symphony Hall boxoffice.

APRIL

RABAUD'S RENDITION BRILLIANT

Beethoven's Overture Features Next to Last Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the last Boston Symphony concert, but one, of the season, given yesterday afternoon, Henri Rabaud conducting, was as follows: Symphony No. 2 in E minor, op. 5, Rabaud; recitative and aria, "Odes Amants," from Mehul's "Adriodant"; Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie, from Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings; three songs by Moussorgsky, with orchestral accompaniment, "Death's Serenade," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the River Dnieper"; overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Beethoven. Miss Sophie Braslau, contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera company, was soloist.

OUTSTANDING FEATURE

The overwhelming feature of a brilliant concert was the performance of Beethoven's overture. In at least 20 years it has not been so impressively interpreted in Boston, nor is it easy to conceive of a nobler, more dramatic conception than Mr. Rabaud's. It is astonishing, indeed almost incredible, but the fact not to be fairly or logically denied is that in the passage of years mentioned no German conductor has so thrilled and at least momentarily ennobled his hearers in performing the works of the great master. Beethoven, too, was a man who loved freedom. There has never been in the experience of the writer such an opening of this overture, so moving a treatment of the second theme, such a grim and heroic o'ershadowing of fate through the allegro, so exultant and uplifting a conclusion. Nor is it the least praise of the conductor that during the performance one forgot him and felt the beat of the wings of a mighty spirit above the gathering.

Music Utterly Sincere

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was written by a youth of 25 or thereabouts in 1898 or 1899. It is not the symphony of an innovator. The structure, firm, logical, well-knit, is on conventional symphonic lines. There is felt the Mendelssohn-Schumann romanticism of years gone by in the first and second movements. The wonder is that after these years the music is so pleasing. The scherzo, with its passing reminiscences of themes from other moments and its captivating touches of orchestral color such as the episode for harp and certain wind instruments, appears to owe something to Saint-Saens. And it is more Gallic than the preceding two movements in idom. Themes of the earlier movements again recur in the finale.

The music is utterly sincere, poetic, retrospective in character. We personally find too much of the string choir and not enough variety of combination of wood and brass in the instrumental scheme. Nevertheless, because of the sincerity and fineness of feeling, the well-contrasted themes, of lyrical or dramatic character, and the substantial structure, this symphony gave much pleasure. The audience, which was very enthusiastic, stood at the end of its performance, to honor the composer-conductor whom it has come to so greatly admire and esteem in the course of the season. It was the last demonstration which could fitly be made to one who has rendered such distinguished service as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Choice Is Excellent

Miss Braslau is to be congratulated on choosing songs and an aria of worth and not fatiguingly familiar to concert-goers. The aria of Mehul is old-fashioned but dramatic, demanding both technical brilliancy and considerable interpretive ability of the singer. Miss Braslau made an excellent impression both in the recitative and in the aria which followed. She has a superb voice, which has filled out and developed greatly in its different registers and in its capacity for color and for the flexible expression of feeling. This was shown not only in this but also in the songs of a composer unparalleled among all his colleagues, Modest Moussorgsky.

The wild song of the Cossack life with the Polish and Jewish horde on the banks of the Dnieper is peculiarly suited to the noble quality of this singer, the breadth of style which Miss Braslau can obtain. "The Banks of the Don" is as charming as it is inimitable, as idyllic in its spirit. "Death's Serenade," one of the series of "Songs and Dances of Death," which Moussorgsky composed under the inspiration of verse of his friend and close companion of the early '70s, Count Golinitschef-Kutusoff, is a song to freeze the blood, a song in the macabre mood, all unprecedented, representative of one of the phases of Moussorgsky's genius. The dying soldier in the night sweet-scented with the odors of June, hears the voice of the Spectre, Death, who plunks his guitar and comes nearer, and at last triumphantly enfolds her in his arms.

Next Concert the

These are not songs for everyone. Miss Braslau, singing them in the original Russian, interpreted them very intelligently, with vocal resources which at times, and rightly, sacrificed sheer tonal loveliness to rhetorical and dramatic intent. She was warmly applauded and recalled. An admirable foil to this music were the charming movements from Bach's suite, in which Mr. Laurent, flutist, excelled.

The concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be the final ones of the present Boston Symphony season, and the "Pops" season will open one week from tomorrow.

REDUCTION RATIO 16x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

CONDUCTOR AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, Who Has Long Been Famous as a Conductor Italian Opera, Returns to the Pops.

RABAUD'S FAREWELL

For the occasion of his farewell appearances before the American public, which are also the final concerts of the Boston Symphony season, on Friday and Saturday next (May 2 and 3), Mr. Rabaud has chosen an appropriate program of one American and one French work. The first will be the "Woodland Suite" of MacDowell, describing "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess's Song," "Forest Spirit." The rest of the program will be filled by Saint-Saens's "The Lyre and the Harp," a choral ode of large proportions, being a musical setting of Victor Hugo's poem. A chorus of 150 voices, trained by Mr. Townsend, will sing, together with the following quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

GALA POPS SEASON

As surely as the flowers show their heads at the beginning of May, the Pops take possession of Symphony Hall, and make spring a reality.

Next week the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been pronounced, the tabbs will be hauled forth, the cookery plant installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now busily under way. The Pops orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—most orchestral scores ask for no more.

Agide Jacchia, who has long been famous as a conductor of Italian opera, will again, after two conspicuously successful seasons, be leader of the Pops.

The program follows.

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halversen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octett...D. Scarlatti
(b) Capriccio for strings
Instrumentation by Mr. Jacchia.
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo (a) "Elgin" (b) "Spanish Dance"
Entr'actes .....Holst
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Van Westerhout
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sarabide, Dance from "The Promise of Meeks".....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

Mr. Jacchia is an indefatigable program maker. He counted the unprecedented repertoire of 28 different pieces on his combined programs of last year. Mr. Jacchia has worked consistently for three things—quality of performance, variety of programs and popularity of choice.

The innovation of the year will be a small army of waitresses in dainty uniforms and colored ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted on to please the eye and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamed of achieving.

Many special nights are planned; for instance, a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "millionaire's night" and "Liberty Loan night." The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Stephen Townsend leading the songs of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The "doughboy" will be given every consideration and YD nights dedicated to him.

As usual, the Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, for 10 weeks. The sale of table reservations and seats for the opening week will be made

RABAUD CHARMS IN 2 CONCERTS

Second Symphony Worthy Work; Composers Prefer Not to Conduct

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Rabaud.....Symphony in E major.
Mehul.....Air from "Adolphe et Clara."
Soloist, Miss Sophie Braslau.
Bach.....Three movements from B minor suite.
Moussorgsky.....Three songs with orchestra.
Miss Braslau.
Beethoven.....Egmont" overture.

At this concert in Symphony Hall Yesterday afternoon and repeated in the evening, we find revealed the true reason why M. Rabaud goes back to Paris. A little attack of a good deal of home sickness, but chiefly the desire to get back to composition. A man who can write clear and symmetrical, a symphony does not care greatly for conducting.

Spite of Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, of Richard Strauss and Mendelssohn, the average composer does not like conducting, while the thorough conductor had better give up composition. When Hans Richter took up conducting as his life work he put all his compositions in the stove, lit them, and made a cup of coffee on the flames. After that cup of coffee he became one of the greatest of conductors.

The Rabaud symphony explains also why we have had little of the extreme modern French school in our programs, for it moves along the regular path which St. Saens and Franck trod, and it does not indulge in eccentricities or vagaries. There is good counterpoint, the interweaving of themes, and the theme themes are intelligible if somewhat sombre at times. The first movement is tragic, just as Franck's D minor symphony is mournful.

A STRIKING COMBINATION.

The slow movement also has some sorrowful touches, but there is a tranquil, chorale-like theme in contrast. Only in the third movement does a lighter mood set in, and here, against the dance-like theme, comes the chorale-like melody of the first movement, a striking combination. The working up of this theme, both in the second and third movements is masterly and again reminds strongly of the style of Cesar Franck, although more dramatic than that master.

[illegible] with fresh material and the two movements conjoined with the original theme. It is as a whole plaintive and sorrowful. Although there are major effects at the final climax and a recurrence of chorale treatment, chief emotion of the work is struggle rather than triumph. We long for a bit of Schumann's broad virility at the close. The third movement seemed to receive the best attention, but we felt that the turbulence of the first movement and the skilful combinations of the themes in the second were easily the best of the work. At the end of it (in the afternoon) the orchestra and the audience rose and gave M. Rabaud a triumph such as is accorded to few composers in Boston.

The three movements from Bach's Suite for flute and strings require no new analysis. They showed that Bach is by no means the "dry-as-dust" composer that the uneducated imagine him to be. But they were refreshing new in the beauty of the flute-playing, especially in the coquettish "Badinerie." Our orchestra is to be congratulated on having two such artists as M. Georges Laurent and M. Georges Longy in its woodwind department. M. Laurent was vociferously applauded.

THE SCREAM OF VICTORY.

If the note of triumph was some [illegible] what lacking in the opening work of this program, it was made up by the screams of Victory in the last number. We are told that "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell" (he may have had his her toes) but she fairly yelled, according to Beethoven, after Egmont lost his head. Beethoven was always frenzied when he had Liberty for a subject, and the work was given with all the spirit which it demanded, the piccolo fully earning its salary, and the violins scaling the heights bravely, in the coda.

Miss Braslau won success in some entirely unfamiliar numbers. Mehul's music is seldom heard nowadays outside of France. We only remember him as the composer who once wrote an opera without any violins, at the request of Napoleon Bonaparte. Yet the air from "Ariodant" was very attractive and melodic, although the progression, so unlike French operas, are somewhat too obvious. Even Miss Braslau's noble alto could not make the music live. Still that there was plenty of dramatic force in the first and last of her three songs by Moussorg.

The last song, "On the Dnieper," fairly waded in Bolshevik style, in Polish and Russian folk lore, and the music was exciting as the words. Miss Braslau sang it superbly, and in Russian, which is a sufficiently musical tongue to be called the Italian of the North.

The artist was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm. The originality of the songs and the work of the singer deserved the tribute.

RECALLS HIM TWICE TO GIVE OVATIONS

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, announced for Friday afternoon, was postponed until yesterday afternoon on account of the parade. The concert was repeated last night. The program was as follows: Rabaud, Symphony, No. 2, E minor (first time at these concerts); Mehul, Recitative, "Que dis-je?" and Aria "O des Amants, le plus fidele" from "Ariodant" (Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company); Bach, Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite No. 2, B minor, for flute and strings (George Laurent, flute); Moussorgsky, Three Songs with orchestral accompaniment: Death's Serenade, the Banks of the Don, On the River Dnieper (Miss Braslau); Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was first played in Paris in 1899, when he was 26 years old. It was played under his direction. For this work he was awarded the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs. The symphony was heard in Boston 11 years ago at one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's concerts, conducted by Mr. Longy. There have been four double performances in Philadelphia. The symphony has been played by the New York Symphony orchestra, the Chicago Symphony orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and it was performed at the Worcester Festival of 1917.

A prize composition is often and justly looked on with suspicion. To satisfy the average judges, the work must be orthodox; all the conventions must be observed; above all, there must be grace of originality.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony is a brilliant exception to the rule. While the workmanship displayed must have satisfied the most critical, the music is far from being pedantic. There is no counterpoint merely for counterpoint's sake. The fresh, vigorous, beautiful themes are developed in an interesting and often dramatic manner. While the different movements are well contrasted there is a unity of the whole by reason of the ingenious and at times unexpected use in the later movements of preceding themes. The announcement of the virile motif at the beginning of the work arouses attention. This and the next theme are followed by a pleasing song for the oboe. This thematic material is worked out in masterly fashion. The whole movement is strongly dramatic, but not theatrical. Here, as in the movements that follow, the hearer recognizes a composer of a sensitive, poetic nature, whose innate virility is controlled by a fine, refined taste.

This first movement, energetic, now melancholy, wistful, now exultant, is on the whole the expression of a perturbed soul. The slow movement and the Scherzo are in a different vein. The former has for its chief subject an impressive Chorale of quiet, solemn beauty. This theme is used in the following movements with marked effect. It is introduced in the Scherzo, after the light and tripping first subject, introduced with great cunning; witness the variant of it, skilfully orchestrated. And in this Scherzo, as in the other movements, Mr. Rabaud has shown that he knows when to stop. He does not insist too strongly on an idea though it may please him; he is not enamored of his own thoughts; he does not repeat, dilute, weary. In some respects the Finale is the most striking movement of the four. The opening, whirring measures, the mysterious mutterings, the voices hinting, prophesying, stir the imagination of the hearer. And in the Finale as in the Scherzo, the mood is suddenly changed, by the introduction of quieter, contemplative measures. Nor is the apotheosis a blatant appeal, a trap set for the applause of the unthinking.

The production of this symphony is one of the leading features of a season that has been remarkable for the excellence of the programs and for the bringing out of many unfamiliar works that richly deserved a hearing. The reception given to this symphony yesterday afternoon was much more than a compliment to a departing and honored guest. The music itself made an immediate and deep impression. At the end, when Mr. Rabaud was recalled the second time, not only the orchestra, but the audience rose spontaneously and paid a tribute long to be remembered.

Mr. Rabaud sensibly gave only three of the seven movements in Bach's Suite. These afforded Mr. Laurent, the solo flutist, opportunity to show his skill and taste, as he had already done in the Scherzo of the symphony, as he had already done at concerts in the past.

Miss Braslau, who sang here at a subscription concert for the first time, brought out an air in the grand style from Mehul's forgotten opera. The aria is interesting, and not only as an example of the heroic French manner of 120 years ago. There is a dignity, a nobility in this air, so that one can understand the enthusiasm of Berlioz. Miss Braslau, whose voice is a rich one, of liberal compass, also of true contralto quality, sang the old music dramatically and with full appreciation of the varied emotional contents. It was a pleasure to hear Moussorgsky's songs, which she sang in Russian. Here, again, she sang dramatically, but she did not overstep the line that separates the concert from the opera. And how the three songs differed! Death serenading the maiden who at last is his; the charming song of the garden by the Don, with Masha coming from the well; and then the savage cry of the Cossack to the river Dnieper, foretelling the triumph of Ukraina; singularly effective, the three, as Miss Braslau sang them.

Press
APR 24 1919

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Succeeds Henri Rabaud as Conductor of Orchestra

Albert Sidney Biggs Becomes Organist

[From the New York World.]

[illegible] Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Pierre Monteux, who has been conducting the Paris Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite poles. Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his preoccupied gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words. The other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could not imagine Mr. Rabaud as making enemies; one could fancy Mr. Monteux as making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform his redy smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

Yet Mr. Monteux is ill described if you think him one without strong views, one who veers to the wind of others' opinions. Ask him what he thinks of "Pagliacci" or of the operas of Puccini and see the devotee's indignation in his musician's eye. But if you expect any chauvinistic prejudices to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théatre des Champs-Elysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on four tours he has specialized in Russian ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mais oui; second rate, also. Facile; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with it. It is music for the public, as far as for me I like music for the musicians."

"And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure; the public for me has more for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"But yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra, it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programme must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux recalled. "We gave his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saëns was his own organist. He was not all satisfied with the organist chosen, he said, "I will play the organ myself, but who shall conduct?" It was [illegible] heard, and a friend of mine said, 'Monteux is in the audience.' 'A-ah!' Saëns demands that I come to the [illegible] that I conduct. Voilà! I have c[illegible] Saëns—'La Princesse [illegible]'

MONTEUX AND MUSIC

SUNDRY OPINIONS FROM THE NEW CONDUCTOR

The Range of His Experiences — Catholicity and Wagner — Symphonic Versus Operatic Pieces—A Word About French, and Also About American, Composers—Orchestra and Leader

NO two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite poles. Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his preoccupied gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words. The other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could not imagine Mr. Rabaud as making enemies; one could fancy Mr. Monteux as making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform his redy smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

Yet Mr. Monteux is ill described if you think him one without strong views, one who veers to the wind of others' opinions. Ask him what he thinks of "Pagliacci" or of the operas of Puccini and see the devotee's indignation in his musician's eye. But if you expect any chauvinistic prejudices to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théatre des Champs-Elysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on four tours he has specialized in Russian ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mais oui; second rate, also. Facile; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with it. It is music for the public, as far as for me I like music for the musicians."

"And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure; the public for me has more for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"But yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra, it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programme must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux recalled. "We gave his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saëns was his own organist. He was not all satisfied with the organist chosen, he said, "I will play the organ myself, but who shall conduct?" It was [illegible] heard, and a friend of mine said, 'Monteux is in the audience.' 'A-ah!' Saëns demands that I come to the [illegible] that I conduct. Voilà! I have c[illegible] Saëns—'La Princesse [illegible]'

[illegible] his greatest work, Sunset pure [illegible]

"There has been no [illegible] during out of the war, in France [illegible] Mr. Monteux said regretfully in a [illegible] to a question. "Nor will there be for [illegible] time, I believe. Men's minds have [illegible] on other things. One writes you [illegible] to an occasion and one cannot be equal [illegible] the occasion as it has been in France the four years."

"Have you ever composed, Mr. Monteux?" He leaned forward confidentially, finger up. "Yes, indeed. I have composed many things. And do you know where they are, those compositions? In a big box, tied up tight with a string. And they will never see the sun, I promise you. I play too much other people's music to write any more of my own. Not since fifteen years ago, when I composed for the last time, have I written anything. For I believe that a man can only have one career, and that mine is to conduct. I shall always be a conductor."

"You find the personal equation a strong factor in conducting, do you not, Mr. Monteux? What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?"

"Both," the conductor answered. "It must seem a democracy, but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for the orders' sake, but only to get results." Mr. Monteux seemed as he spoke an epitome of that remarkable nation whose foremost quality has long been the ability to influence others, while always respecting the individual's liberty. One could not imagine this smiling, vivacious little man ever becoming autocratic; but one could readily perceive how his personality might arouse in others enthusiasm for that music which so evidently rules his life.

"Presently we spoke of Russian composers and Mr. Monteux expressed his admiration for the works of Rimsky-Korsakov, of Borodin and of Stravinsky. "So many material difficulties have interfered with presenting Russian operas," he said regretfully. "People wonder why more are not performed, but you see it needs more than the composer and the librettist; more even than the artists. Not so with the giving of the orchestral music. I look forward to that. It will be my hope to include all kinds of good music, even American," he added with a laugh. "France ought to hear some of your composers, by the way; you have several that should be known in Europe. Loeffler, Carpentier, four or five others are well worthy to be heard; some of them here. Then I shall seek out and bring over some good concert music from Italy. That is a side of Italian musical development that has been too much ignored, for the operatic pieces always receive the emphasis. There are a number of young Italian composers of whom I hear good things said, as well as the older ones whose music I hope to bring forward."

"Is there anything you would especially like to say for publication, Mr. Monteux?" he said, unexpectedly and earnestly. "Yes, for that! Young people, you have in playing French music I shall be the French propaganda. You understand, Messager and I, we have Rabaud, Messager and I, we have [illegible] in France; it is our country. We naturally love and we play the music of our country. But not only music is great enough not to need [illegible] you Americans know and love music already. I shall not play music because it is French music, but because it is great music. But I understand, although I love it. But I play the best music of every nation."

—Ethelbert Peeler in Musical America.

SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, APRIL 27, 1919

CONDUCTOR AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, Who Has Long Been Famous as a Conductor of Italian Opera, Returns to the Pops.

RABAUD'S FAREWELL

For the occasion of his farewell appearance before the American public, which are also the final concerts of the Boston Symphony season, on Friday and Saturday next (May 2 and 3), Mr. Rabaud has chosen an appropriate program of new French work. Debussy's "Nocturnes." The first will be the "Woodland Suite" of MacDowell, describing "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess's Song," "Forest Spirits." The rest of the program will be filled by Saint-Saens' "The Eye and the Harm," a choral ode of large proportions, being a musical setting of Victor Hugo's poem. A chorus of 150 voices, trained by Mr. Townsend, will sing, together with the following quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

GALA POPS SEASON

As surely as the flowers show their heads at the beginning of May, the Pops take possession of Symphony Hall, and make spring a reality.

Next week the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been promulgated, the tables will be hauled forth, the cookery plant installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now busily under way. The Pops orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—must orchestral scores ask for no more.

Agide Jacchia, who has long been famous as a conductor of Italian opera, will again, after two conspicuously successful seasons, be leader of the Pops.

The program follows.

Entrances of the Royals.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octet...D. Scarlatti
(b) Capricio for strings.....Pergolesi
Instrumentation by Mr. Jacchia
Fantasia, "Carnaval".....Bizet
Rondo, "Capriccioso".....Mendelssohn
Harp solo (a) "Elfin" ..Alvarez—Grandani Dancers.....Holy
Entertainer.....Van Westerhout
Finale of "Scaciaprazide".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrifice Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Rabaud
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Hungarian".....Chabrier

Mr. Jacchia is an indefatigable programme maker. He counted the unprecedented repertoire of 24 different pieces on his combined programs of last year. Mr. Jacchia has worked consistently for three things—quality of performance, variety of programs and popularity of choice.

The innovation of the year will be a small army of waitresses in dainty uniforms and colored ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted on to please the eye and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamed of achieving.

Many special nights are planned. For instance, a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "Volunteer Liners' night" and "Liberty Loan night." The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Stephen Townsend leading the sons of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The "doughboy" will be given every consideration and YD nights dedicated to him.

As usual, the Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, for 12 weeks. The sale of table reservations and seats for the opening week will [illegible]

SUNDAY ADVERTISER AND AMERICAN, APRIL 27, 1919

RABAUD CHARMS IN 2 CONCERTS

Second Symphony a Worthy Work; Composers Prefer Not to Conduct

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

(CHICAGO)

Rabaud "Symphony in Major"
Mozart "Air from Idomeneo"
Debussy "Nocturnes" (Two numbers)
Bach "Toccata and Fugue in D minor"
Moussorgsky "Three Songs"
Beethoven "Egmont" overture

At the Boston Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and repeated in the evening, we had revealed the true reason why M. Rabaud goes back to Paris. It is not, as I thought, a good deal of home sickness, but chiefly the desire to get back his composition. Much a work should be one and symmetrical, a symphony does not cate greatly for conducting.

Between Berlioz and Wagner, Richard Strauss and Mendelssohn, the average composer does not long for conducting, but the thorough conductor had better give up composing for. When Bach or Beethoven conducted or his the work he put all his compositions in a cup of coffee over them, and sought the greatest of coffee drinkers.

The Rabaud symphony, explaining why M. Rabaud had left Paris, is a work which modern French school in programs, for it moves along regular path which M. Rabaud has taken in his work. It does not indulge in eccentricities or vagaries. There is some counterpoint, but it does not intrude, and these themes are memorable, simple, somewhat similar to Franck's D minor symphony, but more melodic.

A STRIKING COMBINATION

The slow movement also has some beautiful, chorale-like theme in contrast. Only in the third movement does a lighter mood set in, and here against the dance-like theme, comes a chorale-like melody of great beauty. A striking combination. The working up of this theme, in the second and third movements is quite lovely and again reminds strongly of the style of César Franck, in a much more dramatic than that [illegible]

[illegible] popular opinion, or [illegible] Boston, are more [illegible] at the chorale, chief exponent of the world's strangle rather than [illegible] Saint-Saëns's [illegible] Saint-Saëns's [illegible] virility at the close. The third movement seemed to receive the greatest [illegible] in the finale found the turbulence of the first movement and the skilful combinations of the second. At the end of it (in the afternoon) the orchestra and the audience rose and gave M. Rabaud a triumph such as is accorded to few composers in the Boston.

The three movements from Bach's Suite for flute and strings require no new analysis. They showed that Bach is by no means the "dry-as-dust" composer that the uneducated imagine him to be. But they were almost new in the beauty of the flute-playing, especially in the concertino "Badinerie." Our orchestra is to be congratulated on having two such artists as M. Georges Laurent and M. Georges Longy; in a wonderful department. M. Laurent was vociferously applauded.

THE SCREAM OF VICTORY

If the note of triumph was somewhat lacking in the opening work of this program, it was made up by the screams of Victory in the last number. We are told that "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell" (he may have fallen on her toes) but she fairly yelled, according to Beethoven, after Egmont lost his head. Beethoven was always frenzied when he had Liberty for a subject, and the work was given with all the spirit which it demanded, the piccolo fully earning its salary, and the violins scaling the heights bravely, in the coda.

Miss Braslau won success in some entirely unfamiliar numbers. Mehul's music is seldom heard nowadays outside of France. We only remember him as the composer who once wrote an opera without any violins, at the request of Napoleon Bonaparte. Yet the air from "Ariodant" is very attractive and melodic, although the engineering of the French operas is somewhat too obvious. Even Moussorgsky, a Russian composer, is not [illegible] but there was plenty of dramatic force in the first and last of her three songs by Moussorgsky.

"The last song, "On the Dnieper," fairly waded in Bohemian style, in Polish and Irish dances, and the music was exciting as the words. Miss Braslau sang it superbly, and in Russian, which, by the way, is said to be to be called the Italian of the [illegible]

The artist was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm, and the work of the singer deserved the [illegible]

RECALLS HIM TWICE TO GIVE OVATIONS

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, announced for Friday afternoon, was postponed until yesterday afternoon on account of the parade. The concert was repeated last night. The program was as follows: Rabaud, Symphony, No. 2, B minor (first time at these concerts); Mehul, Recitative, "Que dis-je?" and Aria "O des Amants, le plus aimable" from "Ariodant" (Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company); Bach, Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite No. 2, B minor, for flute and strings (George Laurent, flute); Moussorgsky, Three Songs with orchestral accompaniment, Death's Serenade, the Banks of the Iom, On the River Dnieper (Miss Braslau); Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was first played in Paris in 1899, when he was 25 years old. It was played under his direction. For this work he was awarded the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs. The symphony was heard in Boston years ago at one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's concerts, conducted by Mr. Longy. There have been four double performances in Philadelphia. The symphony has been played by the New York Symphony orchestra, the Chicago Symphony orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and it was performed at the Worcester Festival of 1917.

A prize composition is often and justly looked on with suspicion. To satisfy the average judges, the work must be strictly orthodox; all the conventions must be observed; above all, there must be no trace of originality.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony is a brilliant exception to the rule. While the workmanship displayed must have satisfied the most critical, the music is far from being pedantic. There is no counterpoint merely for counterpoint's sake. The fresh, vigorous, beautiful themes are developed in an interesting and often dramatic manner. While the different movements are well contrasted there is a unity of the whole by reason of the ingenious and at times unexpected use in the later movements of preceding themes. The pronouncement of the virile motif at the beginning at once arouses attention. This, and the next theme are followed by a pleasing song for the oboe. This thematic material is worked out in masterly fashion. The whole movement is strongly dramatic, but not theatrical. Here, as in the movements that follow, the hearer recognizes a composer of a sensitive, poetic nature, whose innate virility is controlled at a time, not liberal taste.

This first movement, energetic, now melancholy, wistful, now exultant, is on the whole the expression of a portrayed soul. The slow movement and the Scherzo are in a different vein. The former has for its chief subject an impressive Chorale of quiet, solemn beauty. The theme is used in the following movements with marked effect. It is introduced in the Scherzo, after the light and tripping first subject, introduced with great coming; witness the variant of it, skilfully orchestrated.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 28

MONTEUX AND MUSIC

SUNDRY OPINIONS FROM THE NEW CONDUCTOR

The Range of His Experiences — Catholicity and Wagner — Symphonic Versus Operatic Pieces—A Word About French, and Also About American, Composers—Orchestra and Leader

No two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite poles. Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his preoccupied gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words. The other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could not imagine Mr. Rabaud as making enemies; one could fancy Mr. Monteux as making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform his redy smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

Yet Mr. Monteux is ill described if you think him one without strong views, one who veers to the wind of others' opinions. Ask him what he thinks of "Pagliacci" or of the operas of Puccini and see the devotee's indignation in his musician's eye. But if you expect any chauvinistic prejudices to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on tour he has specialized in ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mais oui; second rate, also. Paëlle; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with. It is music for the public; as for me I like music for the musicians."

"And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure; the public is not the same for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"But yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programmes must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the great composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux continued. "We gave his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saëns was his own organist. He was not at all satisfied with the organ chosen," he said, "I will play the organ my[illegible] but who shall conduct?" It was [illegible] hearsal, and a friend of mine said, [illegible] teux is in the audience.' At once, [illegible] Saëns demands that I come to the [illegible] that I conduct. Voilà! I have c[illegible] much of Saint-Saëns—'La Princesse [illegible] 'Phryné,' 'Henri VIII,' 'La Princesse [illegible] I like 'Samson and Delilah.' It [illegible] his greatest work, almost pure m[illegible]

Presently we spoke of Russian composers and Mr. Monteux expressed his admiration for the works of Rimsky-Korsakov, of Borodin and of Stravinsky. "So many material difficulties have interfered with representing Russian operas," he said regretfully. "People wonder why more are not performed; but you see it needs more than the composer and the librettist; more even than the artists. Not so with the giving of the national music. I look forward to that. It will be my hope to include all kinds of good music, even American," he added with a laugh. "France ought to hear some of your composers, by the way; you have several that should be known in Europe. Chausson, Carpentier, four or five others are well worthy to be heard; some others are well worthy to be heard; some others are well worthy to be heard; some

SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, APRIL 27,

CONDUCTOR AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, Who Has Long Been Famous as a Conductor Italian Opera, Returns to the Pops.

RABAUD'S FAREWELL

For the occasion of his farewell appearance before the American public when also the final concerts of the Boston Symphony season, on Friday and Saturday afternoon (May 2 and 3), Mr. Rabaud has chosen an appropriate program of two American and one French work. The first will be the "Woodland Suite" of MacDowell, describing "In a Haunted Forest" "Summer Idyl" "In Arcadie" "The Shepherdess Song," "Forest Spirits." The best of the program will be filled by Saint-Saëns' "Tour Lyre and the Harp," a choral ode of large proportions, being a classical setting of Victor Hugo's poem. A chorus of 150 voices, trained by Mr. Townsend, will sing, to-gether with the following quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, Ronald Werrenrath, baritone.

GALA POPS SEASON

As surely as the flowers show their heads at the beginning of May, the Pops take possession of Symphony Hall, and make spring a reality.

Next week, the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been performed, the fabric will be hauled forth, the cooling plant installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now hardly under way. The Pops orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—most orchestral scores ask for no more.

Arthur Jacchia, who has long been famous as a conductor of Italian operas, returns as leader of the Pops.

The program follows.

The program follows.

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Ratcliff".....Rossini
An Festgruss for wind octet, D, op. 61.....Reinecke
Instrumentation for wind octet.
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Mr. Jacchia
Bach's Capriccio.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo (a) "Prelude" (b) "Gigue" (c) "Intermezzo" (d) "Sarabande" (e) "Gavotte" (f) "Tarantelle".....Van Westerhout
Music of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Traviata".....Verdi
Saint-Saëns' Piano Concerto, No. 2, G minor, op. 22.....Saint-Saëns
Mr. Rabaud's Farewell Appearance.
Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Orlando
Mr. Jacchia is an indefatigable program maker. He counted the unprecedented prescriptive of 26 different pieces on his combined programs of last year. Mr. Jacchia has worked consistently for three things—quality of performance, variety of programs and popularity of that.

The innovation of the year will be a small army of waitresses in dainty uniforms and school ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted on to please the eye and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamed of achieving.

Many special nights are planned, for instance, a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "soldiers' night" and "Liberty Loan night." The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Stephen Townsend leading the songs of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The "doughboy" will be given every consideration and YD nights dedicated to him.

As usual, the Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, for 19 weeks. The sale of table reservations and seats for the opening week will [illegible]

SUNDAY ADVERTISER AND AMERICAN, APRIL 27

RABAUD CHARMS IN 2 CONCERTS

Second Symphony a Worthy Work; Composers Prefer Not to Conduct

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM

Rabaud Symphony in E major.
Mehul Overture, "Uriodant."
Brasiliana, Mme. Brasiliana.
Moussorgsky, "Three Russian Songs."
Rabaud, "Samson and Delilah."

At this concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and repeated in the evening, we had revealed the true reason why M. Rabaud has come back to Paris. A little of it is due to his dislike of home sickness, but chiefly the desire to get back to composition. A man who can write such a work as his symphony, a symphony does not care greatly for conducting.

Spite of Berlioz and Wagner, Richard Strauss and Mendelssohn, [illegible] Beethoven and Schubert, [illegible] made of this dose [illegible] cred Public, or out 1.98 [illegible] 1.39 [illegible] ing. [illegible] Hem stitched with dainty lace back and front, of ladies' style or [illegible] in fitch, wash satin. Other exceptional values in Silk Waists at 2.98 to 14.98 CAMISOLES—Good quality Dainty Underwear

what lacking in the opening work of this program: it was made up by the screams of Victory in the last number. We are told that "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell" (he may have fallen on her toes) but she fairly yelled, according to Beethoven, since Egmont, long his hero, Beethoven was always frenzied when he had liberty for a subject, and the work was given with all the spirit which it demanded, the piccolo fully carrying its burden, and the violins seeing the heights bravely, in the coda.

Miss Brasiau won success in some entirely unfamiliar numbers. Mehul's music is seldom heard nowadays outside of France. We only remember his Overture to Joseph and his opera without any violins, at the request of Napoleon Bonaparte. Yet Berlioz praised Mehul's music very highly, and neither, although the program gives us three old French songs, do we find them too obsolete. Even Miss Brasiau, mobile alto could not make the Lover's thriller fine in the Provencal Gavotte, or Gounod in the first and last of her three songs by Moussorgsky.

The last of these, "On the Dnieper," fairly waded in Rossiavish style, in Polish and Russian almost, and the music was exciting as the words. Miss Brasiau sang it superbly, and in Russian, which is the most musical language to be called the Italian of the North.

The artist was recalled twice and over again with great enthusiasm. The originality of the songs and the singer alike deserved the tribute.

APRIL 28

MUSIC

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—At one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral concerts given in this city more than 11 years ago, among the numbers heard was a symphony by Henri Rabaud. Both the composer and his works were unknown here except to a very few, and none among those who heard the work had the least idea that in the years to come the composer would be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his symphony would be heard at one of the regular concerts under the composer's direction. But it was just this that happened at the twenty-third symphony concert on April 26, the last but one in the present series.

While Mr. Rabaud's symphony (his second in E minor, op. 5) has been given several times during the past few years, the performance at this concert was the first in Boston, also believed to be the first in the country under the composer's direction. And this last performance must have been the most authoritative of any given previously.

Mr. Rabaud won the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs with this second symphony, in 1889. And for once here is a work which proves to be a notable exception to the usual rule that a prize composition is seldom worth a hearing after the first one.

This symphony is neither an example of the ultra-modern French school of D'Indy and later writers, nor modeled on the conservative ideas of the older composers as represented by Saint-Saëns. At times there is a suggestion of Franck, and here and there a faint reminiscence of Wagner, but in all it is something more than pedantic or classically academic, for the themes are vigorous, and highly pleasing, worked out in a most interesting manner. The first movement is highly original and of many moods, from grave to gay, which suggest a little uncertainty as to just what the composer had in mind. The slow movement is distinguished by an impressive chorale, and this as a subject is heard as well in the scherzo which follows. This scherzo, by the way, is Mr. Rabaud's happiest vein. The finale is many-sided in its thought, and there are many who will consider this movement the best of the four. Be this as it may, the symphony impressed greatly on the first hearing after many years. Its reception was far more than a farewell compliment to Mr. Rabaud, and it is pleasant to say that at the conclusion, both in the afternoon and in the evening, not only was the composer recalled several times, but that both orchestra and audience rose in their seats: a tribute as deserving as it was spontaneous.

Mr. Rabaud also gave three movements from the Mehul overture, strings, flute and strings, and Mr. Laurent again showed his virtuosity in unmistakable manner. There was also an admirable performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Between these numbers, Sophie Brasiau, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, sang in admirable voice an unfamiliar aria from "Ariodant," one of Méhul's forgotten operas, also three songs of Moussorgsky. Most of the texts were gloomy in spirit, but the music was varied and interesting.

HERALD APRIL 27, SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 23D CONCERT

Audience Pays Impressive Tribute to Conductor Rabaud

RECALLS HIM TWICE TO GIVE OVATIONS

BY PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, announced for Friday afternoon, was postponed until yesterday afternoon on account of the parade. The concert was repeated last night. The program was as follows: Rabaud, Symphony, No. 2, E minor (first time at these concerts). Mehul, Bacchanale, "Que disje?" and Aria "O dea Amante, le plus idole" from Ariodant" (Sophie Brasiau of the Metropolitan Opera Company). Bach, Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite No. 2, B minor, for flute and strings (George Laurent, flute). Moussorgsky, Three Songs with orchestral accompaniment: Death's Serenade, the Banks of the Don, On the River Dnieper (Miss Brasiau); Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was first played in Paris in 1899, when he was 32 years old. It was played under his direction. For this work he was awarded the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs. The symphony was heard in Boston 11 years ago at one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's concerts, conducted by Mr. Longy. There have been four double performances in Philadelphia. The symphony has been played by the New York Symphony orchestra, the Chicago Symphony orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and it was performed at the Worcester Festival of 1917.

A prize composition is often and justly looked on with suspicion. To satisfy the average judge the work must be strictly orthodox: all the conventions must be observed; above all, there must be no trace of originality.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony is a brilliant exception to the rule. While the workmanship displayed must have satisfied the most critical, the music is far from being pedantic. There is no counterpoint merely for counterpoint's sake. The fresh, vigorous, beautiful themes are developed in an interesting and often dramatic manner. While the different movements are well contrasted, there is a unity of the whole by reason of the ingenious and at times unexpected use in the later movements of preceding themes. The announcement of the virile motif at the beginning at once arouses attention. This and the next theme are followed by a pleasing song for the oboe. This thematic material is worked out in masterly fashion. The whole movement is strongly dramatic, but not theatrical. Here, as in the movements that follow, the listener recognizes a composer of a sensitive, poetic nature, whose music vitality is controlled by a fine, not finical taste.

This first movement, energetic, now melancholy, wistful, now exultant, is on the whole the expression of a perturbed soul. The slow movement and the Scherzo are in a different vein. The former has for its chief subject an impressive chorale of quiet, solemn beauty. This theme is used in the following movements with marked effect. It is introduced in the Scherzo, after the light and tripping first subject, introduced with great cunning: witness the variant of it, skilfully orchestrated.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 28

MONTEUX AND MUSIC

SUNDRY OPINIONS FROM THE NEW CONDUCTOR

The Range of His Experiences — Catholicity and Wagner — Symphonic Versus Operatic Pieces—A Word About French, and Also About American, Composers—Orchestra and Leader

No two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite poles. Rabaud is tall, slender, frizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious, to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his preoccupied gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words. The other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could not imagine Mr. Rabaud as making enemies; one could fancy Mr. Monteux as making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform his redy smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

Yet Mr. Monteux is ill described if you think him one without strong views, one who veers to the wind of others' opinions. Ask him what he thinks of "Pagliacci" or of the operas of Puccini and see the devotee's indignation in his musician's eye. But if you expect any chauvinistic prejudices to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on four tours he has specialized in ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mais oui; second rate, also. Pacile; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with. It is music for the public as for me I like music for the musicians."

"And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure: the public is not the same for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best, of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"Yes, yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls, at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra, it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programmes must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux continued. "We gave his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saëns was his own organist. He was not at all satisfied with the organist chosen," he said, "I will play for the concert, but who shall conduct?" It was a hoarse1, and a friend of mine said, 'Monteux is in the audience.' And Saint-Saëns demands that I come to the [illegible] that I conduct. Voilà! I have conducted Saint-Saëns—'La Princesse [illegible] 'Phryne,' 'Henri VIII,' [illegible] 'Samson and Delilah.' It is his greatest work, almost pure music."

"There has been no great music during out of the war, in France at [illegible]," Mr. Monteux said regretfully in reply to a question. "Nor will there be for [illegible] time, I believe. Men's minds have [illegible] on other things. One writes you a [illegible] to an occasion and one cannot be equal [illegible] the occasion as it has been in France the four years."

"Have you ever composed, Mr. Monteux?" He leaned forward confidentially, fingers up. "Yes, indeed. I have composed many things. And do you know where they are, those compositions? In a big box, tied up tight with a string. And they will never see the sun, I promise you. I play too much other people's music to write any more of my own. Not since fifteen years ago, when I composed for the last time, have I written anything. For I believe that a man can only have one career, and that mine is to conduct. I shall always be a conductor."

"You find the personal equation a strong factor in conducting, do you not, Mr. Monteux? What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?"

"Both," the conductor answered. "It must seem a democracy but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for the orders' sake, but only to get results." Mr. Monteux seemed as he spoke an epitome of that remarkable nation whose foremost quality has long been the ability to influence others, while always respecting the individual's liberty. One could not imagine this smiling, vivacious little man ever becoming autocratic; but one could readily perceive how his personality might arouse in others enthusiasm for that music which so evidently rules his life.

Presently we spoke of Russian composers and Mr. Monteux expressed his admiration for the works of Rimsky-Korsakov, of Borodin and of Stravinsky. "So many material difficulties have interfered with presenting Russian operas," he said regretfully. "People wonder why more are not performed; but you see it needs more than the composer and the librettist; more even than the artists. Not so with the giving of their orchestral music. I look forward to that. It will be my hope to include all kinds of good music, even American," he added with a laugh. "France ought; to hear some of your composers, by the way; you have several that should be known in Europe. Loeffer Carpenter, four or five others are well worthy to be heard; some have been. Then I shall seek out and bring over some good concert music from Italy. That is a side of Italian musical development that has been too much ignored, for the operatic pieces always receive the emphasis. There are a number of young Italian composers of whom I hear good things said, as well as the older ones whose music I hope to bring forward."

"Is there anything you would especially like to say for publication, Mr. Monteux?" "Yes," he said, unexpectedly and earnestly: "this: In playing French music I shall be the French propaganda. You understand, Rabaud, Messager and I, we have spent our life in France; it is our country. We naturally love and we play the music of our country. But you to make us for it; that would be stupid. Music is great enough not to need [illegible] you Americans know and love music because it is French music. I understand, although I love it. But I play the best music of every nation."

[illegible] Peeler in Musical America.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

APRIL

BAUD'S
NDITION
RILLIANT

ven's Overture ures Next to st Concert

OLIN DOWNES

nme of the last Boston
ncert, but one, of the yesterday afternoon, conducting, was as fol-ony No. 2 in E minor,
; recitative and aria,
from Mehul's "Adriose, Rondo and Badich's suite in B minor trings; three songs by ith orchestral accom-th's Serenade," "The n" and "On the River
ure to Goethe's "Eg-
Miss Sophie Bras-of the Metropolitan was soloist.

ING FEATURE

ng feature of a bru-the performance of
ure. In at least 20 en so impressively inon, nor is it easy to r, more dramatic con-abaud's. It is astonost incredible, but the ly or logically denied ssage of years men-conductor has so ast momentarily en-in performing the master. Beethoven, who loved freedom.
st in the experience
an opening of this a treatment of the a grim and heroic ate through the al-nd uplifting a cone least praise of the ng the performance felt the beat of the pirit above the gathrly Sincere

phony was written thereabouts in 1898
e symphony of an
cture, firm, logical, entional symphonic
the Mendelssohnism of years gone
second movements.
after these years
sing. The scherzo, reminiscences of moments, and its
of orchestral color for harp and nts, appears to owe
-Saens. And it is the preceding two
n. Themes of the again recur in the erly sincere, poetic, racter. We person-of the string choir

iety of combination in the instrumental ess, because of the ess of feeling, the mes, of lyrical or
and the substantial phony gave much
dience, which was tood at the end of honor the composer has come to so esteem in the course as the least demond fitly be made to dered such distin-
the leader of the Orchestra.

xcellent One

be congratulated on an aria of worth familiar to concert-Mehul is old-fashc, demanding both and control and high of the singer. Miss xcellent impression
ve and in the aria
She has a superb filled out and deits different reg-pacity for color and pression of feeling.
only in the aria but f a composer incomhis colleagues—mod-

the Cossacks' battle, Jewish hosts in the er is peculiarly suited ty of this voice and which Miss Braslau

ERALD, BOSTON, APRIL 27,

CONDUCTOR AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, Who Has Long Been Famous as a Conductor of Italian Opera, Returns to the Pops.

RABAUD'S FAREWELL

For the occasion of his farewell appearances before the American public, which are also the final concerts of the Boston Symphony season, on Friday and Saturday next (May 2 and 3), Mr. Rabaud has chosen an appropriate program of one American and one French work. The first will be the "Woodland Suite" of MacDowell, describing "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess,s Song," "Forest Spirits." The rest of the program will be filled by Saint-Saens's "The Lyre and the Harp," a choral ode of large proportions, being a musical setting of Victor Hugo's poem. A chorus of 150 voices, trained by Mr. Townsend, will sing, together with the following quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

GALA POPS SEASON

As surely as the flowers show their heads at the beginning of May, the Pops take possession of Symphony Hall, and make spring a reality.

Next week the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been pronounced, the tables will be hauled forth, the cookery plant installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now busily under way. The Pops orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—most orchestral scores ask for no more.

Agide Jacchia, who has long been famous as a conductor of Italian opera, will again, after two conspicuously successful seasons, be leader of the Pops.

The program follows.

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octett..D. Scarlatti
(b) Capriccio for strings.
Instrumentation by Mr. Jacchia.
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo (a) "Idyl" (b) "Spanish Dance").....Holy Enfantillage.....Van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

Mr. Jacchia is an indefatigable program maker. He counted the unprecedented repertoire of 306 different pieces on his combined programs of last year. Mr. Jacchia has worked consistently for three things—quality of performance, variety of programs and popularity of choice.

The innovation of the year will be a small army of waitresses in dainty uniforms and colored ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted on to please the eye and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamed of achieving.

Many special nights are planned; for instance, a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "milliners' night" and "Liberty Loan night." The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Stephen Townsend leading the songs of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The "doughboy" will be given every consideration and YD nights dedicated to him.

As usual, the Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, for 10 weeks. The sale of table reservations and seats for the opening week will

ONITOR, APRIL 28

MUSIC

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony

Specially for The Christian Science Monit

BOSTON, Massachusetts—At one Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral concer given in this city more than 11 yea ago, among the numbers heard was symphony by Henri Rabaud. Both t composer and his works were unknow here except to a very few, and no among those who heard the work ha the least idea that in the years to com the composer would be the conducto of the Boston Symphony Orchestr and that his symphony would be hear at one of the regular concerts unde the composer's direction. But it wa just this that happened at the twenty third symphony concert on April 2 the last but one in the present series.

While Mr. Rabaud's symphony (hi second in E minor, op. 5) has bee given several times during the pas few years, the performance at this con cert was the first in Boston, also be lieved to be the first in the countr under the composer's direction. And so this last performance must have been the most authoritative of any given previously.

Mr. Rabaud won the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs with this second symphony, in 1899. And for once here is a work which proves to be a notable exception to the usual rule that a prize composition is seldom worth a hearing after the first one.

This symphony is neither an example of the ultra-modern French school of D'Indy and later writers, nor modeled on the conservative ideas of the older composers as represented by Saint-Saëns. At times there is a suggestion of Franck, and here and there a faint reminiscence of Wagner, but all in all it is something more than pedantic or classically academic, for the themes are vigorous, and highly pleasing, worked out in a most interesting manner. The first movement is highly original and of many moods, from grave to gay, which suggest a little uncertainty as to just what the composer had in mind. The slow movement is distinguished by an impressive chorale, and this as a subject is heard as well in the scherzo which follows. This scherzo, by the way, is in Mr. Rabaud's happiest vein. The finale is many-sided in its thought, and there are many who will consider this movement the best of the four. Be this as it may, the symphony impressed greatly on the first hearing after many years. Its reception was far more than a farewell compliment to Mr. Rabaud, and it is pleasant to say that at the conclusion, both in the afternoon and in the evening, not only was the composer recalled several times, but that both orchestra and

UNDAY ADVERTISER AND AMERICAN, APRIL 27

RABAUD CHARMS IN 2 CONCERTS

Second Symphony a Worthy Work; Composers Prefer Not to Conduct

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Rabaud. Symphony in E major.
Mehul. Air from "Arodiant."
Soloist, Miss Sophie Braslau.
Bach. Three movements from B minor suite.
Moussorgsky. Three songs with orchestra.
Miss Braslau.
Beethoven. "Egmont" overture.

At this concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and repeated in the evening, we find revealed the true reason why M. Rabaud goes back to Paris. A little fatigue, a good deal of home sickness, but chiefly the desire to get back to composition. A man who can write so clear and symmetrical, a symphony does not care greatly for conducting.

Spite of Berlioz and Wagner, of Richard Strauss and Mendelssohn, the average composer does not long for conducting, while the thorough conductor had better give up composition. When Hans Richter took up conducting as his life work he put all his compositions in the stove, lit them, and made a cup of coffee over the flames. After that cup of coffee he became one of the greatest of conductors.

The Rabaud symphony explains also why we have had little of th extreme modern French school in ou programs, for it moves along th regular path which St. Saens an Franck trod, and it does not indulge in eccentricities or vagaries. There is good counterpoint, fine interweaving of themes, and these themes are intelligible if somewhat sombre at times. The first movement is tragic, just as Franck's D minor symphony is mournful.

A STRIKING COMBINATION.

The slow movement also has some sorrowful touches, but there is a tranquil, chorale-like theme in contrast. Only in the third movement does a lighter mood set in, and here, against the dance-like theme, comes the chorale-like melody of the second movement, a striking combination. The working up of this theme, both in the second and third movements is masterly and again reminds strongly of the style of Cesar Franck, although more dramatic than that master.

There is more thematic transference in the finale, both from the second and the first movement, combined with new subject matter. It is again plaintive and sorrowful. Although there are major effects at the final climax and a return of chorale treatment, chief emotion of the work is struggle rather than triumph. We long for a bit of Schumann's broad virility at the close. The third movement seemed to receive the most appreciation, but we found the turbulence of the first movement and the skilful combinations of the finale the most masterly portions of the work. At the end of it (in the afternoon) the orchestra and the audience rose and gave M. Rabaud a triumph such as is accorded to few composers in Boston.

The three movements from Bach's Suite for flute and strings require no new analysis. They showed that Bach is by no means the "dry-as-dust" composer that the uneducated imagine him to be. But they were almost new in the beauty of the flute-playing, especially in the coquettish "Badinerie." Our orchestra is to be congratulated on having two such artists as M. Georges Laurent and M. Georges Longy in its woodwind department. M. Laurent was vociferously applauded.

THE SCREAM OF VICTORY.

If the note of triumph was somewhat lacking in the opening work of this program, it was made up by the screams of Victory in the last number. We are told that "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell" (he may have fallen on her toes) but she fairly yelled, according to Beethoven, after Egmont lost his head. Beethoven was always frenzied when he had Liberty for a subject, and the work was given with all the spirit which it demanded, the piccolo fully earning its salary, and the violins scaling the heights bravely, in the coda.

Miss Braslau won success in some entirely unfamiliar numbers. Mehul's music is seldom heard nowadays outside of France. We only remember him as the composer who once wrote an opera without any violins, at the request of Napoleon Bonaparte. Yet the air from "Arodiant" was very attractive and melodic, although the progressions in these old French operas are somewhat too obvious. Even Miss Braslau's noble alto could not make this number a thriller. But there was plenty of dramatic force in the first and last of her three songs by Moussorg.

The last song, "On the Dnieper," fairly waded in Bolsheviki style, in Polish and Jewish blood, and the music was exciting as the words. Miss Braslau sang it superbly, and in Russian, which is a sufficiently musical tongue to be called the Italian of the North.

The artist was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm. The originality of the songs and the work of the singer deserved the tribute.

RECALLS HIM TWICE TO GIVE OVATIONS

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, announced for Friday afternoon, was postponed until yesterday afternoon on account of the parade. The concert was repeated last night. The program was as follows: Rabaud, Symphony, No. 2, E minor (first time at these concerts); Mehul, Recitative, "Que dis-je?" and Aria "O des Amants, le plus fidele" from "Ariodant" (Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company); Bach, Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite No. 2, B minor, for flute and strings (George Laurent, flute); Moussorgsky, Three Songs with orchestral accompaniment: Death's Serenade, the Banks of the Don, On the River Dnieper (Miss Braslau); Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was first played in Paris in 1899, when he was 26 years old. It was played under his direction. For this work he was awarded the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs. The symphony was heard in Boston 11 years ago at one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's concerts, conducted by Mr. Longy. There have been four double performances in Philadelphia. The symphony has been played by the New York Symphony orchestra, the Chicago Symphony orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and it was performed at the Worcester Festival of 1917.

A prize composition is often and justly looked on with suspicion. To satisfy the average judges, the work must be strictly orthodox; all the conventions must be observed; above all, there must be no trace of originality.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony is a brilliant exception to the rule. While the workmanship displayed must have satisfied the most critical, the music is far from being pedantic. There is no counterpoint merely for counterpoint's sake. The fresh, vigorous, beautiful themes are developed in an interesting and often dramatic manner. While the different movements are well contrasted there is a unity of the whole by reason of the ingenious and at times unexpected use in the later movements of preceding themes. The announcement of the virile motif at the beginning at once arouses attention. This and the next theme are followed by a pleasing song for the oboe. This thematic material is worked out in masterly fashion. The whole movement is strongly dramatic, but not theatrical. Here, as in the movements that follow, the hearer recognizes a composer of a sensitive, poetic nature, whose innate virility is controlled by a fine, not finical taste.

This first movement, energetic, now melancholy, wistful, now exultant, is on the whole the expression of a perturbed soul. The slow movement and the Scherzo are in a different vein. The former has for its chief subject an impressive Chorale of quiet, solemn beauty. This theme is used in the following movements with marked effect. It is introduced in the Scherzo, after the light and tripping first subject, introduced with great cunning; witness the variant of it, skilfully orchestrated.

And in this Scherzo, as in the other movements, Mr. Rabaud has shown that he knows when to stop. He does not insist too strongly on an idea though it may please him; he is not enamored of his own thoughts; he does not repeat, dilute, weary. In some respects the Finale is the most striking movement of the four. The opening, whirring measures, the mysterious mutterings, the voices hinting, prophesying, stir the imagination of the hearer. And in the Finale as in the Scherzo, the mood is suddenly changed, by the introduction of quieter, contemplative measures. Nor is the apotheosis a blatant appeal, a trap set for the applause of the unthinking.

The production of this symphony is one of the leading features of a season that has been remarkable for the excellence of the programs and for the bringing out of many unfamiliar works that richly deserved a hearing. The reception given to this symphony yesterday afternoon was much more than a compliment to a departing and honored guest. The music itself made an immediate and deep impression. At the end, when Mr. Rabaud was recalled the second time, not only the orchestra, but the audience rose spontaneously and paid a tribute long to be remembered.

Mr. Rabaud sensibly gave only three of the seven movements in Bach's Suite. These afforded Mr. Laurent, the solo flutist, opportunity to show his skill and taste, as he had already done in the Scherzo of the symphony, as he had already done at concerts in the past.

Miss Braslau, who sang here at a subscription concert for the first time, brought out an air in the grand style from Mehul's forgotten opera. The aria is interesting, and not only as an example of the heroic French manner of 120 years ago. There is a dignity, a nobility in this air, so that one can understand the enthusiasm of Berlioz. Miss Braslau, whose voice is a rich one, of liberal compass, also of true contralto quality, sang the old music dramatically and with full appreciation of the varied emotional contents. It was a pleasure to hear Moussorgsky's songs, which she sang in Russian. Here, again, she sang dramatically, but she did not overstep the line that separates the concert from the opera. And how the three songs differed! Death serenading the maiden who at last is his; the charming song of the garden by the Don, with Masha coming from the well; and then the savage cry of the Cossack to the river Dnieper, foretelling the triumph of Ukraina; singularly effective, the three, as Miss Braslau sang them.

om
ress
APR 24 1919

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Succeeds Henri Rabaud as Conductor of Orchestra

[From the New York World.]

BURLESON

These Are the Society's Officers

The officers and directors chosen last week are: President, Charles L. Newcomb of Holyoke; vice-presidents the society upon doing in Western Massachusetts what soon will be the fashion for the nation.

secure from fire and water." Engineers haven't been in touch with people." The professor complimented

APRIL 28

MONTEUX AND MUSIC

SUNDRY OPINIONS FROM THE NEW CONDUCTOR

The Range of His Experiences — Catholicity and Wagner — Symphonic Versus Operatic Pieces—A Word About French, and Also About American, Composers—Orchestra and Leader.

No two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite poles. Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his preoccupied gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words. The other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could not imagine Mr. Rabaud as making enemies; one could fancy Mr. Monteux as making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform his redy smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

Yet Mr. Monteux is ill described if you think him one without strong views, one who veers to the wind of others' opinions. Ask him what he thinks of "Pagliacci" or of the operas of Puccini and see the devotee's indignation in his musician's eye. But if you expect any chauvinistic prejudices to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théatre des Champs-Elysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on four tours he has specialized in ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mais oui; second rate, also. Facile; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with. It is music for the public; as for me I like music for the musicians."

"And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure; the public is not the same for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"But yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programmes must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux continued. "We ga his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saë was his own organist. He was not al satisfied with the organist chosen he said, "I will play the organ my but who shall conduct?" It was a hearsal, and a friend of mine said, teux is in the audience.' At once Saëns demands that I come to the that I conduct. Voilà! I have c much of Saint-Saëns—'La Princes 'Phryne,' 'Henri VIII.' But of all

I like 'Samson and Delilah.' It his greatest work, almost pure m

"There has been no great music ing out of the war, in France at Mr. Monteux said regretfully in a to a question. "Nor will there be for time, I believe. Men's minds have on other things. One writes you k to an occasion and one cannot be equal the occasion as it has been in France the four years."

"Have you ever composed, Mr. Monteux?" He leaned forward confidentially, finger up. "Yes, indeed. I have composed many things. And do you know where they are, those compositions? In a big box, tied up tight with a string. And they will never see the sun, I promise you. I play too much other people's music to write any more of my own. Not since fifteen years ago, when I composed for the last time, have I written anything. For I believe that a man can only have one career, and that mine is to conduct. I shall always be a conductor."

"You find the personal equation a strong factor in conducting, do you not, Mr. Monteux? What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?"

"Both," the conductor answered. "It must seem a democracy, but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for the orders' sake, but only to get results." Mr. Monteux seemed as he spoke an epitome of that remarkable nation whose foremost quality has long been the ability to influence others, while always re-

SUNDAY ADVERTISER AND AMERICAN, APRIL 27 — TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 28

AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, Who Has Long Been Famous as a Conductor Italian Opera, Returns to the Pops.

RABAUD'S FAREWELL

For the occasion of his farewell appearances before the American public, which are also the final concerts of the Boston Symphony season, on Friday and Saturday next (May 2 and 3), Mr. Rabaud has chosen an appropriate program of one American and one French work. The first will be the "Woodland Suite" of MacDowell, describing "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess,s Song," "Forest Spirits." The rest of the program will be filled by Saint-Saens's "The Lyre and the Harp," a choral ode of large proportions, being a musical setting of Victor Hugo's poem. A chorus of 150 voices, trained by Mr. Townsend, will sing, together with the following quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

GALA POPS SEASON

As surely as the flowers show their heads at the beginning of May, the Pops take possession of Symphony Hall, and make spring a reality.

Next week the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been pronounced, the tables will be hauled forth, the cookery plant installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now busily under way. The Pops orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—most orchestral scores ask for no more.

Agide Jacchia, who has long been famous as a conductor of Italian opera, will again, after two conspicuously successful seasons, be leader of the Pops.

The program follows.

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octett..D. Scarlatti
(b) Capriccio for strings.
Instrumentation by Mr. Jacchia.
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo (a) "Idyll" (b) "Spanish Dance").....Holy
Enfantillage.....Van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

Mr. Jacchia is an indefatigable program maker. He counted the unprecedented repertoire of 306 different pieces on his combined programs of last year. Mr. Jacchia has worked consistently for three things—quality of performance, variety of programs and popularity of choice.

The innovation of the year will be a small army of waitresses in dainty uniforms and colored ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted on to please the eye and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamed of achieving.

Many special nights are planned; for instance, a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "milliners' night" and "Liberty Loan night." The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Stephen Townsend leading the songs of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The "doughboy" will be given every consideration and YD nights dedicated to him.

As usual, the Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, for 10 weeks. The sale of table reservations and seats for the opening week will [illegible]

MONITOR, APRIL 28

MUSIC

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—At one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral concerts given in this city more than 11 years ago, among the numbers heard was a symphony by Henri Rabaud. Both the composer and his works were unknown here except to a very few, and none among those who heard the work had the least idea that in the years to come the composer would be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that his symphony would be heard at one of the regular concerts under the composer's direction. But it was just this that happened at the twenty-third symphony concert on April 26, the last but one in the present series.

While Mr. Rabaud's symphony (his second in E minor, op. 5) has been given several times during the past few years, the performance at this concert was the first in Boston, also believed to be the first in the country under the composer's direction. And so this last performance must have been the most authoritative of any given previously.

Mr. Rabaud won the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs with this second symphony, in 1899. And for once here is a work which proves to be a notable exception to the usual rule that a prize composition is seldom worth a hearing after the first one.

This symphony is neither an example of the ultra-modern French school of D'Indy and later writers, nor modeled on the conservative ideas of the older composers as represented by Saint-Saëns. At times there is a suggestion of Franck, and here and there a faint reminiscence of Wagner, but all in all it is something more than pedantic or classically academic, for the themes are vigorous, and highly pleasing, worked out in a most interesting manner. The first movement is highly original and of many moods, from grave to gay, which suggest a little uncertainty as to just what the composer had in mind. The slow movement is distinguished by an impressive chorale, and this as a subject is heard as well in the scherzo which follows. This scherzo, by the way, is in Mr. Rabaud's happiest vein. The finale is many-sided in its thought, and there are many who will consider this movement the best of the four. Be this as it may, the symphony impressed greatly on the first hearing after many years. Its reception was far more than a farewell compliment to Mr. Rabaud, and it is pleasant to say that at the conclusion, both in the afternoon and in the evening, not only was the composer recalled several times, but that both orchestra and audience rose in their seats: a tribute as deserving as it was spontaneous.

Mr. Rabaud also gave three movements of the Bach B minor suite for flute and strings, and Mr. Laurent again showed his virtuosity in unmistakable manner. There was also an admirable performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Between these numbers, Sophie Braslau, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, sang in admirable voice an unfamiliar aria from "Ariodant," one of Méhul's forgotten operas, also three songs of Moussorgsky. Most of the texts were gloomy in spirit, but the music was varied and interesting.

HERALD, APRIL 27,

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 23D CONCERT

Audience Pays Impressive Tribute to Conductor Rabaud

RECALLS HIM TWICE TO GIVE OVATIONS

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, announced for Friday afternoon, was postponed until yesterday afternoon on account of the parade. The concert was repeated last night. The program was as follows: Rabaud, Symphony, No. 2, E minor (first time at these concerts); Mehul, Recitative, "Que dis-je?" and Aria "O des Amants, le plus fidele" from "Ariodant" (Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company); Bach, Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite No. 2, B minor, for flute and strings (George Laurent, flute); Moussorgsky, Three Songs with orchestral accompaniment: Death's Serenade, the Banks of the Don, On the River Dnieper (Miss Braslau); Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was first played in Paris in 1899, when he was 26 years old. It was played under his direction. For this work he was awarded the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs. The symphony was heard in Boston 11 years ago at one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's concerts, conducted by Mr. Longy. There have been four double performances in Philadelphia. The symphony has been played by the New York Symphony orchestra, the Chicago Symphony orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and it was performed at the Worcester Festival of 1917.

A prize composition is often and justly looked on with suspicion. To satisfy the average judges, the work must be strictly orthodox; all the conventions must be observed; above all, there must be no trace of originality.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony is a brilliant exception to the rule. While the workmanship displayed must have satisfied the most critical, the music is far from being pedantic. There is no counterpoint merely for counterpoint's sake. The fresh, vigorous, beautiful themes are developed in an interesting and often dramatic manner. While the different movements are well contrasted there is a unity of the whole by reason of the ingenious and at times unexpected use in the later movements of preceding themes. The announcement of the virile motif at the beginning at once arouses attention. This and the next theme are followed by a pleasing song for the oboe. This thematic material is worked out in masterly fashion. The whole movement is strongly dramatic, but not theatrical. Here, as in the movements that follow, the hearer recognizes a composer of a sensitive, poetic nature, whose innate virility is controlled by a fine, not finical taste.

This first movement, energetic, now melancholy, wistful, now exultant, is on the whole the expression of a perturbed soul. The slow movement and the Scherzo are in a different vein. The former has for its chief subject an impressive Chorale of quiet, solemn beauty. This theme is used in the following movements with marked effect. It is introduced in the Scherzo, after the light and tripping first subject, introduced with great cunning; witness the variant of it, skilfully orchestrated, what lacking in the opening work of this program, it was made up by the screams of Victory in the last number. We are told that "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell" (he may have fallen on her toes) but she fairly yelled, according to Beethoven, after Egmont lost his head. Beethoven was always frenzied when he had Liberty for a subject, and the work was given with all the spirit which it demanded, the piccolo fully earning its salary, and the violins scaling the heights bravely, in the coda.

Miss Braslau won success in some entirely unfamiliar numbers. Mehul's music is seldom heard nowadays outside of France. We only remember him as the composer who once wrote an opera without any violins, at the request of Napoleon Bonaparte. Yet the air from "Arodiant" was very attractive and melodic, although the progressions in these old French operas are somewhat too obvious. Even Miss Braslau's noble alto could not make this number a thriller. But there was plenty of dramatic force in the first and last of her three songs by Moussorg.

The last song, "On the Dnieper," fairly waded in Bolsheviki style, in Polish and Jewish blood, and the music was exciting as the words. Miss Braslau sang it superbly, and in Russian, which is a sufficiently musical tongue to be called the Italian of the North.

The artist was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm. The originality of the songs and the work of the singer deserved the tribute.

Dainty Underwear

CAMISOLES—Good quality wash satin, in flesh, trimmed with dainty lace back and front, or tailored style with hemstitching.

1.39

PAJAMAS—"Billy Burke," made of fine flowered batiste, cut full and quite voluminous, with nainsook and batiste, white

1.98

ENVELOPE CHEMISE—Fine nainsook and batiste, white

Other exceptional values in Silk Waists at 2.98 to 14.98

APR 24 1919

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Succeeds Henri Rabaud as Conductor of Orchestra

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His departure will cause regret from the musical public.

However, his no less distinguished compatriot, Pierre Monteux, is to succeed him. A conductor with a wider experience would be indeed hard to find. In Europe he has played in orchestras and chamber music organizations; in Europe and America both he has conducted opera, ballet and orchestral concerts. His engagement comes as a natural sequence of events, for he conducted the opening concerts of the present season with remarkable results, in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan opera house and pending the delayed arrival of Mr Rabaud.

A distinguished career commends him for the post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon and in the concerts of the "Musical composers' society." He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the "Civic orchestra" in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company.

Mr. Rabaud sensibly gave only three of the seven movements in Bach's Suite. These afforded Mr. Laurent, the solo flutist, opportunity to show his skill and taste, as he had already done in the Scherzo of the symphony, as he had already done at concerts in the past.

Miss Braslau, who sang here at a subscription concert for the first time, brought out an air in the grand style from Mehul's forgotten opera. The aria is interesting, and not only as an example of the heroic French manner of 120 years ago. There is a dignity, a nobility in this air, so that one can understand the enthusiasm of Berlioz. Miss Braslau, whose voice is a rich one, of liberal compass, also of true contralto quality, sang the old music dramatically and with full appreciation of the varied emotional contents. It was a pleasure to hear Moussorgsky's songs, which she sang in Russian. Here, again, she sang dramatically, but she did not overstep the line that separates the concert from the opera. And how the three songs differed! Death serenading the maiden who at last is his; the charming song of the garden by the Don, with Masha coming from the well; and then the savage cry of the Cossack to the river Dnieper, foretelling the triumph of Ukraina; singularly effective, the three, as Miss Braslau sang them.

APRIL 28

MONTEUX AND MUSIC

SUNDRY OPINIONS FROM THE NEW CONDUCTOR

The Range of His Experiences — Catholicity and Wagner — Symphonic Versus Operatic Pieces—A Word About French, and Also About American, Composers—Orchestra and Leader.

No two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite poles. Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his preoccupied gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words. The other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could not imagine Mr. Rabaud as making enemies; one could fancy Mr. Monteux as making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform his redy smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

Yet Mr. Monteux is ill described if you think him one without strong views, one who veers to the wind of others' opinions. Ask him what he thinks of "Pagliacci" or of the operas of Puccini and see the devotee's indignation in his musician's eye. But if you expect any chauvinistic prejudices to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théatre des Champs-Elysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on four tours he has specialized in ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mais oui; second rate, also. Facile; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with. It is music for the public; as for me I like music for the musicians."

"And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure; the public is not the same for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"But yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programmes must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux continued. "We ga[illegible] his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saë[illegible] was his own organist. He was not al[illegible] satisfied with the organist chosen [illegible] he said, "I will play the organ my[illegible] but who shall conduct?" It was a [illegible] hearsal, and a friend of mine said, [illegible] teux is in the audience.' At once [illegible] Saëns demands that I come to the [illegible] that I conduct. Voilà! I have c[illegible] much of Saint-Saëns—'La Princes[illegible] 'Phryne,' 'Henri VIII.' [illegible] I like 'Samson and Delilah.' It [illegible] his greatest work, almost pure m[illegible]

"There has been no great musi[illegible] ing out of the war, in France at [illegible] Mr. Monteux said regretfully in a[illegible] to a question. "Nor will there be for [illegible] time, I believe. Men's minds have [illegible] on other things. One writes you k[illegible] to an occasion and one cannot be equal [illegible] the occasion as it has been in France the[illegible] four years."

"Have you ever composed, Mr. Monteux?" He leaned forward confidentially, finger up. "Yes, indeed. I have composed many things. And do you know where they are, those compositions? In a big box, tied up tight with a string. And they will never see the sun, I promise you. I play too much other people's music to write any more of my own. Not since fifteen years ago, when I composed for the last time, have I written anything. For I believe that a man can only have one career, and that mine is to conduct. I shall always be a conductor."

"You find the personal equation a strong factor in conducting, do you not, Mr. Monteux? What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?"

"Both," the conductor answered. "It must seem a democracy, but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for the orders' sake, but only to get results." Mr. Monteux seemed as he spoke an epitome of that remarkable nation whose foremost quality has long been the ability to influence others, while always respecting the individual's liberty. One [illegible]

Agide Jacchia, Who Has Long Been Famous as a Conductor Italian Opera, Returns to the Pops.

RABAUD'S FAREWELL

For the occasion of his farewell appearances before the American public, which are also the final concerts of the Boston Symphony season, on Friday and Saturday next (May 2 and 3), Mr. Rabaud has chosen an appropriate program of one American and one French work. The first will be the "Woodland Suite" of MacDowell, describing "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess,s Song," "Forest Spirits." The rest of the program will be filled by Saint-Saens's "The Lyre and the Harp," a choral ode of large proportions, being a musical setting of Victor Hugo's poem. A chorus of 150 voices, trained by Mr. Townsend, will sing, together with the following quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

GALA POPS SEASON

As surely as the flowers show their heads at the beginning of May, the Pops take possession of Symphony Hall, and make spring a reality.

Next week the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been pronounced, the tables will be hauled forth, the cookery plant installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now busily under way. The Pops orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—most orchestral scores ask for no more.

Agide Jacchia, who has long been famous as a conductor of Italian opera, will again, after two conspicuously successful seasons, be leader of the Pops.

The program follows.

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octett..D. Scarlatti
(b) Capriccio for strings.
Instrumentation by Mr. Jacchia.
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo (a) "Idyll" (b) "Spanish Dance") .....Holy
Enfantillage .....Van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade".....
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea" .....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana" .....Chabrier

Mr. Jacchia is an indefatigable program maker. He counted the unprecedented repertoire of 306 different pieces on his combined programs of last year. Mr. Jacchia has worked consistently for three things—quality of performance, variety of programs and popularity of choice.

The innovation of the year will be a small army of waitresses in dainty uniforms and colored ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted on to please the eye and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamed of achieving.

Many special nights are planned; for instance, a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "milliners' night" and "Liberty Loan night." The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Stephen Townsend leading the songs of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The "doughboy" will be given every consideration and YD nights dedicated to him.

As usual, the Pops will be given every night, except Sunday, for 10 weeks. The sale of table reservations and seats for the opening week will begin

ONITOR, APRIL 28

MUSIC

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—At one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral concerts given in this city more than 11 years ago, among the numbers heard was a symphony by Henri Rabaud. Both the composer and his works were unknown here except to a very few, and none among those who heard the work had the least idea that in the years to come the composer would be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that his symphony would be heard at one of the regular concerts under the composer's direction. But it was just this that happened at the twenty-third symphony concert on April 26, the last but one in the present series.

While Mr. Rabaud's symphony (his second in E minor, op. 5) has been given several times during the past few years, the performance at this concert was the first in Boston, also believed to be the first in the country under the composer's direction. And so this last performance must have been the most authoritative of any given previously.

Mr. Rabaud won the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs with this second symphony, in 1899. And for once here is a work which proves to be a notable exception to the usual rule that a prize composition is seldom worth a hearing after the first one.

This symphony is neither an example of the ultra-modern French school of D'Indy and later writers, nor modeled on the conservative ideas of the older composers as represented by Saint-Saëns. At times there is a suggestion of Franck, and here and there a faint reminiscence of Wagner, but all in all it is something more than pedantic or classically academic, for the themes are vigorous, and highly pleasing, worked out in a most interesting manner. The first movement is highly original and of many moods, from grave to gay, which suggest a little uncertainty as to just what the composer had in mind. The slow movement is distinguished by an impressive chorale, and this as a subject is heard as well in the scherzo which follows. This scherzo, by the way, is in Mr. Rabaud's happiest vein. The finale is many-sided in its thought, and there are many who will consider this movement the best of the four. Be this as it may, the symphony impressed greatly on the first hearing after many years. Its reception was far more than a farewell compliment to Mr. Rabaud, and it is pleasant to say that at the conclusion, both in the afternoon and in the evening, not only was the composer recalled several times, but that both orchestra and

Dainty Underwear
CAMISOLES—Good quality
wash satin,
in flesh,
trimmed with dainty lace back and front.
Other exceptional values in Silk Waists at 2.98 to 14.98

audience rose in their seats: a tribute as deserving as it was spontaneous.

Mr. Rabaud also gave three movements of the Bach B minor suite for flute and strings, and Mr. Laurent again showed his virtuosity in unmistakable manner. There was also an admirable performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Between these numbers, Sophie Braslau, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, sang in admirable voice an unfamiliar aria from "Ariodant," one of Méhul's forgotten operas, also three songs of Moussorgsky. Most of the texts were gloomy in spirit, but the music was varied and interesting.

HERALD APRIL 27,

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 23D CONCERT

Audience Pays Impressive Tribute to Conductor Rabaud

RECALLS HIM TWICE TO GIVE OVATIONS

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, announced for Friday afternoon, was postponed until yesterday afternoon on account of the parade. The concert was repeated last night. The program was as follows: Rabaud, Symphony, No. 2, E minor (first time at these concerts); Mehul, Recitative, "Que dis-je?" and Aria "O des Amants, le plus fidele" from "Ariodant" (Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company); Bach, Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite No. 2, B minor, for flute and strings (George Laurent, flute); Moussorgsky, Three Songs with orchestral accompaniment: Death's Serenade, the Banks of the Don, On the River Dnieper (Miss Braslau); Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was first played in Paris in 1899, when he was 26 years old. It was played under his direction. For this work he was awarded the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs. The symphony was heard in Boston 11 years ago at one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's concerts, conducted by Mr. Longy. There have been four double performances in Philadelphia. The symphony has been played by the New York Symphony orchestra, the Chicago Symphony orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and it was performed at the Worcester Festival of 1917.

A prize composition is often and justly looked on with suspicion. To satisfy the average judges, the work must be strictly orthodox; all the conventions must be observed; above all, there must be no trace of originality.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony is a brilliant exception to the rule. While the workmanship displayed must have satisfied the most critical, the music is far from being pedantic. There is no counterpoint merely for counterpoint's sake. The fresh, vigorous, beautiful themes are developed in an interesting and often dramatic manner. While the different movements are well contrasted there is a unity of the whole by reason of the ingenious and at times unexpected use in the later movements of preceding themes. The announcement of the virile motif at the beginning at once arouses attention. This and the next theme are followed by a pleasing song for the oboe. This thematic material is worked out in masterly fashion. The whole movement is strongly dramatic, but not theatrical. Here, as in the movements that follow, the hearer recognizes a composer of a sensitive, poetic nature, whose innate virility is controlled by a fine, not finical taste.

This first movement, energetic, now melancholy, wistful, now exultant, is on the whole the expression of a perturbed soul. The slow movement and the Scherzo are in a different vein. The former has for its chief subject an impressive Chorale of quiet, solemn beauty. This theme is used in the following movements with marked effect. It is introduced in the Scherzo, after the light and tripping first subject, introduced with great cunning; witness the variant of it, skilfully orchestrated.

APR 24 1919

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Succeeds Henri Rabaud as Conductor of Orchestra

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His departure will cause regret from the musical public.

However, his no less distinguished compatriot, Pierre Monteux, is to succeed him. A conductor with a wider experience would be indeed hard to find. In Europe he has played in orchestras and chamber music organizations; in Europe and America both he has conducted opera, ballet and orchestral concerts. His engagement comes as a natural sequence of events, for he conducted the opening concerts of the present season with remarkable results, in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan opera house and pending the delayed arrival of Mr Rabaud.

A distinguished career commends him for the post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon and in the concerts of the "Musical composers' society." He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the "Civic orchestra" in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company.

and paid a tribute [illegible]
bered.

Mr. Rabaud sensibly gave only three of the seven movements in Bach's Suite. These afforded Mr. Laurent, the solo flutist, opportunity to show his skill and taste, as he had already done in the Scherzo of the symphony, as he had already done at concerts in the past.

Miss Braslau, who sang here at a subscription concert for the first time, brought out an air in the grand style from Mehul's forgotten opera. The aria is interesting, and not only as an example of the heroic French manner of 120 years ago. There is a dignity, a nobility in this air, so that one can understand the enthusiasm of Berlioz. Miss Braslau, whose voice is a rich one, of liberal compass, also of true contralto quality, sang the old music dramatically and with full appreciation of the varied emotional contents. It was a pleasure to hear Moussorgsky's songs, which she sang in Russian. Here, again, she sang dramatically, but she did not overstep the line that separates the concert from the opera. And how the three songs differed! Death serenading the maiden who at last is his; the charming song of the garden by the Don, with Masha coming from the well; and then the savage cry of the Cossack to the river Dnieper, foretelling the triumph of Ukraina; singularly effective, the three, as Miss Braslau sang them.

to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théatre des Champs-Elysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on four tours he has specialized in ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mais oui; second rate, also. Facile; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with. It is music for the public; as for me I like music for the musicians."

"And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure; the public is not the same for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best, of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"But yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programmes must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux continued. "We ga[illegible] his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saë[illegible] was his own organist. He was not al[illegible] satisfied with the organist chosen[illegible] he said, "I will play the organ my[illegible] but who shall conduct?" It was [illegible] hearsal, and a friend of mine said, [illegible] teux is in the audience.' At once [illegible] Saëns demands that I come to the [illegible] that I conduct. Voilà! I have c[illegible] much of Saint-Saëns—'La Princes[illegible] 'Phryne,' 'Henri VIII.' But of all [illegible] I like 'Samson and Delilah.' It [illegible] his greatest work, almost pure m[illegible]

"There has been no great musi[illegible] ing out of the war, in France at [illegible] Mr. Monteux said regretfully in [illegible] to a question. "Nor will there be for [illegible] time, I believe. Men's minds have [illegible] on other things. One writes you k[illegible] to an occasion and one cannot be equal [illegible] the occasion as it has been in France the[illegible] four years."

"Have you ever composed, Mr. Monteux?" He leaned forward confidentially, finger up. "Yes, indeed. I have composed many things. And do you know where they are, those compositions? In a big box, tied up tight with a string. And they will never see the sun, I promise you. I play too much other people's music to write any more of my own. Not since fifteen years ago, when I composed for the last time, have I written anything. For I believe that a man can only have one career, and that mine is to conduct.—I shall always be a conductor."

"You find the personal equation a strong factor in conducting, do you not, Mr. Monteux? What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?"

"Both," the conductor answered. "It must seem a democracy but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for the orders' sake, but only to get results." Mr. Monteux seemed as he spoke an epitome of that remarkable nation whose foremost quality has long been the ability to influence others, while always respecting the individual's liberty. One could not imagine this smiling, vivacious little man ever becoming autocratic; but one could readily perceive how his personality might arouse in others enthusiasm for that music which so evidently rules his life.

Presently we spoke of Russian composers and Mr. Monteux expressed his admiration for the works of Rimsky-Korsakov, of Borodin and of Stravinsky. "So many material difficulties have interfered with presenting Russian operas," he said regretfully. "People wonder why more are not performed; but you see it needs more than the composer and the librettist; more even than the artists. Not so with the giving of their orchestral music. I look forward to that. It will be my hope to include all kinds of good music, even American," he added with a laugh. "France ought to hear some of your composers, by the way; you have several that should be known in Europe. Loeffler, Carpenter, four or five others are well worthy to be heard; some have been. Then I shall seek out and bring over some good concert music from Italy. That is a side of Italian musical development that has been too much ignored, for the operatic pieces always receive the emphasis. There are a number of young [illegible]alian composers of whom I hear good [illegible]ngs said, as well as the older ones whose [illegible]sic I hope to bring forward."

[illegible]s there anything you would especially [illegible]to say for publication, Mr. Monteux?"

"[illegible]," he said, unexpectedly and earnest[illegible] [illegible]his: In playing French music I shall [illegible]ke French propaganda. You under[illegible] [illegible]abaud, Messager and I, we have [illegible]ght up in France; it is our coun[illegible] [illegible]aturally love and we play the [illegible]our country. But not to make [illegible]a for it; that would be stupid. [illegible]usic is great enough not to need [illegible] you Americans know and love [illegible] music already. I shall not play [illegible] music because it is French music, [illegible]nderstand, although I love it. But I [illegible] play the best music of every nation."

[illegible]e Peeler in Musical America.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 28

WEEK-END CONCERTS

RABAUD'S SYMPHONY AND SONGS FROM MUSORGSKY

An Interesting and Grateful Music Characteristic of the Composer and Conductor—Miss Braslau's Vivid Russian Excursion—Intermezzi of a Double Day—Sabbath Entertainments—Mr. Monteux Goes to Paris

THE memory of man runneth not to a day wherein the Symphony Orchestra has undertaken two concerts—one in the afternoon, another in the evening. Yet this thing befell on Saturday—last probably, of the perturbations of routine, of the departures from habit, that two years of war and an autumn of influenza have enforced upon band and audiences. The parade of returned troops on Friday, preoccupying the town and actually passing Symphony Hall, put out of the question the usual afternoon concert. It befell accordingly on Saturday; while four hours later followed the usual repetition of the evening. Possibly the audience at either was smaller than is customary; but otherwise there was no observable consequence. No doubt the players, being musicians in an orchestra "did their bit" in grumbling, since it is the nature of their kind so to do. No doubt, Mr. Rabaud, already fatigued by a long and laborious season and naturally spending himself to the utmost upon his own symphony, felt the strain of a double occasion. Yet doubled only the more gratefully and immediately, was the return. For in the evening as in the afternoon the audience not only received the piece with eager interest and hearty applause, but rose in its places, along with the orchestra, in tribute to the just deserts of the Parisian composer and conductor who has dwelt and worked for a space in this town. Nor were both companies lacking in warmth towards Miss Braslau, the singer of the day from the "jeune troupe" of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Though Mr. Rabaud's symphony—number two in E minor opus five—has entered concert-halls in the United States only in recent years, it is relatively youthful work, written and played for the first time in Paris in 1899. By date of original performance at least, no more than a month separates it from the tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne"; yet it hardly attains the finesse of handling, the adroitness of imagination, distinguishing that piece and still more the opera of "Marouf" and the incidental music to Mr. Firmin-Gémier's version of "The Merchant of Venice"—all three heard in Boston or in New York during the current season. On the other hand, the symphony bears few marks of the direct influence of illustrious elders. There are obvious kinships between the temperament of Mr. Rabaud, as man and composer in youth or in middle age, and the temperament of Franck. The music of the symphony more than once reflects these affinities. Nor is it without mark of the formal procedures that twenty years ago who pant for "reminiscences," no doubt become part of the common and accepted heritage of contemporary music. Those who pant for "remininiscences," no doubt heard in Mr. Rabaud's measures occasional hint of Wagnerian harmonies, progressions, tonal coloring; but where in the music of the middle and conservative generation of European and American composers are they not to be spied out by superfluously searching eyes?

So far as affinities are concerned, it seems fairest and truest to say that Mr. Rabaud's symphony is in the direct line of the symphonic tradition as it descends into our day from Beethoven through Brahms and also through Franck. The large manipulation of tonal masses through the first movement foreshadows in a way the Mahler who ran to excess with them. It was possible in the ascent and amplification of the choral theme of the second movement to hear a faint hint of Bruckner. But no Mahler and (outside Vienna) no Bruckner existed musically in 1899, least of all in Mr. Rabaud's Parisian world. Rather, all these incidental kinships lie within the circle of the classical symphonic tradition continued. By the same token, except in unclouded lucidity and in unflagging logic of design, Mr. Rabaud's symphony bears no distinctively Gallic ear-marks. Within those traits, it is a French music. Otherwise, in 1899, any heir to the symphonic ages, having also the composer's mind, heart and hand, might have written it anywhere.

To hear the music, however, is to take little thought of these coördinations. Rather, Mr. Rabaud's symphony interests the ear, quickens the mind, stirs responsive emotion and generally pleasures the hearer by intrinsic virtue. The motives out of which he builds it and which he intertwines in the successive movements, are as clear as the day and as plainly charactered. In development and progress with them, in contrast and cumulation, Mr. Rabaud discloses no little technical resource and invention. The lay ear follows with unconscious satisfaction in such unified and rounded work, the course of the symphony; the expert listener finds many a detail interesting and piquant. The music, however, is no mere music of an expert craftsman. Throughout it is animated with clear depth and range of mood, with communicating warmth of feeling, with grateful play of imagination. Grave power and large emotion sway and swing the tonal masses, the advances and the recessions of the first movement. The second, with its choral motive, works the illusion of deep and ascetic aspiration—an aspiration characteristically Rabaudian in freedom from the occasional sentimentality of Franck and the frequent sentimentality of Bruckner, in a recurring beauty also, to which the mind rather than the heart answers the quicker.

Out of both divisions shines a clear candor, a warm insistence of melody; for Mr. Rabaud is not of those composers who stifle instrumental song in workmanship or strangle it after a few measures lest they seem too simple in a sophisticated time. The scherzo renews this melodic frankness, touches it with fancy, suggests through all its freedom of form and lightness of pace the fine masculine quality of Beethoven's scherzi. Beethoven-like, again, are the iterated rhythms of the finale; but more Franckian are the mounting brightness and the final advance into large swelling, choral-like close. A reflective, a logical symphony, if the hearer chooses to exalt these qualities in the music; a symphony warm and even rich with grateful melody; a symphony of exemplary and painstaking workmanship; but also a symphony animate with the directness of feeling, the fine imagination, the justice in all things that underlie the grave, the ascetic, the sincere and the scrupulous Henri Rabaud.

There was intermezzo in the concert when Mr. Laurent, the first flute of the orchestra, played with the string choir three of the seven divisions of Bach's familiar suite in B minor; while for finale stood Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont." Beyond peradventure it is a noble and eloquent music, a large and heroic tapestry in tones. Beyond questioning Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra played it, as they usually play romantic pieces, with light and heat. And yet, and yet, how many times has it been heard at the Symphony Concerts; while other overtures, even some of Beethoven's own, repose year in and year out upon the shelves of the neighboring library! No doubt the late Professor Norton read in "Hamlet" daily with pleasure; but not all of us at the Symphony Concerts are Nortons with Beethoven. There can be too much of him in a season; the standard repertory is indeed a convenient thing; but it has been known to turn classics hackneyed. Fortunately, there was Mr. Laurent to freshen Bach's suite and a Rabaud leading it whose ear at last had compassed the true balance in such pieces between the ment and the accompanying the first time this season. M

Continued on Last P

Bach was plastic; for the first time, the interwoven voices sounded in light and just proportion. Mr. Laurent, in turn, was fated to those imitative measures in which Bach writes for a flute as though he were composing for strings. Yet the little master played them as though they were native and grateful to his instrument; while in them and in the rest the rare brightness, fluidity, and transparency of his edgeless tone no less praised him.

Yet, next to Mr. Rabaud's symphony, the interest, the excitement, of the concert sprang from Miss Braslau's singing of three songs out of Musorgsky as scored for orchestra by various hands. First she made her way through an air from Méhul's opera, "Ariodant," in the semi-classic French manner of the end of the eighteenth century—music in which she proved her command of broad and marching declamatory measures, of the grave and stately phrases marshalled by the composer into large, expansive and ornate line, music, indeed, for the richness of Miss Braslau's alto tones, her measured dramatic energy, her amplitudes of style. Then ensued the three songs of Musorgsky. In one, Death as ironic lover serenades the wasted maiden he is about to snatch from the joy of light and life—music that now caressed with its sensuous voice and again pierced with boding and bitter interval or harmony. Another song glowed warm and still with amorous longing for the maid who passed—and glanced—along the flowery path beside the river—a music quivering with the fragrance of the scene, the leap of the impulse, a music of distilled beauty. The third, of the Dneiper when the waiting waters run red with the blood of Jew and Pole slain by savage Cossack hands, burnt into the imagination with fierce and leaping fires, a superb chant of vindictive and rejoicing massacre, an infuriate, pounding, tribal music.

And out of all three and out, as well, of Miss Braslau's imparting song, various as the three pieces and in full accord with each, rose the wondrous quality that sets Musorgsky apart from other composers. He who writes longs for those rare moments when the word becomes animate with the thing it should bear. He who composes must long equally for the moments—as rare also in kind—when the tone is as this thing alive. Such moments Musorgsky knew oftener than most composers. For him there was but one impulse, one goal—this living directness, this transmuting of the sensation, white-hot and naked, into the expression. There are many such moments in his music-drama of "Boris"; of them, no less, and the more for Miss Braslau's singing, were the three songs of Saturday.

POST APRIL 17

MONTEUX TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Engaged for Next Season to Succeed Mr. Rabaud

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season will be Pierre Monteux, now of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Mr. Rabaud's brilliant countryman, who conducted the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony season, prior to Mr. Rabaud's arrival in Boston.

This announcement, made yesterday afternoon by the directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came in answer to much excited inquiry and suspense. There were rumors of the coming of Arturo Toscanini, Rhené Baton, Mengelberg of Amsterdam and a dozen others.

RETURNS TO COMPOSING

It was hoped for some time that Mr. Rabaud would extend his contract for another season, but Mr. Rabaud is first of all a composer, as well as a man of means. He came over to America at the urgent invitation of the Boston Symphony trustees in answer to a crying need for a conductor of the first rank. Knowing how arduous were the duties of the conductor of the Boston Symphony, he came in a spirit of art and of patriotic co-operation with a country with which France has now more intimate bonds than ever.

His stay has added to his fame; his pleasure at his reception has been great, but now Mr. Rabaud longs to return to his family and to his composing. The best wishes of an admiring public will go back with him.

With Orchestra Last Fall

Mr. Monteux's remarkable results when he conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts last autumn, in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud, are too well remembered to need emphasis. He was handicapped by the difficult task of training a newly reconstructed personnel and by a small number of concerts to reward his labors—the epidemic made it necessary to cancel two of the four pairs of concerts which he was to conduct in Boston. Nevertheless, the fine tonal balance and quality of ensemble which he elicited from a still comparatively strange organization was a subject of general remark.

Many were also surprised by his versatility in choosing and interpreting symphonic music of every kind. Brilliant performances of Debussy, Havel and Dukas were to be expected by Boston audiences already familiar with him as a conductor of ballet music; his sympathetic and comprehensive readings of Beethoven, Franck, Handel and Schumann revealed his fuller talents.

A Distinguished Career

A distinguished career also commends him for the post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1879, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the violin in Colonne's orchestra, he was a member of the orchestra of the Opera-Comique, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the "Musical Composers' Society."

He conducted at the several concert halls in Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion.

In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and conducted at the Boston Opera House (Nov. 6-11) "Les Papillons," "Spectre de la Rose," "Thamar," "Petrouchka," "Scheherazade," "Prince Igor," "Sadko," "The Afternoon of a Faun" and "Cleopatra."

In the summer of 1917 he conducted a series of concerts in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Under his skilful baton and discriminating judgment "Faust" was reset, Rabaud's "Marouf," "Le Coq d'Or" and Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo" were mounted. This season his repertory has been extended, and further new operas produced. At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan Opera Company, he conducted "Le Coq d'Or," "The Dance in Place Congo" and "Samson and Delilah." Thus his destiny has led him three times to Boston, and his fourth visit seems almost a natural sequence of events.

Mr. Rabaud will conduct seven more concerts in America, three pairs at Symphony Hall on April 18-19, April 26 (afternoon and evening) and May 2-3. The other concert will take place in Cambridge, April 24.

The farewell concerts in Boston abound in events of interest. Tomorrow and Saturday, Raoul Laparra, the spirited French composer, will play the piano part in his new orchestral suite, "A Basque Sunday." Mr. Rabaud will also conduct by request Cesar Franck's great symphony which has not been heard in Boston under his leadership. At the 23d pair of concerts he will conduct his own "Second Symphony," generally accounted his master work, again by request, and Miss Sophie Braslau, the young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist.

At the final concerts of May 2 and 3, Saint-Saens' Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," will have its first performance in this country, for which a chorus of 150 voices is being trained. There will also be the following quartet of soloists: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor and Reinald Werrenrath, bass.

THE APRIL 17, HERALD,

MONTEUX WILL LEAD SYMPHONY

Succeeds Henri Rabaud Next Season as Its Conductor

LATTER TO TAKE UP COMPOSITION WORK

Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening of Boston Symphony concerts last fall, has been engaged as conductor for next year, succeeding Henri Rabaud, who has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of more than 100 concerts leaves no opportunity for his chosen vocation.

News of the conductor's decision to return home will undoubtedly be received with real regret by the musical public of this country. He will conduct seven more concerts in America, three pairs at Symphony Hall, April 18, 19 and 26 (afternoon and evening) and May 2-3. The other will take place in Cambridge, April 24.

Laparra to Play

The farewell concerts in Boston abound in events of interest. Tomorrow and Saturday, Raoul Laparra will play the piano part of his new orchestral suite, "A Basque Sunday." Mr. Rabaud will also conduct by request Cesar Franck's great symphony. On the 23d he will conduct his own "second Symphony," generally accounted his master work, and Miss Sophie Braslau, the young contralto of the Metropolitan opera company, will be the soloist.

At the final concerts of May 2 and 3, Saint-Saens' Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," will have its first performance in this country, for which a chorus of 150 voices is being trained. There will also be the following quartet of soloists: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, bass.

The remarkable success which attended the conducting of Mr. Monteux last fall is well remembered. Many were surprised by his versatility in choosing and interpreting symphonic music of every kind. Brilliant performances of Debussy, Ravel and Dukas were to be expected by the audiences already familiar with him as a conductor of ballet music.

A distinguished career also commends him for the new post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, he studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. Later he conducted at several concert halls in Paris. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and conducted at the Boston Opera House.

In the summer of 1917 he conducted a series of concerts in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed regular French conductor of the Metropolitan opera company. At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan, he conducted "Le Coq d'Or," "The Dance in Place Congo," and "Samson and Delilah." Thus, his destiny has led him three times to Boston, and his fourth visit seems almost a natural sequence of events.

(Photograph Copyright by Mishkin, N. Y.)
PIERRE MONTEUX
Will Succeed Henry Rabaud as Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Next Season.

WORLD
New York City

MONTEUX TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Succeeds Henri Rabaud, Who Will Devote All His Time to Composition.

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract.

Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud.

Born in Paris April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's orchestra and was a member of the Opera-Comique orchestra. He took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the Musical Composers' Society.

He conducted at several concert halls in Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," in 1913 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours of Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916. In 1917 he conducted the opera here and the following year was appointed French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Although M. Monteux's contract with the Metropolitan Opera House has more to run, Mr. Gatti-Casazza released him in order that he might accept the post generally considered the most important of the orchestras of this country.

Sophie Braslau (Photograph by Mishkin)

Ablest of the Younger Altos of the Metropolitan Opera House and Assisting Singer at the Symphony Concerts of Saturday

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Indiscipline in the Symphony Orchestra—A Subscriber's Complaint—Miss Braslau's Novel Pieces

THE following letter bears witness to the fact that frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are beginning to note an obvious disregard of discipline in the orchestra and to chafe under it. The note comes from a subscriber of many years' standing at Symphony Hall and says:

That the Symphony Orchestra, as at present constituted, is in need of stricter discipline and of a more serious spirit was exemplified at the concert of last Friday afternoon. In the overture to "Der Freischütz" the quartet for horns at the begining was played so ill as to attract the attention of the most inexperienced listener. The four players seemed vastly amused by their own poor doings. The chief offender was wreathed in smiles for a considerable period, while two of the others, giving evidence of equal amusement, indulged in a lengthy conversation, possibly on the subject. And all this while the rest of the orchestra was making its way through the overture. A little Prussian discipline might well be exercised.

The fashion in which, last Friday, the four horn-players "dealt with" the introduction to Weber's overture was evident to every ear—no less than, on other occasions, the seemingly wilful blaring of the trumpets or the careless raggedness of the string choir. Whispered conversation while the performance is proceeding and the smile that mocks may also be observed from time to time in the orchestra as they were of old in Mr. Fiedler's final years. The truth is that like any other body of a hundred men, variously tempered and minded, the Symphony Orchestra requires a severer discipline than the kindly and conscientious conductor of the present season has sometimes laid upon it. If Mr. Rabaud were conducting an orchestra of Rabauds, all would have gone well, but not every player sitting under him has his the sense of obligation and conduct. Possibly the incoming Monteux will maintain a more rigid rule and hold the orchestra individually and collectively more strictly to it.

In any case it is high time to have done with the pretty notion fostered of late in some quarters that the Symphony Concerts are "gatherings of friends and lovers of music to try over interesting pieces," or in one voice put it, that they were become "homey" again. Somehow it is hard to believe that to be "homey" is exactly a desirable quality in public and costly concerts undertaken by a celebrated orchestra presumably cultivating the highest standards of performance. The atmosphere of the music-room or the studio is pleasant enough, but it is hardly the atmosphere that rewards and stimulates in the concert hall.

Miss Braslau and Her Songs

Miss Braslau's pieces at the Symphony Concerts of Saturday promise to be as interesting as her rich and colorful voice and the warmth of her ripening talents. Méhul's name stood upon a programme at Symphony Hall, where Cherubini has too long represented the Paris composers of the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth. Possibly some of Méhul's overtures to operas would prove quite as interesting as the two or three of Cherubini that still keep place in the repertory of twentieth-century orchestras. At the least the air of Méhul's "Ariodant" that Miss Braslau will sing should whet curiosity. The opera, produced in Paris in 1799 to small favor, was built upon an episode in Ariosto's poem, "Orlando Furioso"; the particular air of Miss Braslau's choice is a monologue of a longing and anxious woman over a lover gone to fight for and against a "traitorous" rival. The singer's other numbers are three songs of Mussorgsky, a rarer name even than Méhul's on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, but with better reason. For Mussorgsky wrote few orchestral pieces, while "symphonic fragments" are not easily detachable from his music-dramas. The first of the chosen songs, "On the Banks of the Don," runs in playfully sentimental vein. The second, "Death's Serenade," is most characteristic in the fashion in which the composer adapts lightness of form and manner to the ironic voice and mood of the sinister serenader. When death sings the beauty of the maiden whom he covets Musorgsky, according to his wont, is bitterly sensuous. The third song, "On the Dnyeper," is a savage and equally characteristic piece, exulting in Cossack victory over Poles and Jews. Upon their blood the great river feasts.

Victor Hugo at the Symphony Concerts

His Ode, "La Lyre et La Harpe," to Be Heard for the First Times in Boston Tomorrow Afternoon and Saturday Evening to Saint-Saens's Music for Orchestra, Chorus and Solo-Singers

THE poem is the second ode of the fourth book of Hugo's "Odes et Ballades," originally published in 1822 when the poet and playwright was relatively at his beginnings. It is here printed in his own French, because the translation into English to be used by the singers at Symphony Hall, and therefore to be printed in the programme-book, is a paltry, clumsy botch. Saint-Saens wrote the piece to fulfil a commission from the Birmingham Festival in England. He first intended to put music to a Breton legend. Finding that text unworkable, he substituted for it Hugo's ode as aforesaid. The resulting numbers were first heard at Birmingham on Aug. 28, 1879. In recent years, they have seldom returned to the concert hall in France, in England or in the United States. In the performances of Friday and Saturday, Mr. Rabaud, the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Townsend's Chorus and Mmes. Kline and Alcock, Messrs. A. Hackett and Werrenrath, for solo-singers, will all share. The poem, dedicated to "M. Alph. de L[amartine]" and preceded by two Latin quotations, is presumed to contrast paganism, speaking as the Lyre, and Christianity, speaking as the Harp.

LA LYRE

Dors, ô fils d'Apollon! ses lauriers te couronnent, Dors en paix! Les neuf Sœurs t'adorent comme un roi;
De leurs chœurs nébuleux les Songes t' environnent;
La lyre chante auprès de toi!

LA HARPE

Eveille-toi, jeune homme, enfant de la misère!
Un rêve ferme au jour tes regards obscurcis,
Et pendant ton sommeil, un indigent, ton frère,
A ta porte en vain s'est assis!

LA LYRE

Ton jeune âge est cher à la gloire.
Enfant, la Muse ouvrit tes yeux,
Et d' une immortelle mémoire
Couronna ton nom radieux.
En vain Saturne te menace;
Va, l'Olympe est né du Parnasse,
Les poëtes ont fait les dieux!

LA HARPE

Homme, une femme fut ta mère.
Elle a pleuré sur ton berceau;
Souffre donc. Ta vie éphémère
Brille et tremble, ainsi qu'un flambeau.
Dieu, ton maître, a d'un signe austère
Tracé ton chemin sur la terre,
Et marqué ta place au tombeau.

LA LYRE

Chante! Jupiter règne et l'univers l'implore;
Vénus embrasse Mars d'un souris gracieux;
Iris brille dans l'air, dans les champs brille Flore;
Chante! Les immortels, du couchant à l'aurore,
En trois pas parcourent les cieux!

LA HARPE

Prie! Il n'est qu'un vrai Dieu, juste dans sa clémence,
Par la fuite des temps sans cesse rajeuni.
Tout s'achève dans lui, par lui tout recommence.
Son être emplit le monde ainsi qu'une âme immense;
L'éternel vit dans l'infini.

LA LYRE

Ta douce Muse à fuir t'invite.
Cherche un abri calme et serein;
Les mortels, que le sage évite,
Subissent le siècle d'airain.
Viens; près de tes lares tranquilles,
Tu verras de loin dans les villes
Mugir la Discorde aux cent voix.
Qu'importe à l'heureux solitaire
Que l'antan dévaste la terre
S'il ne fait qu'agiter ses bois!

LA HARPE

Dieu, par qui tout forfait s'expie,
Marche avec celui qui le sert.
Apparais dans la foule impie,
Tel que Jean, qui vint du désert.
Va donc, parle aux peuples du monde:
Dis-leur la tempête qui gronde,
Révèle le juge irrité;
Et, pour mieux frapper leur oreille,
Que ta voix s'élève, pareille
A la rumeur d'une cité!

LA LYRE

L'aigle est l'oiseau du Dieu qu'avant tous on adore.
Du Caucase à l'Athos l'aigle planant dans l'air,
Roi du feu qui féconde et du feu qui dévore,
Contemple le soleil et vole sur l'éclair.

LA HARPE

La colombe descend du ciel qui la salue,
Et, voilant l'Esprit-Saint sous son regard de feu,
Chère au vieillard choisi comme à la vierge élue,
Porte un rameau dans l'arche, annonce au monde un Dieu!

LA LYRE

Aime! Eros règne à Gnide, à l'Olympe, au Tartare.
Son flambeau de Sestos allume le doux phare,
Il consume Ilion par la main de Paris.
Toi, fuis de belle en belle, et change avec leurs charmes.
L'Amour n'enfante que des larmes;
Les Amours sont frères des Ris!

LA HARPE

L'amour divin défend de la haine infernale.
Cherche pour ton cœur pur une âme virginale;
Chéris-la, Jéhovah chérissait Israël.
Deux êtres que dans l'ombre unit un saint mystère
Passent en s'aimant sur la terre,
Comme deux exilés du ciel!

LA LYRE

Jouis! c'est au fleuve des ombres
Que va le fleuve des vivants.
Le sage, s'il a des jours sombres,
Les laisse aux dieux, les jette aux vents.
Enfin, comme un pâle convive,
Quand la mort imprévue arrive,
De sa couche il lui tend la main;
Et, riant de ce qu'il ignore,
S'endort dans la nuit sans aurore,
En rêvant un doux lendemain!

LA HARPE

Soutiens ton frère qui chancelle,
Pleure si tu le vois souffrir;
Veille avec soin, pricavec zèle,
Vis en songeant qu'il faut mourir.
Le pêcheur croit, lorsqu'il succombe,
Que le néant est dans la tombe,
Comme il est dans la volupté;
Mais quand l'ange impur le réclame,
Il s'épouvante d'être une âme,
Et frémit de l'éternité!

Le poëte écoutait, à peine à son aurore,
Ces deux lointaines voix qui descendaient du ciel;
Et plus tard il osa parfois, bien faible encore,
Dire à l'écho du Pinde un hymne du Carmel!

(Copyright by Mishkin, N. Y.)
PIERRE MONTEUX

eed Henry Rabaud as Con- Symphony Orchestra Next Season

ORLD
New York City
APR 17 1917

TEUX TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY

eds Henri Rabaud, Who Devote All His Time to Composition.

Rabaud, who came from last November to conduct the Symphony Orchestra for the season, has declined the in- of the trustees to extend his t.

Rabaud prefers to devote his composition, and finds that on of over 100 concerts leaves ortunity or energy for his chos- tion.

compatriot, Pierre Monteux, en engaged to succeed him. Mr. ix conducted the opening Bos- mphony concerts of the pres- ason in conjunction with his at the Metropolitan Opera and pending the delayed f Mr. Rabaud.

in Paris April 4, 1875, Pierre nin Monteux studied at the vatory of that city, and while il of Berthalier was awarded prize for violin playing. He the viola in Colonne's orches- d was a member of the Opera ue orchestra. He also took in concerts given by Messrs. llard, Hayot and Salmon, and concerts of the Musical Com- Society.

conducted at several concert in Paris, and instituted the certs Monteux" at the Casino de on Sunday afternoons, where troduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de emps" and "Petrouch." In 1911 as engaged as conductor of the an Ballet, with which he made tours of Europe. In the same city he came to the United es in 1916. In the summer of he conducted the City Orchestra and the following autumn he appointed French conductor of Metropolitan Opera Company. hough M. Monteux' contract the Metropolitan has one year to run, Mr. Gatti Casazza re- d him in order that he might t the post generally regarded as most important among Symphony

RABAUD RESIGNS AS SYMPHONY LEADER

He Will Be Succeeded by Pierre Monteux

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the persent season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition.

© Photo by Mishkin

PIERRE MONTEUX

His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged as conductor. Mr Monteaux' remarkable results, when he conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts last Autumn, in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr Rabaud, are well remembered. He was handicapped by the difficult task of training a newly reconstituted personnel, and by a small number of concerts to reward his labors —the epidemic made it necessary to cancel two of the four pairs of concerts which he was to conduct in Boston. Nevertheless, the fine tonal balance and quality of ensemble which he elicited from a still comparatively strange organization, was a subject of general remark.

Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, was a member of the orchestra of the Opera Comique, and became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard.

In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and conducted at the Boston Opera House.

In the Summer of 1917 he conducted a series of concerts in New York, and the following Autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The news of Mr Rabaud's decision to return home will undoubtedly be received with real regret by the musical public of this country. To his musicianship, his industry, and his notable results, both orchestra and public are indebted. He will conduct seven more concerts in America, three pairs at Symphony Hall on April 18, 19, April 26 (afternoon and evening) and May 2, 3. The other concert will take place in Cambridge April 24.

The farewell concerts in Boston abound in events of interest. Tomorrow and Saturday Raoul Laparra, the spirited French composer, will play the piano part in his new orchestral suite, "A Basque Sunday." Mr Rabaud will also conduct, by request, Ceasar Franck's great Symphony, which has not been heard in Boston under his leadership. At the 23d pair of concerts he will conduct his own "Second Symphony," generally accounted his master work.

Sophie Braslau (Photograph by Mishkin)

Ablest of the Younger Altos of the Metropolitan Opera House and Assisting Singer at the Symphony Concerts of Saturday

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Indiscipline in the Symphony Orchestra—A Subscriber's Complaint—Miss Braslau's Novel Pieces

THE following letter bears witness to the fact that frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are beginning to note an obvious disregard of discipline in the orchestra and to chafe under it. The note comes from a subscriber of many years' standing at Symphony Hall and says:

That the Symphony Orchestra, as at present constituted, is in need of stricter discipline and of a more serious spirit was exemplified at the concert of last Friday afternoon. In the overture to "Der Freischütz" the quartet for horns at the begining was played so ill as to attract the attention of the most inexperienced listener. The four players seemed vastly amused by their own poor doings. The chief offender was wreathed in smiles for a considerable period, while two of the others, giving evidence of equal amusement, indulged in a lengthy conversation, possibly on the subject. And all this while the rest of the orchestra was making its way through the overture. A little Prussian discipline might well be exercised.

The fashion in which, last Friday, the four horn-players "dealt with" the introduction to Weber's overture was evident to every ear—no less than, on other occasions, the seemingly wilful blaring of the trumpets or the careless raggedness of the string choir. Whispered conversation while the performance is proceeding and the smile that mocks may also be observed from time to time in the orchestra as they were of old in Mr. Fiedler's final years. The truth is that like any other body of a hundred men, variously tempered and minded, the Symphony Orchestra requires a severer discipline than the kindly and conscientious conductor of the present season has sometimes laid upon it. If Mr. Rabaud were conducting an orchestra of Rabauds, all would have gone well, but if every player sitting under him has his the sense of obligation and conduct. Possibly the incoming Monteux will maintain a more rigid rule and hold the orchestra individually and collectively more strictly to it.

In any case it is high time to have done with the pretty notion fostered of late in some quarters that the Symphony Concerts are "gatherings of friends and lovers of music to try over interesting pieces," or, as one voice put it, that they were becoming "homey" again. Somehow it is hard to believe that to be "homey" is exactly a desirable quality in public and costly concerts undertaken by a celebrated orchestra, presumably cultivating the highest standards of performance. The atmosphere of the music-room or the studio is pleasant enough, but it is hardly the atmosphere that rewards and stimulates in the concert hall.

Miss Braslau and Her Songs

Miss Braslau's pieces at the Symphony Concerts of Saturday promise to be as interesting as her rich and colorful voice, as the warmth of her ripening talents. Seldom has Méhul's name stood upon a programme at Symphony Hall, where Cherubini has too long represented the Parisian composers of the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth. Possibly some of Méhul's overtures to operas would prove quite as interesting as the two or three from Cherubini that still keep place in the repertory of twentieth-century orchestras. At the least the air from Méhul's "Ariodant" that Miss Breslau will sing should whet curiosity. The opera, produced in Paris in 1799 to no small favor, was built upon an episode in Ariosto's poem, "Orlando Furioso"; the particular air of Miss Braslau's choice is a monologue of a longing and anxious woman over a lover gone to fight for her against a "traitorous" rival. The singer's other numbers are three songs of Musorgsky, a rarer name even than Méhul's on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, but with better reason. For Musorgsky wrote few orchestral pieces, while "symphonic fragments" are not easily detachable from his music-dramas. The first of the chosen songs, "On the Banks of the Don," runs in playfully sentimental vein. The second, "Death's Serenade," is more characteristic in the fashion in which the composer adapts lightness of form and manner to the ironic voice and mood of the sinister serenader. When death sings the beauty of the maiden whom he covets, Musorgsky, according to his wont, is bitterly sensuous. The third song, "On the Dnyeper," is a savage and equally characteristic piece, exulting in Cossack victory over Poles and Jews. Upon their blood the great river feasts.

ctor Hugo at the Symphony Concerts

His Ode, "La Lyre et La Harpe," to Be Heard for the First Times in Boston Tomorrow Afternoon and Saturday Evening to Saint-Saens's Music for Orchestra, Chorus and Solo-Singers

HE poem is the second ode of the fourth book of Hugo's "Odes et Ballades," originally published in 1822 when the poet and playwright was relatively at his beginnings. It is here printed in his own French, because the translation into English to be used by the singers at Symphony and therefore to be printed in the programme-book, is a paltry, clumsy botch. Saint-Saens wrote ece to fulfil a commission from the Birmingham Festival in England. He first intended to put o a Breton legend. Finding that text unworkable, he substituted for it Hugo's ode as aforesaid. sulting numbers were first heard at Birmingham on Aug. 28, 1879. In recent years, they have seldom ed to the concert hall in France, in England or in the United States. In the performances of and Saturday, Mr. Rabaud, the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Townsend's Chorus and Mmes. Kline ock, Messrs. A. Hackett and Werrenrath, for solo-singers, will all share. The poem, dedicated Alph. de L[amartine]" and preceded by two Latin quotations, is presumed to contrast paganism, ing as the Lyre, and Christianity, speaking as the Harp.

LA LYRE

fils d'Apollon! ses lauriers te couronnent, en paix! Les neuf Sœurs t'adorent comme un roi;
urs chœurs nébuleux les Songes t' environnent:
La lyre chante auprès de toi!

LA HARPE

e-toi, jeune homme, enfant de la misère!
ve ferme au jour tes regards obscurcis,
ndant ton sommeil, un indigent, ton frère,
A ta porte en vain s'est assis!

LA LYRE

Ton jeune âge est cher à la gloire.
Enfant, la Muse ouvrit tes yeux,
Et d' une immortelle mémoire
Couronna ton nom radieux.
En vain Saturne te menace;
Va, l'Olympe est né du Parnasse,
Les poëtes ont fait les dieux!

LA HARPE

Homme, une femme fut ta mère.
Elle a pleuré sur ton berceau;
Souffre donc. Ta vie éphémère
Brille et tremble, ainsi qu'un flambeau.
Dieu, ton maître, a d'un signe austère
Tracé ton chemin sur la terre,
Et marqué ta place au tombeau.

LA LYRE

te! Jupiter règne et l'univers l'implore;
embrasse Mars d'un souris gracieux;
rille dans l'air, dans les champs brille Flore;
e! Les immortels, du couchant à l'aurore,
En trois pas parcourent les cieux!

LA HARPE

Il n'est qu'un vrai Dieu, juste dans sa clémence, fuite des temps sans cesse rajeuni.
s'achève dans lui, par lui tout recommence.
tre emplit le monde ainsi qu'une âme immense;
L'éternel vit dans l'infini.

LA LYRE

Ta douce Muse à fuir t'invite.
Cherche un abri calme et serein;
Les mortels, que le sage évite,
Subissent le siècle d'airain.
Viens; près de tes lares tranquilles,
Tu verras de loin dans les villes
Mugir la Discorde aux cent voix.
Qu'importe à l'heureux solitaire
Que l'antan dévaste la terre
S'il ne fait qu'agiter ses bois!

LA HARPE

Dieu, par qui tout forfait s'expie,
Marche avec celui qui le sert.
Apparais dans la foule impie,
Tel que Jean, qui vint du désert.

Va donc, parle aux peuples du monde:
Dis-leur la tempête qui gronde,
Révèle le juge irrité;
Et, pour mieux frapper leur oreille,
Que ta voix s'élève, pareille
A la rumeur d'une cité!

LA LYRE

L'aigle est l'oiseau du Dieu qu'avant tous on adore.
Du Caucase à l'Athos l'aigle planant dans l'air,
Roi du feu qui féconde et du feu qui dévore,
Contemple le soleil et vole sur l'éclair.

LA HARPE

La colombe descend du ciel qui la salue,
Et, voilant l'Esprit-Saint sous son regard de feu,
Chère au vieillard choisi comme à la vierge élue,
Porte un rameau dans l'arche, annonce au monde un Dieu!

LA LYRE

Aime! Eros règne à Gnide, à l'Olympe, au Tartare.
Son flambeau de Sestos allume le doux phare,
Il consume Ilion par la main de Paris.
Toi, fuis de belle en belle, et change avec leurs charmes.
L'Amour n'enfante que des larmes;
Les Amours sont frères des Ris!

LA HARPE

L'amour divin défend de la haine infernale.
Cherche pour ton cœur pur une âme virginale;
Chéris-la, Jéhovah chérissait Israël.
Deux êtres que dans l'ombre unit un saint mystère
Passent en s'aimant sur la terre,
Comme deux exilés du ciel!

LA LYRE

Jouis! c'est au fleuve des ombres
Que va le fleuve des vivants.
Le sage, s'il a des jours sombres,
Les laisse aux dieux, les jette aux vents.
Enfin, comme un pâle convive,
Quand la mort imprévue arrive,
De sa couche il lui tend la main;
Et, riant de ce qu'il ignore,
S'endort dans la nuit sans aurore,
En rêvant un doux lendemain!

LA HARPE

Soutiens ton frère qui chancelle,
Pleure si tu le vois souffrir;
Veille avec soin, prieavec zèle,
Vis en songeant qu'il faut mourir.
Le pêcheur croit, lorsqu'il succombe,
Que le néant est dans la tombe,
Comme il est dans la volupté;
Mais quand l'ange impur le réclame,
Il s'épouvante d'être une âme,
Et frémit de l'éternité!

Le poëte écoutait, à peine à son aurore,
Ces deux lointaines voix qui descendaient du ciel;
Et plus tard il osa parfois, bien faible encore,
Dire à l'écho du Pinde un hymne du Carmel!

(Copyright by Mishkin, N. Y.)

PIERRE MONTEUX

eed Henry Rabaud as Con- Symphony Orchestra Next Season

ORLD

New York City

APR 17 1917

TEUX TO CONDUCT OSTON SYMPHONY

ds Henri Rabaud, Who Devote All His Time to Composition.

Rabaud, who came from last November to conduct the Symphony Orchestra for the season, has declined the in- of the trustees to extend his t.

Rabaud prefers to devote his composition, and finds that n of over 100 concerts leaves rtunity or energy for his chos- tion.

compatriot, Pierre Monteux, n engaged to succeed him. Mr. ux conducted the opening Bos- mphony concerts of the pres- ason in conjunction with his at the Metropolitan Opera and pending the delayed ar- f Mr. Rabaud.

in Paris April 4, 1875, Pierre min Monteux studied at the vatory of that city, and while il of Berthalier was awarded prize for violin playing. He the viola in Colonne's orches- d was a member of the Opera ue orchestra. He also took in concerts given by Messrs. llard, Hayot and Salmon, and concerts of the Musical Com- Society.

conducted at several concert in Paris, and instituted the erts Monteux" at the Casino de on Sunday afternoons, where troduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de emps" and "Petrouch." In 1911 as engaged as conductor of the an Ballet, with which he made tours of Europe. In the same city he came to the United s in 1916. In the summer of he conducted the Civic Orchestra and the following autumn he appointed French conductor of Metropolitan Opera Company. hough M. Monteux contract the Metropolitan has one year to run, Mr. Gatti-Casazza re- d him in order that he might at the post generally regarded a that important association.

RABAUD RESIGNS AS SYMPHONY LEADER

He Will Be Succeeded by Pierre Monteux

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition.

Photo by Mishkin

PIERRE MONTEUX

His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged as conductor. Mr Monteaux' remarkable results, when he conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts last Autumn, in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr Rabaud, are well remembered. His was handicapped by the difficult task of training a newly constituted personnel, and by a small number of concerts to reward his labors—the epidemic made it necessary to cancel two of the four pairs of concerts which he was to conduct in Boston. Nevertheless, the fine tonal balance and quality of ensemble which he elicited from a still comparatively strange organization, was a subject of general remark.

Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, was a member of the orchestra of the Opera Comique, and became much occupied in chamber music playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard.

In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and conducted at the Boston Opera House.

In the Summer of 1917 he conducted a series of concerts in New York, and the following Autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The news of Mr Rabaud's decision to return home will undoubtedly be received with real regret by the musical public of this country. To his musicianship, his industry, and his notable results, both orchestra and public are indebted. He will conduct seven more concerts in America, three pairs at Symphony Hall on April 18, 19, April 26 (afternoon and evening) and May 2, 3. The other concert will take place in Cambridge April 24.

The farewell concerts in Boston abound in events of interest. Tomorrow and Saturday Raoul Laparra, the spirited French composer, will play the piano part in his new orchestral suite, "A Basque Sunday." Mr Rabaud will also conduct, by request, Ceasar Franck's great symphony, which has not been heard in Boston under his leadership. At the 23d pair of concerts he will conduct his own "Second Symphony," generally accounted his master work.

REDUCTION RATIO

15x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 1.1 1.25 1.4 1.6 1.8

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

RECORD, MAY 1,

Keeps Pop Concert Music "Full of Pep"

CONDUCTOR JACCHIA

POPS SEASON WITH JACCHIA OPENS MONDAY

By J. V. CLARK

Serious music ends its season Saturday night; light music holds sway again starting Monday. The season of symphony concerts will close with the concerts of this week, when Mr. Rabaud will say adieu to Boston, where he has become extremely popular.

A Macdowell suite and Saint-Saens' "Lyre and Harp" will complete the program. In the Saint-Saens work the orchestra will be assisted by a large chorus and these soloists: Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath.

The Pops season is awaited with the greatest pleasure by thousands of persons who find the light music and the lighter (especially this year) refreshments ideal entertainment for the spring and early summer months. The Pops, musically speaking, have never been more attractive than at the present time.

Mr. Jacchia is just the man to lead these concerts. He makes good, diversified programs. He conducts much music with authority. Best of all he has the "pep," which keeps these popular concerts full of sparkle.

On his programs stand part of such interesting works as "Scheherezade." Why not these works in their complete form? The audiences, we feel sure, would welcome them.

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 22.

For the first time this spring, a nationalized programme will be heard this evening at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall, while, better still, Mr. Jacchia, sufficiently recovered, is expected to conduct in it. All the chosen pieces are Russian, with Chaikowsky almost inevitably the predominating composer. The list stands:

March from "A Night in Egypt".....Arensky
Waltz, "Dornröschen".....Chaikowsky
Prelude in C-sharp Minor.....Rakhmaninov
Overture, "1812".....Chaikowsky
Two Numbers from the Ballet, "Peramus":
(Torch Dance; Wedding March).....Rubinstein
Orientale .....Cui
Allegretto Grazioso ("The Waltz that Never Waltzes") from the "Pathetic Symphony".....Chaikowsky
Finale (Festival and Shipwreck) from the Suite, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky Korsakov
Slav March.....Chaikowsky
Volga Boatmen's Song, "Ay Ukhnem".....
Bacchanale from the Ballet, "The Seasons," Polonaise, from the Opera, "Eugène Onégin"
.....Chaikowsky

RECORD, MAY 17,

Third Week of Pops

In defiance of prohibition and pessimism, the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall enter upon their third week in a thriving state. It is now proven that music and not alcohol is the vital sap at the Pops, and that lighter things to drink may do their part. Moreover, not before civilization itself totters will the Pops yield to the anti-Tobacco League.

Tuesday, May 20, the Temple Israel has engaged the entire floor to entertain the Union of Congregations and Federation of Temple Sisterhoods who are holding their national convention in Boston May 19-22.

Thursday, May 22, has a Russian program, and Friday is Roxbury Latin School Night.

appearing on the concert programmes. Among these are the Bach Double Concerto, perhaps one of the noblest of Bach's works written by the master, the famous Moszkowski suite and others.

—o—o—o—o—o—o—

OPENING WEEK OF POPS

Tomorrow night the Pops will begin, and henceforth on all but Sunday evenings for a period of 10 weeks Symphony Hall will be the scene of lively activity from 8 to 11.

Mr. Agide Jacchia enters upon his third season at the helm of the Pops orchestra, transformed from an operatic conductor of the purest Italian sort into an all-round symphonist. Not only has he learned to catch the spirit of a symphonic suite, a rousing march, or—what is hardest of all—a Viennese waltz—his interest in this side of music is as extensive as his repertory. Mr. Jacchia believes so strongly in cosmopolitanism in music that no wave of propaganda moves him; he not only believes, but has proved that the term "popular music" may include all kinds. Every mood in the gamut of human emotion has its popular aspect, and so has every species of music. There is music of "fibre" on every one of Mr. Jacchia's programmes, and that music by no means brings less applause.

Two nights (Tuesday and Thursday) have been appropriated by the Liberty Loan committee and a number of the 14th Engineers, respectively. However, the Milliners' night, Wednesday, May 7, will be a public affair, and all comers may watch lemonade disappearing under the latest styles in hats, while they listen to a special programme dedicated to the sex that wears them, ranging from "The Queen of Sheba" to "Mademoiselle Modiste." The programmes of the opening week follow:

Opening night, Monday, May 5:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Pastorale for wind octet.....D. Scarlatti
Capriccio for strings.....(1685-1757)
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso .....Mendelssohn
Large solo a, "Idyll"
b, "Spanish Dance".....Holy
Rhapsodie .....Hungarian Weerkerk
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Queen of Medea".....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, MILLINERS' NIGHT.

March and Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Les Sirenes".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
'Cello solo, "The Swan".....Saint-Saens
(Mr. Georges Miquelle)
Children's Parade.....van Westerhout
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Mademoiselle Modiste".....Herbert
Reve Angelique .....Rubinstein
Waltz, Wine, Women and Song".....Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar

FRIDAY, MAY 9.

Coronation March from "Prophet".Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Madrigal (Orchestrated by Mr. Jacchia)
.....Carini (1545-1614)
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Roumanian Rhapsody .....Enescu
Organ solo, "Cantabile".....Franck
(Mr. Lynwood W. Sawa.)
Giga for wind octet.....van Westerhout
"Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Sinbad".....Romberg
Waltz, "La Rumeur".....Waldteufel
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin-Jacchia
Introduction to Act III, of "Lohengrin"
.....Wagner

SATURDAY, MAY 10.

March, "Entrance of the Gladiators"...Fucik
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Minuet .....Puccini
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2.....Bizet
Violin solo, "Souvenir de Moscow".Wieniawski
(Mr. Jacques Jacobs)
"Romanza".....Martucci
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
Rondo d'Amour.....van Westerhout
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

—o—o—o—o—o—o—

Mr. Grenville Vernon, who has written Atlantic articles on Russian and Polish music in the columns of the New York Tribune, recently penned a witty and a just estimate of the talents of that cosmopolitan but essentially American creation, Miss Mary Garden, as follows:

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

WARM FAREWELLS FOR MR. RABAUD DEPARTING

Public and Semi-Private Tokens of Large Good-Will and High Appreciation—An Inauspicious and Slender Programme Divided Between MacDowell's Woodland Suite and Saint-Saens's Boresome Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp"—Musically, a Thin Afternoon

Of all conductors of his time Mr. Rabaud is surely the most modest, the most self-effacing. Yesterday, leading for the last time at an afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra, he took leave of one-half of his Bostonian public. This evening he will similarly farewell the other half. Now, Mr. Rabaud excels with the romantic music of French composers of the nineteenth century—of Berlioz, of Franck, of Lalo or Chabrier, of d'Indy in his earlier manner. Yet no such piece stood upon his programme for this final pair of concerts. Mr. Rabaud succeeds well with the highly colored, sharply rhythmed music of the Russians, like Rimsky-Korsakov; but he found no room for them in his list. Mr. Rabaud has read one or two symphonies of Beethoven—the fifth, say, or the sixth—penetratingly, warmly and has projected it largely, eloquently upon his hearers; yet no such number rounded out his year with the Boston Orchestra. It has been the nearly unvarying custom of his predecessors to signalize in some fashion the final concerts of a season. Yet as Mr. Rabaud assembled the programme and as conductor, orchestra, chorus and soloists accomplished it, yesterday afternoon was a routine that most of the preceding Friday afternoons from November into this May have escaped.

MacDowell's Suite in A minor, the music of woodland imagery, began the concert. It is a novel, fanciful, tuneful piece that is thinning fast under the wear of time and change. It taxed neither conductor nor orchestra; the audience listened with very pleasure to measures that might have come from Mendelssohn, less Mendelssohn's skill and imagination with instrumental color as such color went in his day. The rest of the concert fell to Saint-Saens's setting of Hugo's Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," the dullest bore that has been heard at the Symphony Concerts in all Mr. Rabaud's year. Again conductor, orchestra, chorus and soloists acquitted themselves ably, but they could not gild vanize into semblance of life a mechanical and withered music. Patient and balcony-ties did their best to listen with interest, but before the Ode was half done, they yawned over this sandpapered Mendelssohn à la Francaise. A. D. 1879. Mr. Rabaud might becomingly have arranged these final concerts as epitome of his own abilities shining through French and German classics or semi-classics. Instead, he seemingly "consecrated" them to the greater glory of the dead-and-gone Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, disguised in the one instance as Edward MacDowell, American of Wiesbaden, and in the other as Camille Saint-Saëns, Frenchman of Paris. It has been occasional reproach to some of Mr. Rabaud's programmes that he pretty-fied them with trivial, scrappy pieces, although he, a conductor somewhat elderly in mind, though not in body, were providing "restful" entertainment for the elderly companies that hear and especially admire him. Trivial certainly were the two numbers of yesterday, but for the first time in all the year's experience of Mr. Rabaud, one and the longer, was downright dull. Yet manifestly the concert of Friday and the concert of today made double occasion for one of his usually stimulating lists. Truly, the departing conductor is a self-abnegating man.

Yet with reason, the audience was not to be balked in its desire to testify its regard for Mr. Rabaud and its appreciation of the difficult work in a troubled time that he has accomplished, loyally, ably, without thought of self. It hailed him warmly when he came first to his place. At the end of MacDowell's Suite, it applauded conductor and orchestra as though they had just brought a masterpiece to revelling and enhancing voice. It did its best to clap the numbers in Saint-Saëns's Ode and fairly seized such occasion for plaudits as Mr. Werrenrath's profound singing, for example, yielded. At the end of the concert, it repeatedly recalled Mr. Rabaud, while players, singers and hearers stood and some, even, shouted their farewells. Finally, after the audience had departed, a semi-private ceremony crowned the afternoon. Marshalled by Mr. and Mrs. Townsend and by Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, the Symphony Chorus gathered in the foyer behind the lower balcony and, with the Judge for spokesman, gave Mr. Rabaud a silver cup, adding thereto a silver pitcher for Mme. Rabaud in distant Paris. The little ceremony was simple, sincere and deftly ordered. The more for this happy circumstance was the conductor plainly touched. What other tokens await him of the regard of his coworkers and his hearers, later incident may disclose and later record may tell.

Mr. Rabaud—a man of fine feeling in all things, except possibly his shadings of the German classics—paid his Bostonian public an agreeable and unobtrusive compliment when he divided his final programme between an American and a French composer. He was as happily prompted when he chose for the one our semi-classic MacDowell and for the other his own canonized Saint-Saëns. With one exception, however, MacDowell's orchestral pieces do not shine beside his "masterworks"—the more eloquent pianoforte Sonatas, for example. That exception is his "Indian Suite"—music that every European conductor at work in America has warmly and justly admired for richness of invention, energy of progress, largeness of mood, warmth of imagery, pictorial and poetic quality. In it and it only of MacDowell's orchestral pieces does the execution match the unfolding design, the prompting impulses. It is also music in which Mr. Rabaud, by many a token, would have been stirring to hear.

Instead the conductor chose the earlier Suite of forest scene and fairy suggestion. Throughout, it is mellifluous music that sometimes barely escapes naïveté of tune and that once and again courts a transparent prettiness perilously near to that of operetta. If these melodies run brief and thin they also run gracefully fancifully. While here and there a gentle wistfulness, a mystical mood, a glimpse of woodland vision agreeably colors or inflects them. Indeed in the Finale of the revel of the Forest Spirits, MacDowell is close to light brilliance. Even in the days in which the Suite was new—the musically easy-going eighties that seemed to haunt Mr. Rabaud in this final programme—the harmonic and instrumental coloring ran none to rich. Now, to ears accustomed in such things to sensuous opulence or to the bitter that is bitter-sweet, it sounds thin, pinching, as though the composer were painting in water-color on a cardboard letting the white paper show. Yet by these short cunnings, this woodland music is more characteristic of the usual MacDowell—say of the songs and the lighter of piano pieces than of the composer who was above his normal self in the finer Sonatas and who wrought his one tour de force in the "Indian Suite." Pretty pastime to hear so much these forest scenes, and a pretty shimmer of tone, polish of phrase, and lightness of accent did orchestra and conductor bring to them.

At the least MacDowell's his Suite was mildly amusing; while Saint-Saëns in his Ode was neither more nor less than bore-some. Pleasantly anticipating "The Lyre and the Harp," curious listeners wonder why, at home in Paris and abroad in all Europe and America, the music had been heard so seldom in the forty years of nonhal existence. It had not improved in many measures before they discovered it plainly the grounds for this seeming neglect. Thereafter, theirs not to reason why it was resurrected at the Symphony Concerts; theirs but to marvel at the unctuous listeners upon an otherwise indignant occasion. To the technician, course, Saint-Saëns is always interesting. Not a composer of his time has any working means of music so readily at fingers' ends, uses them so expertly, and his efforts so precisely fascinate and variously his tonal lures—a tinting rather than a glamour lack of adjustable white polished stairs to hide inner recesses. Apt indeed in "The Lyre and the Harp" Saint-Saëns, conceiving of the choral part round rim the phrases, smooth are the events, clear the rhythms. A measured, exacting yet strongly grateful music for choir, even as was Mendelssohn's. Yet the choir, even as was Mendelssohn's, is a choir of well-made parts, the voices, the voice-singers, chastely disposing their voices, insinuating to their hearers phrasing and thematic varied in the high-mark color. The orchestra plays a soft low-voiced, sustainedly melodious prelude, previously an invention of Hugo's, a lovely piece of poetic vision. The clarinets are returns with true Gallic grace, the end. For an hour between, it accordingly and artfully accompanies the singing voices.

The text is a well-made, perfunctory, [illegible] and withering music. Hugo's [illegible] in the original French is no masterpiece. Yielding verses in pedestrian translation into English it narrowly escapes banality, but in either it does contrast the serene, pagan ideal of gods and men, life and fate with the darker Deity of the Hebrews, a single graven belief and practice of the seasons of Jehovah. It is possible to write the Ode set in long duet for two voices in one of which should speak the Greco-Roman lyre, in the other the lyre of Israel. Saint-Saëns, unpoetically, did Saint-Saëns take thought of these suggestive obligations. To him the higher duty was to build his consolation from the Birmingham festival and provide a succession of vocal and orchestral "[illegible]" Bringing to the assembled Britons as chorus and solo-singers ran them off as skilfully and conventionally. He has written his string of pieces, in spite of the prescription, conscientiously, but with a polite disdain for either the clear substance of the inter-instruction of the text. For once he has decided even to be appropriate. The pagan notion of death comes through a Federo. Loves and hates speak the same artificial accents; the voice of the lyre and the voice of the harp are equally polished, perfectly, indistinguishable.

As Saint-Saëns delivered his Ode to the Birmingham Festival in the summer of 1879 exactly according to contract, so conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo-singers delivered it to the audience yesterday. The orchestra returned plastic accompaniment; clarity, warmth and plancy of tone, smoothness of phrase, exactness of rhythm, niceties of shading and of diction—all the choral virtues in short—commended Mr. Townsend's choir; while one and all—Mmes. Kline and Alcock, Mr. Hackett and Mr. Werrenrath were as smooth and elegant with their solo or concerted measures as Saint-Saëns could have wished. Now and then, but far too infrequently through this drawing-room entertainment emerged the Rabaud, whom on other and more auspicious days, his audience had shown as masterful conductor of masterpieces. As such it was sincerely requiting and speeding him.

H. T. F.

MONITOR, MAY

MR. HENRI RABAUD REORGANIZER

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—On the stage of the Academy of Music, in Brooklyn, New York, a tall, whiskered, quiet, unassuming, obliging gentleman stepped out from the wings with the intention of thanking the orchestra players for their part in making a success of the presentation of his opera. He found himself in front of the footlights, and back of the footlights an applauding audience waiting to extend its congratulations to the composer for whom it had been calling.

Had Mr. Rabaud known that this was what he had to face, he never would have stepped from the wings. Mr. Monteux, the conductor, knew this, and only by the ruse of telling the composer of "Marouf" that he thought the musicians would appreciate a few words from him was he able to persuade him to step on to the stage.

This is the same man who, later, in Boston, when his own symphony was to be played by the orchestra which he conducted, said in reply to a question as to when he would rehearse it, "I do not think it will require much rehearsal. I know it; the men are fine players, and I do not like to trouble them with rehearsing my own work."

It was only at the earnest request of numerous patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts that Mr. Rabaud was persuaded to put this symphony on a program at all. It is interesting to record that at both performances of it audience and orchestra rose spontaneously to their feet as a tribute to the genius of the composer.

This is the sort of man whom future historians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have to place alongside of Sir George Henschel, who got the first band of players together, and William Gericke, who left a reputation as a hard drillmaster, but who gave the orchestra its ideal of precise playing which it has never lost and which now distinguishes it among the orchestras of the world.

Mr. Rabaud must be considered as reorganizer of this orchestra, for he came at a time when a Teutonic pilot had been dropped, and his task it was to steer the craft past dangerous shoals of threatening mediocrity and into the safe waters of Gallic eclecticism. The trustees of the orchestra wisely insisted that the conductor for the present season must be a Frenchman. They have made the same wise decision regarding next season's incumbent, Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Monteux, coming back as the regular conductor to the orchestra which he took in hand temporarily, will find a very different organization. During the months in which Mr. Rabaud has been working with it, drilling, correcting, coordinating, and inspiring, he has gradually changed rigidity to plasticity, and coldness to warmth. There remains, however, much for Mr. Monteux to do. There are still in the orchestra many men technically American citizens whose training and sympathies are German. It was Mr. Rabaud's task to change the ideals of the organization; it will be Mr. Monteux's duty to see that there is no lapse.

Naturally, in programs of the season the French school has predominated. Of the 101 compositions presented, only 23 were by German composers, and these were of the classics. Forty-eight compositions, almost half the total number, were of the French school; the rest were divided among Americans, Italians, Russians, and Scandinavians. Such a list cannot help but have given the audiences who have heard the concerts an appreciation of French music. The drilling and rehearsing must, like wise, have had an effect on the playing of the orchestra as a whole. Mr. Rabaud's work as reorganizer, therefore, is to be measured in terms of men and instruments, but by that dimensions with which one gauges ideals, and those are things whose force is cumulative.

Mr. Rabaud Ends His S[illegible]

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—[illegible] day afternoon concert of the [illegible]ing pair of the Boston Symphony [illegible]chestra's season was made memo[illegible] by the warmth of the greeting [illegible]corded Mr. Rabaud, both before and after the program, and by the presentation to him of a cup by the chorus which has assisted at the concerts. The presentation took place at a reception with Major Higginson, founder of the orchestra; Judge Cabot, the president of the board of trustees, Mr. Rabaud, and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Townsend receiving. Judge Cabot made the presentation speech, expressing the appreciation of the conductor's efforts with orchestra and chorus and Mr. Rabaud responded feelingly. There was also a gift for Mrs. Rabaud which consisted of a duplicate of Paul Revere pitcher in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

The feature of the final concert, the thirty-eighth symphony concert, was the performance for the first time in Boston of Saint-Saëns' "The Lyre and the Harp," a setting of Victor Hugo's ode for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. This is an "order" composition, written for the Birmingham Festival of 1879. Nearly 40 years ago, Mr. Jordan produced the work in Providence (Rhode Island, for the first time in the country, and shortly after there was a performance in the old Music Hall, New York. Since then, for some reason, "The Lyre and the Harp" has not been heard until the present [illegible]

On a first hearing, the general impression is that it is better than the usual "order" composition, as a whole, not in Saint-Saëns's usual manner. "The work is divided into a dozen sections, or stanzas, with orchestral prologue, and epilogue. Some of the sections are choral, others, for solo voices, and one for vocal quartet. The accompaniment, including two harps, and also a large use of the organ, as might be expected, for was not Saint-Saëns one of the greatest organists of his time and was not the work written for an occasion where the organ is an evidence?

The prologue, or as stated, prelude, opens, mainly with organ solo, with the gradual addition of the orchestra. The first chorus is continuous in character and well worked out. Some of the succeeding solo numbers are without especial distinction, but the tenor solo, with chorus, "God, the monarch of all creation," is especially interesting. Unfortunately the gem of the whole work is the baritone solo "Be glad! The stream overflowed, channel sounding," a sort of vocal minuet, with dainty orchestration. The epilogue for chorus makes a good ending.

The soloists were Olive Kline, soprano, Merle Alcock, contralto, Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone. The did well, individually and collectively, although some of the solo numbers were not interesting from a melodic standpoint. The chorus trained by Stephen Townsend was admirable as to voice and volume. And whether or not one would enjoy a second hearing, it must be said that the performance as a whole was superb at all points.

The other part of the program included "The Saint" A score by Mac[illegible]. The five little numbers are [illegible] in their way, and the performance was in a truly fine manner, as Mr. Rabaud bade farewell to his own laurels as a composer.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

RECORD, MAY 1,

Keeps Pop Concert Music "Full of Pep"

CONDUCTOR JACCHIA

POPS SEASON WITH JACCHIA OPENS MONDAY

By J. V. CLARK

Serious music ends its season Saturday night; light music holds sway again starting Monday. The season of symphony concerts will close with the concerts of this week, when Mr. Rabaud will say adieu to Boston, where he has become extremely popular.

A Macdowell suite and Saint-Saens' "Lyre and Harp" will complete the program. In the Saint-Saens work the orchestra will be assisted by a large chorus and these soloists: Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath.

The Pops season is awaited with the greatest pleasure by thousands of persons who find the light music and the lighter (especially this year) refreshments ideal entertainment for the spring and early summer months. The Pops, musically, speaking, have never been more attractive than at the present time.

Mr. Jacchia is just the man to lead these concerts. He makes good, diversified programs. He conducts much music with authority. Best of all he has the "pep," which keeps these popular concerts full of sparkle.

On his programs stand part of such interesting works as "Scheherezade." Why not these works in their complete form? The audiences, we feel sure, would welcome them.

TRANSCRIPT MAY 22,

For the first time this spring, a nationalized programme will be heard this evening at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall, while, better still, Mr. Jacchia, sufficiently recovered, is expected to conduct in it. All the chosen pieces are Russian, with Chaikowsky almost inevitably the predominating composer. The list stands:

March from "A Night in Egypt".....Arensky
Waltz, "Dornröschen".....Chaikovsky
Prelude in C-sharp Minor.....Rakhmaninov
Overture, "1812".....Chaikovsky
Two Numbers from the Ballet, "Feramors" Rubinstein
(Torch Dance; Wedding March)
Orientale.....Cui
Allegretto Grazioso ("The Waltz that Never Waltzes") from the "Pathetic Symphony".....Chaikovsky
Finale (Festival and Shipwreck) from the Suite, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Slav March.....Chaikovsky
Volga Boatmen's Song, "Ay Ouchem"
Bacchanale from the Ballet, "The Seasons," Glazunov
Polonaise from the Opera, "Eugène Onégin" Chaikovsky

RECORD, MAY 17,

Third Week of Pops

In defiance of prohibition and pessimism, the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall enter upon their third week in a thriving state. It is now proven that music and not alcohol is the vital sap at the Pops, and that lighter things to drink may do their part. Moreover, not before civilization itself totters will the Pops yield to the anti-Tobacco League.

Tuesday, May 20, the Temple Israel has engaged the entire floor to entertain the Union of Congregations and Federation of Temple Sisterhoods who are holding their national convention in Boston May 19-22.

Thursday, May 22, has a Russian program, and Friday is Roxbury Latin School Night.

appearing on concert programmes. Among these are the Bach Double Concerto, probably one of the noblest of the violin works written by the master, the famous Moszkowski suite and others.

OPENING WEEK OF POPS

Tomorrow night the Pops will begin, and henceforth on all but Sunday evenings for a period of 10 weeks Symphony Hall will be the scene of lively activity from 8 to 11.

Mr. Agide Jacchia enters upon his third season at the helm of the Pops orchestra, transformed from an operatic conductor of the purest Italian sort into an all-round symphonist. Not only has he learned to catch the spirit of a symphonic suite, a rousing march, or—what is hardest of all—a Viennese waltz—his interest in this side of music is as extensive as his repertory. Mr. Jacchia believes so strongly in cosmopolitanism in music that no wave of propaganda moves him; he not only believes, but has proved that the term "popular music" may include all kinds. Every mood in the gamut of human emotion has its popular aspect, and so has every species of music. There is music of "fibre" on every one of Mr. Jacchia's programmes, and that music by no means brings less applause.

Two nights (Tuesday and Thursday) have been appropriated by the Liberty Loan committee and a number of the 14th Engineers, respectively. However, the Milliners' night, Wednesday, May 7, will be a public affair, and all comers may watch lemonade disappearing under the latest styles in hats, while they listen to a special programme dedicated to the sex that wears them, ranging from "The Queen of Sheba" to "Mademoiselle Modiste." The programmes of the opening week follow:

Opening night, Monday, May 5:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Pastorale for wind octet.....D. Scarlatti
Capriccio for strings.....(1685-1757)
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo a. "Idyll"
b. "Spanish Dance".....Holy
Enfantillage.....van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, MILLINERS' NIGHT.

March and Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"..Nicolai
Waltz, "Les Sirenes".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
'Cello solo, "The Swan".....Saint-Saens
(Mr. Georges Miquelle)
Children's Parade.....van Westerhout
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Mademoiselle Modiste"....Herbert
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song".....Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar

FRIDAY, MAY 9.

Coronation March, from "Propbet".Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Madrigal (Orchestrated by Mr. Jacchia) Cacini (1545-1614)
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Rumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Organ solo, "Cantabile".....Franck
(Mr. Albert W. Snow.)
Giga for wind octet.....van Westerhout
"Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Sinbad".....Romberg
Waltz, "La Bacarole".....Waldteufel
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin-Jacchia
Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin" Wagner

SATURDAY, MAY 10.

March, "Entrance of the Gladiators"..Fucik
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Minuet.....Puccini
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2.....Bizet
Violin solo, "Souvenir de Moscou".Wieniawski
(Mr. Jacques Hoffmann.)
"Romanza".....Martucci
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
Rondo d'Amour.....van Westerhotu
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Grenville Vernon, who has written brilliantly and with penetration about music in the columns of the New York Tribune, recently penned a witty and a just estimate of the talents of that cosmopolitan but essentially American creation, Miss Mary Garden, as follows:

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

WARM FAREWELLS FOR MR. RABAUD DEPARTING

Public and Semi-Private Tokens of Large Good-Will and High Appreciation—An Inauspicious and Slender Programme Divided Between MacDowell's Woodland Suite and Saint-Saens's Boresome Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp"—Musically, a Thin Afternoon

OF all conductors of his time Mr. Rabaud is surely the most modest, the most self-effacing. Yesterday, leading for the last time at an afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra, he took leave of one-half of his Bostonian public. This evening he will similarly farewell the other half. Now, Mr. Rabaud excels with the romantic music of French composers of the nineteenth century—of Berlioz, of Franck, of Lalo or Chabrier, of d'Indy in his earlier manner. Yet no such piece stood upon his programme for this final pair of concerts. Mr. Rabaud succeeds well with the highly colored, sharply rhythmed music of the Russians, like Rimsky-Korsakov; but he found no room for them in his list. Mr. Rabaud has read one or two symphonies of Beethoven—the fifth, say, or the sixth—penetratingly, warmly and has projected it largely, eloquently upon his hearers; yet no such number rounded out his year with the Boston Orchestra. It has been the nearly unvarying custom of his predecessor to signalize in some fashion the final concerts of a season. Yet as Mr. Rabaud assembled the programme and as conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo-singers accomplished it, yesterday afternoon ran in a routine that most of the preceding Fridays from November unto this May have escaped.

MacDowell's Suite in A minor—the music of woodland imagery—began the concert. It is a pretty, fanciful, tuneful piece that is thinning fast under the wear of time and change. It taxed neither conductor nor orchestra; the audience listened with easy pleasure to measures that might have come from Mendelssohn, less Mendelssohn's skill and imagination with instrumental color as such color went in his day. The rest of the concert fell to Saint-Saëns's setting of Hugo's Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," the dullest music that has been heard at the Symphony Concerts in all Mr. Rabaud's year. Again conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo quartet acquitted themselves ably, but they could not galvanize into semblance of life a mechanical and withered music. Parquet and balconies did their best to listen with interest, but before the Ode was half done, they yawned over this sandpapered Mendelssohn à la Française, A. D. 1879. Mr. Rabaud might becomingly have arranged these final concerts as epitome of his own abilities shining through French and German classics or semi-classics. Instead, he seemingly "consecrated" them to the greater glory of the dead-and-gone Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, disguised in the one instance as Edward MacDowell, American of Wiesbaden, and in the other as Camille Saint-Saëns, Frenchman of Paris. It has been occasional reproach to some of Mr. Rabaud's programmes that he prettyfied them with trivial, scrappy pieces, as though he, a conductor somewhat elderly in mind, though not in body, were providing "restful" entertainment for the elderly companies that hear and especially admire him. Trivial certainly were the two numbers of yesterday, but for the first time in all the year's experience of Mr. Rabaud, one and the longer, was downright dull. Yet manifestly the concert of Friday and the concert of today made double occasion for one of his usually stimulating lists. Truly, the departing conductor is a self-abnegating man.

Yet with reason, the audience was not to be balked in its desire to testify its regard for Mr. Rabaud and its appreciation of the difficult work in a troubled time that he has accomplished, loyally, ably, without thought of self. It hailed him warmly when he came first to his place. At the end of MacDowell's Suite, it applauded conductor and orchestra as though they had just brought a masterpiece to revealing and enhancing voice. It did its best to clap the numbers in Saint-Saëns's Ode and fairly seized such occasion for plaudits as Mr. Werrenrath's orotund singing, for example, yielded. At the end of the concert, it repeatedly recalled Mr. Rabaud, while players, singers and hearers stood and some, even, shouted their farewells. Finally, after the audience had departed, a semi-private ceremony crowned the afternoon. Marshalled by Mr. and Mrs. Townsend and by Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, the Symphony Chorus gathered in the foyer behind the lower balcony and, with the Judge for spokesman, gave Mr. Rabaud a silver cup, adding therto a silver pitcher for Mme. Rabaud in distant Paris. The little ceremony was simple, sincere and deftly ordered. The more for this happy circumstance was the conductor plainly touched. What other tokens await him of the regard of his coworkers and his hearers, later incident may disclose and later record may tell.

Mr. Rabaud—a man of fine feeling in all things, except possibly his shadings of the German classics—paid his Bostonian public an agreeable and unobtrusive compliment when he divided his final programme between an American and a French composer. [illegible] happily prompted when he chose and instrumental coloring ran none to rich. Now, to ears accustomed in suc things to sensuous opulence or to the bit that is bitter-sweet, it sounds thin, pind ing, as though the composer were paintin in water-color and occasionally letting th white paper show. Yet by these short comings, this woodland music is mor characteristic of the usual MacDowell-say of the songs and the lesser of piano pieces than of the composer who was abov his normal self in the finer Sonatas an who wrought his one tour de force in th "Indian Suite." Pretty pastime to hear re main these forest scenes, and a pretty shimmer of tone, polish of phrase, an lightness of accent did orchestra and con ductor bring to them.

At the least MacDowell in his Suite wa mildly amusing; while Saint-Saëns in hi Ode was neither more nor less than bor some. Pleasantly anticipating "The Lyr and the Harp," curious listeners wonder why, at home in Paris and abroad in bo Europe and America, the music had bee heard so seldom in the forty years of nom nal existence. It had not proceeded f many measures before they discovered t plainly the grounds for this seeming ne lect. Thereafter, theirs not to reason wh it was resurrected at the Symphony Co certs; theirs but to do—if not to die— courteous listeners upon an otherwise b nignant occasion. To the technician, course, Saint-Saëns is always interestin Not a composer of his time has eve working means of music so readily at h fingers' ends, uses them so expertly, gai his effects so precisely, lays on so neat and variously his tonal brush-work, le ting artifice glamor lack of animatio while polished surfaces hide inner hollow Apt indeed in "The Lyre and the Harp" Saint-Saëns's weaving of the choral part round run the phrases, smooth are the a cents, clear the rhythms. A measurab exacting yet steadily grateful music to th choir, even as was Mendelssohn's befo him. As well-made are the numbers f the solo-singers, chastely displayful their voices, ingratiating to their hearer pleasurably and piquantly varied in rhyth march, color. The orchestra plays a sho low-voiced, sustainedly melodious prelude presumably, an invocation of Hugo's a mosphere of poetic vision. To like mea ures it returns with true Gallic logic, the end. For an hour between, it di creetly and artfully accompanies the sin ing voices.

The rest is a well-made, perfuncto brittle and withering music. Hugo's O in the original French is no masterpiece visioning verse; in pedestrian translat into English it narrowly escapes banalit but in either it does contrast the sensuo pagan ideal of gods and men, life and fait with the sterner Deity of the Hebrews, a the graven belief and practice of the se vants of Jehovah. It is possible to co ceive the Ode set in long duet for t voices in one of which should speak t Greco-Roman lyre, in the other the ha of David. Little, apparently, did Sai Saëns take thought of these suggestio obligations. To him the higher duty was to fulfill his commission from the Birmingham festival and provide a succession of viable and effective "Morceaux" pleasing to the assembled Britons as chorus and solo-singers ran them off as skilfully and conventionally. He has written his string of pieces, according to prescription and predilection, but with a polite disdain for either the clear substance or the inner implication of the text. For once he has declined even to be appropriate. The pagan notion of death smiles through a Bolero. Loves and hates speak the same artificial accents; the voice of the lyre and the voice of the harp are equally polished, perfunctory, indistinguishable.

As Saint-Saëns delivered his Ode to the Birmingham Festival in the summer of 1879 exactly according to contract, so conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo-singers delivered it to the audience yesterday. The orchestra returned plastic accompaniment; clarity, warmth and pliancy of tone, smoothness of phrase, exactness of rhythm, niceties of shading and of diction—all the choral virtues in short—commended Mr. Townsend's choir; while one and all—Mmes. Kline and Alcock, Mr. Hackett and Mr. Werrenrath were as smooth and elegant with their solo or concerted measures as Saint-Saëns could have wished. Now and then, but far too infrequently through this drawing-room entertainment emerged the Rabaud, whom on other and more auspicious days, his audience had known as masterful conductor of masterpieces. As such it was sincerely requiting and speeding him.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, MAY

MR. HENRI RABAUD REORGANIZER

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — On th stage of the Academy of Music, i Brooklyn, New York, a tall, bewhis kered, quiet, unassuming, obligin gentleman stepped out from the wing with the intention of thanking th orchestra players for their part i making a success of the presentatio of his opera. He found himself i front of the footlights, and back o the footlights an applauding audi ence waiting to extend its congratula tions to the composer for whom it had been calling.

Had Mr. Rabaud known that this was what he had to face, he never would have stepped from the wings. Mr. Monteux, the conductor, knew this, and only by the ruse of telling the composer of "Marouf" that he thought the musicians would appreciate a few words from him was he able to persuade him to step on to the stage.

This is the same man who, later, in Boston, when his own symphony was to be played by the orchestra which he conducted, said in reply to a question as to when he would rehearse it, "I do not think it will require much rehearsal. I know it; the men are fine players, and I do not like to trouble them with rehearsing my own work."

It was only at the earnest request of numerous patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts that Mr. Rabaud was persuaded to put this symphony on a program at all. It is interesting to record that at both performances of it audience and orchestra rose spontaneously to their feet as a tribute to the genius of the composer.

This is the sort of man whom future historians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have to place alongside of Sir George Henschel, who got the first band of players together, and William Gericke, who left a reputation as a hard drillmaster, but who gave the orchestra its ideal of precise playing which it has never lost and which now distinguishes it among the orchestras of the world.

Mr. Rabaud must be considered as reorganizer of this orchestra, for he came at a time when a Teutonic pilot had been dropped, and his task it was to steer the craft past dangerous shoals of threatening mediocrity and into the safe waters of Gallic electicism. The trustees of the orchestra wisely insisted that the conductor for the present season must be a Frenchman. They have made the same wise decision regarding next season's incumbent, Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Monteux, coming back as the regular conductor to the orchestra which he took in hand temporarily, will find a very different organization. During the months in which Mr. Rabaud has been working with it, drilling, correcting, coordinating, and inspiring, he has gradually changed rigidity to plasticity, and coldness to warmth. There remains, however, much for Mr. Monteux to do. There are still in the orchestra many men technically American citizens whose training and sympathies are German. It was Mr. Rabaud's task to change the ideals of the organization; it will be Mr. Monteux's duty to see that there is no lapse.

Naturally in programs of the season the French school has predominated. Of the 104 compositions presented, only 25 were by German composers, and these were of the classics. Forty-eight compositions, almost half the total number, were of the French school; the rest were divided among Americans, Italians, Russians, and Scandinavians. Such a list cannot help but have given the audiences who have heard the concerts an appreciation of French music. The drilling and rehearsing must likewise have had an effect on the playing of the orchestra as a whole. Mr. Rabaud's work as reorganizer, then, is not to be measured in terms of men and instruments, but by that illusive measure with which one gauges ideals, and those are things whose force is cumulative.

AGIDE JACCHIA ANNOUNCES for the opening of his "Pops" program tonight (Thursday) overture from the opera in which Rosa Penselle made her sensational debut at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, Verdi's "La Forza del Destino." Trust Mr. Jacchia to include in his programs numbers bearing special interest in the events of the day.

MONITOR, MAY

Mr. Rabaud Ends His S

Specially for The Christian Science M

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Th day afternoon concert of the co ing pair of the Boston Symphony chestra's season was made memo by the warmth of the greeting corded Mr. Rabaud, both before after the program, and by the pre tation to him of a cup by the ch which has assisted at two conc The presentation took place at a ception with Major Higginson, founder of the orchestra; Judge C the president of the board of tru Mr. Rabaud, and Mr. and Mrs. St Townsend receiving. Judge made the presentation speech, the appreciation of the condu efforts with orchestra and chorus Mr. Rabaud responded feelin There was also a gift for Mrs. Rab which consisted of a duplicate of Paul Revere pitcher in the Bo Museum of Fine Arts.

The feature of the final concert the thirty-eighth symphony was the performance for the first in Boston of Saint-Saëns' "The L and the Harp," a setting of Vi Hugo's ode for solo voices, chorus orchestra. This is an "order" written for the Birmingham Fe of 1879. Nearly 37 years ago, Jo Jordan produced the work in Pro dence, Rhode Island, for the first in the country, and shortly after was a performance in the old Chick ing Hall, New York. Since then some reason, "The Lyre and the H has not been heard until the pre

On a first hearing, the general pression is, that it is better than usual "order" composition, at a whole, not in Saint-Saëns' tre manner. The work is divid a dozen sections, or stanzas, with orchestral prologue, and cho logue. Some of the sections choral, others, for solo voices, for vocal quartet. The scoring including two harps, and also large use of the organ, as might expected, for was not Saint-Saë of the greatest organists of his and was not the work written for occasion where the organ is evidence?

The prologue, or as stated, prel opens mainly with organ solo, the gradual addition of the orche The first chorus is contrapuntal character and well worked out. S of the succeeding solo numbers without especial distinction, but tenor solo, with chorus, "God, monarch of all creation," pro especially interesting. Undoubted the gem of the whole work is the ba tone solo "Be glad! The stream channel scouring," a sort of vo minuet, with dainty orchestration. T epilogue for chorus makes a qui ending.

The soloists were Olive Kline, prano, Merle Alcock, contralto, Arth Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werre rath, baritone. They did well, ind vidually and collectively, althoug some of the solo numbers were n interesting from a melodic standpoi The chorus trained by Stephen Tow end was admirable as to voice a volume. And whether or not o would enjoy a second hearing, it ca be said that the performance as whole was superb at all points.

The other part of the program in cluded the Suite in A minor by Mac Dowell. The five little movements are gems in their way, and the performa ance was in a truly ideal manner. And so Mr. Rabaud leaves Boston, wit the best wishes of all for a happy life in his own land as a composer-con ductor.

On the afternoon of April [illegible]

CONDUCTOR JACCHIA

POPS SEASON WITH JACCHIA OPENS MONDAY

By J. V. CLARK

Serious music ends its season Saturday night; light music holds sway again starting Monday. The season of symphony concerts will close with the concerts of this week, when Mr. Rabaud will say adieu to Boston, where he has become extremely popular.

A Macdowell suite and Saint-Saens' "Lyre and Harp" will complete the program. In the Saint-Saens work the orchestra will be assisted by a large chorus and these soloists: Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath.

The Pops season is awaited with the greatest pleasure by thousands of persons who find the light music and the lighter (especially this year) refreshments ideal entertainment for the spring and early summer months. The Pops, musically speaking, have never been more attractive than at the present time.

Mr. Jacchia is just the man to lead these concerts. He makes good, diversified programs. He conducts much music with authority. Best of all he has the "pep," which keeps these popular concerts full of sparkle.

On his programs stand part of such interesting works as "Scheherezade." Why not these works in their complete form? The audiences, we feel sure, would welcome them.

TRANSCRIPT MAY 22,

For the first time this spring, a nationalized programme will be heard this evening at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall, while, better still, Mr. Jacchia, sufficiently recovered, is expected to conduct in it. All the chosen pieces are Russian, with Chaikowsky almost inevitably the predominating composer. The list stands:

March from "A Night in Egypt".....Arensky
Waltz, "Dornröschen".....Chaikovsky
Prelude in C-sharp Minor.....Rakhmaninov
Overture, "1812".....Chaikovsky
Two Numbers from the Ballet, "Feramors" Rubinstein
(Torch Dance; Wedding March)
Orientale.....Cui
Allegretto Grazioso ("The Waltz that Never Waltzes") from the "Pathetic Symphony".....Chaikovsky
Finale (Festival and Shipwreck) from the Suite, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Slav March.....Chaikovsky
Volga Boatmen's Song, "Ay Ouchem"....
Bacchanale from the Ballet, "The Seasons," Glazunov
Polonaise from the Opera, "Eugène Onégin" Chaikovsky

RECORD, MAY 17,

Third Week of Pops

In defiance of prohibition and pessimism, the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall enter upon their third week in a thriving state. It is now proven that music and not alcohol is the vital sap at the Pops, and that lighter things to drink may do their part. Moreover, not before civilization itself totters will the Pops yield to the anti-Tobacco League.

Tuesday, May 20, the Temple Israel has engaged the entire floor to entertain the Union of Congregations and Federation of Temple Sisterhoods who are holding their national convention in Boston May 19-22.

Thursday, May 22, has a Russian program, and Friday is Roxbury Latin School Night.

and henceforth on all but Sunday evenings for a period of 10 weeks Symphony Hall will be the scene of lively activity from 8 to 11.

Mr. Agide Jacchia enters upon his third season at the helm of the Pops orchestra, transformed from an operatic conductor of the purest Italian sort into an all-round symphonist. Not only has he learned to catch the spirit of a symphonic suite, a rousing march, or—what is hardest of all—a Viennese waltz—his interest in this side of music is as extensive as his repertory. Mr. Jacchia believes so strongly in cosmopolitanism in music that no wave of propaganda moves him; he not only believes, but has proved that the term "popular music" may include all kinds. Every mood in the gamut of human emotion has its popular aspect, and so has every species of music. There is music of "fibre" on every one of Mr. Jacchia's programmes, and that music by no means brings less applause.

Two nights (Tuesday and Thursday) have been appropriated by the Liberty Loan committee and a number of the 14th Engineers, respectively. However, the Milliners' night, Wednesday, May 7, will be a public affair, and all comers may watch lemonade disappearing under the latest styles in hats, while they listen to a special programme dedicated to the sex that wears them, ranging from "The Queen of Sheba" to "Mademoiselle Modiste." The programmes of the opening week follow:

Opening night, Monday, May 5:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Pastorale for wind octet.....D. Scarlatti
Capriccio for strings.....(1685-1757)
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo a. "Idyll"
b. "Spanish Dance".....Holy
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
'Cello solo, "The Swan".....Saint-Saens
(Mr. Georges Miquelle)
Children's Parado.....van Westerhout
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Mademoiselle Modiste"....Herbert
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song".....Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar

FRIDAY, MAY 9.

Coronation March, from "Prophet".Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Madrigal (Orchestrated by Mr. Jacchia) Cacini (1545-1614)
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Rumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Organ solo, "Cantabile".....Franck
(Mr. Albert W. Snow.)
Giga for wind octet.....van Westerhout
"Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Sinbad".....Romberg
Waltz, "La Bacarole".....Waldteufel
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin-Jacchia
Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin" Wagner

SATURDAY, MAY 10.

March, "Entrance of the Gladiators"..Fucik
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Minuet.....Puccini
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2.....Bizet
Violin solo, "Souvenir de Moscou".Wieniawski
(Mr. Jacques Hoffmann.)
"Romanza".....Martucci
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Intermezzo, Act III, "Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
Rondo d'Amour.....van Westerhotu
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Grenville Vernon, who has written brilliantly and with penetration about music in the columns of the New York Tribune, recently penned a witty and a just estimate of the talents of that cosmopolitan but essentially American creation, Miss Mary Garden, as follows:

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

WARM FAREWELLS FOR MR. RABAUD DEPARTING

Public and Semi-Private Tokens of Large Good-Will and High Appreciation—An Inauspicious and Slender Programme Divided Between MacDowell's Woodland Suite and Saint-Saens's Boresome Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp"—Musically, a Thin Afternoon

OF all conductors of his time Mr. Rabaud is surely the most modest, the most self-effacing. Yesterday, leading for the last time at an afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra, he took leave of one-half of his Bostonian public. This evening he will similarly farewell the other half. Now, Mr. Rabaud excels with the romantic music of French composers of the nineteenth century—of Berlioz, of Franck, of Lalo or Chabrier, of d'Indy in his earlier manner. Yet no such piece stood upon his programme for this final pair of concerts. Mr. Rabaud succeeds well with the highly colored, sharply rhythmed music of the Russians, like Rimsky-Korsakov; but he found no room for them in his list. Mr. Rabaud has read one or two symphonies of Beethoven—the fifth, say, or the sixth—penetratingly, warmly and has projected it largely, eloquently upon his hearers; yet no such number rounded out his year with the Boston Orchestra. It has been the nearly unvarying custom of his predecessor to signalize in some fashion the final concerts of a season. Yet as Mr. Rabaud assembled the programme and as conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo-singers accomplished it, yesterday afternoon ran in a routine that most of the preceding Fridays from November unto this May have escaped.

MacDowell's Suite in A minor—the music of woodland imagery—began the concert. It is a pretty, fanciful, tuneful piece that is thinning fast under the wear of time and change. It taxed neither conductor nor orchestra; the audience listened with easy pleasure to measures that might have come from Mendelssohn, less Mendelssohn's skill and imagination with instrumental color as such color went in his day. The rest of the concert fell to Saint-Saëns's setting of Hugo's Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," the dullest music that has been heard at the Symphony Concerts in all Mr. Rabaud's year. Again conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo quartet acquitted themselves ably, but they could not galvanize into semblance of life a mechanical and withered music. Parquet and balconies did their best to listen with interest, but before the Ode was half done, they yawned over this sandpapered Mendelssohn à la Française, A. D. 1879. Mr. Rabaud might becomingly have arranged these final concerts as epitome of his own abilities shining through French and German classics or semi-classics. Instead, he seemingly "consecrated" them to the greater glory of the dead-and-gone Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, disguised in the one instance as Edward MacDowell, American of Wiesbaden, and in the other as Camille Saint-Saëns, Frenchman of Paris. It has been occasional reproach to some of Mr. Rabaud's programmes that he prettyfied them with trivial, scrappy pieces, as though he, a conductor somewhat elderly in mind, though not in body, were provide example, yielded. At the end of the concert, it repeatedly recalled Mr. Rabaud, while players, singers and hearers stood and some, even, shouted their farewells. Finally, after the audience had departed, a semi-private ceremony crowned the afternoon. Marshalled by Mr. and Mrs. Townsend and by Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, the Symphony Chorus gathered in the foyer behind the lower balcony and, with the judge for spokesman, gave Mr. Rabaud a silver cup, adding thereto a silver pitcher for Mme. Rabaud in distant Paris. The little ceremony was simple, sincere and deftly ordered. The more for this happy circumstance was the conductor plainly touched. What other tokens await him of the regard of his coworkers and his hearers, later incident may disclose and later record may tell.

Mr. Rabaud—a man of fine feeling in all things, except possibly his shadings of the German classics—paid his Bostonian public an agreeable and unobtrusive compliment when he divided his final programme between an American and a French composer. He was as happily prompted when he chose for the one our semi-classic MacDowell and for the other his own canonized Saint-Saëns. With one exception, however, MacDowell's orchestral pieces do not shine beside his "masterworks"—the more eloquent pianoforte Sonatas, for example. That exception is his "Indian Suite"—music that every European conductor at work in America has warmly and justly admired for richness of invention, energy of progress, largeness of mood, warmth of imagery, pictorial and poetic quality. In it and it only of MacDowell's orchestral pieces does the execution match the unfolding design, the prompting impulses. It is also music in which Mr. Rabaud, by many a token, would have been stirring to hear.

Instead the conductor chose the earlier Suite of forest scene and fairy suggestion. Throughout, it is mellifluous music that sometimes barely escapes naivété of tune and that once and again courts a transparent prettiness perilously near to that of operetta. If these melodies run brief and thin they also run gracefully fancifully, while here and there a gentle wistfulness, a mystical mood, a glimpse of woodland vision agreeably colors or inflects them. Indeed in the Finale of the revel of the Forest Spirits, MacDowell is close to light brilliance. Even in the days in which the Suite was new—the musically easy-going eighties that seemed to haunt Mr. Rabaud in this final programme—the harmonic and instrumental coloring ran none to rich. Now, to ears accustomed in suc things to sensuous opulence or to the bit that is bitter-sweet, it sounds thin, pind ing, as though the composer were paintin in water-color and occasionally letting th white paper show. Yet by these short comings, this woodland music is mor characteristic of the usual MacDowell- say of the songs and the lesser of piano pieces than of the composer who was abov his normal self in the finer Sonatas an who wrought his one tour de force in th "Indian Suite." Pretty pastime to hear re main these forest scenes, and a pretty shimmer of tone, polish of phrase, an lightness of accent did orchestra and con ductor bring to them.

At the least MacDowell in his Suite wa mildly amusing; while Saint-Saëns in hi Ode was neither more nor less than bor some. Pleasantly anticipating "The Lyr and the Harp," curious listeners wonder why, at home in Paris and abroad in bo Europe and America, the music had bee heard so seldom in the forty years of nom nal existence. It had not proceeded f many measures before they discovered t plainly the grounds for this seeming ne lect. Thereafter, theirs not to reason wh it was resurrected at the Symphony Co certs; theirs but to do—if not to die— courteous listeners upon an otherwise b nignant occasion. To the technician, course, Saint-Saëns is always interestin Not a composer of his time has eve working means of music so readily at h fingers' ends, uses them so expertly, gai his effects so precisely, lays on so neat and variously his tonal brush-work, le ting artifice glamor lack of animatio while polished surfaces hide inner hollow Apt indeed in "The Lyre and the Harp" Saint-Saëns's weaving of the choral part round run the phrases, smooth are the a cents, clear the rhythms. A measurab exacting yet steadily grateful music to th choir, even as was Mendelssohn's befo him. As well-made are the numbers f the solo-singers, chastely displayful their voices, ingratiating to their hearer pleasurably and piquantly varied in rhyth march, color. The orchestra plays a shor low-voiced, sustainedly melodious prelude presumably, an invocation of Hugo's a mosphere of poetic vision. To like mea ures it returns with true Gallic logic, the end. For an hour between, it di creetly and artfully accompanies the sin ing voices.

The rest is a well-made, perfuncto brittle and withering music. Hugo's O in the original French is no masterpiece visioning verse; in pedestrian translat into English it narrowly escapes banalit but in either it does contrast the sensuo pagan ideal of gods and men, life and fait with the sterner Deity of the Hebrews, a the graven belief and practice of the se vants of Jehovah. It is possible to co ceive the Ode set in long duet for t voices in one of which should speak t Greco-Roman lyre, in the other the ha of David. Little, apparently, did Sai Saëns take thought of these suggestio obligations. To him the higher duty was to fulfill his commission from the Birmingham festival and provide a succession of viable and effective "Morceaux" pleasing to the assembled Britons as chorus and solo-singers ran them off as skilfully and conventionally. He has written his string of pieces, according to prescription and predilection, but with a polite disdain for either the clear substance or the inner implication of the text. For once he has declined even to be appropriate. The pagan notion of death smiles through a Bolero. Loves and hates speak the same artificial accents; the voice of the lyre and the voice of the harp are equally polished,

HOME
III NEWBURY
NEW CLASS
BY SIX LESSONS
ON MONDAY & WEDNESDAY at 11 A.M. & 8 P.
Beginning Monday, May 5
All welcome. Free will offerings only receive

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — On th stage of the Academy of Music, i Brooklyn, New York, a tall, bewhis kered, quiet, unassuming, obligin gentleman stepped out from the wing with the intention of thanking th orchestra players for their part i making a success of the presentatio of his opera. He found himself i front of the footlights, and back o the footlights an applauding audi ence waiting to extend its congratula tions to the composer for whom it had been calling.

Had Mr. Rabaud known that this was what he had to face, he never would have stepped from the wings. Mr. Monteux, the conductor, knew this, and only by the ruse of telling the composer of "Marouf" that he thought the musicians would appreciate a few words from him was he able to persuade him to step on to the stage.

This is the same man who, later, in Boston, when his own symphony was to be played by the orchestra which he conducted, said in reply to a question as to when he would rehearse it, "I do not think it will require much rehearsal. I know it; the men are fine players, and I do not like to trouble them with rehearsing my own work."

It was only at the earnest request of numerous patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts that Mr. Rabaud was persuaded to put this symphony on a program at all. It is interesting to record that at both performances of it audience and orchestra rose spontaneously to their feet as a tribute to the genius of the composer.

This is the sort of man whom future historians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have to place alongside of Sir George Henschel, who got the first band of players together, and William Gericke, who left a reputation as a hard drillmaster, but who gave the orchestra its ideal of precise playing which it has never lost and which now distinguishes it among the orchestras of the world.

Mr. Rabaud must be considered as reorganizer of this orchestra, for he came at a time when a Teutonic pilot had been dropped, and his task it was to steer the craft past dangerous shoals of threatening mediocrity and into the safe waters of Gallic electicism. The trustees of the orchestra wisely insisted that the conductor for the present season must be a Frenchman. They have made the same wise decision regarding next season's incumbent, Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Monteux, coming back as the regular conductor to the orchestra which he took in hand temporarily, will find a very different organization. During the months in which Mr. Rabaud has been working with it, drilling, correcting, coordinating, and inspiring, he has gradually changed rigidity to plasticity, and coldness to warmth. There remains, however, much for Mr. Monteux to do. There are still in the orchestra many men technically American citizens whose training and sympathies are German. It was Mr. Rabaud's task to change the ideals of the organization; it will be Mr. Monteux's duty to see that there is no lapse.

Naturally in programs of the season the French school has predominated. Of the 104 compositions presented, only 25 were by German composers, and these were of the classics. Forty-eight compositions, almost half the total number, were of the French school; the rest were divided among Americans, Italians, Russians, and Scandinavians. Such a list cannot help but have given the audiences who have heard the concerts an appreciation of French music. The drilling and rehearsing must likewise have had an effect on the playing of the orchestra as a whole. Mr. Rabaud's work as reorganizer, then, is not to be measured in terms of men and instruments, but by that illusive measure with which one gauges ideals, and those are things whose force is cumulative.

AGIDE JACCHIA ANNOUNCES for the opening of his "Pops" program tonight (Thursday) overture from the opera in which Rosa Penselle made her sensational debut at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, Verdi's "La Forza del Destino." Trust Mr. Jacchia to include in his programs numbers bearing special interest in the events of the day.

chestra's season was made by the warmth of the corded Mr. Rabaud, bot after the program, and by tation to him of a cup by which has assisted at two
The presentation took place ception with Major Higgin founder of the orchestra; Judge the president of the board of
Mr. Rabaud, and Mr. and Mrs.
Townsend receiving. Judge made the presentation speech, the appreciation of the efforts with orchestra and chorus
Mr. Rabaud responded
There was also a gift for Mrs.
which consisted of a duplicate
Paul Revere pitcher in the Museum of Fine Arts.

The feature of the final co
the thirty-eighth symphony was the performance for the in Boston of Saint-Saëns' " and the Harp," a setting of Hugo's ode for solo voices, chorus orchestra. This is an "orde written for the Birmingham of 1879. Nearly 37 years ago
Jordan produced the work dence, Rhode Island, for the in the country, and shortly was a performance in the old ing Hall, New York. Since some reason, "The Lyre and the has not been heard until the

On a first hearing, the ge pression is, that it is better usual "order" composition, whole, not in Saint-Saëns' manner. The work is di a dozen sections, or stanzas orchestral prologue, and logue. Some of the sections choral, others, for solo voices for vocal quartet. The scoring including two harps, and also large use of the organ, as expected, for was not Saint-Saëns of the greatest organists of and was not the work written occasion where the organ is evidence?

The prologue, or as stated,
opens mainly with organ solo,
the gradual addition of the
The first chorus is contrapuntal character and well worked out.
of the succeeding solo numbers without especial distinction, but tenor solo, with chorus, "God, monarch of all creation," p especially interesting. Undoubt the gem of the whole work is the tone solo "Be glad! The stream channel scouring," a sort of minuet, with dainty orchestration.
epilogue for chorus makes a ending.

The soloists were Olive Kline, prano, Merle Alcock, contralto, Ar
Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werr rath, baritone. They did well, in vidually and collectively, altho some of the solo numbers were interesting from a melodic standpo
The chorus trained by Stephen To end was admirable as to voice volume. And whether or not would enjoy a second hearing, it be said that the performance whole was superb at all points.

The other part of the program
cluded the Suite in A minor by Mac Dowell. The five little movements gems in their way, and the perform ance was in a truly fine manner.
And so Mr. Rabaud leaves Boston with the best wishes of all for a happy in his own land as a composer-con ductor.

On the afternoon of April

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

THE appointment of Pierre Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was not much of a surprise. Indeed it was more of a surprise that he did not get it this season, instead of Mr. Rabaud, inasmuch as the Metropolitan Opera Company has at all times been willing to release Mr. Monteux from his contract, which, by the way, has still a year to run, in case the Boston Orchestra really wanted him and he was willing to go.

By one of those strange happenings so frequent in musical circles, in this country especially, Mr. Rabaud, who has for years been a distinguished conductor of opera and has done orchestral and symphonic conducting only incidentally, was called to one of the great est of American orchestras. By the same token, Mr. Monteux, who, among other things, frequently conducted the Colonne Orchestra in Paris and who maintained his own symphony orchestra in the French capital, only conducting opera occasionally, and never making it a specialty, was summoned

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, MAY 3,

RABAUD DIRECTS FINAL SYMPHONY

Takes Leave of Boston Orchestra Tonight

Those who attended the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon will not soon forget the tribute paid Henri Rabaud, who on that occasion directed his last Friday afternoon concert of the orchestra and with tonight's concert closes his connection with the orchestra. Mr. Rabaud was afforded evidence at every opportunity of the high regard in which he is held by Symphony patrons. He took the post at the opening of the season under most trying conditions and has simply worked wonders.

Not a popular man in the sense the word is often used, he has steadily won his way in public favor until he leaves Boston beloved by patrons and players as have been few conductors of this famous orchestra.

A rather pretty farewell took place after the concert when the Symphony chorus through the trustees presented Mr. Rabaud with a silver loving cup and gave him for Mrs. Rabaud, a silver pitcher.

The concert itself was chiefly notable for the fine reading of the MacDowell suite and the success of conductor, orchestra, chorus and soloists, Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor and Reinald Werrenrath, bass, with the all but impossible Saint-Saens "The Lyre and the Harp" cantata.

THE POPS BEGIN MONDAY NIGHT

Agide Jacchia Again to Conduct First Program

The Pops begin their 10 weeks' season at Symphony Hall on Monday night, continuing every night in the week save Sunday. Once more Agide Jacchia, one of the most popular conductors this famous Boston institution has ever had, will lead his orchestra of some 80 Boston Symphony players. It will be his third season with the Pops.

As usual there will be the special nights throughout the season. The programs will be in the same popular vein that has contributed so much to the success of these concerts. This season nothing but soft drinks will be served with the refreshments and waitresses will replace the men waiters.

Monday night's program will be:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octet.....Scarlatti
(b) Capriccio for strings.....Scarlatti
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solos:
(a) "Idyll"
(b) "Spanish Dance".....Holy
Alfred Holy
Enfantillage.....van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Randegger
"Love's Dream After the Ball".....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

RECORD, MAY 3,

RABAUD GIVEN OVATION AT HIS FINAL CONCERT

Boston Symphony in Last Performance of the Year

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—Henri Rabaud, conductor. Final afternoon performance of the year yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.. The program, to be repeated this evening, was—

MacDowell.....Suite in A minor, op 42
Saint-Saens.....The Lyre and the Harp."
Ode in two parts for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, poem by Victor Hugo.

The program showed Mr. Rabaud's modesty. Some conductors, saying farewell would have made a program of well worn music that attention might be focussed solely on the conductor. Not so with the modest Mr. Rabaud. He played the Saint-Saens work for the first time in Boston. The work demanded the assistance of a large chorus, trained by Stephen S. Townsend and this quartet of solo singers, Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett, and Reginald Werren-

Technique of Our Symphony Orchestra

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

OUR Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of technical efficiency, has had some peculiar ups and downs. Three years ago it was undoubtedly the best orchestra in the world. Today, partly because of the aggressive advance of the Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras, its leadership even in America may be questioned. But, as it has had recessions before, we may hope that this status is but temporary and that it may again make a thorough advance.

When it began, under Henschel, it had so many musical derelicts in its ranks that it was almost an old musicians' home, and Mr. Henschel had not the requisite firmness to whip it into shape. He was unable even to introduce trumpets in place of cornets, although he had a couple of these instruments brought from Europe. It was only under Gericke (the real founder of the greatness of the organization) that firm discipline set in. Yet even he was vigorously attacked when he dared to substitute Mr. Kneisel for Mr. Listemann as first violinist. But he brought in the trumpets, forced in the slide instead of the valve trombone, brought a great harpist from abroad, and substituted young artists to grow up with the orchestra instead of many veterans past service. He built wisely

POST, APRIL 27,

M. Rabaud Bids Farewell

"Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Scored an Artistic Triumph in a Season Inaugurated Against the Most Serious Odds," Says Olin Downes

The musical season proper comes to an end with the last Symphony concert which introduces the month of May. After the last Symphony concert, commence the Pop concerts, which go on into July. A belated recital or two interests if the performer is talented, and because the music "crickets" and concert-goers are if anything a little fresher for hearing than at the height of the season. But this week concludes the season proper, and one week from tomorrow Mr. Rabaud sails immediately for France.

Enough has been said in these columns about the surprising and impressive excellences of this conductor, to make overmuch recapitulation of them unnecessary. It is public knowledge, and knowledge which gives pleasure to this reviewer that Mr. Rabaud's audiences have become more and more aware of his greatness as an interpreter as the season has gone on. Pro-Germans, of course, still exist, and they have worked directly and indirectly to undermine him. Then there are others, sincere patriots as any in existence, who remain pro-German in their musical prejudices, and who have been, apparently, unable to realize what was long apparent to any unprejudiced person with a modicum of musical knowledge that in many interesting and important respects Mr. Rabaud was a different kind of a conductor than Dr. Muck, and that in certain respects Mr. Rabaud was the superior of the two men. These things are now becoming realized as Mr. Rabaud, unfortunately, is leaving for France. We plead guilty to the luxury, and the human pleasure of saying, "I told you so."

Next season Mr. Monteux returns. He conducted the first two concerts of the Symphony season just concluded, prior to the arrival here of Mr. Rabaud. How much the orchestra owes its present technical excellence to Mr. Monteux has not been fully appreciated—indeed, could not be fully appreciated—by those out of actual touch with the rehearsals. Mr. Manteaux is in certain respects, perhaps, more of a man for discipline and the polishing of detail, than Mr. Rabaud, who has a marvellous sense of proportion and the adjustment of detail to the main outlines of a work. At all events, Mr. Monteux has already associated himself promisingly with the present development of the Boston Symphony, and he will have the opportunity of showing his talent fully next season. He would have been the conductor throughout this season if the trustees of the Boston Symphony had shown themselves more capable of quick and decisive action than they did last fall, when Mr. Monteux was appointed as a late makeshift, and could not cancel his already signed contract as French conductor for the season of 1918-19 at the Metropolitan Opera House. Ths public did not lose by this, for we had two brilliant French conductors instead of one. But next season Mr. Monteux will have full swing with the orchestra which he worked so effectively to whip into shape at the beginning of last season.

Pass from the conductors to the orchestra. This season the Boston Symphony was in its personnel almost one-third new. The best orchestra in the world does not become a truly organic, cohesive structure under such conditions for at least many months. It does not matter who the players are. They may be good or poor. The best man in the world will not blend their talents successfully until they have rehearsed and played together a long time. But in recent months the full glory of the new orchestra has appeared, and we venture to assert, some of our New York brethren to the contrary, that the Boston Symphony has seldom, even in palmiest days under William Gericke, been a nobler on more beautiful instrument than it now is. The performance of the Cesar Franck symphony, a week ago last night, a memorable performance of a work which has been played last winter in a number of different cities under Mr. Rabaud before it was played in Boston, was a case in point, and a good vehicle of comparison, for this symphony was one of Mr. Gericke's finest offerings, and Mr. Gericke had a supremely fine ear and an artistic conscience, too late appreciated during his long regime in Boston.

Well, the quality of the different choirs—possibly owing in part to the clear air of last Saturday, which always has a beneficial effect on musical instruments—has not in the memory of the writer been surpassed, if equalled, for sheer glory of orchestral tone. The writer has heard every performance of this symphony given in Boston since the first interpretation of Wilhelm Gericke, back in 1904, when this simple and heavenly work seemed strange and cryptic to the ear. He never heard the strings play more warmly and with more variety of nuance than in the passages of the first movement, and particularly of the slow movement. Nor does he remember the English horn solo played more admirably than it was played a week ago last night. Nor has he heard purer intonation and a finer balance of the wood-wind choir than in certain chords and isolated passages of this same movement. Nor has he heard from the brass, with the exception of a single solo instrument, a tone more brilliant, and at the same time mellow, a finer sonority, a crisper attack. Let the people who think only Germans can conduct or make an orchestra, and those who prefer to turn their faces from the present to the past, say what they like. The fact is self-evident that the Boston Symphony, as an orchestra, and through its leaders, has enjoyed a rare artistic triumph in a season inaugurated against the most serious odds.

The programmes, too, have on the whole been better balanced and more interesting than for many seasons in the past. Certain composers, as we remarked last Sunday, have not been represented, and the absence of Wagnerian excerpts on the programmes disappointed some, while the absence of tone poems by Richard Strauss—quite rightly omitted from these concerts—were, musically speaking a serious loss. There is a moment, however, when national sentiment should have something to do with musical programmes, to say nothing of the direct financial benefit accruing to Strauss from every orchestral performance of one of his works. Richard Strauss was one of those who signed a document commending Germany's atrocious actions towards various nations, including the United States, in the war, and when Americans were dying like flies at the front was not the time to indulge in esthetic quibblings about art for art's sake, and of the innocence from bloodshed of German composers.

These circumstances limited the programmes in an inevitable way. But Bache, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms were with us, as they shall always be, French composers, modern Russians and an important modern Italian — Malapiero — were given more than adequate representation. The list of soloists was a brilliant one, and included the newer and younger arrivals, as well as the long-established virtuosi of international fame. All in all, a very brilliant season, and one which gave valuable proof that German standards need no more dominate our orchestral policies in the future than German dyes need have dominated in another field in the past. A foreign influence directly detrimental to original musical development in America was materially reduced and modified in the course of the season, and this will surely hasten the development of American music and musicians to the point where they are not influenced unduly by the art of any foreign nation. From Europe we have been, and we must be learning, but in America we must also learn to look to ourselves and create.

Agide Jacchia.

few that had ciding melody mirably sung gratefully he excepting Mi meet demand more. The e lent.

Let the clos son be a tribt agement of S a hall which many respec those of the are attended sons. These handled. T pushing, pul condition m ly at the S no interrup the admissi performanc tendants a Little detai ing, add to Mr. Brenna week day gett for th for this e due. Mr. press depa ficient in with mater program b clear analy of incident py anecdot

Arnold B life is mad the great ments, but add to the human beings. In some degree the same may be said of symphony concerts. The glorious hours of the season, such hours as that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Cecar Franck symphony, are not the sum and substance of the pleasure of concert going. Thoughtful attention to the well being of patrons attending concerts for 24 weeks in the season adds quite as much to the sum total of their enjoyment as superb interpretation of mater works. Such thoughtful attention has been bountifully supplied by Mr. Brennan and his associates.

the st of her two concerts of the season April 20, Emilio deGogorza and Mr Samaroff, pianist, gave a recital. Th Handel and Haydn Society in the "Ction," and the 27th, Mme. Schuma Heink, closed the season.

T season just closed was the most suss ful of any since the Sunday afoon series opened, in that there w more sold-out houses than in any ov ear. Mme. Galli-Curci has ap ed four times this season; John M mack, six; Heifetz, three; Rachmoff, three; Hofmann, twice; Mme. Stann-Heink, twice, and Rosita Rd, twice.

addition to the regular Sunday afoon concerts, Raoul LaParra and H Stanley were heard in concert on Sday afternoon, Nov. 2; Rachmanin Friday afternoon, Jan. 10, and a on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22. H Hempel gave one of the most dful of the season's concerts on Sday afternoon, March 8, and Rosa P the dramatic soprano, came to Sony Hall on the evening of April 3 was assisted by Mr. Rimini.

* * * *

THE POPS

e 1919 season of the Pops will have sual interest. Mr. Jacchia again ucts, although he had to relinquish rtant posts in so doing, because of resulting disagreements with the cal union. At all events he is here , an uncommonly able and enthuic leader for these concerts. Last n, as conductor of the Pops, he had little triumphs of his own, and he s year following in a considerable rtion of his programme policies then worked successfully. These in general, a greater proportion of good music than his predecessors provided for the Pop programmes. Waltzes, marches, excerpts from popular operettas will still appear in considerable numbers on the lists, but there will also be such works as Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," one movement of which figures on the first programme tomorrow night; the overture or Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Andante cantabile of Tschaikowsky; Sibelius' "Finlandia," "On the Steppes of Middle Asia" of Borodin, and many selections from grand opera. There will also be interesting and entertaining revivals of old music, such as an enchanting madrigal of Cacini of the 17th century, the familiar "Pastorale" and "Capriccio" of Scarlatti, known thus far as piano pieces, which they originally were, but now arranged and orchestrated by Mr. Jacchia, the one for wood wind, the other for strings. Then there are charming small pieces of Van Westerhout, a composer of Dutch name, but Italian descent, whose piano pieces have again furnished Mr. Jacchia with suggestions for orchestrations. In general Mr. Jacchia believes that it has been rather the custom at these concerts, and, indeed, throughout America, to somewhat underrate the extent and the genuineness of the American public's love of simple, good music, and his experience of last season has thoroughly born out this contention. The Pop orchestra will again be a very large one, and the players are those who form by far the greater part of the orchestra which gives concerts of international fame through the winter.

Next week, the final rites of the regular Boston Symphony season having been pronounced, the tables will be hauled forth, the cuisine installed, and the season in the lighter vein will be on. Preparations are even now busily under way. The Pops orchestra, which in years past numbered no more than 50, has been gradually increasing and now reaches the mark of 80 players—a good round number for any symphony orchestra—most orchestral scores ask for no more.

The programme of the opening Pops concert of May 5, an uncommonly brilliant one, follows:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Pastorale for wind, octet.....D. Scarlatti
Capriccio for strings.....(1685-1757)
Instrumentation by Mr. Jacchia.
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo (a, "Idyll), b, "Spanish Dance".....Holy
Enfantillage.....Van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Randegger
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

The innovation of the year will be a small army of fair waitresses in dainty uniforms and colored ribbons to match a particular night. They may be counted upon to please the eye and bring forth food, drinks and "smokes" in an agile and noiseless way which their predecessors of the heavy-footed sex probably never dreamt of achieving.

Many special nights are being planned—for instance a number of nights with "guest-conductors" of prominence. For the opening week there will be a "milliners" night and a "Liberty Loan" night. The experiment of a chorus on patriotic nights, with Mr. Stephen Townsend leading the songs of the day, was too successful last year not to be repeated. The doughboy will be given every consideration, and YD nights dedicated to him.

The Sunday afternoon series of concerts in Symphony Hall will close with this afternoon's concert by Mme. Schumann-Heink. Sharing the programme with her, Ernesto Berumen, Mexican pianist, will play two groups of works for the pianoforte; Frank La Forge, the composer-pianist, is the accompanist, and Wallace Goodrich will play the organ accompaniment of La Forge's "Before the Crucifix."

The New Quintet

Next Tuesday evening the new Boston chamber music organization, yclept "the Boston Quintet," founded by Hans Ebell, the Russian pianist, give their first concert at Steinert Hall. The Frenchman, Ravel, furnishes the first number on their programme with his Quartet in F major; then follows Glazounoff with, "Five Novelettes," Op. 15, and ending with Schumann's Quintet for piano and strings, Op. 94.

Rabaud's Farewell

For the occasion of his farewell appearances before the American public, which are also the final concerts of the Boston Symphony season, on Friday and Saturday next, May 2 and 3, Mr. Henri Rabaud has chosen an appropriate programme of one American and one French work. The first will be the "Woodland Suite" of our greatest composer, MacDowell, describing "In a Haunted Forest"; "Summer Idyl"; "In October", "The Shepherdess' Song" and "Forest Spirits." The rest of the programme will be filled by Saint-Saens' "The Lyre and the Harp," a choral ode of large proportions, being a musical setting of Victor Hugo's poem. Except for a performance at a Birmingham festival, the work has probably never been heard in this country. A chorus of 150 voices, trained by Stephen S. Townsend, will sing, together with the following notable quartet: Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

TIGHT BINDING

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

THE appointment of Pierre Monteux, conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was not much of a surprise. Indeed it was more of a surprise that he did not get it this season, instead of Mr. Rabaud, inasmuch as the Metropolitan Opera Company has at all times been willing to release Mr. Monteux from his contract, which, by the way, has still a year to run, in case the Boston Orchestra really wanted him and he was willing to go.

By one of those strange happenings so frequent in musical circles, in this country especially, Mr. Rabaud, who has for years been a distinguished conductor of opera and has done orchestral and symphonic conducting only incidentally, was called to one of the greatest of American orchestras. By the same token, Mr. Monteux, who, among other things, frequently conducted the Colonne Orchestra in Paris and who maintained his own symphony orchestra in the French capital, only conducting opera occasionally, and never making it a specialty, was summoned to the conductorship of our greatest opera company. One would naturally have thought that Mr. Monteux would have gone to Boston and Mr. Rabaud to New York, although probably the salary paid in Boston had something to do with the final decision.

MR. RABAUD'S chief reason for not remaining in Boston is said to be that he desires to devote himself almost exclusively to composition. But there is no denying the fact that the Boston season has not been a brilliant one, either from the standpoint of popular success or of art. The series of concerts given in Philadelphia this season are positive proof of this, for although there were only five of them, they came at such widely distributed points of the season that the progress or rather retrogression of the orchestra could be plainly seen.

As the early concert, which was conducted by Mr. Monteux, who had been loaned by the Metropolitan to lead until Mr. Rabaud should have arrived in the United States, nothing could be reasonably expected. The Boston Orchestra was then for the first time in its existence playing under or rather being trained by a French conductor. Despite the mixed nationalities of its personnel, it had been steeped in the traditions of Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler and Muck. These were not to be overthrown in a moment and, in fact, to an outsider it seemed as though they had not been seriously impaired, although somewhat shaken, by the entire season.

There was also a new concertmeister who had not had the orchestral training of some of his predecessors, and, all in all, things were not in a very homogeneous state when Mr. Monteux arrived to take over the organization. Nevertheless his concert here was one of the best of the series and showed that he had some definite plans for the handling of the orchestra.

VERY much the best concert of the series, however, was the one in December, which was the first time that Mr. Rabaud appeared in this city as a conductor. The orchestra at this concert showed a mental state entirely different from that which it had shown since the enforced retirement of Doctor Muck, and at that time it looked as though Mr. Rabaud would be able to get the organization in at least something like its former self.

The succeeding concerts, however, dispelled this idea. There was very apparent friction in the orchestra, which played carelessly and with a lack of discipline which would not have been tolerated for a moment under the former leaders. The writer at one of the later concerts saw one of the violinists stop playing for no apparent reason, lay his violin in his lap and deliberately talk to his seatmate for a space of not less than a minute, before he resumed playing, although the instruments of his section were busy at the time. This was only one of a number of incidents which occurred in the Philadelphia concerts, which indicated something was seriously wrong in the body. Imagine what would have happened had such a thing transpired under disciplinarians like Nikisch or Gericke.

HOWEVER, this is now all past, and the interesting question is, What will Mr. Monteux do with the orchestra? To an impartial observer it seems as though the change from Rabaud to Monteux or, for that matter, to any French or Italian conductor is a case of "from the frying pan into the fire," unless certain radical changes are made. It had been said that there are twenty-three changes in the personnel of the Boston Orchestra for next season, and some of these may make Mr. Monteux's task considerably lighter.

As has been said, the traditions of the Boston Orchestra are those of a nation other than that of the coming and the retiring conductors. It is no easy matter to make a change so radical without affecting, to a very serious extent, the morale of the organization. Some of what that means has been seen this year. The well-known leopard and the equally well-known Ethiopian would have a far easier time changing their respective spots and skin than the average orchestral player in changing the traditions under which his organization has won success in the past, and from which a partial change has been shown to be unsuccessful. Under any circumstances, the future of the Boston Orchestra in its coming season is one of the most interesting situations in American music.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, MAY 3,

RABAUD DIRECTS FINAL SYMPHONY

Takes Leave of Boston Orchestra Tonight

Those who attended the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon will not soon forget the tribute paid Henri Rabaud, who on that occasion directed his last Friday afternoon concert of the orchestra and with tonight's concert closes his connection with the orchestra. Mr. Rabaud was afforded evidence at every opportunity of the high regard in which he is held by Symphony patrons. He took the post at the opening of the season under most trying conditions and has simply worked wonders.

Not a popular man in the sense the word is often used, he has steadily won his way in public favor until he leaves Boston beloved by patrons and players as have been few conductors of this famous orchestra.

A rather pretty farewell took place after the concert when the Symphony chorus through the trustees presented Mr. Rabaud with a silver loving cup and gave him for Mrs. Rabaud, a silver pitcher.

The concert itself was chiefly notable for the fine reading of the MacDowell suite and the success of conductor, orchestra, chorus and soloists, Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor and Reinald Werrenrath, bass, with the all but impossible Saint-Saens "The Lyre and the Harp" cantata.

THE POPS BEGIN MONDAY NIGHT

Agide Jacchia Again to Conduct First Program

The Pops begin their 10 weeks' season at Symphony Hall on Monday night, continuing every night in the week save Sunday. Once more Agide Jacchia, one of the most popular conductors this famous Boston institution has ever had, will lead his orchestra of some 80 Boston Symphony players. It will be his third season with the Pops.

As usual there will be the special nights throughout the season. The programs will be in the same popular vein that has contributed so much to the success of these concerts. This season nothing but soft drinks will be served with the refreshments and waitresses will replace the men waiters.

Monday night's program will be:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octet.....Scarlatti
(b) Capriccio for strings.....Scarlatti
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solos:
(a) "Idyll"
(b) "Spanish Dance".....Holy
Alfred Holy
Enfantillage.....van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Randegger
"Love's Dream After the Ball".....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

POST, APRIL 27,

Kelly & Sons.
H, 774 Washington St.
& W. C. Covel.
TLAND, Congress St.
erre A. Ledoux
NECTICUT
V HAVEN, 1105 Chappel St.
ouis M. Schablein.
V LONDON 207 Bank St.
. M. Hannon.

r. The name "Half-Sole Tire" is it in connection with

RE

hotoplays the Lan-first half in "Eye ronounced ss of the photoplay heme and d Bennet,
comedy,
he bill for Talmadge
her best le role in
by Eugene of the imitle. News upplement gramme is

EATRE

American
rns to the al Square and Wed-Amazing is popular Creaking
photoplay
eville acts.
School, will consists of ree horses.
rray, "His n, and the Mack Sen-
idow," and rgan, com-nday night

TRE

She Walked other week tomorrow has taken heatregoers.
at the some e company
ing, Arthur
ye. Majorie

FENWAY THEATRE

A new role for the ever-versatile Mary Pickford has been found in "Cap't Kidd, Jr., the latest production to be turned out by the Paramount company. She is cast as a little Scotch girl, who is money crazy, and the story deals with her experiences in search for lost treasure. On the same bill is Sessue Hayakawa in "A Courageous Coward," a story written purposely for this ever-popular actor. From Thursday, through Saturday, Dorothy Dalton, Paramount star in "The Homebreakers," and Earle Williams in "The Usurper," comprise the main attractions. Dorothy Dalton is cast as a travelling saleslady, who proves that she can even beat a man at his own game. The remainder of the bill is made up of Burton Holmes' Travels, "Mutt and Jeff Cartoon" and the News weekly.

GLOBE THEATRE

The two bills of photoplays announced for the week at Loew's Globe Theatre give rich promise of variety and quality. For the initial half there will be given the first Boston showings of Enid Bennett, the Paramount actress, in "The Law of Man." This is a story replete with thrills in which mystery of incident plays importantly. The other photoplay will be "Ginger" with Violet Palmer. Charlie Chaplin in "Shanghaied" also will be shown. The bill for the last half will include the first showings of De Mille's production, "For Better, for Worse," and Vera Michelena in "The Devil's Playground." A Sunday show of six vaudeville acts and photoplay subjects has been arranged.

COPLEY THEATRE

So favorably has "The Thunderbolt" been received by patrons of the Copley Theatre that the management has decided to continue the Pinero comedy-drama for another week. The Henry Jewett Players are giving a remarkably smooth and interesting performance of this novelty.

strels.
He was at that time the ager of the biggest show
He journeyed the troup where it was booked f
ment at the Drury Lane T
don. He later turned hi outdoor events and prom walking contest given un America. The event took ton, and proved a big suc
His connection in this d
abled him to discover Fr colored pedestrian, whose ords for years astounded
He then became associa
O'Leary on the latter's re ica after capturing the London. His next step w tion of outdoor spectacles
He remained there for nea and was wholly responsib struction of the mammoth in that city.
A business journey to fered him the opportunit himself with "Charley"
ime the country's foremo
He was assigned to the nent of all Hoyt's at lled every new sho night Bell" to the l t wrote. In all he the dramatist for
s. This was followe
ion of several plays,
"York State Folks,"
of the best rura
en.
next big venture wa
e colossal spectacle, lon." This piece w nction with the Barn
t. At this time the S waging a bitter war anger, then common

RECORD, MAY 3.

RABAUD GIVEN OVATION AT HIS FINAL CONCERT

Boston Symphony in Last Performance of the Year

By J. V. CLARK

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—Henri Rabaud, conductor. Final afternoon performance of the year yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.. The program, to be repeated this evening, was—

MacDowell.....Suite in A minor, op 42
Saint-Saens.....'The Lyre and the Harp." Ode in two parts for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, poem by Victor Hugo.

The program showed Mr. Rabaud's modesty. Some conductors, saying farewell would have made a program of well worn music that attention might be focussed solely on the conductor. Not so with the modest Mr. Rabaud. He played the Saint-Saens work for the first time in Boston. The work demanded the assistance of a large chorus, trained by Stephen S. Townsend and this quartet of solo singers, Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett, and Reginald Werrenrath.

The afternoon, however, was Mr. Rabaud's. The audience applauded him on all occasions. MacDowell's charming music in the woodland suite does not make for frantic applause, yet the applause followed its playing was tremendous. It was intended for Mr. Rabaud, not the late Mr. MacDowell. After the Saint-Saens ode, Mr. Rabaud was called to the stage many times. He made no speech. Very imperfect English would make that almost impossible. His work showed moreclearly than any speech the calibre of the man. He has been unfailing in his efforts to make the reorganized symphony orchestra a perfect instrument and to give the city, which honored hi mwith an invitation to lead its orchestra, a series of brilliant concerts.

The men of the orchestra and the members of the chorus paid their respects to Mr. Rabaud after the concert. The chorus presented him with a loving cup and a gift, a copy of the Paul Revere pitcher, for Mme. Rabaud, who has remained in Paris. Judge Cabot of the Board of Trustees made a brief speech.

The works performed yesterday and their performance demand but the tenderness and the mysticism that is the composer. The peculiar idiom of the composer is frequently evident.

The Saint-Saens work was decidedly disappointing. It was well made and that is about all. There were no pages to stir the blood and only a few that had even the appeal of deciding melody. One dancing tune admirably sung by Mr. Werrenrath was gratefully heard. The solo singers, excepting Miss Kline, who failed to meet demands, were adequate, not more. The choral singing was excellent.

Let the closing remarks on the season be a tribute to the excellent management of Symphony Hall. Here is a hall which is a model of its kind in many respects. The concerts, like those of the Sunday afternoon series, are attended by large crowds of persons. These crowds are excellently handled. There is a minimum of pushing, pulling and crowding, which condition might well prevail especially at the Sunday concerts. There is no interruption of the programs by the admission of auditors when the performance is in progress. The attendants are unfailingly courteous. Little details, like the subdued lighting, add to the patrons' comfort. To Mr. Brennan and Mr. Judd for the week day concerts and to Mr. Mudgett for the Sunday concerts, thanks for this excellent management are due. Mr. Burke, a newcomer in the press department, has been most efficient in supplying the newspapers with material they desire. Mr. Hale's program book is a delight, full of clear analyses of the music, a wealth of incidental material and many happy anecdotes and touches of humor.

Arnold Bennett has pointed out that life is made most endurable, not by the great emotions, the big movements, but by the little details that add to the comfort and well being of human beings. In some degree the same may be said of symphony concerts. The glorious hours of the season, such hours as that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Cecar Franck symphony, are not the sum and substance of the pleasure of concert going. Thoughtful attention to the well being of patrons attending concerts for 24 weeks in the season adds quite as much to the sum total of their enjoyment as superb interpretation of mater works. Such thoughtful attention has been bountifully supplied by Mr. Brennan and his associates.

Technique of Our Symphony Orchestra

136

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

OUR Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of technical efficiency, has had some peculiar ups and downs. Three years ago it was undoubtedly the best orchestra in the world. Today, partly because of the aggressive advance of the Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras, its leadership even in America may be questioned. But, as it has had recessions before, we may hope that this status is but temporary and that it may again make a thorough advance.

When it began, under Henschel, it had so many musical derelicts in its ranks that it was almost an old musicians' home, and Mr. Henschel had not the requisite firmness to whip it into shape. He was unable even to introduce trumpets in place of cornets, although he had a couple of these instruments brought from Europe. It was only under Gericke (the real founder of the greatness of the organization) that firm discipline set in. Yet even he was vigorously attacked when he dared to substitute Mr. Kneisel for Mr. Listemann as first violinist. But he brought in the trumpets, forced in the slide instead of the valve trombone, brought a great harpist from abroad, and substituted young artists to grow up with the orchestra instead of many veterans past service. He built wisely for the future, for a great permanent orchestra.

That even the greatest conductor may not be a blessing to a permanent orchestra unless he is a thorough drill master was proved by Arthur Nikiseh, who gave the most poetic readings imaginable but allowed Gericke's stern discipline to lapse altogether. Under his regime the band became a second class orchestra under a first class leader. All of the men experienced caprice at rehearsals, personal favoritism was rampant and the game of poker was sometimes allowed to encroach upon the hours of practice. The public were dazzled by the brilliancy of the readings, but the perfect unity of performance, the remarkable ensemble, was fast disappearing when Mr. Nikisch left the conductorship.

Then came Emil Paur, rather heavy-handed, somewhat prone to force rather than delicacy (it was Paur by name and Power by nature), but excellent in Brahms works, wonderful in Richard Strauss compositions, which he gave frequently, and able to interpret Tschaikowsky as no one has done before or since in Boston. Meanwhile the constant playing together of the artists was in itself resulting in an unrivalled band. The policy at this time was to make very few changes in the personnel of the orchestra, a wise plan which only the necessities and the antagonisms of war afterwards overthrew.

At the end of Paur's directorship the founder of the orchestra (Gericke) came back, and again the hand of iron in a glove of velvet was in evidence. But there was now considerable opposition to the conservatism which was characteristic of Gericke. People no longer cared to be fed up almost entirely upon the German classics. Nikisch and Paur (Henschel too at the beginning) had revelled in the modern works. Paur believed that Russia was to become the great orchestral nation of the future (he expressed himself to that effect to the present writer), and Boston soon became acquainted with the glories of the "Big Five" of that country.

Discontent at the make-up of Gerick's programs was expressed not only in Boston, but in New York, Brooklyn and other cities which the orchestra regularly visited. The revulsion may be understood when we state that finally Gericke gave Beethoven's great Ninth Symphony, and it was a superb performance, while there were more performers upon the stage than persons in the audience. There was mutual dissatisfaction after that, and the great classicist and superb drill master soon went back to Vienna.

In Dr. Muck all the necessary qualities were again united. Although not a good program maker, he gave a good proportion of all schools, and all the strict discipline of the band was restored. It is curious to note that when he afterward gave the Ninth Symphony there was a tremendous demand for tickets, although Gericke's empty-house performance was nearly as good.

Again, a recession of discipline came under Fiedler, who followed.

ot that he was careless or capricus, as Nikisch had been, but he was o genial and good-natured to be of the stuff of which the orchestral drillmaster should be made. He was, however, a splendid program maker, and Boston kept abreast of all the modern developments in music under his baton. He was a favorite with the public and with his men, and he left very pleasant memories behind him.

Of Dr. Muck's second reign it is unnecessary to speak. It may be stated, however, that no orchestra in America could hope to rival the performances of Brahms' First Symphony, of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, or of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, by an orchestra under his baton.

After Muck's extinguishment the threads began to unravel again. This cannot be charged to M. Rabaud. It was a case of a house dixided against itself. The war brought animosities and even hatreds, even among those who were not forced out of the orchestra. Much new material was necessarily brought into the band which had existed so long without great changes. Some of the individual artists who were added are of superior calibre to those whom they have replaced, yet they need time to work into a true ensemble in their new surroundings. M. Rabaud did quite enough in dancing skillfully on this volcano, and he had a sense of balance of tone that went far to give the impression that there was excellent ensemble, yet occasionally slips were made in individual parts which would have caused the riot act to be read in Gericke's time. It now requires more than a drill-master, it needs a diplomat to manage and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

M. Monteux has not had a chance to show what he can do as conductor of this organization. The few concerts which he gave at the beginning of last season left a tepid impression, but it would be decidedly unfair to judge by them. A partially rebuilt orchestra, at the end of a summer vacation, under a strange conductor is one thing; an orchestra which has been a year together, which has time to become acquainted with its conductor, and one in which the disturbing elements are quieting down with the return of peace, may be a wholly different matter. M. Monteux will have a cordial welcome and might be informed that Boston is not generally in the habit of killing a conductor at the end of a concert because a performer dislikes his discipline, at least not in the Symphony Orchestra.

at the Boston O

BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE MARCH 22.

Boston Symphony in Last of Season's Concerts at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of this year's series of concerts in the Academy of Music last evening. That the reorganized orchestra has found favor equal to that which it enjoyed during other and earlier regimes was evidenced by the size and enthusiasm of an audience attracted solely by the orchestra itself and without the lure of a popular soloist. Its faith proved well-founded; for last evening Mr. Rabaud and the band outdid their previous achievements.

In the four concerts which he has conducted here this winter Mr. Rabaud has, despite the high standards raised by his forerunners among Boston Symphony conductors, proven himself a musician of profound sympathy and deep understanding and a conductor who can secure excellent results from the orchestra at his command. He has in the course of a few months welded a heterogeneous collection of old and new men into an orchestral body capable of a high degree of homogeneous expression. A master of euphony, Mr. Rabaud has succeeded in maintaining the oldest and best traditions of the Boston Orchestra; in other words, in keeping it the premier orchestra of the country.

For last evening's program the conductor chose works of varying kind and content. Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor, called the Organ Symphony because of its incorporation of that instrument in the body of sound, began the list. It has not been a symphony to win popular appeal, though long recognized as a master effort of the dean of French composers. Last evening, however, it sounded richer and rarer than ever before. This was to be expected, for in the course of the past winter Mr. Rabaud has revealed himself again and again as the single conductor who could make Saint-Saens "sound." He could not eliminate some of its arid stretches, but he did succeed in diminishing their aridness and in making them easily forgotten in the wealth of color and clarity of design that distinguished the reading of the whole composition.

An informed and informing reading of the symphonic excerpt from Franck's "Redemption" followed, and then came the Second Brandenberg Concerto of Bach, with Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim furnishing the solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet respectively. The work is little played because of the difficulties it presents to the modern trumpet-player, and conductors in the past have only sought its interpretation through a rewriting of the trumpet part. Mr. Heim used last evening a smaller trumpet than is heard as a rule in modern orchestras, yet even then had difficulty in maintaining the perfect expression of the Bach line. On the whole, however, he was eminently successful. The composition from first to last is of that sturdy, rugged nature inherent in Bach and its low movement of such searching into the spiritual depths of things as only Bach ever attained.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," with its unearthly harmonies and orchestral greens and grays, and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz" brought the evening to a close. Compositions of contrasting color and compositional method, they served to reveal once more the wide sympathy of the conductor and the virtuosity of the orchestra. Both were nicely planned and thoroughly well executed efforts.

Mary Kent, a young contralto, who had been heard earlier in the season wth the Society of American Singers, gave her first song recital in Acolian Hall yesterday afternoon. Her program, designed to disclose mastery of varying styles of recital selections, began with Gluck's air, "Che faro senza Euridice," and others by Haydn and Falconiere. In addition there were groups in English and French.

Miss Kent has a voice of excellent natural quality, but more than this, she knows how to use it. Quite true, she still has something to learn of the value and the application of tonal color, and her diction, especially in the French songs, left something to be desired. Yet on the whole, Miss Kent disclosed a singing ability of high degree. She will be heard again with interest and ought to find an assured place in the recital field.

Glad! the Stream Her Channel Scouring," almost of an operetta character in bolero rhythm, will always be applauded when it is sung with the spirit and the admirable diction displayed by Mr. Werrenrath. Another reason why it should be applauded is that it awakens an audience overcome by the paleness of the music that precedes it.

It is not necessary to speak of Hugo's Ode, contrasting Christian sobriety with pagan sensualism. The text should have inspired highly colored music. Alas, Saint-Saens expression of pagan sensualism is as a rule sobriety itself.

The chorus, which had been prepared by Stephen S. Townsend, was worthy of a more impressive composition. Its attack, variety of tonal graduations, prevailing euphony, deserved all praise. Mr. Rabaud conducted in a masterly manner playing upon chorus and orchestra as upon a responsive, eloquent instrument. The concert will be repeated tonight.

An audience that completely filled the hall applauded heartily the movements of the suite, and recalled Mr. Rabaud many times. At the end of the concert the applause for him was enthusiastic and prolonged. It seemed as if the audience was loath to lose him from its sight. No conductor for the past 30 years has received so great an honor; no conductor has so richly deserved it.

For the past season has in certain respects been the most brilliant during the last 30 years. The programs have been of engrossing interest; the performances have often been revelations—revelations of how music by Frenchmen should be played; revelations of the tenderness, the beauty, the profound emotion, the grandeur in the symphonies and overtures of Beethoven. There are some unfortunate persons in Boston who still maintain that only a German can "understand" Beethoven. There are some equally unfortunate in the audience that like to characterize Mr. Rabaud as "academic." They have ears and hear not.

German propagandism is persistent and insidious. There are some in Boston that are uneasy at the thought of any one but a German serving as conductor of this orchestra. Those that do not attend the concerts, some that are in the audience, lose no opportunity of carping, sneering, making false statements concerning the "deterioration" of this superb orchestra; the "inferior" character of the programs and the interpretations.

Mr. Rabaud has not been chauvenistic. Some German-Austrian composers have been represented with 27 performances in all; six Russians, nine Americans, two Italians, one Scandanavian. Beethoven led with 10 performances. The other German-Austrian composers were Bach, Brahms, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Weber. The Americans were Chadwick, Converse, Foote, Gilbert, Hadley, Hill, Kelley, Loeffler, MacDowell. The Russians were Borodin, Glinka, Moussorjaky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tschaikowsky. The Italians were represented by Verdi and by Malipiero.

The list of works performed for the first time in Boston or at these concerts is an imposing one. Equally noteworthy is the list of soloists that appeared at these concerts for the first time. Among them were Mmes. Easton and Braslau, Messrs. Gogorza, Werrenrath, Cortot, Laparra, Levitzski, Fradkin, Heifetz, Thibaud, Bor...

HERALD, MAY 3,

LEADER RABAUD SAYS FAREWELL

Conducts Superbly Last Symphony Concert of the Season

ADMIRERS GIVE HIM LOVING CUP

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 38th season, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: MacDowell, Suite in A minor, op. 42; Saint-Saens, "The Lyre and the Harp," Ode for solo voices, chorus and orchestra (poem by Victor Hugo). The solo singers were Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath.

While MacDowell's Suite in A minor is a less important work than his "Indian" Suite, it is delightful by reason of its freshness, its youthful vitality, its poetic grace, its out-of-door spirit, the poetic fancy shown in the movements, "In a Haunted Forest" and "Forest Spirits." This music is by MacDowell, the lover of Nature, happy in his home at Peterboro; the MacDowell that was not without a dash of Gaelic mysticism in his composition. To him the forest was haunted by strange woodland creatures. To him the trees of years were sentient, companionable.

Saint-Saens's Ode was performed in Boston for the first time. We know of only one performance in the United States before that of yesterday—the one in Providence, R. I., by the Arion Society, conducted by Jules Jordan, in 1892. The neglect of this work is easily explained. The English translation of Hugo's poem is a wretched one, pedestrian and clumsy. The music, written for a Birmingham (Eng.) festival, is almost wholly without inspiration. That it is "well made" may be taken for granted. Saint-Saens is not in the habit of writing carelessly. The orchestral score is often interesting in itself; but there are few expressive or effective vocal pages; nowhere are there pleasures that move or thrill the hearer. The nearest approach to any marked effect is in the closing section of the last part in which a tenor solo is followed by the chorus. The soprano solo that opens the second part suffered yesterday, no doubt, from the inadequacy of the singer. The baritone solo, "Be Glad! the Stream Her Channel Scouring," almost of an operetta character in bolero rhythm, will always be applauded when it is sung with the spirit and the admirable diction displayed by Mr. Werrenrath. Another reason why it should be applauded is that it awakens an audience overcome by the paleness of the music that precedes it.

It is not necessary to speak of Hugo's Ode, contrasting Christian sobriety with pagan sensualism. The text should have inspired highly colored music. Alas, Saint-Saens expression of pagan sensualism is as a rule sobriety itself.

The chorus, which had been prepared by Stephen S. Townsend, was worthy of a more impressive composition. Its attack, variety of tonal graduations, prevailing euphony, deserved all praise. Mr. Rabaud conducted in a masterly manner playing upon chorus and orchestra as upon a responsive, eloquent instrument. The concert will be repeated tonight.

An audience that completely filled the hall applauded heartily the movements of the suite, and recalled Mr. Rabaud many times. At the end of the concert the applause for him was enthusiastic and prolonged. It seemed as if the audience was loath to lose him from its sight. No conductor for the past 30 years has received so great an honor; no conductor has so richly deserved it.

For the past season has in certain respects been the most brilliant during the last 30 years. The programs have been of engrossing interest; the performances have often been revelations—revelations of how music by Frenchmen should be played; revelations of the tenderness, the beauty, the profound emotion, the grandeur in the symphonies and overtures of Beethoven. There are some unfortunate persons in Boston who still maintain that only a German can "understand" Beethoven. There are some equally unfortunate in the audience that like to characterize Mr. Rabaud as "academic." They have ears and hear not.

German propagandism is persistent and insidious. There are some in Boston that are uneasy at the thought of any one but a German serving as conductor of this orchestra. Those that do not attend the concerts, some that are in the audience, lose no opportunity of carping, sneering, making false statements concerning the "deterioration" of this superb orchestra; the "inferior" character of the programs and the interpretations.

Mr. Rabaud has not been chauvenistic. Some German-Austrian composers have been represented with 27 performances in all; six Russians, nine Americans, two Italians, one Scandanavian. Beethoven led with 10 performances. The other German-Austrian composers were Bach, Brahms, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Weber. The Americans were Chadwick, Converse, Foote, Gilbert, Hadley, Hill, Kelley, Loeffler, MacDowell. The Russians were Borodin, Glinka, Moussorjaky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tschaikowsky. The Italians were represented by Verdi and by Malipiero.

The list of works performed for the first time in Boston or at these concerts is an imposing one. Equally noteworthy is the list of soloists that appeared at these concerts for the first time. Among them were Mmes. Easton and Braslau, Messrs. Gogorza, Werrenrath, Cortot, Laparra, Levitzski, Fradkin, Heifetz, Thibaud, Bor...

Mr. Rabaud's departure is mourned not only by the audience but by the men of the orchestra, who respect and admire his ability, who have found in him a considerate, sympathetic friend. The affectionate regard of the chorus was shown yesterday afternoon after the concert, when the members presented him with a handsome loving cup and sent to Mme. Rabaud a copy of the Paul Revere pitcher. Judge Cabot of the board of trustees presented these gifts with a few well-chosen words. Mr. Rabaud, touched by these tokens of the esteem in which he is held, expressed his gratitude in French and in English.

He bears with him the good-will and best wishes of his hearers. He will not soon be forgotten. His work and his influence will long outlive this season. As a conductor and a composer he has made for musical righteousness in this city. As a man, he has won all hearts by his sincerity, his modesty, his simplicity, his personal charm. The gallant nation of France, the nation of the finest arts, could not have sent to us a more accomplished and gallant gentleman.

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The third week of the "Pops" opens tomorrow. For those who contend that the title of the Pops has lost its reason, it is only necessary to reply that bottles still pop at the Pops (fizz being perfectly permissible). Moreover, the origin of the name is not at all certain. Far back in the eighties, when the Pops were started, the European name of "Promenade" concerts was given them. The term "Pops" sprang up spontaneously. Whether it came from "Promenade" or "Popular," or the carbonated element, will never be proved on paper. If "Pops" signifies "Popular," then of course it applies.

On Tuesday, May 20, the Temple Israel has engaged the entire floor to entertain the Union of Congregations and Federation of Temple Sisterhoods who are holding their national convention in Boston May 19-22. Thursday, May 22, has a Russian program, and Friday is Roxbury Latin school night.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 19.

Overture, "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Aubade Printaniere ..... Lacome
Traeumerei ..... Schumann
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Carnival in Italy ..... Berlioz
Viola solos: a, Melodie; b, Bagatelle. Wittmann
Mr. Wittmann; Mr. Lamson, accompanist.
Serenade ..... Schubert-Jacobi
Scherzo, from "Eroica" Symphony ..... Beethoven
Dance, "Piemontesi" ..... Sinigaglia
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascagni
Valse des Fleurs, from the "Nutcracker" Suite ..... Tschaikowsky Bacchanale, from "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner

TUESDAY, MAY 20.

"Coronation March," from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture, "Semiramide" ..... Rossini
Waltz, "Artists Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet a March of the Smugglers.
b Danse Boheme.
Violoncello solo:
Mr. Miquelle.
Turkish March ..... Mozart
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
"Sometime" ..... Foote
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
With Organ.
Tarantelle ..... Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier

WEDNESDAY, MAY 21.

Prelude to Act I., "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture, "La Cazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
"A Petits Pas" ..... Chaminade
Fantasia, "A Masked Ball" ..... Verdi
Suite, "La Gitanilla" ..... Lacome
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor" ..... Donizetti
Third Movement of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Scenes Pittoresques" ..... Massenet
a, Air de Ballet. b, Fete Boheme.
Intermezzo, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "Cagliostro" ..... Strauss
Selection, "Naughty Marietta" ..... Herbert

THURSDAY, MAY 22.

Russian Program.
March from "A Night in Egypt" ..... Arensky
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" ..... Tschaikowsky
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture "1812" (with organ) ..... Tschaikowsky
Suite, "Feramors" ..... Rubinstein
Orientale ..... Cui
Allegretto from the "Symphonie Pathetique" ..... Tschaikowsky
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Volga Bargemen's Song ..... Arr. by Jacchia
Bacchanale from "The Season" ..... Glazounoff
Polonaise from "Eugen Oniegin" ..... Tschaikowsky

FRIDAY, MAY 23.

Roxbury Latin School Night.
March, "Old Roxbury" ..... Zerr
Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Volisteff
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Orpheus" ..... Offenbach
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Reve Angelique (with organ) ..... Rubinstein
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "The Rainbow Girl" ..... Hirsch
Minuet ..... Paderewski
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
Overture, "1812" (with organ) ..... Tschaikowsky

SATURDAY, MAY 24.

Cortege de Bacchus ..... Delibes
Overture, "Figaro's Wedding" ..... Mozart
Serenata, Barcarola ..... De Nardis
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ..... Donizetti
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Clair de Lune, from "Werther" ..... Massenet
Pastorale for wood-wind octet ..... Scarlatti
Capriccio for strings
Arranged by Mr. Jacchia.
Baccanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Ave Maria from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "One Thousand and One Nights" ..... Strauss
Selection, "Katinka" ..... Friml

POST MAY 3

RABAUD'S FAREWELL TO BOSTON

Symphony Conductor Given Parting Gift of Silver

BY OLIN DOWNES

The final Friday afternoon conce by the Boston Symphony Orchestra o the present season took place yesterda in Symphony Hall. The last conce of the season which Mr. Rabaud h conducted with such admirable resu will take place this evening. The co cert yesterday afternoon was in nature of a leave taking between conductor and his Friday afterno audience, and the demonstration ma by that audience showed how dee it has come to appreciate, in the cour of a season, the accomplishments this gifted and brilliant leader. the beginning of the concert "The St Spangled Banner" was not only play by the orchestra, but sung by a lar chorus.

GIFT IN SILVER

On every possible occasion—when M Rabaud entered, after the opening pe formance of MacDowell's suite, in A m nor, and the conclusion of Saint-Saens work for chorus, soloists and orchestra after Victor Hugo's ode, "The Lyre an the Harp"—the quality and the duratio of the applause evidently sought t speak in the characteristically undemon strative fashion of New England aud ces—of the esteem which it feels fo his conductor and his work. Mr. Ra aud appeared to be much moved b his, acknowledging his greeting wit characteristic modesty and indicatin the members of the orchestra his in obtedness to them for the achievement a season.

Following the concert an informa ception for the conductor was held b r. and Mrs. Stephen Townsend an he chorus, whom Mr. Townsend ha oached so effectively for the work wit he orchestra during the past season. A his time Judge Cabot, president of the oard of directors, presented Mr. Ra aud with silver tokens for himself an rs. Rabaud, who has remained i aris. Mr. Townsend made a shor peech and Major Higginson, founde nd maintainer for so many years of th oston Symphony Orchestra, wrung Mr abaud's hand in appreciation of the onductor's accomplishments.

Has Won Artistic Triumph

Mr. Rabaud has won an exceptiona rtistic triumph in this city. He came heralded. He was not known to the merican public at all as a conductor e was and is a very self-less man, no ving to practices and devices con eived to gain public attention. Mr abaud had also to contend against a rejudice more or less unconscious ye eep-seated in a number of members o n eminently patriotic community: tha reat conductors are born only in Ger any. Confronted with these conditions nd perhaps offending some by refusing n any way to work for their support r favor, Mr. Rabaud devoted himself t his task with an enthusiasm as effective as it was lacking in ostentation. He wil be included in the list of the greates conductors the Boston orchestra has known. Not the disciplarian that his predecessor was, Mr. Rabaud has a least as profound a knowledge of his art, as broad a scholarship and deeper feeling, a keener ear and finer artistic sensibilities. No other Symphony con ductor has shown so fine a sense o tonal values as Mr. Rabaud, save Wil helm Gericke, who was inclined to b pedantic. There was a day when Mr Nikisch, a virtuoso conductor of gen us, led the Boston Symphony.

These are the three most salient fig ures in the list of Boston Symphon conductors of years past. Mr. Rabaud who has without doubt his special lim itations, and who has possibility not attempted to be the rigid drillmaster inaugurating a new regime, as might have been the case had he engaged for several seasons instead of for one, appears, on the whole, as the best balanced artist of them all. Mr. Monteux comes to Boston next season. It has been and it will be of great benefit to this city to listen to some fine French musicians at the head of the Boston Symphony.

Effective Solo Singers

The performances of yesterday do not call for extended comment, save that one marvelled again at the broad understanding and the quick sympathies of this conductor when he interpreted the charming pieces of the most poetic musical genius that America has yet known—Edward MacDowell. Saint-Saens' music was on the whole excellently sung by the chorus and by a capable and well prepared quartet of soloists, consisting of Miss Olive Klein, Mrs. Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath. But with due respect to the occasion and to the taste of Mr. Rabaud, we must confess that we found this composition deadly dull. As an impressive marshalling of choral and orchestral hosts, with effective solo singers, it is without doubt a valuable piece for an occasion. As such, let it be blessed and forgotten.

The dominating thou... of the noon was regret at the ... so remarkable a musician, ... a man as Mr. Rabaud, ... for his invaluable services to ... munity. Long may he live ... tinue in the service and glorification ... the art he loves!

POST MAY 6.

1919 POP SEASON OPENED

Absence of Wet Refreshments Keeps None Away

The Pop season at Symphony Hall opened last night with a record-breaking attendance and an orchestra which surpassed its most brilliant record of previous Pop seasons in the qualities of the performances which were conducted by Jacchia.

FIRST DRY SEASON

If any feared that the absence of claret in the lemonade would make any difference to the public of these concerts they were quickly shown their error. The audience has seldom been at this early stage in the Pop season so large and so brilliant. Many musicians, social leaders, artists, as well as business men, and whole families came to enjoy the evening made part of it. John S. Sargent, the artist, and George Longy, the celebrated first oboist of the orchestra, sat within a few seats of each other. Everyone was in the highest spirits, and the orchestra was applauded to the echo.

To the eye there were a few new things about the hall. Greenery on the stage relieved the formality of the rows of orchestra seats. Girl waitresses took the place of the men of previous seasons, and gave touch of pleasing novelty to the occasion.

Capable Orchestra

The conductor of these concerts is fortunate indeed with the orchestra at his disposal. The Pop orchestra this season numbers 80, and these 80 represent a band of players probably without a superior in the world, both as regards technical capacity to play everything ever written.

Mr. Jacchia knows what his men can do, and he, an enthusiastic and extremely capable conductor, does not hesitate to put them through their paces. The concert opened with the brilliant and barbaric march, "The Entrance of the Boyars," by Halvorsen. Then came the overture to "William Tell." There were two charming small pieces by Scarlatti, instrumentated by Mr. Jacchia. There was music from "La Tosca" and "Carmen."

"Scheherazade" on list

At the end of the second group of the programme was the ... music which the great Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff, penned for the finale of his piece after Persian ... "Scheherazade," a marvellous piece of music, of incomparable power and caprice and splendor, played by a band of virtuosos who drove every ... home.

In the history of these concerts there has probably not been so brilliant an opening, either from the standpoint of music or of public attendance and appreciation. There was in the air the excitement and enthusiasm of an opening night, a feeling which stimulates musician and hearer alike. At the ... the programme Mr. Jacchia had a number of popular pieces, and the concert came to an end with Chabrier's exhilarating music based on Spanish ... "Espana." Among the encores was Jacchia's arrangement of the ... Russian song sung by the boatmen on the Volga. The audience stayed to the last note and appeared loth to go.

Loan Night Tonight

The Pop concert tonight, for which a very attractive programme has been arranged, will be the occasion of a speech in behalf of the Victory Loan by Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury, and Vice-Admiral William S. Sims of the United States navy. Eleven hundred balcony seats will be sold to the public. The rest will be given away. Popular songs will be sung from 7:15 to 8 p. m.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TIGHT BINDING

POST, MAY 6,

919 POP SEASON OPENED

Absence of Wet Refreshments Keeps None Away

The Pop season at Symphony Hall ...ned last night with a record-break... attendance and an orchestra ...ch surpassed its most brilliant rec... of previous Pop seasons in the ...ities of the performances which ...e conducted by Jacchia.

FIRST DRY SEASON

...any feared that the absence of ...et in the lemonade would make any ...rence to the public of these con... they were quickly shown their ...r. The audience has seldom been ...his early stage in the Pop season ...arge and so brilliant. Many mu...ns, social leaders, artists, as well ...usiness men, and whole families out ...njoy the evening made part of it. ...S. Sargent, the artist, and Georges ...gy, the celebrated first oboist of ...orchestra, sat within a few seats of ...other. Everyone was in the high... spirits, and the orchestra was ap...ded to the echo.

...the eye there were a few new ...s about the hall. Greenery on the ...e relieved the formality of the rows ...orchestra seats. Girl waitresses ...the place of the men of previous ...ons, and gave touch of pleasing ...lty to the occasion.

Capable Orchestra

...e conductor of these concerts is ...mate indeed with the orchestra at ...disposal. The Pop orchestra this ...on numbers 80, and these 80 repre... a band of players probably without ...perior in the world, both as re... technical capacity to play every... ever written.

...Jacchia knows what his men can ...and, he, an enthusiastic and ex...ly capable conductor, does not ...ate to put them through their ... The concert opened with the ...ant and barbaric march, "The En...e of the Boyars," by Halvorsen. ...came the overture to "William ...." There were two charming ...pieces by Scarlatti, instru...ated by Mr. Jacchia. There was ...o from "La Tosca" and "Carmen."

"Scheherazade" on List

...the end of the second group of ...programme was the maddening ...c which the great Russian, Rim...Korsakoff, penned for the finale of ...piece after Persian folk-lore, ...eherazade," a marvellous piece of ...c, of incomparable power and ...ss and splendor, played by a band ...virtuosos who drove every note ...

...the history of these concerts there ...probably not been so brilliant an ...ing, either from the standpoint of ...c or of public attendance and ap...ation. There was in the air the ex...ent and enthusiasm of an opening ..., a feeling which stimulates mu...n and hearer alike. At the last of ...programme Mr. Jacchia had a num... of popular pieces, and the concert ... to an end with Chabrier's swift...ng music based on Spanish airs, ...ana." Among the encores was Mr. ...hia's arrangement of the famous ...lian song sung by the boatmen of ...Volga. The audience stayed to the ...note and appeared loth to go.

Loan Night Tonight

...Pop concert tonight, for which a ...attractive programme has been ar...d, will be the occasion of speeches ...alf of the Victory Loan by Carter ..., Secretary of the Treasury, and ...Admiral William S. Sims of the ...d States navy. Eleven hundred ...y seats will be sold to the public. ...st will be given away. Patriotic ...will be sung from 7:15 to 8 p. m.

—(V)—(V)—(V)—(V)—(V)—(V)—

...ERTISER AMERICAN, MAY 4,

M. RABAUD IN FAREWELL APPEARANCE

Melodious Symphony Concert His Last Offering to Boston

CONDUCTOR GIVEN OVATION AT CLOSE

Works of MacDowell and St. Saens Ably Presented

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

MacDowell—Sylvan suite for orchestra.
St. Saens—"The Lyre and the Harp." Ode for solo voices, chorus and orchestra.

Everything was tuneful, popular and comprehensible in this last concert at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with which M. Rabaud took his farewell from Boston.

MacDowell's Suite in A minor is not his greatest orchestral work and it sometimes reflects the influence of his friend Raff, but it is tuneful and poetic, a graceful, unstrained work. First it pictures the "Haunted Forest" in which there is evidently the ghost of a piccolo player in the woods.

Very delightful is the third movement, "October" which is brief enough to be February, a brevity which we wish some of our overswollen ones would imitate. It had just the glorious atmosphere of a New England Autumn, and the horns and woodwind are beautifully present in its measure.

"The Shepardess" is chiefly quite supported by muted strings and a horn instead of the oboe, which one would naturally expect in a picture of rustic innocence. The Finale is "Forest Spirits" (not moonshine whiskey, or Southrons, nor ghostly revelry) of a sparkling fairy-like, rather than of a morbid order. The whole work is one of the pleasant, enjoyable compositions of the native repertoire, full of poetic themes, well harmonized, well developed, well scored, and no attempt is made to astonish or to overwhelm anybody. Wherefore there was much applause.

SPICY INSTRUMENTATION.

St. Saens' "Lyre and Harp" is a comparatively early work, written for a Birmingham festival in England, and the composer is evidently careful not to become too abstruse for the audience he expected. There is fugal work, but never involved, and there are two guiding motives which even the youngest amateur can follow, and there are tunes and spicy instrumentation.

It is Victor Hugo's ode, representing Christianity and Paganism, upset into English by a translator who certainly deserves the boomerang prize. It is the weakest translation that we have seen in a long time. The Harp (Christianity) represents austerity and stern morality, while the Lyre (Paganism) is entirely given over to unseemly pleasure and frivolity, but the harp is copiously used in the passages representing the lyre. The subject is not a dramatic one, and becomes a trifle tedious.

There was a chorus of about 100, which had been finely trained by Stephen Townsend, who has done much good work on the choral side of these concerts. The soloists—Miss Olive Kline, soprano; Mrs. Merle Alcock, alto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reginald Werrenrath, bass—were well balanced and generally good.

After a soft passage upon the organ, unison, and a contrasted theme which suggests that St. Saens had heard "Tannhaeuser" we get these two themes treated in alternation, giving the effect of a diluted Wagner. The Pagans go first to the bat with a chorus, "Sleep, Apollo's Fairest Son," after which the Christians get their innings with an alto solo, "Awake, Child of Poverty," excellently sung by Mrs. Alcock.

The club sandwich style of alternation is continued by a Pagan chorus and a Christian alto and bass solo, after which comes a more lengthy and important chorus, "Sing on, Jupiter Reigns," which makes the first score on the Pagan side. Jupiter reigns in a mildly contrapuntal manner and dabbles a little in fugue, as Handel had replaced Wagner on the Pagan batting list.

This chorus, very well given, was the first important number, the accompaniment being finely developed and the whole being a good combination of classical and popular. Christianity now tries to even the score with a tenor solo and chorus, but in spite of the excellence of Mr. Hackett and the power of the chorus, the preceding number was the more worthy.

TWO POPULAR DUETS.

Part II. begins with a soprano solo, one of the large numbers of the work, sung broadly and expressively given by Miss Kline. It pictures "The Eagle and the Dove," but here some particulars were shown, for while the eagle ... the flute. That ... Samson ... made her nest in ... Delilah," for the downward chromatic sextolets of the flute were afterwards used to much better advantage in the great love song of that opera.

Two popular duets are in Part II., one for soprano and alto, and one for alto and tenor. Both were clearly tuneful and directly popular music. But the most popular solo number of the entire work is given to the baritone, another hit for the pagan side, it is rather Omar Khayyam-ish, and is entitled "Be Glad." It is intentionally a trifle superficial or vulgar, with drums, cymbals and triangle in the accompaniment to add to its spice. Of course it praises pleasure and does so in a bright three-eight rhythm, with a syncopation frequent on the second beat—a species of waltz with hiccoughs.

Sung by Mr. Werrenrath, which means that it was very well sung, this won a decided success and always will with the general public, although it is a little beneath even a Birmingham Festival work. Although applauded by the audience, it was at once rebuked by the Christian side who now came up for the final innings. A severe and stern quartet in which the theme of the harp (religion) was heard reproved this melodic frivolity, and then came an epilogue, short and indecisive, which did not inform us as to which side had won. It ended pianissimo and was excellently shaded.

This is a work which has direct melodies, clear treatment throughout, a sort of halfway house between scientific and popular music. But we scarcely found it the best number for our great symphony concerts. Altogether, then, the last concert of the season asd M. Rabaud's conductorship was a refreshingly easy one, just a species of "omelette soufflee" dessert to the heavier musical banquet that had gone before.

RABAUD GIVEN OVATION.

At its close M. Rabaud had an ovation of which any conductor might be proud. He was recalled over and again and shouts and hurrahs rang through Symphony Hall, an affectionate farewell to a conductor who has conquered his way here.

But there was a little coda after all this. As soon as the public had departed on Friday afternoon, the chorus gathered in the foyer and had M. Rabaud brought before them. They then and there took revenge upon him for his use of the baton over them by presenting him with a silver loving cup. There was sly malice in this, for if he should stay in America he can only drink lemonade, ginger ale or milk out of it after July 1. But he evades this by immediately going abroad.

A large number of musical notabilities were present at this function, but it was best of all to see Major Henry L. Higginson recovered from his recent illness and gracing the farewell of the popular ...

Pops to Begin Tomorrow Night

TOMORROW night the Pops will begin, and henceforth on all but Sunday evenings, for a period of ten weeks, Symphony Hall will be the scene of lively activity from 8 to 11.

Agide Jacchia enters upon his third season at the helm of the Pops Orchestra. Mr. Jacchia believes so strongly in cosmopolitanism in music that no wave of propaganda moves him; he not only believes, but has proved that the term "popular music" may include all kinds.

Two nights (Tuesday and Thursday) have been appropriated by the Liberty Loan Committee and a number of the 14th Engineers, respectively. Milliners' Night, Wednesday, May 7, will be a public affair, and all comers may watch lemonade disappearing under the latest styles in hats, while they listen to a special program dedicated to the sex that wears them, ranging from "The Queen of Sheba" to "Mademoiselle Modiste." The program of the opening night follows:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octet.....D. Scarlatti
(b) Capriccio for strings.....(1685-1757)
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet

Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solo (a) "Idyll"
(b) "Spanish Dance".....Holy
(Mr. Alfred Holy)
Enfantillage.....van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade"...Rimsky-Korsakoff

Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Randegger
"Love's Dream After the Ball".....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier

Loving Cup for M. Rabaud

MR. AND MRS. STEPHEN TOWNSEND, Judge Frederick Cabot and the guest of honor received at the reception given in the foyer of Symphony Hall Friday afternoon immediately after the concert for M. Rabaud, when he was presented by Judge Cabot with a loving cup given by the members of the chorus, and at the same time a silver Paul Revere pitcher, a reproduction of the one in the Art Museum, was given Mrs. Rabaud. There were about 250 in the company, and later tea was served. Presiding over the tables were Miss Phyllis Robbins, Miss Susan Dabney, Mrs. Galen Stone and Mrs. Ernest Dane.

JUNE 2, TRANSCRIPT,

Here in Boston

According to custom the management of the Symphony Orchestra will not announce until autumn the "assisting artists" engaged for the concerts of next winter. They cannot, however, prevent the announcement in the spring by the "artists" themselves of what they consider an honor. Thus word comes today from Mr. Bonner, the eminent organist, that he will be heard at the Symphony Concerts early in December.

At Symphony Hall, this evening, Mr. Strube begins his term as "guest-conductor" of The Pops—a stay likely to continue until Mr. Jacchia's good health is firmly restored. Of old, when the conductor for these concerts was chosen from the ranks of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Strube was by far the ablest and the best-liked of such leaders. Bostonians have not heard him since he departed to Baltimore six years ago to join the teaching staff of the Peabody Institute. There, however, for three years past, he has gathered and led a Baltimore Symphony Orchestra of appreciable merit. Thus the conductor returns to Symphony Hall ripened in his calling. For this evening he sets the following programme:

Prelude to the Opera, "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon".....Weber
Romanza .....Cella
Fantasia from the Opera, "Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde,"
.....Wagner
Serenade .....Strube
Hymn to Saint Cecilia.....Gounod
(Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; Harp, Mr. Holy; Organ, Mr. Snow)
Finale from the Symphony in F minor (No. 4) .....Chaikovsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "Sometime" .....Friml
Revery, "The Voice of Chimes".....Lugini
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
"In the Hall of the Mountain King," from the Incidental Music to Ibsen's Play, "Peer Gynt" .....Grieg

To those who, as friends or as enemies, profess to be concerned over the future of the Symphony Orchestra in its own town and in other cities, it is timely to say that on June 1, 1919, every seat is taken by subscription for every one of the ten concerts in New York that do not begin until next November. And some have been saying that the New York public of the orchestra would not "stand for" Mr. Monteux as conductor!

Those Slipping Types Again—Boston is to be congratulated and so is Pierre Monteux. The post in the city of the Sacred God pays the neat little sum of $20,000 a year. It is by far the best paying conductorship in the United States, and when you say that you are saying the world.

—Pittsburgh Gazette

HERALD, BOSTON MAY 4

OPENING WEEKS OF THE POPS

Tomorrow night the Pops will begin, and henceforth on all but Sunday evenings, for a period of 10 weeks, Symphony Hall will be the scene of lively activity from 8 to 11.

Mr. Jacchia will enter upon his third season transformed from an operatic conductor of the purest Italian sort into an all-round symphonist. Not only has he learned to catch the spirit of a symphonic suite, a rousing march or—what is hardest of all—a Viennese waltz—but his interest in this side of music is as extensive as his repertory. Mr. Jacchia believes so strongly in cosmopolitanism in music he has proved that the term "popular music" may include all kinds. There is music of "fibre" on every one of Mr. Jacchia's programs, and that music by no means brings less applause.

Two nights (Tuesday and Thursday) have been appropriated by the Liberty loan committee and a number of the 14th engineers (YD), respectively. However, the milliners' night, Wednesday, May 7, will be a public affair, and all comers may watch lemonade disappearing under the latest styles in hats while they listen to a special program dedicated to the sex that wears them, ranging from "The Queen of Sheba" to "Mlle. Modiste." The programs of the opening week follow:

Opening Night, Monday, May 5
Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
(a) Pastorale for wind octet.....Scarlatti
(b) Capriccio for strings.....Scarlatti
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Harp solos:
(a) "Idyl"
(b) "Spanish Dance".....Holy
Mr. Holy
Enfantillage.....Van Westerhout
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Sacrificial Dance from "The Promise of Medea".....Randegger
"Love's Dream After the Ball".....Czibulka
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Wednesday, May 7, Milliners' Night
March and Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Les Sirenes".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
'Cello solo, "The Swan".....Saint-Saens
Mr. Miquelle
"Children's Parade".....Van Westerhout
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda"
.....Ponchielli
Selection, "Mademoiselle Modiste".....Herbert
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song".....Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Friday, May 9
Coronation March, "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Madrigal .....Caccini
(Orchestrated by Mr. Jacchia)
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
"Roumanian Rhapsody".....Enesco
Organ solo, "Cantabile".....Franck
Mr. Snow
Giga for wind octet.....Van Westerhout
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Sinbad".....Romberg
Waltz, "La Bacarole".....Waldteufel
Nocturne, op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin-Jacchia
Introduction of Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Saturday, May 10
March, "Entrance of the Gladiators".....Fucik
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Minuet .....Puccini
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2.....Bizet
Violin solo, "Souvenir de Moscou"..Wieniawski
Mr. Hoffmann
"Romanza" .....Martucci
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Intermezzo, Act III., "Jewels of the Madonna" .....Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".Strauss
"Rondo d'Amour".....Van Westerhout
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

RECORD, MAY 6,

POP CONCERTS IN GAY OPENING AT SYMPHONY HALL

Waitresses and Soft Drinks Season's Innovations

By J. V. CLARK

The Pops, the same but different, opened their season at Symphony Hall last evening. The opening was a success in many ways. The orchestra is as large or larger than ever before. The program was excellently made, if a little solid. It contained much "good" music and some popular waltz tunes. Mr. Agide Jacchia, the conductor, who last year proved himself an ideal Pops conductor by reason of his sound musicianship, his acquaintance with a wide library of music, his unaggingfl zeal, zest, enthusiasm, punch and "pep," was again at the conductor's stand.

The presence of waitresses, instead of the old time honored waiters, and the presence of soft drinks in place of the semi-hard drinks of the day before the Prohibitionists ascended to power, were innovations so radical, so revolutionary, that the auditors at these most Bostonese of all-Bostonical entertainments blinked with amazement.

The passing of the he-waiter will probably bring forth few tears, in his place now appears a trim, efficient, willing maid, easy to look upon and easy to tip. The absence of the drinks of other days cannot be taken quite as easily. The hard drinks of the Pops were always paradoxical, they were so soft. Never distilled liquor served straight or in the form of any mixed drink. Light beers and wines were the hardest drinks obtainable. It would be untrue to say that many of the Pops patrons will not miss the slight stimulus of the malt and grape drinks but they must yield to the present situation. The management, if it cannot serve real drinks, will serve delicious soft drinks as possible. The management will make the entertainments on the stage even better than in other years. Some of the delights of the palate will have to give way to aural pleasures.

Record

POP CONCERTS

The Pops Concerts at Symphony Hall, which are under the full swing of their opening week, will take on an added glory this evening. It is to be Milliners' Night. Living "manikins" in the chic headgear of the coming summer will consume refreshing drinks with other mortals, float about the corriders in the intermissions, and listen to an appropriate programme.

V Victory proms will be innovations of the "Pops," which reopen at Symphony Hall, Monday night, as a welcome feature of the spring and summer season. Greater Boston's multitude of milliners as well as many from adjoining cities, will be much in evidence Wednesday night, which has been designated as "Milliners' Night." Conductor Agide Jacchia will again thrill with delight the large audiences, and for the mid-week programme announces that the motif of each number will be of especial interest to la femme. The selections will range from Mlle. Modiste to Madama Butterfly and "The Sirens." Millinery night at the "Pops" will be given under the auspices of the Boston Retail Millinery Association, Mr. A. A. Allendorff, president. The "wholesale" branch will be well represented also, and large blocks of seats have been assigned for these special hosts and their guests. The leaders among Boston wholesalers have announced that their guests will include the living models, a handsome coterie who display with so much chic and charm the chapeaux to be selected by milady. During the intermissions, these models will promenade, while vieing with their attractiveness will be many hostesses who are active members of the retail association.

A feature new to the Pops also will be the girl waiters, who will be very nattily attired in black, with a draped apron and fetching cap of Joffre blue voile. For Thursday night, the house has been taken by the 14th Engineers, and all are rejoicing that these returned heroes, who were the first Americans sailing from these shores, may forget the brunt of battle and its consequences in the bliss of music and its congenial accompaniment of tinkling glasses, delectable confections, and admiring fair friends.

MUSIC AND MUSICI...

NEW ENGLAND AND THE SYMPH... ORCHESTRA

A Field That It Has Cultivated T... Season Generously and Profitably — Lie Nailed About Departures from t... Band—Verse from Miss Lowell Abo... Mr. Loeffler — Mr. Ysaye's Summer ... Richard Strauss to Conduct in Vienna. Items and Opinions

IN one particular of which the Bo...tonian public of the Symphony O...chestra has heard little, it ... notably broadened its work in t... season now ending. For many yea... it has undertaken series of concerts ... Providence and Worcester, and annuall... paid a single but regular visit to Northamp...ton, New Bedford, and other cities of Mas...sachusetts. Last winter and this spri... it has added to these expeditions o... casional concerts in Lowell, Lawrenc... Haverhill or Fitchburg. These cities a... easy of access and return in a single eve...ing; the journey lays relatively small t... on the treasury of Symphony Hall; t... audiences have been large and the result... revenue considerable. Better still, ... new publics have heard the orches... Mr. Rabaud eagerly; enjoyed the m... acting as well as the lighter nur... the programme; and are now ... anticipating the renewal of the vi... season. Such cities as Lowell o... field, for example, such a college ... Northampton, readily yield an audi... a symphony concert; but relatively ... do the orchestras of New York jo... thither; while almost as rarely until ... season has the Boston band descend... upon them.

On all these occasions the orchest... could have asked for no more recepti... audience, while that audience, in turn, h... given every sign of lively pleasure. T... Symphony Orchestra is indeed a natio... institution that Boston and New York, Ch...cago and San Francisco (when these ... moter cities have the chance) hear gladly. ... is none the less bound to cultivate the p...lic of New England in the metropoli... which it came into being and first gath... reputation. In the past, when all thi... were working in the well oiled rut ... routine, the management was somew... disposed to overlook this opportunity. N... it has seen and seized it with equal pleasu... and profit to all concerned. So in Euro... the celebrated orchestra of Mr. Mengelbe... at Amsterdam takes the whole of Holla... for its field, and similarly widens prest... and public. Mr. Monteux should go glad... next winter to these New England co...certs.

Here in Boston

There is no truth whatever in the ... surd report now going about the town t... twenty, thirty and even forty men of ... Symphony Orchestra will leave the ba... at the end of the present season in Ju... because they are dissatisfied with the co...ditions under which they now work or a... anxious over the future of the concer... As a matter of fact a few players a... quitting the orchestra when The Pops a... done because they are engaged only for t... season of 1918-19. A few more are betai...ing themselves of their own motion to wha... they believe better posts with the Philade...phia or the Detroit Orchestra, each ... which is improving its personnel. T... total number of departures in both cat...gories is less than ten and almost whol... among secondary players. A trade-journ... of music in Chicago is the presumab... source of these yarns, while gossip in Bo...ton has also sped them. Evidently th... Symphony Orchestra has sufficiently re... gained its prestige to stir the malice ... those who dislike or dread it.

Among the interesting pieces that Mr... Jacchia will put upon the programmes o... The Pops next week are his own arrange...ment for small orchestra of an ancien... madrigal by Caccini, announced for Friday... evening; the second suite from Bizet'... music to the play, "L'Arlésienne," listed... for Saturday; and the introduction to th... third act of "Lohengrin"—for Friday— the... first measures of Wagner's music to b... heard in Boston for nearly a year.

Frequenters of concerts hereabouts will read with interest of the engagement and approaching marriage of Miss Renée Long... to Mr. Georges Miquelle, one of the Frenc... violoncellists of the Symphony Orchestra. The comely daughter of the excellent oboist of Symphony Hall, Miss Longy has bee... a familiar figure in our concert halls often as intent listener, sometimes as pleasur...able performer. As Mme. Miquelle those who have known her as Miss Longy wil... expect to see and hear her with the old pleasure.

...and hearer alike. At the last of ...programme Mr. Jacchia had a num... of popular pieces, and the concert ... to an end with Chabrier's swift...ng music based on Spanish airs, ...ana." Among the encores was Mr. ...hia's arrangement of the famous ...lian song sung by the boatmen of ...Volga. The audience stayed to the ...note and appeared loth to go.

...the flute. That ... Samson ... made her nest in ... Delilah," for the downward chromatic sextolets of the flute were afterwards used to much better advantage in the great love song of that opera.

Two popular duets are in Part II., one for soprano and alto, and one for alto and tenor. Both were clearly tuneful and directly popular music. But the most popular solo number of the entire work is given to the baritone, another hit for the pagan side, it is rather Omar Khayyam-ish, and is entitled "Be Glad." It is intentionally a trifle superficial or vulgar, with drums, cymbals and triangle in the accompaniment to add to its spice. Of course it praises pleasure and does so in a bright three-eight rhythm, with a syncopation frequent on the second beat—a species of waltz with hiccoughs.

Sung by Mr. Werrenrath, which means that it was very well sung, this won a decided success and always will with the general public, although it is a little beneath even a Birmingham Festival work. Although applauded by the audience, it was at once rebuked

THIRD WEEK OF THE POP CONCERTS

For Tuesday, May 20, the Temple Israel has engaged the entire floor at the Pop Conserts in Symphony Hall to entertain the Union of Congregations and Federation of Temple Sisterhoods who are holding their national convention in Boston May 19-22. Thursday, May 22, has a Russian program, and Friday is Roxbury Latin School night. The program for tomorrow follows:

Overture "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Aubade Printaniere .....Lacombe
Traumerei .....Schumann
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"...Saint-Saens
Carnival in Italy .....Cella
Viola Solos: a. Melodie; b. Bagatelle.....
(Mr. Florian Whittmann) .....Wittmann
Serenade .....Schubert-Jacchia
(Mr. Carl Lamson, accompanist)
Scherzo from the "Eroica" Sympathony....
Dance, "Piemontesi" .....Beethoven
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Singaglia
Valse des Fleurs from the "Nutcracker" Suite
.....Tschaikowsky
Bacchanale (The Venusberg Mountain) from "Tannhauser" .....Wagner

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

AMERICAN, MAY 6,

POPS STILL POPULAR THOUGH VERY 'DRY'

TRAVELER, TUESDAY, MAY 6,

BIG AUDIENCE AT OPENING OF POPS

The Pops opened in Symphony Hall last night with Agide Jacchia conducting the eighty-piece orchestra, and will be continued for a period of ten weeks, nightly except Sundays. This is the third season that Mr. Jacchia has led this body.

It is certainly a welcome event judging from the throngs of music-loving Bostonians that turned out for the initial performance last evening. The main floor was crowded, every table being occupied long before the first number. Both galleries were likewise crowded.

Mr. Jacchia came to his flower-decked stand 'mid thunderous applause. The first interpretation was the "Entrance of The Boyards," by Halvorsen. This was wildly acclaimed. Likewise the overture from "William Tell." The third was a double number, the "Pastorale" and "Capriccio." The latter was for string instruments.

The "Fantasia, Carmen" was a beautiful interpretation. The harp solo by Alfred Holy, "Idyll," and the "Spanish Dance," received a number of encores. It was the hit of the evening. The balance of the program consisted of "Rondo Capriccioso," by Mendelssohn; "Enfantillage," by van Westerhout; "Finale of Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Fantasia from La Tosca"; "Sacrificial Dance from The Promise of Medea," "Love's Dream After The Ball," and the "Rhapsody, Espana."

Tuesday night is reserved for the Liberty Loan Committee for the boosting of the Fifth Victory Loan at which prominent speakers will be present. However, Wednesday will give those present an opportunity to gaze upon the latest millinery styles, as this night is to be known as "Milliner's Night." A special program is arranged.

TIMES, New York City, MAY 11, 191

Musicians and the Loan.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of men of seventeen nationalities, is officially "100 per cent. subrally for the Victory Loan, when one of Frieda Hempel helped to put the loan over the top at Norfolk, Va., last Monday. She sang and offered $5,000 for bonds, while others took $50,000.

Amparito Farrar was a volunteer to accompany Colonel Haywood, Representative Hicks, and the Mayor of Louvain on an up-State tour for the loan.

Max Rosen played at Brooklyn's big rally for the Victory loan, when one of the large pledges was offered if the violinist would give Schubert's "Ave Maria," as an encore.

POPS BEGIN NEXT WEEK

Next Monday night, May 5th, the Pop concerts will begin, and henceforth on all but Sunday evenings, for a period of ten weeks, Symphony hall will be the scene of lively activity from eight to eleven.

Agide Jacchia, who is about to have his third season at the helm of the Pops Orchestra, has become an indispensible part of the Pops. Although primarily a conductor of Italian Opera. he has had a marked success in catching the occulent spirit of a rousing march, a symphonic suite, an operetta selection or —what is hardest of all—a Viennese Waltz.

TRAVELER, MAY 10,

SECOND WEEK OF POPS MONDAY

Wednesday and Thursday Evenings Special

The Pops start in on their second week at Symphony Hall next Monday night. Two of the evenings will be special nights, Wednesday, Booksellers' night, in honor of the annual convention of the booksellers in this city, and Thursday, Professional Woman's night.

Monday night's program is a fair sample of the care and success with which Mr. Jacchia selects his numbers. It is as follows:

Wedding March.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc".....Verdi
Gavotte.....Martini
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Suite, "Roma".....Bizet
"Ave Maria".....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Selection, "Jack o'Lantern".....Caryll
Canzone.....Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tschaikowsky

OPENING NIGHT AT THE POPS

POPS OPEN SEASON WITH BIG HOUSE

Jacchia's Program and Conducting Make Hit

It evidently didn't require the big electric "Pops" sign outside Symphony Hall last night to acquaint the music lovers of Greater Boston with the fact that the Pops season for 1919 was on, for they were pouring into the hall long before the 8 o'clock starting hour at a rate that threatened to trot out the standing room only sign.

The audience was a regular Pops gathering, democratic as usual, Back Bay and Brookline mixing with the representatives of the humbler walks of life, all thoroughly enjoying this particularly and much envied Boston institution now in its 34th season. Agide Jacchia, the popular conductor, was kept busy several minutes when he came to the flower surrounded conductor's stand acknowledging the audience's applause. He opened with a stirring rendition of the "Star Spangled Banner." Would that other conductors could put the fire into their directing Mr. Jacchia does.

As usual with his programs, the numbers caught the fancy of the house with the result that encores were enthusiastically demanded throughout the evening. If one missed the occasional pop of opening a bottle of beer, ale or wine, owing to the fact this year's Pops are on a prohibition plane, he was more than compensated by the improved service afforded through the substitution of charming young ladies, becomingly attired, for the none too satisfactory men waiters of previous seasons. The refreshments and soft drinks were freely patronized and "smokes" were in demand throughout the evening. It was good to see so many young fellows in service uniform enjoying the concert.

Another innovation this year, pleasing to all, was the larger type used in the printing of the placard announcement of extra numbers. One can read them from any part of the hall without straining his eyes. To mention the hits of the evening would be to enumerate the numbers on the program with the exception added.

Tonight's concert will be for the Liberty loan committee, there being no tickets for sale to the public, but for tomorrow night, "Milliners' night," Mr. Jacchia has arranged a program that bids fair to fill the house.

POST, MAY 7,

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, which are under the fully swing of their opening week, will take on an added glory this evening. It is to be Milliners' night. Living "manikins" in the latest headgear of the coming summer will consume refreshing drinks with other mortals, float about the corridors during intermissions, and listen to the following appropriate programme, the titles of which describe ladies of all degrees, climes and morals:

March and Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba".....Goldmark
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Les Sirenes".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
'Cello solo, "The Swan".....Saint-Saëns
Children's Parade.....van Westerhout
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Selection, "Mademoiselle Modiste".....Herbert
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar

TRAVELER, TUESDAY, MAY 13,

Twin Waitresses at Pops Have Patrons Guessing

(Photo by Horner)

Here are the twin waitresses at the Pops concert. They are Maud, on the left, and Dora Patterson, who look so much alike they had to be assigned to opposite corners of Symphony Hall, so as not to confuse patrons.

Patterson Sisters Now Assigned to Opposite Corners

When you are at Pops be careful that you don't stop Miss Maud Patterson and demand what she is carrying to another customer on a tray, because it may have been Miss Dora who took your order.

The Patterson sisters, twin waitresses at Pops, look so much alike that their patrons get all mixed up and wonder why their waitress does not stop, when in reality the waitress they see is not their waitress at all, but her sister.

Such an occurrence transpired on the opening night of the Pops concert. A patron who had ordered a bottle saw "his waitress" passing. He thought it was his bottle too, and his supposed grievances began to weigh on him until the bottle came along on the arm of a waitress who looked the spitting image of the waitress who had served him.

REDUCTION RATIO

13x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TIGHT BINDING

140

...MAY 10,

WEEK OF POPS MONDAY

...sday and Thursday ...venings Special

...start in on their second week ...Hall next Monday night. ...evenings will be special ...Wednesday, Booksellers' night, ...the annual convention of the ...in this city, and Thursday, ...Woman's night.

...night's program is a fair ...the care and success with ...Jacchia selects his numbers. ...follows:

...Mendelssohn
...Jeanne d'Arc" ... Verdi
...Martini
...Gounod
...Organ, Mr. Snow. ... Bizet
...Schubert-Wilhelmj
...Organ, Mr. Snow.
...Rachmaninoff
...Tannhaeuser" ... Wagner
...Will o'Lantern" ... Caryll
...Van Westerhout
...Waldteufel
...Fourth Symphony ... Tschaikowsky

...ight the fancy of the house with ...that encores were enthusi- ...demanded throughout the even- ...one missed the occasional pop ...a bottle of beer, ale or wine, ...the fact this year's Pops are ...prohibition plane, he was more ...compensated by the improved ser- ...vorded through the substitution of ...young ladies, becomingly at- ...the none too satisfactory men ...of previous seasons. The re- ...nts and soft drinks were freely ...zed and "smokes" were in de- ...throughout the evening. It was ...see so many young fellows in ...uniform enjoying the concert. ...her innovation this year, pleas- ...all, was the larger type used in the ...of the placard announcement ...numbers. One can read them ...any part of the hall without strain- ...his eyes. To mention the hits of ...evening would be to enumerate the ...ers on the program with the extras ...d.

...ight's concert will be for the Lib- ...loan committee, there being no ...ts for sale to the public, but for ...rrow night, "Milliners' night," Mr. ...hia has arranged a program that ...fair to fill the house.

...OST, MAY 7,

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

...The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, ...ich are under the fully swing of their ...ening week, will take on an added ...ry this evening. It is to be Milliners' ...ht. Living "manikins" in the chic ...adgear of the coming summer will ...sume refreshing drinks with other ...rtals, float about the corridors in the ...ermissions, and listen to the follow- ...g appropriate programme, the titles ...which describe ladies of all decades, ...mes and morals:

...rch and Cortege from "The Queen of ...heba" ... Gounod
...erture, "Merry Wives of Windsor" ... Nicolai
...altz, "Les Sirenes" ... Waldteufel
...ntasia, "Madama Butterfly" ... Puccini
...let Suite, "Sylvia" ... Delibes
...llo solo, "The Swan" ... Saint-Saens
...ildren's Parade ... van Westerhout
...nce of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" ... Ponchielli
...lection, "Mademoiselle Modiste" ... Herbert
...ve Angelique ... Rubinstein
...altz, "Wine, Woman and Song" ... Strauss
...arch, "Pomp and Circumstance" ... Elgar

...ase it may have been Miss Dorothy ...took your order.

The Patterson sisters, twin waitresses at Pops, look so much alike that their patrons get all mixed up and wonder why their waitress does not stop, when in reality the waitress they see is not their waitress at all, but her sister.

Such an occurrence transpired on the opening night of the Pops concert. A patron who had ordered a bottle saw "his waitress" passing. He thought it was his bottle too, and his supposed grievances began to weigh on him until his own bottle came along on the arm of a twin.

Such confusion has forced the steward to assign the Patterson twins to opposite corners of the hall.

The Patterson twins have to dress exactly alike while they are waiting on the patrons of Symphony Hall. On the street they can be seen in almost identical garments.

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 6,

THE POPS OF 1919

NEW VARIATIONS ON A FAMILIAR THEME

Two Publics Now Frequent the Concerts, and Warily Conductor and Manager Hold the Balance Even—Mr. Jacchia's Signal and Many-Sided Merits—Old Ways Give Place to Saving Substitute or Fresh Device

TWO publics now frequent The Pops and a discreet management has difficulties, no doubt, to hold even the balance between them. One of these publics fills the lower balcony nightly; is numerous in the upper balcony; is by no means unrepresented at the tables of the floor. It comes to a Pop, primarily as it would go to any other concert—to hear the music of the evening for itself and to hear four-fifths of a noted orchestra playing it. A year or two ago these listeners rejoiced when the band was raised in number from fifty or sixty to seventy or eighty—to the whole Symphony Orchestra except a score of "principals" whose contracts exempt them from these spring and summer concerts. This public is as pleased when items from the "standard repertory" of the Symphony Concerts slip into a Pop, as did, last evening (when the new series began) the final division of Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from The Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade" or Chabrier's full-throated and stout-rhythmed rhapsody, "España"; as will Enesco's graphic and titillating Roumanian Rhapsody and the tumbling finale of Chaikovsky's fourth symphony later in the week. Grateful to these hearers also are the old overtures to "William Tell," to "Mignon" and the like, the waltzes of the elder Strauss, the "popular classics" that recumbent upon the shelves of the orchestral library from July through April, bestir themselves at the beginning of each May for their spring of speech from the stage of Symphony Hall. Yet this public is not displeased when it hears a potpourri from a current musical play or an unforgotten operetta. It would dine well, musically, when it comes to a Pop, but it does not forget that most dinners end with a dessert and mix the lighter dishes with the heavier.

The other and contrasting public would have only highly spiced viands, "fizzy" drinks, sweetmeats and syllabubs served in these spring repasts of music at Symphony Hall. If it had its unchecked way, the programmes of The Pops would seldom go much beyond sonorous or vivacious marches, a waltz here and there, endless "selections" from the musical plays of many vintages, and once and again ear-tickling trifles for small orchestra or solo instruments. For it, in particular, last evening, stood a Boyards' March, Czibulka's tinkling and treacly "Love's Dream after the Ball" and pretty little exercises for twinkling strings or solo harp; while by Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, it will be hearing and clapping "Mlle. Modiste," "Sinbad," and "Poet and Peasant." It is this public which annually draws and gilds a halo about the "Old Pops" as they flourished when the Symphony Orchestra sat on the stage of the "old" Music Hall, that rolls the word "high-brow" as a choice morsel under its tongue, and glances reproachfully toward those balconies when Mr. Hoffmann's violin begins the tale of "Scheherazade" or when the strings stalk through the first unisons of the Roumanian Rhapsody. Yet, if the observable truth is to be told, the bark of this public is worse than its bite. To The Pops it still flocks; and last evening it was plainly to be seen and heard applauding Scarlatti and Mendelssohn (in light arrangements of pleasant trifles) and even hanging intent upon the irresistible swirl and clang of the Russian music to the Arabian Nights—and also to Mr. Diaghilev's celebrated ballet.

Needless, almost, to say which of these two publics a conductor of Mr. Jacchia's

ability and ambition prefers, and as needless to note also the even hand with which he skilfully and discriminatingly gratifies now the one and now the other—and, indeed, the rest between. No conductor in the thirty-four springs of The Pops has made the "active repertory" so full and various as he; and none has put together programmes so well balanced between many tastes, expectations, and satisfactions. Mr. Jacchia is a leader who can make vivid play with rhythms, lay on the color richly, marshal his orchestra in striding progressions through large sonorities into upswelling climaxes; yet, no one can keep his strings a-shimmering at need to prompt his flutes, his oboes, his horns to their softest and most liquid tones. He is also a musician of keen mind, quick wit and catholic inclinations, a conductor who knows and cherishes the best of music, who is eager to try "new things," who knows but one discontent—the discontent of routine. Such a musician, such a man, summoned anew to The Pops and welcomed there by a public knowing and loving him, has his right to fragments of "Scheherazade," to "España," when he wills, either piece sound so richly, so vividly as did both last even[illegible] experiments with novelties, with Casella's Ringing [illegible] last year, as he will [illegible]

in this May and June. Moreover, is he who is soon to bring Wagner back to many a hungry and eager Bostonian ear. By the same token it was good to see his light hand and to hear his quick ear exercising strings and horns and woodinds in the lighter graces of one a[illegible] another piece upon his programme. As agreeably and by a signal virtue of these [illegible]tins, be they French or Italian, he can be both scholarly and amusing, as he was again when he turned Scarlatti's gentle and graceful Pastorale into an octet for wind instruments and then wrought the complementary Caprice into running and shining figures for the lighter strings.

Mr. Jacchia, however, would not be his balanced and dutiful self, did he not spend equal pains upon his "selections" from "Sinbad" upon his big-voiced marches, upon his other "popular" numbers. Not seldom, as with Czibkulka's glinting and laughing trifle last evening, he and the band almost transfigure them. Not one such piece goes carelessly or even in routine. No conductor of The Pops has hitherto held the orchestra so strictly to its work, kept a standard even for the "Sinbads"

and the "Angels' Dreams." To crown these virtues, Mr. Jacchia is also providing his audience with their only opera of the year. He has worked often in the theatre, he knows and hears his "Carmen" and his "Tosca" of Monday's programme, as music-drama on the stage. Quickly, keenly, he calls his audience to like vision and hearing. Once more, last evening, invisible but by no means inaudible, Carmen, Jose and Escamillo went to and fro in the gypsy tavern, the dawn broke over the battlements of Sant' Angelo and Floria Tosca and her Cavaradossi again sang their loves. Turn by turn and with equal illusion, Mr. Jacchia can make Symphony Hall at a Pop a concert-room, an opera house or a theatre. As this generation knows "these concerts," he is the paragon of conductors for them.

Usually the rest of the record of a first Pop in a new spring and a new series is only as playful routine as the recorder can make it. Last evening, however, change awaited him—discoverable, debatable, unescapable change. No longer are the "light refreshments," as the time-honored phrase still names them, either mildly vinous or pleasantly malted. A month or two before its time, the "soft drink" has entered into Symphony Hall and possessed the tables of The Pops. Where once sat the ale or the beer of metropolitan men, now sits the Sundae of the suburban schoolgirl; where once sparkled the wine of France, of Italy, of the Rhine, now flows the dull red stream of Nebraskan grape-juice or the amber slops—Bevos or Pablos—that mock the ancient glories of St. Louis and Milwaukee. Some of this "soft stuff" lifts its soporific head unabashed; other specimens of it with a superior sense of convivial decency, disguise themselves under ancient and honorable names—a "Pop Punch," for example, a "Loganberry Highball," and the like. "To what base uses we may return, Horatio!" Candies were properly proferred besides these "drinks" and the lettuce sandwich and other derelicts of the tea-table garnished them.

So be it. The passionate regulators of the habits of others, the fussy moralists who would end every pleasure for which they do not care, have so willed and theirs among a sentimental and busy folk, are the seats of the mighty. The Pops with the "soft stuff" of yesterday have merely taken time by the forelock and exhibited the spirit of resignation which we shall all be showing a month or two hence. It was in evidence last evening, among the samplers of the new beverages, while to encourage it, there were incidental compensations. Presentable young women, prettily set in grayish head gear and aprons, with here and there a bright bow, now minister to the thirsty and waitresses, as every one knows that freqnents Bostonian restaurants, are a Bostonian delight. These "girl waiters" do please the eye, but more please it the green trees that set the edge of the stage and the flowery bank that encloses the conductor. The palate may balk at these Pops of 1919, but the eye, as well as the ear, shall at least be gladdened. Mem. (As the old diarists used to write): You may still smoke—if you happen to be a man.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 7,

About a Bostonian Ban

England suffered infinitely more from the war than did the United States, but nobody there has been so inept as to exclude the music of Wagner from opera house or concert-hall. How pleasantly this contrasts with the situation in our Boston, the famous orchestra of which did not play a single Wagner number during the season just ending. And why did the Boston orchestra boycott Wagner? Because all of the great German masters were ignored? Oh, no; he was the only one, excepting those still living. Why was Wagner alone boycotted? Was it because a microscopic organization consisting of two men and a woman (Sherlock Holmes couldn't find any more) "agitated" specially against Wagner? Is Boston so easily cowed? Or was it because the Boston Orchestra was piloted by a Frenchman? But why should a Frenchman boycott Wagner any more than an Englishman? It was a French officer who said "We are making war on the Germans, not on their music." The only plausible explanation of the Boston boycott on Wagner is that Mr. Rabaud harbored resentment (or let us charitably say thought he ought to harbor resentment) against him because of his libretto, "A Capitulation," in which certain French statesmen were ridiculed during the siege of Paris in 1870.

The comic side of all this is that Wagner's farcical libretto was aimed at the Germans much more than at the French. In the final chorus the managers of the royal German theatres are introduced; they dance awkwardly and are mocked. Wagner himself wrote regarding "A Capitulation": "My subject touches on no other side of the French than one by the illumination of which we Germans are really mirrored in a much more ridiculous light than the French, who, in all their follies, are at least original, whereas we, in our disgusting imitation of them, sink far below the level of the ludicrous."

In view of these facts, does it not seem just a little amazing that the good people of Boston should have been for a whole season deprived of the pleasure of hearing the music of Wagner simply because Mr. Rabaud either did not know these facts or lacks a sense of humor? How about his successor? When Mr. Monteux was with the Russian Ballet he refused to conduct the music of Richard Strauss. That was understandable, for Strauss is still living, and it has since been tacitly agreed that living German composers should not be helped to a living by the performance of their works while the war is on. But will he, too, keep Wagner from his Boston and other audiences because of a chauvinistic misunderstanding nearly half a century old? If so, the tea-party spirit must have departed entirely from Boston, as well as all sense of humor. [The New York Evening Post

Items and Announcements

For reasons best known to the ingenious management of the Pop Concerts, this evening at them is "Milliners' Night." Hence possibly the appearance on Mr. Jacchia's programme of such titles as "Sirens," "Pomp and Circumstance," and "Mademoiselle Modiste." The list of pieces stands:

March from "The Queen of Sheba" ... Gounod
Overture to the Opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ... Nicolai
Waltz, "Sirens" ... Waldteufel
Fantasia from "Madama Butterfly" ... Puccini
Suite from the Ballet, "Sylvia" ... Delibes
Solo for Vlioncello, "The Swan" ... Saint-Saëns (Mr. Miquelle)
Children's Parade ... van Westerhout
Dance of the Hours ... Ponchielli
Selection from "Mlle. Modiste" ... Herbert Angelic Dream ... Rubinstein
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song" ... Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ... Elgar

The Symphony Concerts of next autumn are to begin relatively early on Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and Saturday evening, Oct. 11. The succession of them will be broken not only by the five monthly journeys to New York and other cities southward, but also by a week of concerts at midwinter in the Middle West.

HERALD, MAY 8,

MILLINERS HAVE GAY NIGHT AT POPS

Models Show Latest in Spring Headgear

"Mademoiselle Modiste" was never a milliner, but, through the tuneful Victor Herbert score she figured brilliantly in the course of "Milliners' night" at the Pops in Symphony Hall last night. It was in all a characteristic program, lightly and deftly attuned to the occasion, and Mr. Jacchia revealed genuine humor in his scheduled numbers.

It was during the intermissions that the milliners had their most spectacular moments. Models, very much alive, promenaded through the aisles and corridors, showing off the latest in spring headgear, designed by local artisans.

A YD hat worn and designed by Miss Lucretia Seymour of the House of Caroline, and a Victory loan hat created by Miss Frances Mooers of the same establishment, were two striking features. Three red, white and blue pompoms on the YD hat represented bombs, while the band circling the headpiece was offset with several YD insignias. The Victory hat, made in five parts, was also elaborated by the Roman numeral five.

Albert A. Allendorf, president of the New England Association, superintended the display. The principal Boston millinery houses represented included: C. A. Browning Co., Andrews Inc., Bowditch & Clapp, Clapp & Tilton Co., the New Hat Frame Co. Miss Emilien Levy model, showed several hats, but perhaps the most individual, was a moderate poke shape of white Georgette, with a false crown of black velvet ribbon fastened together with lacy circles of faggotting with coarse black silk. A band of the black velvet rims the hat with slightly fullled edges turned toward the crown and ends in a single streamer twisted under the chin and thrown over the shoulder. Miss Levy also wore a dressier hat of peach color Georgette with a crown entirely covered with flat silk flowers of the same delicate color.

Jockey Models.

Higgins & Gardner showed three distinctive hats, the most original being a jockey shape of taupe straw, placed on a tan Georgette circular brim. The effect was at once dressy and practical. A little lace brimmed hat had a crown completely built of curling ostrich feathers in leek green, each plume modified slightly by the addition of the merest touch of black glycerined ostrich.

Bowditch & Clapp were represented by six models. The most striking was a large turquoise poke shape, the brim cut away at the back, and two graceful plumes of rose and turquoise mixed nodded at the back.

The hat which attracted most comment, however, was a wide brimmed brown straw with a graceful edging of wired Georgette and some flowers about the crown. The richness of the materials gave this hat particular distinction.

A leghorn shape with a three-tiered brim of rose taffeta, and a crown of rose taffeta pulled slightly to the right and caught with little roses to the brim was another favorite.

The suits, wraps and coats worn by the models during the evening were the creditable products of Max Raphel.

Many retail houses were represented by young ladies wearing their samples, and among these were a few that one can only describe as "freak" hats—clever, they were, no doubt, but not in keeping with the purpose of the evening. People from far and wide gathered with the practical intention of getting summer ideas certainly achieved their purpose.

Boston.—Milliners' Night at the Pops concert, in Symphony Hall, was an innovation, the results of which were so promising, that a yearly repetition of the fete is anticipated. The idea was to present to those interested—and particularly to representatives of out of town millinery houses now in Boston for the summer opening weeks, styles originated and manufactured by Boston wholesale houses. Milliners' Night was launched under the auspices of the New England Millinery Association, and was attended in large numbers by the millinery interests from all over New England.

The models were presented by mannequins from several large wholesale houses. The concert pieces rendered by an orchestra were chosen with regard to their portrayal of the many-sided feminine character, and airs like "The Queen of Sheba," "Madame Butterfly," "Mademoiselle Modiste," and others were played.

Miss Blanchard, designer for C. A. Browning Co., displayed a degree of origination that was entirely backed up by workmanship, and her two pretty models, held the attention of the house through a series of dazzling changes. Perhaps the most striking was a "butterfly hat," of pale blue tulle, with a brim cut into petal shaped scallops at each side of the front and in one piece at the back. These sections of brim were bound with pale blue satin, and a further gleam of brightness was added by the iridescent bead trimming hanging about the sides of the crown half concealed in a wisp of maline.

This house showed another hat with a cut brim that was very striking, being two panels of leghorn bound with black satin, one on either side of a wide brim of Chantilly lace. At just the smartest angles on either side, waved graceful plumes of black paradise.

A Sally Hat.

Perhaps the best model of their many attractive hats was a Sally poke, narrow at the back, long at the front, made of smooth sand color moire taffeta, relieved by two plumes of mixed rose and sand color ostrich at the back.

Clapp & Tilton showed two black hats of the transparent variety. One had a brim of three narrowing tiers of satin bound maline, the maline crown banded by a wide bias fold of maline tied about at the base with a narrow black velvet ribbon, finishing in a flat bow with long ends tacked to the brim of the right side to follow the lines of the edge.

A crown of sparkling jet galloon, pierced with a long jet pin, brightened the other model, whose brim was made of two rows of pleated net.

Shannon Bros. showed three hats, one a black taffeta, stiff brimmed with a perky wired bow of the taffeta direct in front. Three large inflated loops stood up in the front flanked by a jaunty end wired to an upright position. The other end was skillfully brought back around the crown and along the right side of the brim. A bright red rose half closed, made a bright gleam of color nestling at the base of this flaunting bow. Shannon's hats were all good wearable styles with a distinction of line rather than materials. A little navy taffeta toque surounded by bright field flowers, had a double fold of navy maline turned straight up to form a screen for the gay buttercups and poppies.

POST, MAY 8,

Milliners' Night at Pops a Show in Color

THEY WENT TO THE MILLINERS' "POPS" LAST NIGHT.
Real "Pops" hats, wraps and all the "fixin's" were displayed by pretty girls. In a sapphire blue cape and a $300 chapeau, Miss Marie Sawter was a charming figure. Pretty Miss Florence Berlo wore a victory red coat with a "Spider" hat in silk maline.

No one is in doubt now what to wear at the Pops. Last night the New England milliners had their night at Symphony Hall and for the first time in the history of "Pops" models seated at tables and promenading showed suitable wraps, gowns and hats to the guests.

Thronged to capacity the great hall was aglow with the riotous "Victory" colors, which are this season embodied into smart evening apparel. Miss "YD" and "Miss Liberty Loan" were two features of the evening contributed by Madame Caroline. They were two red, white and blue hats, with crowns and brims adorned with "Y. D.'S" and "V.'S" and brought hearty applause from the audience.

Boston's stride as a millinery centre was given much prominence in the striking exhibition of C. A. Browning. Pretty girls featured exclusively evening and dance and restaurant hats of wonderful distinction.

The huge "war tax" hat worn by Miss Marie Sawyer was adorned with great sprays of Paradise plumes. Chantilly lace in black drooped over cut leghorn and the only crown was of silk maline which revealed the coiled coiffure beneath. Exclusively "Boston" made was this $300 beauty.

The spider-web hat is another Boston creation that would make Paris gasp a bit. Of turquoise blue silk maline the brim is cut petal fashion, hung in beads delicate enough to resemble the outlines of cobwebbing and surmounted by a wispy mist of a tam-o'shanter crown in maline. This atop of the head of Florence Berlo, worn with a Victory red satin wrap, was one of the bright lights of the most brilliant night of Boston's Victory Pops.

TIGHT BINDING

140

MAY 10,

EEK OF S MONDAY

nd Thursday gs Special on their second week next Monday night. ngs will be special Booksellers' night, nual convention of the this city, and Thursday, Woman's night.

program is a fair are and success with selects his numbers.

Mendelssohn
d'Arc" ..... Verdi
..... Martini
..... Gounod
gan, Mr. Snow.
..... Bizet
..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
gan, Mr. Snow.
..... Rachmaninoff
nnhaeuser" ..... Wagner o'Lantern" ..... Caryll
..... Van Westerhout
..... Waldteufel
Symphony ..... Tschaikowsky

the fancy of the house with encores were enthusiended throughout the evenmissed the occasional pop bottle of beer, ale or wine. fact this year's Pops are bition plane, he was more nsated by the improved ser through the substitution of ung ladies, becomingly atnone too satisfactory men previous seasons. The re and soft drinks were freely "smokes" were in deout the evening. It was so many young fellows in orm enjoying the concert. nnovation this year, pleasthe larger type used in the the placard announcement umbers. One can read them part of the hall without strainyes. To mention the hits of would be to enumerate the the program with the extras concert will be for the Libcommittee, there being no sale to the public, but for night, "Milliners' night," Mr. arranged a program that fill the house.

MAY 7,

IGHT AT THE POPS

p concerts at Symphony Hall, under the fully swing of their week, will take on an added his evening. It is to be Milliners' Living "manikins" in the chic of the coming summer will refreshing drinks with other float about the corridors in the missions, and listen to the followppropriate programme, the titles which describe ladies of all decades, and morals:

Cortege from "The Queen of ..... Gounod
"Merry Wives of Windsor" .. Nicolai
"Les Sirenes" ..... Waldteufel
"Madama Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
"The Swan" ..... Saint-Saens
Parade ..... van Westerhout
the Hours, from "LaGioconda" Ponchielli
"Mademoiselle Modiste" .... Herbert
Angelique ..... Rubinstein
"Wine, Woman and Song" ..... Strauss
"Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar

Pops, look so much alike that their patrons get all mixed up and wonder why their waitress does not stop, when in reality the waitress they see is not their waitress at all, but her sister. Such an occurrence transpired on the opening night of the Pops concert. A patron who had ordered a bottle saw "his waitress" passing. He thought it was his bottle too, and his supposed grievances began to weigh on him until his own bottle came along on the arm of a twin. Such confusion has forced the steward to assign the Patterson twins have to dress the corners of the hall. The Patterson twins have to dress exactly alike while they are waiting on patrons of Symphony Hall. On the street, too, they can be seen in almost identical garments.

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 6,

THE POPS OF 1919

NEW VARIATIONS ON A FAMILIAR THEME

Two Publics Now Frequent the Concerts, and Warily Conductor and Manager Hold the Balance Even—Mr. Jacchia's Signal and Many-Sided Merits—Old Ways Give Place to Saving Substitute or Fresh Device

TWO publics now frequent The Pops and a discreet management has difficulties, no doubt, to hold even the balance between them. One of these publics fills the lower balcony nightly; is numerous in the upper balcony; is by no means unrepresented at the tables of the floor. It comes to a Pop, primarily as it would go to any other concert—to hear the music of the evening for itself and to hear four-fifths of a noted orchestra playing it. A year or two ago these listeners rejoiced when the band was raised in number from fifty or sixty to seventy or eighty—to the whole Symphony Orchestra except a score of "principals" whose contracts exempt them from these spring and summer concerts. This public is as pleased when items from the "standard repertory" of the Symphony Concerts slip into a Pop, as did, last evening (when the new series began) the final division of Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from The Arabian Nights "Scheherazade" or Chabrier's full-throated and stout-rhythmed rhapsody, "España". As will Enesco's graphic and titillating Roumanian Rhapsody and the tumbling finale of Chaikovsky's fourth symphony later in the week. Grateful to these hearers also are the old overtures to "William Tell," to "Mignon" and the like, the waltzes of the elder Strauss, the "popular classics" that recumbent upon the shelves of the orchestral library from July through April, bestir themselves at the beginning of each May for their spring of speech from the stage of Symphony Hall. Yet this public is not displeased when it hears a potpourri from a current musical play or an unforgotten operetta. It would dine well, musically, when it comes to a Pop, but it does not forget that most dinners end with a dessert and mix the lighter dishes with the heavier.

The other and contrasting public would have only highly spiced viands, "fizzy" drinks, sweetmeats and syllabubs served in these spring repasts of music at Symphony Hall. If it had its unchecked way, the programmes of The Pops would seldom go much beyond sonorous or vivacious marches, a waltz here and there, endless "selections" from the musical plays of many vintages, and once and again ear-tickling trifles for small orchestra or solo instruments. For it, in particular, last evening, stood a Boyards' March, Czibulka's tinkling and treacly "Love's Dream after the Ball" and pretty little exercises for twinkling strings or solo harp; while by Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, it will be hearing and clapping "Mlle. Modiste," "Sinbad," and "Poet and Peasant." It is this public which annually draws and gilds a halo about the "Old Pops" as they flourished when the Symphony Orchestra sat on the stage of the "old" Music Hall, that rolls the word "high-brow" as a choice morsel under its tongue, and glances reproachfully toward those balconies when Mr. Hoffmann's violin begins the tale of "Scheherazade" or when the strings stalk through the first unisons of the Roumanian Rhapsody. Yet, if the observable truth is to be told, the bark of this public is worse than its bite. To The Pops it still flocks; and last evening it was plainly to be seen and heard applauding Scarlatti and Mendelssohn (in light arrangements of pleasant trifles) and even hanging intent upon the irresistible swirl and clang of the Russian music to the Arabian Nights—and also to Mr. Diaghilew's celebrated ballet.

Needless, almost, to say which of these two publics a conductor of Mr. Jacchia's

ability and ambition prefers, and as needful to note also the even hand with which he skilfully and discriminatingly gratifies now the one and now the other—and, indeed, the rest between. No conductor in the thirty-four springs of The Pops has made the "active repertory" so full and various as he; and none has put together programmes so well balanced between his tastes, expectations, and satisfactions. Mr. Jacchia is a leader who can give vivid play with rhythms, lay on vivid color richly, marshal his orchestra striding progressions through large sonorities into upswelling climaxes; yet, no one keep his strings a-shimmering at need to prompt his flutes, his oboes, his horns to their softest and most liquid tones. He is also a musician of keen mind, quick wit and catholic inclinations, a conductor who knows and cherishes the best of music, who is eager to try "new things," who knows but one discontent—the discontent of routine. Such a musician, such a leader summoned anew to The Pops and welcomed there by a public knowing and loving him, has his right to fragments of "Scheherazade," to "España," when he wills either piece sound so richly, so vividly as did both last evening, to experiments with novelties with Casella's Ringing Bells last year, as he will with in this May and June. Moreover, is he the one who is soon to bring Wagner back to many a hungry and eager Bostonian ear. By the same token it was good to see his right hand and to hear his quiet, caressing strings and horns and woodwinds in the lighter graces of one a[illegible] piece upon his programme. As greatly aid by a signal virtue of these [illegible] they French or Italian, he can [illegible] both scholarly and amusing, as he was again when he turned Scarlatti's gentle and graceful Pastorale into an octet for wind instruments and then wrought the complementary Caprice into running and shining figures for the lighter strings.

Mr. Jacchia, however, would not be his balanced and dutiful self, did he not spend equal pains upon his "selections" from "Sinbad" upon his big-voiced marches, upon his other "popular" numbers. Not seldom, as with Czibkulka's glinting and sighing trifle last evening, he and the band almost transfigure them. Not one such piece goes carelessly or even in routine. No conductor of The Pops has hitherto held the orchestra so strictly to its work, kept a standard even for the "Sinbads"

and the "Angels' Dreams." To crown these virtues, Mr. Jacchia is also providing his audience with their only opera of the year. He has worked often in the theatre, he knows and hears his "Carmen" and his "Tosca" of Monday's programme,

TRANSCRIPT MAY 7,

About a Bostonian Ban

England suffered infinitely more from the war than did the United States, but nobody there has been so inept as to exclude the music of Wagner from opera house or concert-hall. How pleasantly this contrasts with the situation in our Boston, the famous orchestra of which did not play a single Wagner number during the season just ending. And why did the Boston orchestra boycott Wagner? Because all of the great German masters were ignored? Oh, no; he was the only one, excepting those still living. Why was Wagner alone boycotted? Was it because a microscopic organization consisting of two men and a woman (Sherlock Holmes couldn't find any more) "agitated" specially against Wagner? Is Boston so easily cowed? Or was it because the Boston Orchestra was piloted by a Frenchman? But why should a Frenchman boycott Wagner any more than an Englishman? It was a French officer who said "We are making war on the Germans, not on their music." The only plausible explanation of the Boston boycott on Wagner is that Mr. Rabaud harbored resentment (or let us charitably say thought he ought to harbor resentment) against him because of his libretto, "A Capitulation," in which certain French statesmen were ridiculed during the siege of Paris in 1870.

The comic side of all this is that Wagner's farcical libretto was aimed at the Germans much more than at the French. In the final chorus the managers of the royal German theatres are introduced; they dance awkwardly and are mocked. Wagner himself wrote regarding "A Capitulation": "My subject touches on no other side of the French than one by the illumination of which we Germans are really deserves an honorable retirement of this sort. She is the most famous of the battleships of her day—those which reached their prime in the period of the Spanish War.

The Oregon eclipsed all her

Western Canada Farmers

PAY FOR LAND FROM ONE YEAR'S CROP

"Forging ahead!" is the term that may well be applied to agriculture in Western Canada. Splendid homes and well equipped farms are to be seen everywhere, while the farmer's bank account shows a comfortable balance at the end of 1917.

Farm lands are increasing in value, while adjoining farmers secure adjoining holdings.

No better investment can be made than the audiences because of a chauvinistic misunderstanding nearly half a century old? If so, the tea-party spirit must have departed entirely from Boston, as well as all sense of humor. [The New York Evening Post

Items and Announcements

For reasons best known to the ingenious management of the Pop Concerts, this evening at them is "Milliners' Night." Hence possibly the appearance on Mr. Jacchia's programme of such titles as "Sirens," "Pomp and Circumstance," and as music-drama on the stage. Quickly, keenly, he calls his audience to like vision and hearing. Once more, last evening, invisible but by no means inaudible, Carmen, Jose and Escamillo went to and fro in the gypsy tavern, the dawn broke over the battlements of Sant' Angelo and Floria Tosca and her Cavaradossi again sang their loves. Turn by turn and with equal illusion, Mr. Jacchia can make Symphony Hall at a Pop a concert-room, an opera house or a theatre. As this generation knows "these concerts," he is the paragon of conductors for them.

Usually the rest of the record of a first Pop in a new spring and a new series is only as playful routine as the recorder can make it. Last evening, however, change awaited him—discoverable, debatable, unescapable change. No longer are the "light refreshments," as the time-honored phrase still names them, either mildly vinous or pleasantly malted. A month or two before its time, the "soft drink" has entered into Symphony Hall and possessed the tables of The Pops. Where once sat the ale or the beer of metropolitan men, now sits the Sundae of the suburban schoolgirl; where once sparkled the wine of France, of Italy, of the Rhine, now flows the dull red stream of Nebraskan grape-juice or the amber slops—Bevos or Pablos—that mock the ancient glories of St. Louis and Milwaukee. Some of this "soft stuff" lifts its soporific head unabashed; other specimens of it with a superior sense of convivial decency, disguise themselves under ancient and honorable names—a "Pop Punch," for example, a "Loganberry Highball," and the like. "To what base uses we may return, Horatio!" Candies were properly proferred besides these "drinks" and the lettuce sandwich and other derelicts of the tea-table garnished them.

So be it. The passionate regulators of the habits of others, the fussy moralists who would end every pleasure for which they do not care, have so willed and theirs among a sentimental and busy folk, are the seats of the mighty. The Pops with the "soft stuff" of yesterday have merely taken time by the forelock and exhibited the spirit of resignation which we shall all be showing a month or two hence. It was in evidence last evening, among the samplers of the new beverages, while to encourage it, there were incidental compensations. Presentable young women, prettily set in grayish head gear and aprons, with here and there a bright bow, now minister to the thirsty and waitresses, as every one knows that freqnents Bostonian restaurants, are a Bostonian delight. These "girl waiters" do please the eye, but more please it the green trees that set the edge of the stage and the flowery bank that encloses the conductor. The palate may balk at these Pops of 1919, but the eye, as well as the ear, shall at least be gladdened.

Mem. (As the old diarists used to write): You may still smoke—if you happen to be a man.

H. T. P.

HERALD, MAY 8,

MILLINERS HAVE GAY NIGHT AT POPS

Models Show Latest in Spring Headgear

"Mademoiselle Modiste" was never a milliner, but, through the tuneful Victor Herbert score she figured brilliantly in the course of "Milliners' night" at the Pops in Symphony Hall last night. It was in all a characteristic program, lightly and deftly attuned to the occasion, and Mr. Jacchia revealed genuine humor in his scheduled numbers.

It was during the intermissions that the milliners had their most spectacular moments. Models, very much alive, promenaded through the aisles and corridors, showing off the latest in spring headgear, designed by local artisans.

A YD hat worn and designed by Miss Lucretia Seymour of the House of Caroline, and a Victory loan hat created by Miss Frances Mooers of the same establishment, were two striking features. Three red, white and blue pompoms on the YD hat represented bombs, while the band circling the headpiece was offset with several YD insignias. The Victory hat, made in five parts, was also elaborated by the Roman numeral five.

Albert A. Allendorf, president of the New England Association, superintended the display. The principal Boston millinery houses represented included: C. A. Browning Co., Andrews Inc., Bowditch & Clapp, Clapp & Tilton Co., the New Hat Frame Co., Superior Millinery Co., Higgins Gardner Co., Shannon Bros. Co., R. J. Munn & Brother, and the Hub Hat Co.

The New Hat Frame Co., Miss Lillian Levy model, showed several hats, but perhaps the most individual, was a moderate poke shape of white Georgette, with a false crown of black velvet ribbon fastened together with lacy circles of faggotting with coarse black silk. A band of the black velvet rims the hat with slightly fullled edges turned toward the crown and ends in a single streamer twisted under the chin and thrown over the shoulder. Miss Levy also wore a dressier hat of peach color Georgette with a crown entirely covered with flat silk flowers of the same delicate color.

Jockey Models.

Higgins & Gardner showed three distinctive hats, the most original being a jockey shape of taupe straw, placed on a tan Georgette circular brim. The effect was at once dressy and practical. A little lace brimmed hat had a crown completely built of curling ostrich feathers in leek green, each plume modified slightly by the addition of the merest touch of black glycerined ostrich.

Bowditch & Clapp were represented by six models. The most striking was a large turquoise poke shape, the brim cut away at the back, and two graceful plumes of rose and turquoise mixed nodded at the back.

The hat which attracted most comment, however, was a wide brimmed brown straw with a graceful edging of wired Georgette and some flowers about the crown. The richness of the materials gave this hat particular distinction.

A leghorn shape with a three-tiered brim of rose taffeta, and a crown of rose taffeta pulled slightly to the right and caught with little roses to the brim was another favorite.

The suits, wraps and coats worn by the models during the evening were the creditable products of Max Raphel.

Many retail houses were represented by young ladies wearing their samples, and among these were a few that one can only describe as "freak" hats—clever, they were, no doubt, but not in keeping with the purpose of the evening. People from far and wide gathered with the practical intention of getting summer ideas certainly achieved their purpose.

Women's Wear, Friday, May 9,

EXHIBITIONS OF HAT STYLES BY BOSTON HOUSES

Models at Milliners' Night of "Pop Concert" Receive Admiring Comment—Showing to Be Repeated Yearly.

Boston.—Milliners' Night at the Pops concert, in Symphony Hall, was an innovation, the results of which were so promising, that a yearly repetition of the fete is anticipated. The idea was to present to those interested—and particularly to representatives of out of town millinery houses now in Boston for the summer opening weeks, styles originated and manufactured by Boston wholesale houses. Milliners' Night was launched under the auspices of the New England Millinery Association, and was attended in large numbers by the millinery interests from all over New England.

The models were presented by mannequins from several large wholesale houses. The concert pieces rendered by an orchestra were chosen with regard to their portrayal of the many-sided feminine character, and airs like "The Queen of Sheba," "Madame Butterfly," "Mademoiselle Modiste," and others were played.

Miss Blanchard, designer for C. A. Browning Co., displayed a degree of origination that was entirely backed up by workmanship, and her two pretty models, held the attention of the house through a series of dazzling changes. Perhaps the most striking was a "butterfly hat," of pale blue tulle, with a brim cut into petal shaped scallops at each side of the front and in one piece at the back. These sections of brim were bound with pale blue satin, and a further gleam of brightness was added by the iridescent bead trimming hanging about the sides of the crown half concealed in a wisp of maline.

This house showed another hat with a cut brim that was very striking, being two panels of leghorn bound with black satin, one on either side of a wide brim of Chantilly lace. At just the smartest angles on either side, waved graceful plumes of black paradise.

A Sally Hat.

Perhaps the best model of their many attractive hats was a Sally poke, narrow at the back, long at the front, made of smooth sand color moire taffeta, relieved by two plumes of mixed rose and sand color ostrich at the back.

Clapp & Tilton showed two black hats of the transparent variety. One had a brim of three narrowing tiers of satin bound maline, the maline crown banded by a wide bias fold of maline tied about at the base with a narrow black velvet ribbon, finishing in a flat bow with long ends tacked to the brim of the right side to follow the lines of the edge.

A crown of sparkling jet galloon, pierced with a long jet pin, brightened the other model, whose brim was made of two rows of pleated net.

Shannon Bros. showed three hats, one a black taffeta, stiff brimmed with a perky wired bow of the taffeta direct in front. Three large inflated loops stood up in the front flanked by a jaunty end wired to an upright position. The other end was skillfully brought back around the crown and along the right side of the brim. A bright red rose half closed, made a bright gleam of color nestling at the base of this flaunting bow. Shannon's hats were all good wearable styles with a distinction of line rather than materials. A little navy taffeta toque surounded by bright field flowers, had a double fold of navy maline turned straight up to form a screen for the gay buttercups and poppies.

POST, MAY 8,

Milliners' Night at Pops a Show in Color

THEY WENT TO THE MILLINERS' "POPS" LAST NIGHT.
Real "Pops" hats, wraps and all the "fixin's" were displayed by pretty girls. In a sapphire blue cape and a $300 chapeau, Miss Marie Sawter was a charming figure. Pretty Miss Florence Berlo wore a victory red coat with a "Spider" hat in silk maline.

No one is in doubt now what to wear at the Pops. Last night the New England milliners had their night at Symphony Hall and for the first time in the history of "Pops" models seated at tables and promenading showed suitable wraps, gowns and hats to the guests.

Thronged to capacity the great hall was aglow with the riotous "Victory" colors, which are this season embodied into smart evening apparel. Miss "YD" and "Miss Liberty Loan" were two features of the evening contributed by Madame Caroline. They were two red, white and blue hats, with crowns and brims adorned with "Y. D.'S" and "V.'S" and brought hearty applause from the audience.

Boston's stride as a millinery centre was given much prominence in the striking exhibition of C. A. Browning. Pretty girls featured exclusively evening and dance and restaurant hats of wonderful distinction.

The huge "war tax" hat worn by Miss Marie Sawyer was adorned with great sprays of Paradise plumes. Chantilly lace in black drooped over cut leghorn and the only crown was of silk maline which revealed the coiled coiffure beneath. Exclusively "Boston" made was this $300 beauty.

The spider-web hat is another Boston creation that would make Paris gasp a bit. Of turquoise blue silk maline the brim is cut petal fashion, hung in beads delicate enough to resemble the outlines of cobwebbing and surmounted by a wispy mist of a tam-o'shanter crown in maline. This atop of the head of Florence Berlo, worn with a Victory red satin wrap, was one of the bright lights of the most brilliant night of Boston's Victory Pops.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TIGHT BINDING

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 10,

Opera House. So paired either violinist bids fair to be at the top of his bent with uncommon sweep and glow of tone to be expected from Mr. Ysaye and more than his usual energy of song and ardor of progress from Mr. Elman. Not a violinist of the elder generation may match Mr. Ysaye at his best in command of the "grand style." Not one of the younger strikes hotter fire than Mr. Elman. Thus is each virtuoso likely to be the complement of the other. They will be heard in four pieces for two violins, all of which come seldom in these days to the concert-room and three of which are the ancient classics of the violin in which Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Elman both excel. The pieces are:

Concertante ..... Mozart
Sonata in E major ..... Händel
Concerto in D minor ..... Bach
Suite B (Opus 71) ..... Moszkowski

The Pops Continued

At last The Pops are free from the interruptions that during the present week have disturbed the usual succession of the concerts. From this evening onward, they will run their usual course, with the variety of programme and the quality of performance that Mr. Jacchia has now established. No previous conductor of The Pops has stocked them with so ample and widely ranging a repertory, while none has so resolutely kept the orchestra to its mettle. "Selections" from current musical plays and operettas, waltzes and other dance-tunes, songful or playful trifles, familiar overtures, fantasias that epitomize well liked and well remembered operas—all stand side by side on Mr. Jacchia's lists; while in all he keeps the orchestra to warm, colorful, rhythmic and characterizing voice. No wonder the audiences gladly hear him and his seventy-odd men from the Symphony Orchestra. As kindly have they taken to the new régime ordaining "soft drinks" in the "light refreshments." Thus are The Pops well started on the usual spring and summer way. For this evening the programme stands:

March, "Entrance of the Gladiators" ..... Fucik
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppé
Minuet ..... Puccini
Fantasia from "Mefistofele" ..... Boito
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" (No. 2) ..... Bizet
Violin Solo, "Souvenir de Moscou" ... Wieniawski
(Mr. Hoffmann)
Romance ..... Martucci
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Introduction to Act III. of "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Ronde d'Amour ..... van Westerhout
Overture, "1812" ..... Chaikovsky

For the evenings of next week Mr. Jacchia proposes many interesting pieces, viz.: For Monday, Verdi's forgotten overture, "Jeanne d'Arc"; Bizet's seldom heard suite, "Roma"; Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser"; and the whirling finale to Chaikovsky's fourth symphony; for Tuesday, Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Polonaise from Chaikovsky's opera, "Eugen Onégin": for Wednesday, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; the suite from Chaikovsky's ballet, "The Nut Cracker"; the amusing finale of Mr. Chadwick, Symphonic Sketches, "A Vagrom Ballad": Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa"; and the Valkyrs Ride from Wagner's "Die Walküre; for Thursday, Casella's fiery and songful rhapsody, "Italia"; the sprightly and artful scherzo from Mr. Rabaud's second symphony; and fragments of the ballet-music from "The Prophet" seldom heard outside the opera house; for Friday, Cherubini's rarely heard overture, "Ali Baba," and Mr. Chadwick's sterling over-

ADVERTISER MAY 11

"DRY" POPS AS ATTRACTIVE AS EVER

Prohibition won't hurt the Po
The first six nights have served f all the forces at Symphony Hall, mi istering to the ear and the palate, find this out. Innovations have be tested and traditions retried. It accordingly very plain that the Po patrons like the newly-installe waitresses, that they like to he solos by the virtuosi of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra in its Summe guise, that they like the music o Wagner (which has never been banne from the broad-minded Pops); finally that they approve of Mr. Jacchia' programs as thoroughly as they ap prove of his fervor.

There will be two special nights fo
the coming week—Booksellers' Nigh on Wednesday, May 14, and Professior
Women's Night on Thursday, May 15

RECORD, MAY 15.

RETURNING TO HIS POST AS LEADER OF THE BOSTON POPS

AGIDE JACCHIA

The popular Pops leader has been unable to conduct the Pops for a few performances owing to a swollen vein in one ankle, which makes standing most painful. His physicians have told him that he could return to his post this evening, much to his delight as well as the pleasure of his admirers. Mr. Jacchia is offering Boston a series of extremely fine concerts. On his programs stand much beautiful music as well as some of the lighter music of the day.

HERALD, MAY 11.

SECOND WEEK OF THE POPS

The world may be weary of this or that, but it is not weary of the Pop concerts. The first six nights served for all the forces at Symphony Hall, ministering to the ear and the palate, to find the just pace of popularity. Innovations have been tested and traditons re-tried. The public likes the newly-installed waitresses; it likes to hear solos by the virtuosi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its summer guise; it approves of Mr. Jacchia's programs as thoroughly as it approves his fervor.

Mr. Jacchia knows the art of discriminately mixing musical styles into an attractive evening's entertainment, setting music of popular appeal beside music of character. Suites, overtures, marches, waltzes, operatic fantasias, selections from the operettas of the hour, all crowd abundantly one upon the other. So large is his repertory that virtually no repetitions may be found in the 12 programs of the first two weeks.

There will be two special nights for this week—Booksellers' night on Wednesday, May 14, and Professional Women's night on Thursday, May 15. For the first of these, Small, Maynard & Co. have engaged a large block of seats to entertain members of the American Booksellers' Association, which will hold its annual convention in Boston. For Thursday, Mrs. Marie Dewing Faelten, president of the Professional Women's Club, and Mrs. Sybil H. Holmes, president of the Massachusetts Association of Women Lawyers, have also taken a section of the floor for their members.

The programs of the second week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 12.

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Gavotte ..... Martini
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Suite, "Roma" ..... Bizet
"Ave Maria" ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture to "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Jack o'Lantern" ..... Caryll
Canzone ..... Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tschaikowsky

TUESDAY, MAY 13.

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture, "Masaniello" ..... Auber
"Whispering of the Flowers" ..... Blon
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Tarantelle ..... Jacchia
"Ave Maria" ..... Bach-Gounod
Cortege Solenelle ..... Glazounoff
Selection, "Sometime" ..... Friml
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky

WEDNESDAY, MAY 14.

Hungarian March ..... Berlioz
Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
Harp solo, "Dream" ..... Oberthur
Mr. Theodore Cella.
Aria (for strings and organ) ..... Rehfeld
A Vagrom Ballad ..... Chadwick
Mazeppa ..... Liszt
Romanze ..... Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ..... Waldteufel
"Ride of the Valkyries" ..... Wagner

THURSDAY, MAY 15.

Professional Women's Club Night.
March, "Semper Fidelis" ..... Sousa
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Romanza ..... Van Westerhout
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Scherzo, Second Symphony ..... Rabaud
Flute solo:
Mr. Brooke.
Berceuse ..... Godard
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Ballet music, "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
a, Waltz. b, Redowa.
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 2 ..... Schubert
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ..... Strauss
"Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar

FRIDAY, MAY 16.

March, "Stars and Stripes" ..... Sousa
Overture, "Ali Baba" ..... Cherubini
"Song Without Words" ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Ballet music, "Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Hymnus (Trio) ..... Nagel
Organ, Mr. Albert W. Snow; violin, Mr. Hoffmann; violoncello, Mr. G. Miquelle.
"Turkish Patrol" ..... Michaelis
Overture, "Melpomene" ..... Chadwick
Selection, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Souvenir ..... Drdla
"The Marionettes" ..... Lacombe
March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

SATURDAY, MAY 17.

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" . Strauss
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Ballet suite, "Coppelia" ..... Delibes
a, Waltz. b, Czardas.
Tarantelle for Flute and Clarinet . Saint-Saens
Messrs. Brooke and Mimart.
Largo from the "New World" Symphony Dvorak
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Fiddlers Three" ..... Johnstone
Meditation from "Thais" ..... Massenet
Solo violin, Mr. Hoffmann.
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
Overture, "Mignon" ..... Thomas

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 10.

CONCERTS AND COMPOSERS

Wagner Finds Flourishing Place at the Pops to Applauding Hearers—Casella's Glowing "Italia" Played Again — More About Mr. Monteux's Intentions—Mr. Clifton to Conduct in Paris

WAGNER can wait, said one of the voices in the mild controversy last winter over the exclusion of his music from the Symphony Concerts in deference to an understandable, if superfluous, scruple on the part of Mr. Rabaud. He has waited—for as much as three short months—until the retiring conductor has departed for overseas, until summer "Pops" have succeeded winter "Symphonies." Mr. Jacchia is a catholically minded conductor; as he said pointedly the other day, "he is an artist before he is an Italian; as he might have added, he is a musician before he is a man of war. He included music of Wagner in his programmes of last year and his audiences answered him, not with demur and protest, but with every sign of eager interest and lively pleasure. Therefore, to a public still more hungry for music that it has long known and enjoyed, he is again, this spring, restoring the familiar overtures, the familiar fragments from the operas and the music-dramas. Last Saturday, a distinctively "popular" audience roundly applauded the overture to "Tannhäuser"; last Tuesday a more exacting company was as cordially disposed toward the prelude to "Lohengrin." On Wednesday, "The Ride of the Valkyrs," familiar "favorite" at The Pops, went as well. For next week, the prelude to "Tristan" and the music of the Venusberg in "Tannhäuser" are announced and, sooner or later, the crown of all these pieces, the sumptuous and songful prelude to "The Mastersingers" will follow.

Clearly the audiences at Symphony Hall hear all this music gladly, while the orchestra plays it and Mr. Jacchia (or in the instance of the prelude to "Lohengrin," Mr. Lenom) leads it with as frank zest. As clearly, to all but hide-bound and perverted minds, the shimmer of the descending and ascending Grail, the chivalric pomps of "Lohengrin," the battle of the flesh and the spirit through the overture to "Tannhäuser," the Valkyrs swirling across the skies, the love that is stronger than death of Tristan and Isolde—all expressed in a music of universal beauty and power to be the heritage of mankind—have as little to do with the passions of the late war as the Richard Wagner who died forty years before it began. Even to Boston, Wagner has come back unopposed and to stay—if Mr. Monteux reads as clearly as Mr. Jacchia the signs of the musical times.

Casella, the Italian, has likewise come back with the rhapsody, "Italia," heard for the first time at The Pops last May, long since and by many a title deserving a place in the Symphony Concerts, and renewing, last evening, the rhythmic life, the glowing tonal colors, the manifold and illusory atmosphere, the ardors large or fine, that pervade this pulsing, stinging music. Inevitably, Mr. Lenom was not quite Mr. Jacchia with so Italianate a piece; here and there his pace seemed a little slow or his accents lacked sharpness; but the rhapsody plainly stirred him as it stirred players and hearers. Not without emotion may many a listener hear the hollow, haunting, desolate folk-tune of the Sicilian sulphur-mines with which the rhapsody begins—folk-melody comparable almost with the "Ay Ouchem" of the Volga boatmen. As penetrating is the succeeding folk-motive and Casella's development of it that open visions of the Italian plains, broad and bare, still, solitary, heat-smitten, yet of wistful memory to those that have known them. Another emotion leaps from the whirling measures, the mounting clamors, the outflung zest of the finale of Neapolitan folk-dance; while in all the rhapsody are the bite of Casella's rhythms, the richness of his tonal coloring, the hot fire of his imagination. The "Young Italians" who have fashioned such music as this "Italia," as Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," deserve place in other suns than that of their own concerts.

Mr. Monteux Foretells

With the promptness that is the wonder of two worlds, the Post Office has today delivered to this department the number of The Musical Courier for April 24 last—a round three weeks in transit from New York to Boston. It contains Mr. Monteux's answers to a question or two about his plans for the Symphony Concerts next autumn. Belated though the paragraphs seem, they follow hereunder.

My appointment is so recent that my plans are still unformulated. I am going to France for a visit, sailing about May 1, and I shall bring back any worthy novelties I may find, but I intend to figure in no way when in Boston as a propagandist for French music. Just as good wine needs no bush, so good French music needs no special propaganda, and that is the only kind I shall play. I do not think I shall find much room on my programmes for ultra-modern music. As for German music, I expect to pursue the same course as I have since the war began. You will remember that I refused to conduct Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" when I first came to America. I do not now expect to place works by living German composers on the Boston programmes the coming season. I do not think that the American people want to hear them; but I shall conduct the classics of musical literature, just as I have done throughout the war, irrespective of nationality.

From Americans I shall play all worthy works that I can find. I hope to do the first symphony of John Alden Carpenter, which, unless I am mistaken, has never been done either in Boston or New York, and other pieces of his as well; and there is fine music which I know by MacDowell, Chadwick and Loeffler. I am very sensible of the kindness and appreciation that has been shown me in America and I hope to show my appreciation of it by doing what I can to help along good American music. You may be sure that, although I have mentioned only some of your best-known composers, I shall be glad to examine manuscripts of new works from the younger and comparatively unknown men, and whatever I judge worthy of a Boston Symphony programme will find a place on on

Mr. Monteux is mistaken as to Mr. Car penter's symphony. It was played in Bos ton a year ago last month, with M
Schmidt conducting in lieu of Dr. M who had been eager to bring the pie hearing. It well deserves repetition u
Mr. Monteux. No symphony yet writte an American composer, except Mr. L fler's, is comparable with it. Possibl new conductor will hazard Mr. Loe music as well. It also deserves rest performance and new hearing.

Items and Announcements

Two overtures, each heard none too hereabouts, stand on the programme Mr. Jacchia prepared but in which Lenom will lead at the Pop Conce Symphony Hall this evening. One is tively ancient and virtually unknown m Cherubini's large-voiced overture to final opera, "Ali Baba"; the other, familiar, is work of Mr. Chadwick's imaginative years, the concert ove named for the muse, "Melpomene." detail the programme is:

March, "Stars and Stripes" .....
Overture to the Opera, "Ali Baba" .... Che
Song Without Words ..... Chai
Fantasia from the Opera, "Pagliacci" Leon Ballet Music from the Opera, "Queen Sheba" .....
Hymn for Organ, Violin and Violincello ....
(Messrs. Snow, Hoffmann, Miquelle.)
Turkish Patrol ..... Mi
Concert Overture, "Melpomene" ..... Ch
Selection from the Opera, "L'Oracolo" ....
Souvenir .....
The Marionettes .....
March from "Aida" .....

Mr. Chalmers Clifton, well remembe
Boston as the ablest conductor of Cecilia" in recent years, is to lead th
atory Orchestra at P
Fren ... music, to take

TRAVELER, MAY 17

POPS THRIVE ON PROHIBITI

Those who thought taking the w beer and ale from the Pops marked death of this popular amusement sh drop around to Symphony Hall week night and note the crowded ho that wax enthusiastic over Condu
Jacchia's peerless program.

The Pops start in on their third w next Monday night. The Temple Is has engaged the entire floor for T day night, entertaining the Unio Congregations and Federation of T ple Sisterhoods, who are holding t national convention here May Thursday night will bring an all-sian program, while Friday night be Roxbury Latin school night.

Monday night's program is:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino" .....
Aubade Frintaniere ..... Lac
Traumerei ..... Schu
Fantasia, "Samson and Delihah" .. Saint-
Carnival in Italy .....
Viola, Solos:::: ::::::zLemfwyp vbgk
Viola Solos: (a) Melodie; (b) Bagatelle
Wittman
Florian Wittmann; Carl Lamson, Accompanist
Serenade ..... Schubert-Jacchi
Scherzo from the "Eroica" Symphony . Beethove
Dance, "Piemontesi" ..... Sinigagl
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascag
Valse des Fleurs from the "Nutcracker"
Suite ..... Tschaikowsk Bacchanale (The Venusberg Mountain) from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagne

POST, MAY 19

JACCHIA'S BROTHER TO VISIT AMERICA

Mr. Jacchia, conductor of the Pops returns to the conductor's stand for to night's concert, after an absence of sev eral evenings, due to illness. M Jacchia has just received word from hi brother, from Italy, where he is prom inent in the manufacture of the Caprot airplane, that he expects to visit th United States within the next fe weeks in the interests of the Caprot plane.

"It is without doubt," said M Jacchia, "in connection with the inte national interests in cross-Atlantic fl ing that my brother is to visit th country, for the Caproni Company, I understand, proposes to enter into t manufacture of seaplanes as well a army machines."

TRAVELER, MAY 20,

JACCHIA OPPOSES MUSIC BOYCOT

Bans Only Strauss in Retaliation

Signor Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Symphony "Pop" concerts, who is still suffering from an attack of phlebitis which threatens to confine him to his bed for two or three days to come, gave his opinions yesterday on the subject of art as related to politics. Signor Jacchia, who is a strong protagonist of the "art for art's sake" theory, said he was unable to see any connection between these two fields. Art was self-sufficient and should never be besmirched by being dragged through the mire of politics, he declared.

In pursuance of this belief, Signor Jacchia is not to exclude German music from his programs during the coming season. He will make his selections impartially, irrespective of the nationality or political tendencies of the composer.

Wagner and Beethoven will figure as prominently and as frequently as Verdi and Rabaud. Signor Jacchia makes only one exception, which comes in the nature of a reprisal, to this otherwise inflexible rule. The music of Strauss will not be played. He explains this departure as a sort of revenge upon Strauss himself, who at the beginning of the war prohibited the playing of all French and Italian music throughout Germany for solely political reasons.

Concerning the rumors of Signor Jacchia's brother coming over to this country in connection with a projected transatlantic flight in a Caproni hydroplane, the conductor states that aside from the fact his brother is to arrive here shortly in the interests of some Italian airplane company which is attempting to form some sort of Italian-American aviation corporation, he knows nothing definite. The signor adds when he was asked to do some work of this nature in behalf of his brother he politely declined as "business held no charm for him."

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 24

Progress of the Pops

THERE is every likelihood that, from next Monday onwards, Mr. Jacchia can resume without interruption his work as conductor of The Pops. Meanwhile, with Mr. Lenom leading in programmes prepared by the disabled director, the concerts have continued on their wonted way. Incidentally it now stands clear that the substitution of "soft" drinks for the mildly "hard stuff" that was dispensed of old at Symphony Hall has in no wise lessened the numbers and the enjoyment of the audience. Virtually every table on the floor is taken nightly; while only in the balconies does the listening company fluctuate. More and more also it appears that the mainstay of The Pops, outside their perennial quality as a Boston institution, are the diversity, the interest and the sustained merit of Mr. Jacchia's programmes and his own skill and zest as conductor. In the past to lead at The Pops has been a "side line," as the commercial travellers say, for this or that musician. For Mr. Jacchia it is his chief work through the musical year. For this evening the programme stands:

Procession of Bacchus from the Ballet "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Overture to the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding"
Serenata Barcarola ..... Mag
Fantasia from the Opera, "Lucia" ..... de N
Prelude to the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde"
Wag
Moonlight from the Opera, "Werther" ..... Mass
Pastorale for Octet of Wood-Winds—Caprice for Strings ..... Saint
(Arranged by Mr. Jacchia)
Ballet Music from "Samson and Delilah"
Saint-Sa
Slavic March ..... Chaik
Ave Maria from the Opera, "Othello" ..... Verdi Waltz, "Thousand Nights" ..... Strauss
Selection from the Musical Play, "Katinka"
Friml

Two "special nights" befall next week a "Harvard Night" on Wednesday at which the Glee Club of the college will be heard in seven numbers, and a fragment of the suite, "Stevensoniana," by Edward B. Hill, '94, will be played, and the night of the holiday, Friday, when sundry numbers will be as a memorial music to the fallen in the recent war. To suit also a quasi-military occasion the resounding march from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" will be heard. For the sentiment of the day as well, Mr. Chadwick's symphonic sketch, "Noel" will serve. For Monday the programme contains the tone-poem, "Finlandia," the first music by Sibelius to be heard in Boston for a year since the late Mr. Rabaud seemed unaware of the existence of that eminent composer; a fragment of Goldmark's fanciful and songful symphony, "The Country Wedding" and for a novelty a solo-piece for bassoon to be played by the excellent Mr. Laus. The list for Thursday will bring Wagner's glowing prelude to "The Mastersingers" and Enesco's fiery "Roumanian Rhapsody"; while on Saturday the audience will hear one of Mr. Carpenter's war pieces, the march, "Khaki Sammy."

AMERICAN, MAY 24

Wagner in Again.

Wagner is beginning to figure importantly upon the Pops programs. The audiences receive him politely and there are no casualties. Personally, I never believed in excluding dead German composers from concert programs provided their music was the sort which gives pleasure. The only bad feature of letting them in again is the satisfaction it gives the irrepressible Huns, of whom we have a few in our midst. They seem to think that a Wagner overture on our programs is some sort of a "Victory" for the Fatherland.

Now that we have our heel upon the neck of the German Michael I suppose we ought to disregard the hissing of the German geese in our midst, but it is exasperating. An even better argument against Wagner on Pops programs is that Mr. Jacchia is making them heavy enough without him.

There is altogether too much symphonic music on these programs. An audience which is gobbling ice cream, guzzling ginger ale and lemonade and smoking cigarettes is not in the proper frame of mind to be diverted by the Symphony Pathetique of Tschaikowsky, the prelude to Tristan, and even the lively movement from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony.

And it is not fair to the symphonies to play them under such conditions. Jacchia was not brought here to conduct symphonies. More operettas and more ragtime, Mr. Jacchia.

POST, MAY 25

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

Agide Jacchia, the popular conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, is again at the helm as the institution faces its fourth week. During his illness, from which he has recovered, Mr. Claude Lenom of old-time renown has obligingly taken his place. Unruffled by disputes over wine and beer, the Pops complacently prosper on sandwiches and salubrious mixtures of unfermented fruit juices.

Harvard night comes on Wednesday next, May 28. The hall and the waitresses will be decked in red. There will be a lively programme interspersed with rare selections from the Harvard Glee Club. Decoration Day (Friday, May 30) will have appropriate numbers, memorial and patriotic.

TRANSCRIPT

ITEMS ABOUT M

A Bassoon Solo at the Pops and Choral Concerts—M Chamber Music Festival — Paris

SIBELIUS, of whom goo baud had never heard,
the less, is an eminent turns to Symphony Hall th
the tone-poem, "Finlandia," th item in Mr. Jacchia's progra Pop Concert. The list con fragment from Goldmark's phony "Rustic Wedding," piece for bassoon to be p excellent Mr. Laus. In fu
Mr. Jacchia conducting, the stands:

March, "Sambre and Meuse" ....
Overture to the Opera, "William
Polish Dance .....
Fantasia from the Opera, "La Bo
Three Movements from the Incide to Daudet's Play, "L'Arlésienne (Prelude; Minuet Carl
Revery for Bassoon with Orchest
(Bassoon: Mr. Laus
"In the Garden," Love-Scene
Symphony, "Country Wedding"
Tone-Poem, "Finlandia" .....
Carnival in Paris .....
Romance .....
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .....
Ride of the Valkyrs .....

It is fast becoming an open
Mr. Monteux is contemplating ance next winter of Franck's atorio, "The Beatitudes" by th
Orchestra and Mr. Townsend's Chorus in a concert outside of series. In recent years, the pie heard but once in Boston and th revealingly at the hands of The likelihood, indeed, is that M will renew the three concerts masterpieces which Dr. Muck a work of the orchestra in his Then, it will be recalled, the p ly responded to th

HERALD, MAY 2

POPS' FOURTH

Agide Jacchia, the popul of the Pop concerts at Sym is again at the helm as th faces its fourth week. Du ness, from which he has re
Lenom of old-time renow obligingly taking his place.

The jubilation of Har
(which comes on Wednesda 28), knows no check. The waitresses will be decked i uates and undergraduates from all the country roun the general public will also like to watch young spirit even while they listen to a lively program, interspersed selections from the Harvard Decoration day (Friday, M have appropriate numbers, and patriotic. These are th for the week:

MONDAY, MAY 26

March, "Sambre et Meuse" .....
Overture, "William Tell" .....
Polish Dance .....
Fantasia, "La Boheme" .....
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 1 .....
a, Prelude. b, Minuet. c,
Reverie (bassoon and orchestra) ..
Mr. Laus
"In the Garden," from the "Rus ding" Symphony .....
Finlandia .....
Carnival in Paris .....
Romanza ..... Van
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" .....
Ride of the Valkyries .....

TUESDAY, MAY 27

March, "101st Infantry" .....
Overture, "Phedre" .....
Souvenir .....
Fantasia, "Aida" .....
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .....
a, Morning Mood. b, Anitra's D
the Hall of the Mountain K
Trio, "Devotion" .....
Messrs. Hoffmann, violin; Holy,
Organ.
Scherzo, "Midsummer Night's Dr
Overture, "Rienzi" .....
Selection, "Jack o'Lantern" .....
"The Lost Chord" .....
Solo trumpet, Mr. Mager
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danu
Cortege de Bacchus .....

WEDNESDAY, MAY 28

Harvard Night
March, "101st Infantry" .....
Overture, "Zampa" .....
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .....
Harvard Glee Club:
Drinking Song .....
Lullaby .....
Hunting Song .....
Serenade .....
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" ....
Slavonic Dance No. 1 .....
Lullaby for strings, from "Stevenso
E. B
Harvard Glee Club:
Traestat hoc nobis .....
Morning Hymn .....
Prayer of Thanksgiving .....
Selection, "Sinbad" .....
Quartet from "Rigoletto" .....
Hungarian Dance No. 1 .....
March, "Up the Street" .....

THURSDAY, MAY 29

Overture, "La Forza del Destino" ..
Waltz, "Pomone" .....
Andante Cantabile .....
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" ..... Tsch
Roumanian Rhapsody .....
Flute Solo:
Romance Without Words .....
Polonaise .....
Mr. Allan Brooke
Dance of the Priestesses of Dagon,
"Samson and Delilah" .....
Rondo Capriccioso ..... Sai
Selection, "Maytime" ..... Mendelssohn
Duet .....
Intermezzo, Act II., "The Jewels of Madonna" .....
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wolf

FRIDAY, MAY 30

Decoration Day Program
Overture, "Siege of Corinth" .....
Memories .....
Canzone .....
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Van Wes
"The Souls of Our Heroes" .....
Noel (Christmas) .....
Elise Triste .....
Largo (with organ) .....
Third Movement from the "Sympho Pathetique" .....
Aria (strings and organ) ..... Tschaik
American Patrol .....
Miserere from "Il Trovatore" ..... Me

SATURDAY, MAY 31

March, "Khaki Sammy" .....
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" ..... Car
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" .....
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .....
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda
Trumpet Solo, "My Heart at Thy Dea Dance," "Samson and Delilah" ... Saint-
Marionettes .....
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 in F .....
Selection, "The Rainbow Girl" .....
Missus .....
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..
(With Organ)
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Ba

TIGHT BINDING

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 10,

Opera House. So paired either violinist bids fair to be at the top of his bent with uncommon sweep and glow of tone to be expected from Mr. Ysaye and more than his usual energy of song and ardor of progress from Mr. Elman. Not a violinist of the elder generation may match Mr. Ysaye at his best in command of the "grand style." Not one of the younger strikes hotter fire than Mr. Elman. Thus is each virtuoso likely to be the complement of the other. They will be heard in four pieces for two violins, all of which come seldom in these days to the concert-room and three of which are the ancient classics of the violin in which Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Elman both excel. The pieces are:

Concertante ..... Mozart
Sonata in E major ..... Händel
Concerto in D minor ..... Bach
Suite B (Opus 71) ..... Moszkowski

The Pops Continued

At last The Pops are free from the interruptions that during the present week have disturbed the usual succession of the concerts. From this evening onward, they will run their usual course, with the variety of programme and the quality of performance that Mr. Jacchia has now established. No previous conductor of The Pops has stocked them with so ample and widely ranging a repertory, while none has so resolutely kept the orchestra to its mettle. "Selections" from current musical plays and operettas, waltzes and other dance-tunes, songful or playful trifles, familiar overtures, fantasias that epitomize well liked and well remembered operas—all stand side by side on Mr. Jacchia's lists; while in all he keeps the orchestra to warm, colorful, rhythmic and characterizing voice. No wonder the audiences gladly hear him and his seventy-odd men from the Symphony Orchestra. As kindly have they taken to the new régime ordaining "soft drinks" in the "light refreshments." Thus are The Pops well started on the usual spring and summer way. For this evening the programme stands:

March, "Entrance of the Gladiators" ..... Fucik
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppé
Minuet ..... Puccini
Fantasia from "Mefistofele" ..... Boito
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" (No. 2) ..... Bizet
Violin Solo, "Souvenir de Moscou" ... Wieniawski
(Mr. Hoffmann)
Romance ..... Martucci
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Introduction to Act III. of "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Ronde d'Amour ..... van Westerhout
Overture, "1812" ..... Chaikovsky

For the evenings of next week Mr. Jacchia proposes many interesting pieces, viz.: For Monday, Verdi's forgotten overture, "Jeanne d'Arc"; Bizet's seldom heard suite, "Roma"; Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser"; and the whirling finale to Chaikovsky's fourth symphony; for Tuesday, Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Polonaise from Chaikovsky's opera, "Eugen Onégin": for Wednesday, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; the suite from Chaikovsky's ballet, "The Nut Cracker"; the amusing finale of Mr. Chadwick, Symphonic Sketches, "A Vagrom Ballad": Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa"; and the Valkyrs Ride from Wagner's "Die Walküre; for Thursday, Casella's fiery and songful rhapsody, "Italia"; the sprightly and artful scherzo from Mr. Rabaud's second symphony; and fragments of the ballet-music from "The Prophet" seldom heard outside the opera house; for Friday, Cherubini's rarely heard overture, "Ali Baba," and Mr. Chadwick's sterling over-

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 10.

CONCERTS AND COMPOSERS

Wagner Finds Flourishing Place at the Pops to Applauding Hearers—Casella's Glowing "Italia" Played Again — More About Mr. Monteux's Intentions—Mr. Clifton to Conduct in Paris

WAGNER can wait, said one of the voices in the mild controversy last winter over the exclusion of his music from the Symphony Concerts in deference to an understandable, if superfluous, scruple on the part of Mr. Rabaud. He has waited—for as much as three short months—until the retiring conductor has departed for overseas, until summer "Pops" have succeeded winter "Symphonies." Mr. Jacchia is a catholically minded conductor; as he said pointedly the other day, "he is an artist before he is an Italian; as he might have added, he is a musician before he is a man of war. He included music of Wagner in his programmes of last year and his audiences answered him, not with demur and protest, but with every sign of eager interest and lively pleasure. Therefore, to a public still more hungry for music that it has long known and enjoyed, he is again, this spring, restoring the familiar overtures, the familiar fragments from the operas and the music-dramas. Last Saturday, a distinctively "popular" audience roundly applauded the overture to "Tannhäuser"; last Tuesday a more exacting company was as cordially disposed toward the prelude to "Lohengrin." On Wednesday, "The Ride of the Valkyrs," familiar "favorite" at The Pops, went as well. For next week, the prelude to "Tristan" and the music of the Venusberg in "Tannhäuser" are announced and, sooner or later, the crown of all these pieces, the sumptuous and songful prelude to "The Mastersingers" will follow.

Clearly the audiences at Symphony Hall hear all this music gladly, while the orchestra plays it and Mr. Jacchia (or in the instance of the prelude to "Lohengrin," Mr. Lenom) leads it with as frank zest. As clearly, to all but hide-bound and perverted minds, the shimmer of the descending and ascending Grail, the chivalric pomps of "Lohengrin," the battle of the flesh and the spirit through the overture to "Tannhäuser," the Valkyrs swirling across the skies, the love that is stronger than death of Tristan and Isolde—all expressed in a music of universal beauty and power to be the heritage of mankind—have as little to do with the passions of the late war as the Richard Wagner who died forty years before it began. Even to Boston, Wagner has come back unopposed and to stay—if Mr. Monteux reads as clearly as Mr. Jacchia the signs of the musical times.

Casella, the Italian, has likewise come back with the rhapsody, "Italia," heard for the first time at The Pops last May, long since and by many a title deserving a place in the Symphony Concerts, and renewing, last evening, the rhythmic life, the glowing tonal colors, the manifold and illusory atmosphere, the ardors large or fine, that pervade this pulsing, stinging music. Inevitably, Mr. Lenom was not quite Mr. Jacchia with so Italianate a piece; here and there his pace seemed a little slow or his accents lacked sharpness; but the rhapsody plainly stirred him as it stirred players and hearers. Not without emotion may many a listener hear the hollow, haunting, desolate folk-tune of the Sicilian sulphur-mines with which the rhapsody begins—folk-melody comparable almost with the "Ay Ouchem" of the Volga boatmen. As penetrating is the succeeding folk-motive and Casella's development of it that open visions of the Italian plains, broad and bare, still, solitary, heat-smitten, yet of wistful memory to those that have known them. Another emotion leaps from the whirling measures, the mounting clamors, the outflung zest of the finale of Neapolitan folk-dance; while in all the rhapsody are the bite of Casella's rhythms, the richness of his tonal coloring, the hot fire of his imagination. The "Young Italians" who have fashioned such music as this "Italia," as Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," deserve place in other suns than that of their own concerts.

Mr. Monteux Foretells

With the promptness that is the wonder of two worlds, the Post Office has today delivered to this department the number of The Musical Courier for April 24 last—a round three weeks in transit from New York to Boston. It contains Mr. Monteux's answers to a question or two about his plans for the Symphony Concerts next autumn. Belated though the paragraphs seem, they follow hereunder.

My appointment is so recent that my plans are still unformulated. I am going to France for a visit, sailing about May 1, and I shall bring back any worthy novelties I may find, but I intend to figure in no way when in Boston as a propagandist for French music. Just as good wine needs no bush, so good French music needs no special propaganda, and that is the only kind I shall play. I do not think I shall find much room on my programmes for ultra-modern music. As for German music, I expect to pursue the same course as I have since the war began. You will remember that I refused to conduct Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" when I first came to America. I do not now expect to place works by living German composers on the Boston programmes the coming season. I do not think that the American people want to hear them; but I shall conduct the classics of musical literature, just as I have done throughout the war, irrespective of nationality.

From Americans I shall play all worthy works that I can find. I hope to do the first symphony of John Alden Carpenter, which, unless I am mistaken, has never been done either in Boston or New York, and other pieces of his as well; and there is fine music which I know by MacDowell, Chadwick and Loeffler. I am very sensible of the kindness and appreciation that has been shown me in America and I hope to show my appreciation of it by doing what I can to help along good American music. You may be sure that, although I have mentioned only some of your best-known composers, I shall be glad to examine manuscripts of new works from the younger and comparatively unknown men, and whatever I judge worthy of a Boston Symphony programme will find a place on one

Mr. Monteux is mistaken as to Mr. Carpenter's symphony. It was played in Boston a year ago last month, with Mr. Schmidt conducting in lieu of Dr. Muck, who had been eager to bring the piece to hearing. It well deserves repetition under Mr. Monteux. No symphony yet written by an American composer, except Mr. Loeffler's, is comparable with it. Possibly the new conductor will hazard Mr. Loeffler's music as well. It also deserves restudied performance and new hearing.

Items and Announcements

Two overtures, each heard none too often hereabouts, stand on the programme that Mr. Jacchia prepared but in which Mr. Lenom will lead at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall this evening. One is relatively ancient and virtually unknown music—Cherubini's large-voiced overture to his final opera, "Ali Baba"; the other, more familiar, is work of Mr. Chadwick's more imaginative years, the concert overture named for the muse, "Melpomene." In detail the programme is:

March, "Stars and Stripes" ..... Sousa
Overture to the Opera, "Ali Baba" .... Cherubini
Song Without Words ..... Chaikovsky
Fantasia from the Opera, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Ballet Music from the Opera, "Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Hymn for Organ, Violin and Violincello ..... Nagel
(Messrs. Snow, Hoffmann, Miquelle.)
Turkish Patrol ..... Michaelis
Concert Overture, "Melpomene" ..... Chadwick
Selection from the Opera, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Souvenir ..... Drdla
The Marionettes ..... Lacombe
March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

Mr. Chalmers Clifton, well remembered in Boston as the ablest conductor of "The Cecilia" in recent years, is to lead the Symphony Orchestra at Paris in music, to take pla[illegible] French [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT, MAY

Pops

later consider[illegible] very likelihood that, from [illegible]r Smart day onwards, Mr. Jacchia [illegible]icion he without interruption his [illegible]en on uctor of The Pops. Mean- [illegible]r. Lenom leading in pro- [illegible] words ared by the disabled director, [illegible]gically ave continued on their wonted [illegible]en play tally it now stands clear that [illegible]; wher ion of "soft" drinks for the [illegible]al scal l stuff" that was dispensed of [illegible]ofesso hony Hall has in no wise less- [illegible]ons t mbers and the enjoyment of the [illegible]thday irtually every table on the floor [illegible]uld b lightly; while only in the hal- [illegible]oreve s the listening company fluctuate, [illegible]oriou more also it appears that the [illegible]heris of The Pops, outside their peren- [illegible]r th ity as a Boston institution, are [illegible]ed b sity, the interest and the sustained [illegible]woul Mr. Jacchia's programmes and [illegible]harp skill and zest as conductor. In [illegible]ghtf to lead at The Pops has been a [illegible]nin ne," as the commercial travellers [illegible]xpec this or that musician. For Mr. [illegible]s h it is his chief work through the [illegible]nora year. For this evening the pro- [illegible]org e stands:

[illegible] on of Bacchus from the Ballet [illegible]rld.la ..... Delibes
[illegible] the to the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding" [illegible]
[illegible]emp Barcarola ..... Mas[illegible]
[illegible]ntly a from the Opera, "Lucia" ..... D[illegible]
[illegible] th to the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde" [illegible]
[illegible]n. ht from the Opera, "Werther" ..... Massenet [illegible] the for Octet of Wood-Wind [illegible] strings ..... [illegible]
[illegible]play (Arranged by Mr. Jacchia) [illegible]
[illegible] Music from "Samson and Delilah" [illegible]
[illegible] March ..... Saint-Saens
[illegible]g ria from the Opera, "Othello" ..... Verdi [illegible]s on "Thousand Nights" ..... [illegible]
[illegible] from the Musical Play, "Katinka" [illegible]
[illegible]tw Primi
[illegible] th "special nights" befall next week—
[illegible]olc arvard Night" on Wednesday at [illegible]ape the Glee Club of the college will be [illegible]eter in seven numbers, and a fragment of [illegible]at ite, "Stevensoniana," by Edward B.
[illegible] (op. 94, will be played, and the night of [illegible] an holiday, Friday, when sundry num[illegible] ssowill be as a memorial music to the [illegible] hi in the recent war. To suit also [illegible] rasusi-military occasion the resounding [illegible] Th from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Sym-[illegible] H" will be heard. For the sentiment [illegible] day as well, Mr. Chadwick's sym-[illegible] onic sketch, "Noel" will serve. For [illegible] Monday the programme contains the tone[illegible] poem, "Finlandia," the first music by [illegible] Sibelius to be heard in Boston for a year
[illegible] since the late Mr. Rabaud seemed unaware [illegible] of the existence of that eminent composer;
[illegible] a fragment of Goldmark's fanciful and [illegible] songful symphony, "The Country Wed-[illegible] ding" and for a novelty a solo-piece for [illegible] bassoon to be played by the excellent Mr.
[illegible] Laus. The list for Thursday will bring [illegible] Wagner's glowing prelude to "The Master[illegible] singers" and Enesco's fiery "Roumanian
[illegible] Rhapsody"; while on Saturday the audi-[illegible] ence will hear one of Mr. Carpenter's wa
[illegible] pieces, the march, "Khaki Sammy."

TRANSCRIPT, MAY

ITEMS ABOUT M

A Bassoon Solo at the Pops and Choral Concerts—M Chamber Music Festival — Paris

SIBELIUS, of whom goo baud had never heard, the less, is an eminent turns to Symphony Hall th the tone-poem, "Finlandia," th item in Mr. Jacchia's progra Pop Concert. The list con fragment from Goldmark's phony "Rustic Wedding," piece for bassoon to be p excellent Mr. Laus. In fu Mr. Jacchia conducting, the stands:

March, "Sambre et Meuse" ....
Overture to the Opera, "William
Polish Dance ....
Fantasia from the Opera, "La Bo
Three Movements from the Incide to Daudet's Play, "L'Arlésienne (Prelude; Minuet Carl Revery for Bassoon with Orchest (Bassoon: Mr. Laus
"In the Garden," Love-Scene
Symphony, "Country Wedding"
Tone-Poem, "Finlandia" ....
Carnival in Paris ....
Romance ....
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ....
ride of the Valkyrs ....

It is fast becoming an open Mr. Monteux is contemplating nce next winter of Franck's torio, "The Beatitudes" by th rchestra and Mr. Townsend' horus in a concert outside of ries. In recent years, the pie eard but once in Boston and th vealingly at the hands of the likelihood, indeed, is that M ill renew the three concerts asterpieces which Dr. Muck ta ork of the orchestra in his hen, it will be recalled, the p responded to th

ADVERTISER MAY 11

"DRY" POPS AS ATTRACTIVE AS EVER

Prohibition won't hurt the Po The first six nights have served f all the forces at Symphony Hall, mi istering to the ear and the palate, find this out. Innovations have be tested and traditions retried. It accordingly very plain that the Po patrons like the newly-installe waitresses, that they like to hea solos by the virtuosi of the Bost Symphony Orchestra in its Summe guise, that they like the music Wagner (which has never been banne from the broad-minded Pops); finally that they approve of Mr. Jacchia' programs as thoroughly as they ap prove of his fervor.

There will be two special nights fo the coming week—Booksellers' Nigh on Wednesday, May 14, and Professio Women's Night on Thursday, May 15

HERALD, MAY 11.

SECOND WEEK OF THE POPS

The world may be weary of this or that, but it is not weary of the Pop concerts. The first six nights served for all the forces at Symphony Hall, ministering to the ear and the palate, to find the just pace of popularity. Innovations have been tested and traditons re-tried. The public likes the newly-installed waitresses; it likes to hear solos by the virtuosi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its summer guise; it approves of Mr. Jacchia's programs as thoroughly as it approves his fervor.

Mr. Jacchia knows the art of discriminately mixing musical styles into an attractive evening's entertainment, setting music of popular appeal beside music of character. Suites, overtures, marches, waltzes, operatic fantasias, selections from the operettas of the hour, all crowd abundantly one upon the other. So large is his repertory that virtually no repetitions may be found in the 12 programs of the first two weeks.

There will be two special nights for this week—Booksellers' night on Wednesday, May 14, and Professional Women's night on Thursday, May 15. For the first of these, Small, Maynard & Co. have engaged a large block of seats to entertain members of the American Booksellers' Association, which will hold its annual convention in Boston. For Thursday, Mrs. Marie Dewing Faelten, president of the Professional Women's Club, and Mrs. Sybil H. Holmes, president of the Massachusetts Association of Women Lawyers, have also taken a section of the floor for their members.

The programs of the second week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 12.

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc" ..... Verdi
Gavotte ..... Martini
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Suite, "Roma" ..... Bizet
"Ave Maria" ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture to "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Jack o'Lantern" ..... Caryll
Canzone ..... Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tschaikowsky

TUESDAY, MAY 13.

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture, "Masaniello" ..... Auber
"Whispering of the Flowers" ..... Blon
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Tarantelle ..... Jacchia
"Ave Maria" ..... Bach-Gounod
Cortege Solenelle ..... Glazounoff
Selection, "Sometime" ..... Friml
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" .. Tschaikowsky

WEDNESDAY, MAY 14.

Hungarian March ..... Berlioz
Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
Harp solo, "Dream" ..... Oberthur
Mr. Theodore Cella.
Aria (for strings and organ) ..... Rehfeld
A Vagrom Ballad ..... Chadwick
Mazeppa ..... Liszt
Romanze ..... Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ..... Waldteufel
"Ride of the Valkyries" ..... Wagner

THURSDAY, MAY 15.

Professional Women's Club Night.
March, "Semper Fidelis" ..... Sousa
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Romanza ..... Van Westerhout
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Scherzo, Second Symphony ..... Rabaud
Flute solo:
Mr. Brooke.
Berceuse ..... Godard
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Ballet music, "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
a, Waltz. b, Redowa.
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 2 ..... Schubert
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ..... Strauss
"Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar

FRIDAY, MAY 16.

March, "Stars and Stripes" ..... Sousa
Overture, "Ali Baba" ..... Cherubini
"Song Without Words" ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Ballet music, "Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Hymnus (Trio) ..... Nagel
Organ, Mr. Albert W. Snow; violin, Mr. Hoffmann; violoncello, Mr. G. Miquelle.
"Turkish Patrol" ..... Michaelis
Overture, "Melpomene" ..... Chadwick
Selection, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Souvenir ..... Drdla
"The Marionettes" ..... Lacombe
March from "Aida" ..... Verdi

SATURDAY, MAY 17.

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" . Strauss
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Ballet suite, "Coppelia" ..... Delibes
a, Waltz. b, Czardas.
Tarantelle for Flute and Clarinet .. Saint-Saens
Messrs. Brooke and Mimart.
Largo from the "New World" Symphony Dvorak
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Fiddlers Three" ..... Johnstone
Meditation from "Thais" ..... Massenet
Solo violin, Mr. Hoffmann.
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
Overture, "Mignon" ..... Thomas

RECORD, MAY 15.

RETURNING TO HIS POST AS LEADER OF THE BOSTON POPS

AGIDE JACCHIA

The popular Pops leader has been unable to conduct the Pops for a few performances owing to a swollen vein in one ankle, which makes standing most painful. His physicians have told him that he could return to his post this evening, much to his delight as well as the pleasure of his admirers. Mr. Jacchia is offering Boston a series of extremely fine concerts. On his programs stand much beautiful music as well as some of the lighter music of the day.

TRAVELER, MAY 17,

POPS THRIVE ON PROHIBITION

Those who thought taking the wines beer and ale from the Pops marked th death of this popular amusement shoul drop around to Symphony Hall an week night and note the crowded house that wax enthusiastic over Conduc Jacchia's peerless program.

The Pops start in on their third next Monday night. The Temple Is has engaged the entire floor for T day night, entertaining the Unio Congregations and Federation of T ple Sisterhoods, who are holding t national convention here May Thursday night will bring an all- sian program, while Friday night be Roxbury Latin school night.

Monday night's program is:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino" .....
Aubade Printaniere ..... Lac
Traumerei ..... Schu
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-
Carnival in Italy .....
Viola Solos: (a) Melodie; (b) Bagatelle Wittmann
Florian Wittmann; Carl Lamson, Accompanist
Serenade ..... Schubert-Jacchi
Scherzo from the "Eroica" Symphony . Beethove
Dance, "Piemontesi" ..... Sinigagli
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascagn
Valse des Fleurs from the "Nutcracker" Suite ..... Tschaikowsk Bacchanale (The Venusberg Mountain) from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagne

POST, MAY 19

JACCHIA'S BROTHER TO VISIT AMERICA

Mr. Jacchia, conductor of the Pops returns to the conductor's stand for to night's concert, after an absence of sev eral evenings, due to illness. Mr Jacchia has just received word from hi brother, from Italy, where he is prom inent in the manufacture of the Caproni airplane, that he expects to visit th United States within the next fe weeks in the interests of the Caproni plane.

"It is without doubt," said M Jacchia, "in connection with the inte national interests in cross-Atlantic fl ing that my brother is to visit th country, for the Caproni Company, I understand, proposes to enter into th manufacture of seaplanes as well a army machines."

TRAVELER, MAY 20,

JACCHIA OPPOSES MUSIC BOYCOTT

Bans Only Strauss in Retaliation

Signor Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Symphony "Pop" concerts, who is still suffering from an attack of phlebitis which threatens to confine him to his bed for two or three days to come, gave his opinions yesterday on the subject of art as related to politics. Signor Jacchia, who is a strong protagonist of the "art for art's sake" theory, said he was unable to see any connection between these two fields. Art was self-sufficient and should never be besmirched by being dragged through the mire of politics, he declared.

In pursuance of this belief, Signor Jacchia is not to exclude German music from his programs during the coming season. He will make his selections impartially, irrespective of the nationality or political tendencies of the composer.

Wagner and Beethoven will figure as prominently and as frequently as Verdi and Rabaud. Signor Jacchia makes only one exception, which comes in the nature of a reprisal, to this otherwise inflexible rule. The music of Strauss will not be played. He explains this departure as a sort of revenge upon Strauss himself, who at the beginning of the war prohibited the playing of all French and Italian music throughout Germany for solely political reasons.

Concerning the rumors of Signor Jacchia's brother coming over to this country in connection with a projected transatlantic flight in a Caproni hydroplane, the conductor states that aside from the fact his brother is to arrive here shortly in the interests of some Italian airplane company which is attempting to form some sort of Italian-American aviation corporation, he knows nothing definite. The signor adds when he was asked to do some work of this nature in behalf of his brother he politely declined as "business held no charm for him."

ERICAN MAY 24,

Wagner in Again.

Wagner is beginning to figure importantly upon the Pops programs. The audiences receive him politely and there are no casualties. Personally, I never believed in excluding dead German composers from concert programs provided their music was the sort which gives pleasure. The only bad feature of letting them in again is the satisfaction it gives the irrepressible Huns of whom we have a few in our midst. They seem to think that a Wagner overture on our programs is some sort of a "Victory" for the Fatherland.

Now that we have our heel upon the neck of the German Michael I suppose we ought to disregard the hissing of the German geese in our midst, but it is exasperating. An even better argument against Wagner on Pops programs is that Mr. Jacchia is making them heavy enough without him.

There is altogether too much symphonic music on these programs. An audience which is gobbling ice cream, guzzling ginger ale and lemonade and smoking cigarettes is not in the proper frame of mind to be diverted by the Symphony Pathetique of Tschaikowsky, the prelude to Tristan and even the lively movement from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony.

And it is not fair to the symphonies to play them under such conditions. Jacchia was not brought here to conduct symphonies. More operettas and more ragtime, Mr. Jacchia.

POST, MAY 25

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

Agide Jacchia, the popular conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, is again at the helm as the institution faces its fourth week. During his illness, from which he has recovered, Mr. Claude Lenom of old-time renown has obligingly taken his place. Unruffled by disputes over wine and beer the Pops complacently prosper on sundaes, sandwiches and salubrious mixtures of unfermented fruit juices.

Harvard night comes on Wednesday next, May 28. The hall and the waitresses will be decked in red. There will be a lively programme interspersed with rare selections from the Harvard Glee Club. Decoration Day, Friday, May 30, will have appropriate numbers, memorial and patriotic.

HERALD, MAY 2

POPS' FOURTH

Agide Jacchia, the popul of the Pop concerts at Sym is again at the helm as th faces its fourth week. Du ness, from which he has re Lenom of old-time renow obligingly taking his place.

The jubilation of Har (which comes on Wednesda 28), knows no check. The waitresses will be decked i uates and undergraduates from all the country roun the general public will als like to watch young spirit even while they listen to a lively program, intersperse selections from the Harvar Decoration day (Friday, M have appropriate numbers and patriotic. These are th for the week:

MONDAY, MAY 26

March, "Sambre et Meuse" ....
Overture, "William Tell" ....
Polish Dance ....
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ....
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 1 ....
a, Prelude. b, Minuet. c,
Reverie (bassoon and orchestra) ..
Mr. Laus
"In the Garden," from the "Ru ding" Symphony ....
Finlandia ....
Carnival in Paris ....
Romanza ....
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ....
Ride of the Valkyries ....

TUESDAY, MAY 27

March, "101st Infantry" ....
Overture, "Phedre" ....
Souvenir ....
Fantasia, "Aida" ....
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ....
a, Morning Mood. b, Anitra's D
the Hall of the Mountain
Trio, "Devotion" ....
Messrs. Hoffmann, violin; Holy, Organ.
Scherzo, "Midsummer Night's D
Overture, "Rienzi" ....
Selection, "Jack o'Lantern" ....
"The Lost Chord" ....
Solo trumpet, Mr. Mage
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Dan
Cortege de Bacchus ....

WEDNESDAY, MAY 28

Harvard Night
March, "101st Infantry" ....
Overture, "Zampa" ....
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ....
Harvard Glee Club:
Drinking Song ....
Lullaby ....
Hunting Song ....
Serenade ....
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" ....
Slavonic Dance No. 1 ....
Lullaby for strings, from "Stevens E.
Harvard Glee Club:
Traestat hoc nobis ....
Morning Hymn ....
Prayer of Thanksgiving ....
Selection, "Sinbad" ....
Quartet from "Rigoletto" ....
Hungarian Dance No. 1 ....
March, "Up the Street" ....

THURSDAY, MAY 29

Overture, "La Forza del Destino" ..
Waltz, "Pomone" ....
Mandante Cantabile ....
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" ....
Roumanian Rhapsody ....
Flute Solo: ....
Romance Without Words ....
Polonaise ....
Mr. Allan Brooke
Dance of the Priestesses of Dagon, Samson and Delilah" ....
Sando Capriccioso ....
Selection, "Maytime" ....
Duet ....
Mezzo, Act II., "The Jewels of Madonna" ....
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" ....

FRIDAY, MAY 30

Decoration Day Program
Overture, "Siege of Corinth" ....
Stories ....
Tone ....
Fantasia, "Faust" ....
"Souls of Our Heroes" ....
(Christmas) ....
Triste ....
(with organ) ....
Movement from the "Sympho Quartetique" ....
Strings and organ) ....
Roman Patrol ....
Overture from "Il Trovatore" ....

SATURDAY, MAY 31

"Khaki Sammy" ....
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea" ....
"Vienna Blood" ....
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ....
Hours of the Hours, from "La Gioconda Duet Solo, "My Heart at Thy Do
"Samson and Delilah" ....
Marionettes ....
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 in F ....
Medley, "The Rainbow Girl" ....
Medley ....
Overture, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ....
(With Organ)
Waltz to the Dance ....

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SCRIPT, MAY 2

he Pops

every likelihood that, from nday onwards, Mr. Jacchia me without interruption his ductor of The Pops. Mean- Mr. Lenom leading in pro- ared by the disabled director, ve continued on their wonted tally it now stands clear that on of "soft" drinks for the stuff" that was dispensed of ny Hall has in no wise less- ers and the enjoyment of the ally every table on the floor tly; while only in the bal- e listening company fluctuate. re also it appears that the he Pops, outside their peren- s a Boston institution, are he interest and the sustained Jacchia's programmes and and zest as conductor. In ad at The Pops has been a s the commercial travellers or that musician. For Mr. his chief work through the For this evening the pro- s:

Bacchus from the Ballet, ...Delibes Opera, "Figaro's Wedding," Mozart ola.....de N is
he Opera, "Lucia".....Donizetti
Opera, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
the Opera, "Werther"..Massenet tet of Wood-Winds—Capri e .....Sca latti nged by Mr. Jacchia)
m "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Sa ns
.....Chalk w sky
the Opera, "Othello".....Verdi
d Nights".....Strauss
he Musical Play, "Katinka," Friml

l nights" befall next week— Night" on Wednesday at e Club of the college will be numbers, and a fragment of evensoniana," by Edward B. be played, and the night of Friday, when sundry num as a memorial music to the recent war. To suit also ry occasion the resounding haikovsky's "Pathetic Sym e heard. For the sentiment well, Mr. Chadwick's sym "Noel" will serve. For rogramme contains the tone dia," the first music by heard in Boston for a yea Mr. Rabaud seemed unawar e of that eminent composer f Goldmark's fanciful and ony, "The Country Wed- a novelty a solo-piece for played by the excellent Mr. st for Thursday will bring ing prelude to "The Master- Enesco's fiery "Roumanian ile on Saturday the audi- one of Mr. Carpenter's wa rch, "Khaki Sammy."

ICAN MAY 24,

Wagner in Again.

is beginning to figure im- upon the Pops program nces receive him politely re no casualties. Person- er believed in excluding n composers from concert provided their music was hich gives pleasure. The eature of letting them in e satisfaction it gives the e Huns, of whom we have ur midst. They seem to Wagner overture on our some sort of a "Victory" herland.

we have our heel upon the German Michael I suppose o disregard the hissing of geese in our midst, but it ng. An even better argu- st Wagner on Pops pro- at Mr. Jacchia is making enough without him. altogether too much sym- ic on these programs. An hich is gobbling ice cream inger ale and lemonade g cigarettes is not in the e of mind to be diverted mphony Pathetique o ky, the prelude to Tristan e lively movement from Heroic Symphony. ot fair to the symphonies n under such conditions not brought here to con nies. More operettas an e, Mr. Jacchia.

ST, MAY 25

TH WEEK OF POPS

chia, the popular conduct oncerts at Symphony Ha the helm as the institutio urth week. During his i which he has recovered, M m of old-time renown h aken his place. Unruffl over wine and beer, t cently prosper on sunda and salubrious mixtures fruit juices. ight comes on Wednesda s. The hall and the wai e decked in red. There w rogramme interspersed wi ns from the Harvard Gl ation Day (Friday, May 3 propriate numbers, mem riotic.

TRANSCRIPT MAY 26,

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

A Bassoon Solo at the Pops—Mr. Monteux and Choral Concerts—Mrs. Coolidge's Chamber Music Festival — Incidents in Paris

SIBELIUS, of whom good father Rabaud had never heard, but who, none the less, is an eminent composer, returns to Symphony Hall this evening in the tone-poem, "Finlandia," the conspicuous item in Mr. Jacchia's programme for the Pop Concert. The list contains also a fragment from Goldmark's pretty symphony "Rustic Wedding," and a solo-piece for bassoon to be played by the excellent Mr. Laus. In full and with Mr. Jacchia conducting, the programme stands:

March, "Sambre and Meuse".....Planquette
Overture to the Opera, "William Tell"...Rossini
Polish Dance.....Scharwenka
Fantasia from the Opera, "La Bohème".Puccini
Three Movements from the Incidental Music to Daudet's Play, "L'Arlésienne".....Bizet
(Prelude; Minuet; Carillon)
Revery for Bassoon with Orchestra.....Cassado
(Bassoon: Mr. Laus)
"In the Garden," Love-Scene from the Symphony, "Country Wedding".....Goldmark Tone Poem, "Finlandia".....Sibelius
Carnival in Paris.....Svendsen
Romance.....van Westerhout
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner

It is fast becoming an open secret that Mr. Monteux is contemplating a performance next winter of Franck's eloquent oratorio, "The Beatitudes" by the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Townsend's Symphony Chorus in a concert outside of the regular series. In recent years, the piece has been heard but once in Boston and then none too revealingly at the hands of The Cecilia. The likelihood, indeed, is that Mr. Monteux will renew the three concerts of choral masterpieces which Dr. Muck added to the work of the orchestra in his final year. Then, it will be recalled, the public eagerly responded to th

HERALD MAY 25,

POPS' FOURTH WEEK

Agide Jacchia, the popular conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, is again at the helm as the institution faces its fourth week. During his illness, from which he has recovered, Mr. Lenom of old-time renown has been obligingly taking his place.

The jubilation of Harvard Night (which comes on Wednesday next, May 28) knows no check. The hall and the waitresses will be decked in red. Graduates and undergraduates will pour in from all the country round; those of the general public will also come who like to watch young spirits rise high, even when they listen to an especially lively program, interspersed with rare selections from the Harvard Glee Club. Decoration day (Friday, May 30) will have appropriate numbers, memorial and patriotic. These are the programs for the week:

MONDAY, MAY 26

March, "Sambre et Meuse".....Planquette
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Polish Dance.....Scharwenka
Fantasia, "La Bohème".....Puccini
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" No. 1.....Bizet
a. Prelude, b. Minuet, c. Carillon.
Revery (bassoon and orchestra).....Cassado
Mr. Laus
"In the Garden," from the "Rustic Wedding" Symphony.....Goldmark
Finlandia.....Sibelius
Carnival in Paris.....Svendsen
Romance.....Van Westerhout
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

TUESDAY, MAY 27

March, "101st Infantry".....Maquarre
Overture, "Phèdre".....Massenet
Souvenir.....Drdla
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
a. Morning Mood, b. Anitra's Dance, c. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Trio, "Devotion".....Johnson
Messrs. Hoffmann, violin; Holy, harp; Snow, Organ.
Scherzo, "Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Selection, "Jack o' Lantern".....Caryll
"The Lost Chord".....Sullivan
Solo, Trumpet, Mr. Mager
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".Strauss
Cortège de Bacchus.....Delibes

WEDNESDAY, MAY 28

Harvard Night

March, "101st Infantry".....Maquarre
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Harvard Glee Club
Bacchanale, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak
Lullaby, "Stevensoniana".....Hill
Harvard Glee Club
"Sinbad".....Romberg
Quartet, Rigoletto.....Verdi
Hungarian Dance No. 1.....Brahms
"Up the Street".....Morse

RECORD, MAY 31,

GUSTAV STRUBE AT HIS OLD POST AS POPS CONDUCTOR

Gustav Strube, for 18 years a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for 14 years, from time to time, conductor of the Pop concerts, returns today to Boston to lead the Pops again. Mr. Jacchia, this season's conductor, has been confined to his home for some time by illness. Mr. Lenom has conducted on some occasions. The management have now secured the services of Mr. Strube, who will conduct the performances until further notice.

Two special nights of more than usual interest are scheduled for this week. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian Night. A program from the country of carolling tenors without some opera selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the program are not from operas, which goes to prove that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is both popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, Mr. C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of our soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops Night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whizz-Bang" program will be interspersed with community singing in the intermissions.

Phila. May 27.

THE "POP" CONCERTS.

One of the best means of supplying attractive and wholesome entertainment for thousands of people has been found to be "The Pops" at Symphony Hall. There are many attractive regular forms of entertainment that give pleasure and complete satisfaction to a large portion of the great public, but there are also many instances where the theatre, the concert hall or the high-class picture house will hardly gratify the restless man who has been accustomed for years to meet his friends at the club and social gatherings. Symphony Hall with its great orchestra, giving popular concerts during the spring and early summer months, playing semi-classic and popular music is not lacking in genial atmosphere for during the programs light refreshments are served at tables where groups of friends may gather to spend a social and profitable evening.

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 27,

PLAYS AND CONCERTS

Mr. Jacchia Returns to the Pops—A New Schedule at the Plymouth — Summer Farces at the Copley

BACK to Symphony Hall last evening came Mr. Jacchia, no longer disabled physically and leading with the rhythmic verve, the melodic warmth, the ardor for every piece, each according to its kind, that make his Pops more engaging, more spirited than any the Bostonian public has known in years. His programmes, besides, are as full of interest and zest. With reason, his audience yesterday applauded his return. For this evening the list of pieces runs in agreeable miscellany:

March, "101st Infantry".....Maquarre
Overture to Racine's Play, "Phèdre"....Massenet
Souvenir.....Drdla
Fantasia from the Opera, "Aida".....Verdi
Three Fragments from the Music to Ibsen's Play, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg (Morning Mood; Anita's Dance; In the Hall of the Mountain King)
Trio, "Devotion".....Johnson
(Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; Harp, Mr. Holy; Organ, Mr. Snow)
Scherzo from the Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"..... Mendelssohn
Overture to the Opera, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Selection from the Musical Play, "Jack o' Lantern".....Caryll Song, "The Lost Chord".....Sullivan
(Trumpet, Mr. Mager)
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....Strauss
Procession of Bacchus from the Ballet, "Sylvia".....Delibes

According to the present schedule at the Plymouth, "Pinafore" and "The Mikado" —most sought in these days of all the operettas by Gilbert and Sullivan—will divide the third and final week of the stay of the company that has once more and exhilaratingly brought them back to Boston. "Pinafore" will be sung and acted on Mon-

RECORD, MAY 28,

Harvard Night at Pops

For the benefit of graduates, undergraduates and the general public who are interested, Symphony Hall will flaunt red banners tonight for the Pop Concert will be dedicated to the great university. The following music of "pep," interspersed with part songs by the college glee club, will enliven the evening:—

March, "101st Infantry".....Maquarre
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Estudiantine".....Waldteufel
Harvard Glee Club
Bacchanale, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak
Lullaby, "Stevensoniana".....Hill
Harvard Glee Club
"Sinbad".....Romberg
Quartet, Rigoletto.....Verdi
Hungarian Dance No. 1.....Brahms
"Up the Street".....Morse

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 31.

UNFORTUNATELY Mr. Jacchia's illness still disables him and since last Tuesday, Mr. Lenom has been leading at the Pop Concerts, to be succeeded next week by Mr. Strube returning to a post he of old adorned. Last Monday, Mr. Jacchia returned to his place, conducted with his usual zest and energy—and next day experienced a relapse that for the present shuts him in his rooms. There, however, he still puts together the wide-ranging programmes that are not the least of the interest and the pleasure of the Pops; while conductor and orchestra as painstakingly play the chosen pieces. Thus the list for the evening includes four operatic fragments as well as one of Liszt's rhapsodies, Berlioz's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and a sample of Mr. Carpenter as wartime and topical composer in a march, "Khaki Sammy." The list of pieces stands:

March, "Khaki Sammy".....Carpenter
Overture to the Operetta, "The Beautiful Galatea".....Suppé
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Fantasia from the Opera, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Dance of the Hours from the Opera, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli Trumpet Solo, "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from the Opera, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
The Marionettes.....Lacombe
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1.....Liszt
Selection from the Musical Play, "The Rainbow Girl".....Hirsch
Narcissus.....Nevin
Intermezzo from the Opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

Two special "nights" befall next week—an evening for the War Camp Community Service on Tuesday and an evening with an Italian programme on Thursday. For more or less novel pieces, as lists at The Pops go or for notably interesting numbers, the programmes for the new week promise on Monday Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon," the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan" and the whirling, jostling finale of Chaikovsky's fourth symphony; on Tuesday a seldom heard fantasia of Rimsky-Korsakov for violin and orchestra with Mr. Thillois to play the violin part; on Wednesday fragments of Verdi's opera, "Othello," Liszt's third rhapsody, an oboe-piece for the excellent Mr. Speyer, and Smetana's racing overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride"; on Thursday, ancient and modern, symphonic and operatic. Italian composers from Scarlatti and Corelli through Rossini and Verdi to Sinigaglia and Casella on Friday, the closing scene from Wagner's "Tristan"; and on Saturday, Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival." There is likelihood that the incoming Strube will alter some of these items.

Only a few in Boston longed to hear the music of Wagner while American soldiers were fighting in France. Not because Wagner, after the Franco-Prussian war, wrote a foolish, contemptible satire on the Parisians, but because his arrogance and the spirit of his later music were aggressively German. If music by him had been played last season, there would probably have been no unpleasant scene; there might have been applause, for the audience of the Boston Symphony Hall applauds everything, especially a funeral march played in memory of a composer or a citizen.

There is no reason why Mr. Monteux should not conduct music by Wagner next season, if he shows himself skilled in the interpretation of the music. The time has not come, however, when an American can listen patiently to the music of Richard Strauss, Max Bruch, Felix Weingartner, Engelbert Humperdinck and other living representatives of German "Kultur." No one in his right and patriotic mind wishes to pay fees to them or to their publishers.

It must be said, however, that the question of "enemy music" has not been solved in France or in England to the satisfaction of everyone. If Wagnerian operas have been performed in London, there has been in the same city an outcry against performances of music by Brahms, and there was on one occasion, incredible as the statement seems, a protest against music by Handel.

Soon after the present war broke out Saint-Saens wrote in behalf of an anti-German movement in Paris. Saint-Saens is in his 84th year, but he still writes vigorously, violently. Perhaps his attack was directed not so much against the music of Wagner as against the Wagnerian cult in France, the influence of which, in our judgment, he overestimates.

Some other Frenchmen are not so bitterly hostile toward Germanic music. Lucien Chevaillier set himself the task of obtaining the opinions of French musicians who have fought in the war. "By whom," he asks, "should the controversy be definitely settled unless by the musicians that risked their lives in defence of their nation and stood up against Wagner's compatriots? For they are judges who cannot be suspected of partiality toward the German composer."

We now quote from an article in the Daily Telegraph of London: "By means of a publication called Gazette des Classes du Conservatoire, it was sought to obtain from soldier-musicians and musicians mobilized, though not actually in the firing line, an answer to three questions, of which the second ran thus: 'Should German musicians be allowed to retain their places? Brahms and and Wagner?' The results were tabulated as follows: Out of 56 French musicians at the front who were interrogated 46 expressed themselves in favor of Wagner's works being reinstated in their country's repertory; two were radically opposed to that view; four returned less categorical negatives; two replied vaguely, and two vouchsafed no answer. Then, among the musicians mobilized, but serving in the rear lines, 12 were in favor of reviving the Wagner works, while only one was found to be diametrically opposed to any such revival."

Mr. Chevaillier, citing these opinions, asked whether any one would dare to dispute the opinion of the French soldiers "after they had passed under the Arc de Triomphe."

But Saint-Saens contends that for him the Wagner question goes beyond the kingdom of music, for, as he says, the Germans, having long misunderstood Wagner, made of him their national composer, their "great art hero," so that they named war trenches after the characters in his operas. "In these circumstances for us to perform his works would be equivalent to setting up the German flag."

The editor of Le Monde Musical in which this article of Saint-Saens was published, wrote in reply. Mr. Mangeot said:

"It is precisely that which exasperates musicians who have taken the 'Wotan and 'Siegfried' lines—to be accused of hoisting the German flag because they ask not to be wholly deprived of Wagner's operas." He mentioned the fact that Gen. Mangin and his headquarters staff attended a performance of "Die Walkuere" at Wiesbaden.

"They would laugh if they were told that they had thus saluted the German flag." Mr. Mangeot also said to Saint-Saens that "his countrymen, having gone to war in defence of their freedom, and having achieved that end, now demanded to be left free in the choice of their artistic pleasures; after all, it will be easy for those who do not wish to hear Wagner's music any more to stay at home when his music is played." And Saint-Seans was reminded of the fact—that his anti-German attack had also been aimed at Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, whose names had not been given to "the German trenches." Had we listened to you there would have been an end of the Mass in D, and you would have made of us destroyers of cathedrals."

Mr. Stravinsky put music by Wagner on programs, or a program, of the Philharmonic Society of New York last season, that was expected of him. The wonder is that he did not prepare exclusively German programs throughout the year. Nor would it have been surprising if Mr. Stokowski of Philadelphia had done likewise.

Mr. Rabaud showed the musical public of Boston that a Frenchman could be a master interpreter of Beethoven's symphonies and overtures. His interpretation of Wagner's music would undoubtedly have been impressive, for he was celebrated in Paris as a conductor of Wagnerian opera; as he was praised enthusiastically by the Viennese critics in 1899 when he, with Max d'Ollonne, conducted a series of elaborate concerts with diversified programs in that musically fastidious city. It was unfortunate for us that the war was raging; that Wagner was to the great majority not persona grata.

There need be no fear that Mr. Monteux will "Germanize" the musical public by conducting Wagner's music. In years past we have had too much German music, too much, and too little French, Russian, English music. Strong doses, one might say drenches, of Sibelius did not console us. It was a good thing to lose Sibelius for one season. His music will be the fresher when we hear it again. Mr. Monteux is a man of catholic taste. He will not come here as a propagandist of any cult.

Record Mar 27

Harvard Men Make Merry at Pops

Graduates and undergraduates of Harvard made merry last evening at the Harvard Night concert at the Symphony Hall Pops. Owing to the indisposition of Agide Jacchia, the evening's program was conducted admirably by Mr. Lenom.

The Harvard Glee Club rendered many selections and came in for the lion's share of the applause.

Many of the students present thought the Glee Club was putting something over when they started the program by singing "The Drinking Song" and ended with a "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

Selections from "Sinbad" were well received. A special Decoration Day program has been arranged for tomorrow.

RECORD, MAY 31.

COMMUNITY SINGING AT POPS WAR NIGHT

The new feature of community singing, in combination with the Pops, will be introduced at Symphony Hall on War Camp Community service night, which is scheduled for June 3. A special program for this first night for service men yet given in Boston has been arranged by Mr. Jacchia, leader of the orchestra.

The decorations of Symphony Hall on this occasion, in charge of Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene, chairman of the W. C. C. S. central bureau of entertainments, will consist simply of the American flag, flags of the Allies, the Y. D. standard, State flag and war camp community service insignia.

The community singing will be led by E. B. Aborn and a number of the favorite songs of the soldiers, suggested by them, will be sung

HERALD, JUNE 1,

THE POPS THRIVE

On all nights except Sunday, and particularly the warm ones, Boston is flocking to Symphony Hall to hear an unprecedented combination so far as the musical world goes—the finest of all orchestras playing the lightest of all music. By no means the least part of the Pops are the soloists. During the coming week the following will play Mr. Heim, trumpeter; Mr. Hoffmann the concert master (his last week), and Mr. Gerardi, violinist, Mr. Holy, harpist, Mr. Snow, organist, Messrs, Thillois and Speyer, Frenchmen who play the violin and oboe respectively and who bravely served in the war.

Two special nights of more than usual interest are scheduled. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian night. A program from the country of carolling tenors without some operatic selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the program are not from operas, which proves that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whiz-Bang" program will be interspersed with community singing in the intermissions. The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 2, 1919

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Romanza ..... Cella
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" .. Wagner
Intermezzo "Naila" ..... Delibes
"Hymn to St. Cecilia" ..... Gounod
Messrs. Hoffmann, violin; Holy, harp
Snow, organ.
Finale from the Fourth Symphony ..
Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Sometime" ..... Friml
Reverie, "The Voice of Chimes" .... Luigini
Waltz, "Wine Women and Song" ... Strauss
In the Hall of the Mountain King
from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg

TUESDAY, JUNE 3

War Camp Community Service Night
March, "Bullets and Bayonets" ..... Sousa
Overture, "Robespierre" ..... Litolff
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Selection, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Prelude and Siciliana from "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
Violin Solo, Concert Fantasia .....
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Mr. Thillois.
Quartet from "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin" ... Wagner
Selection, "Jack O' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Cavalry Charge ..... Spindler
Waltz, "Roses From the South" .... Strauss
American Patrol ..... Meacham

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4

Overture, "Robespierre" ..... Litolff
Bohemian Dance from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Marche Miniature ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Othello," ..... Verdi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Oboe Solo ..... Paladilhe
Mr. Speyer
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Overture to "The Bartered Bride" . Smetana
Little Suite ..... Trucco
a. Reverie.
b. Arietta.
c. Gavotta.
Humoresque ..... Dvorak
Valse Bleue ..... Margis
Selection, "Katinka" ..... Friml

THURSDAY, JUNE 5.

Italian Night.
Triumphal March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Interludio ..... Tirindelli
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascabni
Suite ..... Van Westerhout
a. Children's Parade.
b. Canzone.
c. Romanza.
d. Children at Play.
Violin Solo, "La Follia" ..... Corelli
Mr. Gerardi.
a. Pastorale ..... Scarlatti
b. Capriccio (1658-1757)
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" ...
Sinigaglia
Minuet ..... Puccini
Waltz, "Il Bacio" ..... Arditi
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli

FRIDAY, JUNE 6.

March, "Lorraine" ..... Ganne
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" ..... Lehar
Fantasia, "La Traviata" ..... Verdi
Ballet Music from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Ave Maria (for strings and organ
Schubert-Wilhelm
Cello Solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Second Polinaise ..... Liszt
"Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Glorianna" ..... Friml
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivan
Cornet Solo, Mr. Heim; organ, Mr. Snow
Waltz, "Morning Journals" ..... Strauss
Farandole from the Suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 2 ..... Bizet

SATURDAY, JUNE 7

March, "The Merry Soldier" ..... Sabathil
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"
Nicolai
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Violin solo: Two Spanish Dances—a, Malaguena; b, Habanera .. Sarasate
Mr. Jacques Hoffmann.
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ... Berlioz
Selection, "Fiddlers Three" ..... Johnstone
Turkish Patrol ..... Michaelis
Waltz, "Eternelle Ivresse" ..... Ganne
March Militaire ..... Schubert

HERALD, JUNE 1,

Symphony Hall Event

An important event announced for this week is war camp community service night at Symphony Hall, for June 3, when several hundred United States army and naval officers and enlisted men, soldiers, sailors and marines will be the guests of Boston war camp community service and a number of its co-operating organizations.

A special program has been arranged by Mr. Jacchia for the occasion, and the novel feature—for Symphony Hall and the Pops—of community singing, to be led by Mr. Edward B. Aborn, will be introduced.

The hall will be decorated with American flags, flags of the allies, the YD standard, state flag, and city and war camp community service insignias.

The list of invited guests includes his excellency Gov. Calvin Coolidge and Mrs. Coolidge, his honor the Mayor and Mrs. Peters, Gen. and Mrs. Edwards, Admiral Herbert O. Dunn, commandant of the Boston Navy Yard; Chaplain Parker, now stationed on the receiving ship of Boston at Hingham, and several hundred service men.

Among those who have secured tables and invited service men as their guests are Mrs. Gamaliel Bradford of Wellesley Hills, Mrs. George W. Wheelwright, Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene, Miss Margaret R. Starratt, Miss Esther Conant, Mr. Chauncey W. Waldron, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus D. Smith, Mrs. George C. Larrabee, Miss Edith M. Howes, Mrs. Mark Andrews, Mrs. H. F. Winslow, Mrs. Herbert E. Fales, Mrs. Addison Burnham, Mrs. Harold Sears, Miss Alma Greenwood, Miss N. Jean Olessen, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Lee, Mrs. Lila Woodbury Lane, Mrs. John Balch of Milton.

HERALD JUNE 1.

WILL CONDUCT "POPS" NEXT WEEK

Gustav Strube, conductor and composer, veteran violinst of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and favorite conductor of the Pops for many a season will preside as guest conductor over the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall for the fifth week, beginning Monday night. This will give Mr. Jacchia full opportunity to recuperate from his illness.

HERALD, JUNE 1,

POPS SECURE GUSTAV STRUBE

Gustav Strube, conductor and composer, veteran violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and favorite conductor of the pops for many a season is in town, ready to act as guest conductor over the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall for the fifth week of the pops, beginning tomorrow night. It has been deemed wise thus to give Mr. Jacchia full opportunity to recuperate from his illness. For the past fortnight during Mr. Jacchia's enforced absence Mr. Clement Lenom, also a Pops leader of several past seasons, has been guest conductor.

Many Bostonians still speak of the lightness and brightness of Mr. Strube's programs, which would make the rainiest evening sociable. Of his own marches and melodies, which were great favorities, at least "Cruiser Harvard" and the "Serenade" will be heard during the week.

Mr. Strube was a member of the years (190-1913), and conducted the Pops for 14 seasons. At the Worcester festivals for six years he conducted both the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony orchestras. From Boston he went to Baltimore, where for six years he has been a mainstay of the Peabody Institute of Musical Instruction, and virtually created te Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which is municipally owned. Mr. Strube has also composed serious music, which has been performed in the larger cities.

TRAVELER, JUNE 2,

GUSTAV STRUBE TO LEAD POPS FOR WEEK

Gustav Strube, the musician and composer, who is an old favorite among the Pops conductors of the past, has come to Boston to be guest conductor at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall for the present week. Tonight he will make his bow to the Bostonian public for the first time in six years. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Romanza ..... Cella
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Serenade ..... Strube
Hymn to Saint Cecilia ..... Strube
(Violin-harp-organ.)
Finale from the Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Sometimes" ..... Friml
Reverie, "The Voice of Chimes" ..... Buigini
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .... Strauss
In the Hall of the Mountain King ..... Grieg

POST, JUNE 1,

Jacchia Praises Miss Bellini

Marguerite Bellini. (Photo by White.)

Miss Marguerita Bellini, a young Boston girl of Italian parentage, and who has earned the greater part of the money used for her musical education by her own efforts, has written a work for orchestra that is being considered so seriously that Mr. Brennan, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has brought it to the attention of Mr. Jacchia, the conductor of the Pops.

Mr. Jacchia says that the work has so much merit that he intends to place it on one of his popular programmes during the season.

The young music student is hopeful of an early performance of her ambitious work and is longing for the day of rehearsal. Mr. Jacchia says Miss Bellini shows remarkable gifts in orchestral construction, but adds that, of course, in many places it requires the hand of a more experienced musician to give the score the professional finish.

Miss Bellini is adding to her educational fund by working every night during the Pops season at Symphony Hall. She is one of the 35 attractive waitresses who serve refreshments at the Pop concerts during this season of "light refreshments only" service, and it was in this way that the attention of the management was brought to the talented student.

Aside from the material assistance her earnings at the Pops aid her in her studies, the chief reason for applying for a place among the fair waitresses was for the opportunity it afforded her to hear the orchestra night after night for 10 weeks, a privilege she could not otherwise enjoy and which she considers invaluable to her in the career for which she seems destined.

THE POPS

On all nights except Sunday, and particularly the warm ones, Boston is flocking to Symphony Hall to hear an unprecedented combination so far as the musical world goes—the finest of all orchestras playing the lightest of all music. By no means the least part of the Pops are the soloists. During the coming week the following will play: Mr. Heim, who is perhaps the best trumpeter in the country; Mr. Hoffmann, the concertmaster (his last week), and Mr. Gerardi, violinists; Mr. Holy, harpist; Mr. Snow, organist; Messrs. Thillois and Speyer, Frenchmen who play the violin and oboe respectfully and have bravely served in the war.

Two special nights of more than unusual interest are scheduled. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian night. A programme from the country of carolling tenors without some opera selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the programme are not from operas, which goes to prove that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is both popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, Mr. C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of our soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whiz-Bang" programme will be in

CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE JUNE 7,

STRUBE RULES THE POPS

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony hall, which are now mid-season, has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and cool drinks, also by the guest conductor, Gustav Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr. Strube is no newcomer to the Pops, and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has recently built up a symphony orchestra in Baltimore.

HERALD, JUNE 3,

EXPECT RUSH FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS

Monteaux Engagement Makes Concert Series Popular

The option to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to renew their subscriptions for the coming season expires tomorrow and the advance sales already indicate a strong public interest in this season's series. The engagement of Pierre Monteaux as conductor, who created such a favorable impression at last year was loaned by the Metropolitan Opera Company to conduct the opening concerts here and who that time, is believed to have much to do with this advance sale. There is every liklihood that by October there will be no seats left to sell from week to week at the Friday afternoon concerts.

Practically every seat has been taken for the 10 Boston Sympathy Orchestra concerts in New York. The five concerts to be given in Washington will be just as popular.

Symphony concerts only have been exempted from the war tax under government regulations and the prices of tickets have remained unchanged. In a sense they are lower, for prices have soared in all other directions and the expense of maintaining the orchestra is much larger than ever before.

GLOBE- JUNE 4

SOLDIERS SING WAR SONGS AT THE POP

War Camp Service Night Brings Noted Guests

Gov Coolidge, Gen Ruckman Present —Solo by Ferdinand Thillois

Flags and banners adorned Symphony Hall last evening, when more than 25[illegible] persons enjoyed the program of War Camp Community Service night at the Pops. Khaki and blue predominated in the audience. During intermissions the songs of the camps and trenches were sung by the uniformed guests, under the direction of E. B. Aborn, with Arthur Fiedler accompanying. A feature of the concert program was the "Concert Fantasia" played by Ferdinand Thillois, the French violinist, veteran of the Marne, Argonne and Chemin des Dames battles.

Among the guests were Gov and Mrs Coolidge, Gen Ruckman, Chaplain McNair, Col Blake, Lieut Parker, Lieut Commander Brickley and Maj A. F. Elwell, who were the guests of Mrs A. Lincoln Filene; Mrs Lila W. Lane, Chauncey W. Waldren, Miss Alma Greenwood, Alexander T. M. Van Renssalaer of New York, Miss Margaret R. Stoddard, chairman of the Home Hospitality Committee, and Ensign H. C. Stoddard, Lieut Marvin S. Bowman, Miss Esther Conant, and 50 of the wounded soldiers from the Base Hospital at Parker Hill, escorted by a group of officers.

Members of the Girls' City Club, Y. W. C. A., members and representatives of girls' societies of Greater Boston, accompanied by uniformed guests from the camps about the city, occupied the galleries.

The orchestral performance was conducted by Agide Jacchia.

HERALD, JUNE 4,

POP CONCERT FOR WAR SERVICE MEN

Governor, Army and Navy Officers Among the Audience

Last night was War Camp Community Service night at the Pop concert and for the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for a body of service men. Gustav Strube conducted. Another feature which gave added interest to the program was the community singing, introduced for the first time at a Pop concert and which was led by E. D. Aborn, song leader of the W. C. C. S.

The decorations of the hall were simple, consisting only of American flags and the standard of the War Camp Community Service. The program was arranged especially for the occasion and included many of the songs that have been so popular for the past two years among the service boys.

Gov. and Mrs. Coolidge, Maj.-Gen McCain of Camp Devens, Col. E. M Blake, representing Maj.-Gen. Edwards Chaplain McNair of the Boston Navy Yard, Lt. H. C. Parker of Camp Devens and Miss Alma Greenwood were guests at Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene's table.

Present also were 50 men from the Parker Hill Hospital and more than 10[illegible] army and navy officers.

TRAVELER JUNE 7,

POPS ON SECOND HALF OF SEASON

Monday evening next inaugurates the second half of the Pops season in Symphony Hall. Mr. Strube will be at the conductor's stand. Mr. Theodorowicz succeeds Mr. Hoffman as concert master. Mr. Heim, the trumpeter, returns. Mr. de Mailly, the admired flutist, returns after a long illness.

There will be three special nights, Tuesday, being Boston Athletic Association night; Thursday, Euclid lodge night, with members participating both as soloists and composers, and Friday night, Insurance night. Monday night's program will be:

March, "Black Bess" ..... Strube
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ..... Waldteufel
Scenes Pittoresques ..... Massenet
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Suite, "Children's Corner" ..... Debussy
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Hungarian Dance No. 5 ..... Brahms
Selection, "The Fortune Teller" ..... Herbert
Ave Maria (strings and organ) . Schubert-Strube
Violoncello solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Waltz, "Enjoy Life" ..... Strauss
Finlandia ..... Sibelius

AMERICAN JUNE 7,

STRUBE LEADS POPS

The popularity of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and iced refreshments, also by the guest conductor, Mr. Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this.

Since next week will inaugurate the second half of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard.. Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, a native of Poland, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1895, except for interruptions (such as when he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet), becomes concertmaster of the Pops, which post he has taken for several years. Mr. Heim, rivalled by no more than two or three trumpeters living, has also returned, and takes great delight in playing the love song from "Samson and Delilah," "Killarney" and "Till We Meet Again," not to speak of the huge delight, which he gives in the same, with splendid tone. Mr. Charles DeMailly, long absent from serious illness, will also be welcomed back this week as first flutist.

RECORD, JUNE 7,

Strube Leads Pops

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and iced refreshments, also by the guest conductor, Mr. Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr. Strube is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship his lively gesture, and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has since launched and raised to a state of importance the civic Symphony Orchestra of Baltimore.

Since next week will inaugurate the second half of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard. Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, a native of Poland, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1895 except for interruptions (such as when he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet) becomes concertmaster of the Pops, which post he has taken for several years. Mr. Heim, rivalled by no more than two or three trumpeters living, has also returned.

There will be three special nights this week. On Tuesday, June 10, the Boston Athletic Assn., under the direction of Mr. Frank Son, have taken a number of tables. Thursday, June 12, the members of the Euclid Lodge will make merry. For Friday night, June 13, the entire floor has been appropriated by the Insurance Society of Massachusetts.

POP CONCERTS

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, which are now mid-season, has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and cool drinks, also by the guest conductor, Gustav Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr Strube is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture, and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has recently built up a symphony orchestra in Baltimore.

HERALD, JUNE 1,

THE POPS THRIVE

On all nights except Sunday, and particularly the warm ones, Boston is flocking to Symphony Hall to hear an unprecedented combination so far as the musical world goes—the finest of all orchestras playing the lightest of all music. By no means the least part of the Pops are the soloists. During the coming week the following will play Mr. Heim, trumpeter; Mr. Hoffmann the concert master (his last week), and Mr. Gerardi, violinist, Mr. Holy, harpist, Mr. Snow, organist, Messrs, Thillois and Speyer, Frenchmen who play the violin and oboe respectively and who bravely served in the war.

Two special nights of more than usual interest are scheduled. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian night. A program from the country of carolling tenors without some operatic selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the program are not from operas, which proves that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whiz-Bang" program will be interspersed with community singing in the intermissions.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 2, 1919

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Romanza ..... Cella
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" .. Wagner
Intermezzo "Naila" ..... Delibes
"Hymn to St. Cecilia" ..... Gounod
Messrs. Hoffmann, violin; Holy, harp
Snow, organ.
Finale from the Fourth Symphony .. Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Sometime" ..... Friml
Reverie, "The Voice of Chimes" .... Luigini
Waltz, "Wine Women and Song" ... Strauss
In the Hall of the Mountain King from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg

TUESDAY, JUNE 3

War Camp Community Service Night
March, "Bullets and Bayonets" ..... Sousa
Overture, "Robespierre" ..... Litolff
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Selection, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Prelude and Siciliana from "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagn
Violin Solo, Concert Fantasia ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Mr. Thillois.
Quartet from "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin" ... Wagner
Selection, "Jack O' Lantern" ..... Caryll
Cavalry Charge ..... Spindler
Waltz, "Roses From the South" .... Strauss
American Patrol ..... Meacham

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4

Overture, "Robespierre" ..... Litolff
Bohemian Dance from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Marche Miniature ..... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Othello," ..... Verdi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Oboe Solo ..... Paladilhe
Mr. Speyer
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Overture to "The Bartered Bride" . Smetana
Little Suite ..... Trucco
a. Reverie.
b. Arietta.
c. Gavotta.
Humoresque ..... Dvorak
Valse Bleue ..... Margis
Selection, "Katinka" ..... Friml

THURSDAY, JUNE 5.

Italian Night.
Triumphal March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Interludio ..... Tirindelli
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascabni
Suite ..... Van Westerhout
a. Children's Parade.
b. Canzone.
c. Romanza.
d. Children at Play.
Violin Solo, "La Follia" ..... Corelli
Mr. Gerardi.
a. Pastorale ..... Scarlatti
b. Capriccio (1658-1757)
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" ... Sinigaglia
Minuet ..... Puccini
Waltz, "Il Bacio" ..... Arditi
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli

FRIDAY, JUNE 6.

March, "Lorraine" ..... Ganne
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Gold and Silver" ..... Lehar
Fantasia, "La Traviata" ..... Verdi
Ballet Music from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Ave Maria (for strings and organ Schubert-Wilhelm
Cello Solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Second Polinaise ..... Lisz
"Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagne
Selection, "Glorianna" ..... Frim
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivai
Cornet Solo, Mr. Heim; organ, Mr. Snow
Waltz, "Morning Journals" ..... Strauss
Farandole from the Suite "L 'Arlesienne" No. 2 ..... Bizet

SATURDAY, JUNE 7

March, "The Merry Soldier" ..... Sabathil
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Violin solo: Two Spanish Dances—a, Malaguena; b, Habanera .. Sarasate
Mr. Jacques Hoffmann.
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ... Berlioz
Selection, "Fiddlers Three" ..... Johnstone
Turkish Patrol ..... Michaelis
Waltz, "Eternelle Ivresse" ..... Ganne
March Militaire ..... Schubert

TRAVELER, JUNE 2,

GUSTAV STRUBE TO LEAD POPS FOR WEEK

Gustav Strube, the musician and composer, who is an old favorite among the Pops conductors of the past, has come to Boston to be guest conductor at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall for the present week. Tonight he will make his bow to the Bostonian public for the first time in six years. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Romanza ..... Cella
Fantasia, "La Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Serenade ..... Strube
Hymn to Saint Cecilia ..... Strube
(Violin-harp-organ.)
Finale from the Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Sometimes" ..... Friml
Reverie, "The Voice of Chimes" ..... Buigini
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" .... Strauss
In the Hall of the Mountain King ..... Grieg

HERALD, JUNE 1,

Symphony Hall Event

An important event announced for this week is war camp community service night at Symphony Hall, for June 3, when several hundred United States army and naval officers and enlisted men, soldiers, sailors and marines will be the guests of Boston war camp community service and a number of its co-operating organizations.

A special program has been arranged by Mr. Jacchia for the occasion, and the novel feature—for Symphony Hall and the Pops—of community singing, to be led by Mr. Edward B. Aborn, will be introduced.

The hall will be decorated with American flags, flags of the allies, the YD standard, state flag, and city and war camp community service insignias.

The list of invited guests includes his excellency Gov. Calvin Coolidge and Mrs. Coolidge, his honor the Mayor and Mrs. Peters, Gen. and Mrs. Edwards, Admiral Herbert O. Dunn, commandant of the Boston Navy Yard; Chaplain Parker, now stationed on the receiving ship of Boston at Hingham, and several hundred service men.

Among those who have secured tables and invited service men as their guests are Mrs. Gamaliel Bradford of Wellesley Hills, Mrs. George W. Wheelwright, Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene, Miss Margaret R. Starratt, Miss Esther Conant, Mr. Chauncey W. Waldron, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus D. Smith, Mrs. George C. Larrabee, Miss Edith M. Howes, Mrs. Mark Andrews, Mrs. H. F. Winslow, Mrs Herbert E. Fales, Mrs. Addison Burnham, Mrs. Harold Sears, Miss Alma Greenwood, Miss N. Jean Olessen, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Lee, Mrs. Lila Woodbury Lane, Mrs. John Balch of Milton.

HERALD JUNE 1.

WILL CONDUCT "POPS" NEXT WEEK

Gustav Strube, conductor and composer, veteran violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and favorite conductor of the Pops for many a season will preside as guest conductor over the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall for the fifth week, beginning Monday night. This will give Mr. Jacchia full opportunity to recuperate from his illness.

HERALD, JUNE 1,

POPS SECURE GUSTAV STRUBE

Gustav Strube, conductor and composer, veteran violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and favorite conductor of the pops for many a season is in town, ready to act as guest conductor over the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall for the fifth week of the pops, beginning tomorrow night. It has been deemed wise thus to give Mr. Jacchia full opportunity to recuperate from his illness. For the past fortnight during Mr. Jacchia's enforced absence Mr. Clement Lenom, also a Pops leader of several past seasons, has been guest conductor.

Many Bostonians still speak of the lightness and brightness of Mr. Strube's programs, which would make the rainiest evening sociable. Of his own marches and melodies, which were great favorities, at least "Cruiser Harvard" and the "Serenade" will be heard during the week.

Mr. Strube was a member of the years (190-1913), and conducted the Pops for 14 seasons. At the Worcester festivals for six years he conducted both the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony orchestras. From Boston he went to Baltimore, where for six years he has been a mainstay of the Peabody Institute of Musical Instruction, and virtually created te Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which is municipally owned. Mr. Strube has also composed serious music, which has been performed in the larger cities.

POST, JUNE 1,

Jacchia Praises Miss Bellini

Marguerite Bellini. (Photo by White.)

Miss Marguerita Bellini, a young Boston girl of Italian parentage, and who has earned the greater part of the money used for her musical education by her own efforts, has written a work for orchestra that is being considered so seriously that Mr. Brennan, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has brought it to the attention of Mr. Jacchia, the conductor of the Pops.

Mr. Jacchia says that the work has so much merit that he intends to place it on one of his popular programmes during the season.

The young music student is hopeful of an early performance of her ambitious work and is longing for the day of rehearsal. Mr. Jacchia says Miss Bellini shows remarkable gifts in orchestral construction, but adds that, of course, in many places it requires the hand of a more experienced musician to give the score the professional finish.

Miss Bellini is adding to her educational fund by working every night during the Pops season at Symphony Hall. She is one of the 35 attractive waitresses who serve refreshments at the Pop concerts during this season of "light refreshments only" service, and it was in this way that the attention of the management was brought to the talented student.

Aside from the material assistance her earnings at the Pops aid her in her studies, the chief reason for applying for a place among the fair waitresses was for the opportunity it afforded her to hear the orchestra night after night for 10 weeks, a privilege she could not otherwise enjoy and which she considers invaluable to her in the career for which she seems destined.

THE POPS

On all nights except Sunday, and particularly the warm ones, Boston is flocking to Symphony Hall to hear an unprecedented combination so far as the musical world goes—the finest of all orchestras playing the lightest of all music. By no means the least part of the Pops are the soloists. During the coming week the following will play: Mr. Heim, who is perhaps the best trumpeter in the country; Mr. Hoffmann, the concertmaster (his last week), and Mr. Gerardi, violinists; Mr. Holy, harpist; Mr. Snow, organist; Messrs. Thillois and Speyer, Frenchmen who play the violin and oboe respectfully and have bravely served in the war.

Two special nights of more than unusual interest are scheduled. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian night. A programme from the country of carolling tenors without some opera selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the programme are not from operas, which goes to prove that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is both popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, Mr. C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of our soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whiz-Bang" programme will be in-

CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE JUNE 7,

STRUBE RULES THE POPS

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony hall, which are now mid-season, has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and cool drinks, also by the guest conductor, Gustav Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr. Strube is no newcomer to the Pops, and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has recently built up a symphony orchestra in Baltimore.

HERALD JUNE 3,

EXPECT RUSH FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS

Monteaux Engagement Makes Concert Series Popular

The option to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to renew their subscriptions for the coming season expires tomorrow and the advance sales already indicate a strong public interest in this season's series. The engagement of Pierre Monteaux as conductor, who created such a favorable impression at last year was loaned by the Metropolitan Opera Company to conduct the opening concerts here and who that time, is believed to have much to do with this advance sale. There is every liklihood that by October there will be no seats left to sell from week to week at the Friday afternoon concerts.

Practically every seat has been taken for the 10 Boston Sympathy Orchestra concerts in New York. The five concerts to be given in Washington will be just as popular.

Symphony concerts only have been exempted from the war tax under government regulations and the prices of tickets have remained unchanged. In a sense they are lower, for prices have soared in all other directions and the expense of maintaining the orchestra is much larger than ever before.

GLOBE- JUNE 4,

SOLDIERS SING WAR SONGS AT THE POP

War Camp Service Nigl Brings Noted Guests

Gov Coolidge, Gen Ruckman Prese —Solo by Ferdinand Thillois

Flags and banners adorned Symphor Hall last evening, when more than 25 persons enjoyed the program of Wa Camp Community Service night at the Pops. Khaki and blue predominated in the audience. During intermissions t songs of the camps and trenches we sung by the uniformed guests, under rection of E. B. Aborn, with Arth Fiedler accompanying. A feature of t concert program was the "Concert Fa tasia" played by Ferdinand Thillol the French violinist, veteran of th Marne, Argonne and Chemin des Dame battles.

Among the guests were Gov and Mr Coolidge, Gen Ruckman, Chaplain Mc-Nair, Col Blake, Lieut Parker, Lieut Commander Brickley and Maj A. F. Elwell, who were the guests of Mrs A. Lincoln Filene; Mrs Lila W. Lane, Chauncey W. Waldren, Miss Alma Greenwood, Alexander T. M. Van Renssalaer of New York, Miss Margaret R. Stoddard, chairman of the Home Hospitality Committee, and Ensign H. C. Stoddard, Lieut Marvin S. Bowman, Miss Esther Conant, and 50 of the wounded soldiers from the Base Hospital at Parker Hill, escorted by a group of officers.

Members of the Girls' City Club, Y. W. C. A., members and representatives of girls' societies of Greater Boston, accompanied by uniformed guests from the camps about the city, occupied the galleries.

The orchestral performance was conducted by Agide Jacchia.

HERALD, JUNE 4,

POP CONCERT FOR WAR SERVICE MEN

Governor, Army and Navy Officers Among the Audience

Last night was War Camp Community Service night at the Pop concert and for the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for a body of service men. Gustav Strube conducted. Another feature which gave added interest to the program was the community singing, introduced for the first time at a Pop concert and which was led by E. D. Aborn, song leader of the W. C. C. S.

The decorations of the hall were simple, consisting only of American flags and the standard of the War Camp Community Service. The program was arranged especially for the occasion and included many of the songs that have been so popular for the past two years among the service boys.

Gov. and Mrs. Coolidge, Maj.-Gen McCain of Camp Devens, Col. E. M Blake, representing Maj.-Gen. Edwards Chaplain McNair of the Boston Navy Yard, Lt. H. C. Parker of Camp Devens and Miss Alma Greenwood were guest at Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene's table.

Present also were 50 men from the Parker Hill Hospital and more than 10 army and navy officers.

TRAVELER JUNE 7,

POPS ON SECOND HALF OF SEASON

Monday evening next inaugurates the second half of the Pops season in Symphony Hall. Mr. Strube will be at the conductor's stand. Mr. Theodorowicz succeeds Mr. Hoffman as concert master. Mr. Heim, the trumpeter, returns. Mr. de Mailly, the admired flutist, returns after a long illness.

There will be three special nights. Tuesday, being Boston Athletic Association night; Thursday, Euclid lodge night, with members participating both as soloists and composers, and Friday night, Insurance night. Monday night's program will be:

March, "Black Bess" ..... Strube
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ..... Waldteufel
Scenes Pittoresques ..... Massenet
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Suite, "Children's Corner" ..... Debussy
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Hungarian Dance No. 5 ..... Brahms
Selection, "The Fortune Teller" ..... Herbert
Ave Maria (strings and organ) . Schubert-Strube
Violoncello solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Waltz, "Enjoy Life" ..... Strauss
Finlandia ..... Sibelius

AMERICAN JUNE 7.

STRUBE LEADS POPS

The popularity of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and iced refreshments, also by the guest conductor, Mr. Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this.

Since next week will inaugurate the second half of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard. Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, a native of Poland, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1895, except for interruptions (such as when he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet), becomes concertmaster of the Pops, which post he has taken for several years. Mr. Heim, rivalled by no more than two or three trumpeters living, has also returned, and takes great delight in playing the love song from "Samson and Delilah," "Killarney" and "Till We Meet Again," not to speak of the huge delight, which he gives in the same, with splendid tone. Mr. Charles DeMailly, long absent from serious illness, will also be welcomed back this week as first flutist.

RECORD, JUNE 7,

Strube Leads Pops

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and iced refreshments, also by the guest conductor, Mr. Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr. Strube is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture, and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has since launched and raised to a state of importance the civic Symphony Orchestra of Baltimore.

Since next week will inaugurate the second half of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard. Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, a native of Poland, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1895 except for interruptions such as when he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet, becomes concertmaster of the Pops, which post he has taken for several years. Mr. Heim, rivalled by no more than two or three trumpeters living, has also returned.

There will be three special nights this week. On Tuesday, June 3, the Boston Athletic Assn., under the direction of Mr. Frank S. Bigelow, have taken a number of tables. Thursday, June 12, the members of the Euclid Lodge will make merry. Friday night, June 13, the entire lodge has been appropriated by the Insurance Society of Massachusetts.

POP CONCERTS

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, which are now mid-season, has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and cool drinks, also by the guest conductor, Gustav Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr Strube is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture, and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has recently built up a symphony orchestra in Baltimore.

HERALD, JUNE 1,

THE POPS THRIVE

On all nights except Sunday, and particularly the warm ones, Boston is flocking to Symphony Hall to hear an unprecedented combination so far as the musical world goes—the finest of all orchestras playing the lightest of all music. By no means the least part of the Pops are the soloists. During the coming week the following will play Mr. Heim, trumpeter; Mr. Hoffmann the concert master (his last week), and Mr. Gerardi, violinist, Mr. Holy, harpist, Mr. Snow, organist, Messrs, Thillois and Speyer, Frenchmen who play the violin and oboe respectively and who bravely served in the war.

Two special nights of more than usual interest are scheduled. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian night. A program from the country of carolling tenors without some operatic selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the program are not from operas, which proves that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whiz-Bang" program will be interspersed with community singing in the intermissions,

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 2, 1919

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Romanza.....Cella
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to '"Tristan and Isolde"..Wagner
Intermezzo, "Naila".....Delibes
"Hymn to St. Cecilia".....Gounod
Messrs. Hoffmann, violin; Holy, harp Snow, organ.
Finale from the Fourth Symphony.. Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Sometime".....Friml
Reverie, "The Voice of Chimes"....Luigini
Waltz, "Wine Women and Song"...Strauss
In the Hall of the Mountain King from "Peer Gynt".....Grieg

TUESDAY, JUNE 3
War Camp Community Service Night

March, "Bullets and Bayonets".....Sousa
Overture, "Robespierre".....Litolff
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Prelude and Siciliana from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Violin Solo, Concert Fantasia..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Mr. Thillois.
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Selection, "Jack O' Lantern".....Caryll
Cavalry Charge.....Spindler
Waltz, "Roses From the South"....Strauss
American Patrol.....Meacham

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4

Overture, "Robespierre".....Litolff
Bohemian Dance from "Carmen"....Bizet
Marche Miniature.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Othello,".....Verdi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Oboe Solo.....Paladilhe
Mr. Speyer
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Overture to "The Bartered Bride".Smetana
Little Suite.....Trucco
a. Reverie.
b. Arietta.
c. Gavotta.
Humoresque.....Dvorak
Valse Bleue.....Margis
Selection, "Katinka".....Friml

THURSDAY, JUNE 5.
Italian Night.

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Interludio.....Tirindelli
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascabni
Suite.....Van Westerhout
a. Children's Parade.
b. Canzone.
c. Romanza.
d. Children at Play.
Violin Solo, "La Follia".....Corelli
Mr. Gerardi.
a. Pastorale.....Scarlatti
b. Capriccio (1658-1757)
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote"... Sinigaglia
Minuet.....Puccini
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....Arditi
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli

FRIDAY, JUNE 6.

March, "Lorraine".....Ganne
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Waltz, "Gold and Silver".....Lehar
Fantasia, "La Traviata".....Verdi
Ballet Music from "Faust".....Gounod
Ave Maria (for strings and organ Schubert-Wilhelm
Cello Solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Second Polinaise.....Liszt
"Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Selection, "Glorianna".....Friml
The Lost Chord.....Sullivan
Cornet Solo, Mr. Heim; organ, Mr. Snow
Waltz, "Morning Journals".....Strauss
Farandole from the Suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 2.....Bizet

SATURDAY, JUNE 7

March, "The Merry Soldier".....Sabatini
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Violin solo: Two Spanish Dances—a, Malaguena; b, Habanera..Sarasate
Mr. Jacques Hoffmann.
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Overture, "The Roman Carnival"...Berlioz
Selection, "Fiddlers Three".....Johnstone
Turkish Patrol.....Michaelis
Waltz, "Eternelle Ivresse".....Ganne
March Militaire.....Schubert

HERALD, JUNE 1,

Symphony Hall Event

An important event announced for this week is war camp community service night at Symphony Hall, for June 3, when several hundred United States army and naval officers and enlisted men, soldiers, sailors and marines will be the guests of Boston war camp community service and a number of its co-operating organizations.

A special program has been arranged by Mr. Jacchia for the occasion, and the novel feature—for Symphony Hall and the Pops—of community singing, to be led by Mr. Edward B. Aborn, will be introduced.

The hall will be decorated with American flags, flags of the allies, the YD standard, state flag, and city and war camp community service insignias.

The list of invited guests includes his excellency Gov. Calvin Coolidge and Mrs. Coolidge, his honor the Mayor and Mrs. Peters, Gen. and Mrs. Edwards, Admiral Herbert O. Dunn, commandant of the Boston Navy Yard; Chaplain Parker, now stationed on the receiving ship of Boston at Hingham, and several hundred service men.

Among those who have secured tables and invited service men as their guests are Mrs. Gamaliel Bradford of Wellesley Hills, Mrs. George W. Wheelwright, Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene, Miss Margaret R. Starratt, Miss Esther Conant, Mr. Chauncey W. Waldron, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus D. Smith, Mrs. George C. Larrabee, Miss Edith M. Howes, Mrs. Mark Andrews, Mrs. H. F. Winslow, Mrs. Herbert E. Fales, Mrs. Addison Burnham, Mrs. Harold Sears, Miss Alma Greenwood, Miss N. Jean Olessen, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Lee, Mrs. Lila Woodbury Lane, Mrs. John Balch of Milton.

HERALD JUNE 1.

WILL CONDUCT "POPS" NEXT WEEK

Gustav Strube, conductor and composer, veteran violinst of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and favorite conductor of the Pops for many a season will preside as guest conductor over the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall for the fifth week, beginning Monday night. This will give Mr. Jacchia full opportunity to recuperate from his illness.

HERALD, JUNE 1,

POPS SECURE GUSTAV STRUBE

Gustav Strube, conductor and composer, veteran violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and favorite conductor of the pops for many a season is in town, ready to act as guest conductor over the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall for the fifth week of the pops, beginning tomorrow night. It has been deemed wise thus to give Mr. Jacchia full opportunity to recuperate from his illness. For the past fortnight during Mr. Jacchia's enforced absence Mr. Clement Lenom, also a Pops leader of several past seasons, has been guest conductor.

Many Bostonians still speak of the lightness and brightness of Mr. Strube's programs, which would make the rainiest evening sociable. Of his own marches and melodies, which were great favorities, at least "Cruiser Harvard" and the "Serenade" will be heard during the week.

Mr. Strube was a member of the years (190-1913), and conducted the Pops for 14 seasons. At the Worcester festivals for six years he conducted both the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony orchestras. From Boston he went to Baltimore, where for six years he has been a mainstay of the Peabody Institute of Musical Instruction, and virtually created te Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which is municipally owned. Mr. Strube has also composed serious music, which has been performed in the larger cities.

TRAVELER, JUNE 2,

GUSTAV STRUBE TO LEAD POPS FOR WEEK

Gustav Strube, the musician and composer, who is an old favorite among the Pops conductors of the past, has come to Boston to be guest conductor at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall for the present week. Tonight he will make his bow to the Bostonian public for the first time in six years. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Romanza.....Cella
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Serenade.....Strube
Hymn to Saint Cecilia.....Strube
(Violin-harp-organ.)
Finale from the Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Sometimes".....Friml
Reverie, "The Voice of Chimes".....Buigini
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"....Strauss
In the Hall of the Mountain King.....Grieg

POST, JUNE 1,

Jacchia Praises Miss Bellini

Marguerite Bellini. (Photo by White.)

Miss Marguerita Bellini, a young Boston girl of Italian parentage, and who has earned the greater part of the money used for her musical education by her own efforts, has written a work for orchestra that is being considered so seriously that Mr. Brennan, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has brought it to the attention of Mr. Jacchia, the conductor of the Pops.

Mr. Jacchia says that the work has so much merit that he intends to place it on one of his popular programmes during the season.

The young music student is hopeful of an early performance of her ambitious work and is longing for the day of rehearsal. Mr. Jacchia says Miss Bellini shows remarkable gifts in orchestral construction, but adds that, of course, in many places it requires the hand of a more experienced musician to give the score the professional finish.

Miss Bellini is adding to her educational fund by working every night during the Pops season at Symphony Hall. She is one of the 35 attractive waitresses who serve refreshments at the Pop concerts during this season of "light refreshments only" service, and it was in this way that the attention of the management was brought to the talented student.

Aside from the material assistance her earnings at the Pops aid her in her studies, the chief reason for applying for a place among the fair waitresses was for the opportunity it afforded her to hear the orchestra night after night for 10 weeks, a privilege she could not otherwise enjoy and which she considers invaluable to her in the career for which she seems destined.

THE POPS

On all nights except Sunday, and particularly the warm ones, Boston is flocking to Symphony Hall to hear an unprecedented combination so far as the musical world goes—the finest of all orchestras playing the lightest of all music. By no means the least part of the Pops are the soloists. During the coming week the following will play: Mr. Heim, who is perhaps the best trumpeter in the country; Mr. Hoffmann, the concertmaster (his last week), and Mr. Gerardi, violinists; Mr. Holy, harpist; Mr. Snow, organist; Messrs. Thillois and Speyer, Frenchmen who play the violin and oboe respectfully and have bravely served in the war.

Two special nights of more than unusual interest are scheduled. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian night. A programme from the country of carolling tenors without some opera selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the programme are not from operas, which goes to prove that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is both popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, Mr. C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of our soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whiz-Bang" programme will be in

CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE JUNE 7,

STRUBE RULES THE POPS

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony hall, which are now mid-season, has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and cool drinks, also by the guest conductor, Gustav Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr. Strube is no newcomer to the Pops, and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has recently built up a symphony orchestra in Baltimore.

HERALD, JUNE 3,

EXPECT RUSH FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS

Monteaux Engagement Makes Concert Series Popular

The option to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to renew their subscriptions for the coming season expires tomorrow and the advance sales already indicate a strong public interest in this season's series. The engagement of Pierre Monteaux as conductor, who created such a favorable impression at last year was loaned by the Metropolitan Opera Company to conduct the opening concerts here and who that time, is believed to have much to do with this advance sale. There is every liklihood that by October there will be no seats left to sell from week to week at the Friday afternoon concerts.

Practically every seat has been taken for the 10 Boston Sympathy Orchestra concerts in New York. The five concerts to be given in Washington will be just as popular.

Symphony concerts only have been exempted from the war tax under government regulations and the prices of tickets have remained unchanged. In a sense they are lower, for prices have soared in all other directions and the expense of maintaining the orchestra is much larger than ever before.

GLOBE- JUNE 4

SOLDIERS SING WAR SONGS AT THE POPS

War Camp Service Night Brings Noted Guests

Gov Coolidge, Gen Ruckman Present —Solo by Ferdinand Thillois

Flags and banners adorned Symphony Hall last evening, when more than 250 persons enjoyed the program of War Camp Community Service night at the Pops. Khaki and blue predominated in the audience. During intermissions the songs of the camps and trenches were sung by the uniformed guests, under direction of E. B. Aborn, with Arthur Fiedler accompanying. A feature of the concert program was the "Concert Fantasia" played by Ferdinand Thillois, the French violinist, veteran of the Marne, Argonne and Chemin des Dames battles.

Among the guests were Gov and Mrs Coolidge, Gen Ruckman, Chaplain McNair, Col Blake, Lieut Parker, Lieut Commander Brickley and Maj A. F. Elwell, who were the guests of Mrs A. Lincoln Filene; Mrs Lila W. Lane, Chauncey W. Waldren, Miss Alma Greenwood, Alexander T. M. Van Renssalaer of New York, Miss Margaret R. Stoddard, chairman of the Home Hospitality Committee, and Ensign H. C. Stoddard, Lieut Marvin S. Bowman, Miss Esther Conant, and 50 of the wounded soldiers from the Base Hospital at Parker Hill, escorted by a group of officers.

Members of the Girls' City Club, Y. W. C. A., members and representatives of girls' societies of Greater Boston, accompanied by uniformed guests from the camps about the city, occupied the galleries.

The orchestral performance was conducted by Agide Jacchia.

HERALD, JUNE 4,

POP CONCERT FOR WAR SERVICE MEN

Governor, Army and Navy Officers Among the Audience

Last night was War Camp Community Service night at the Pop concert and for the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for a body of service men. Gustav Strube conducted. Another feature which gave added interest to the program was the community singing, introduced for the first time at a Pop concert and which was led by E. D. Aborn, song leader of the W. C. C. S.

The decorations of the hall were simple, consisting only of American flags and the standard of the War Camp Community Service. The program was arranged especially for the occasion and included many of the songs that have been so popular for the past two years among the service boys.

Gov. and Mrs. Coolidge, Maj.-Gen McCain of Camp Devens, Col. E. M Blake, representing Maj.-Gen. Edwards Chaplain McNair of the Boston Navy Yard, Lt. H. C. Parker of Camp Devens and Miss Alma Greenwood were guests at Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene's table.

Present also were 50 men from the Parker Hill Hospital and more than 100 army and navy officers.

TRAVELER JUNE 7,

POPS ON SECOND HALF OF SEASON

Monday evening next inaugurates the second half of the Pops season in Symphony Hall. Mr. Strube will be at the conductor's stand. Mr. Theodorowicz succeeds Mr. Hoffman as concert master. Mr. Heim, the trumpeter, returns. Mr. de Mailly, the admired flutist, returns after a long illness.

There will be three special nights, Tuesday, being Boston Athletic Association night; Thursday, Euclid lodge night, with members participating both as soloists and composers, and Friday night, Insurance night. Monday night's program will be:

March, "Black Bess".....Strube
Overture to "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Tres Jolie".....Waldteufel
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Suite, "Children's Corner".....Debussy
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Hungarian Dance No. 5.....Brahms
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".....Herbert
Ave Maria (strings and organ).Schubert-Strube
Violoncello solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Waltz, "Enjoy Life".....Strauss
Finlandia.....Sibelius

AMERICAN JUNE 7,

STRUBE LEADS POPS

The popularity of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and iced refreshments, also by the guest conductor, Mr. Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this.

Since next week will inaugurate the second half of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard.. Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, a native of Poland, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1895, except for interruptions (such as when he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet), becomes concertmaster of the Pops, which post he has taken for several years. Mr. Heim, rivalled by no more than two or three trumpeters living, has also returned, and takes great delight in playing the love song from "Samson and Delilah," "Killarney" and "Till We Meet Again," not to speak of the huge delight, which he gives in the same, with splendid tone. Mr. Charles DeMailly, long absent from serious illness, will also be welcomed back this week as first flutist.

DAILY RECORD, JUNE 7,

Strube Leads Pops

popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and iced refreshments, also by the guest conductor, Mr. Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr. Strube is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship his lively gesture, and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has since launched and raised to a state of importance the civic Symphony Orchestra of Baltimore.

Since next week will inaugurate the second half of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard. Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, a native of Poland, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1895 except for interruptions (such as when he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet) becomes concertmaster of the Pops, which post he has taken for several years. Mr. Heim, rivalled by no more than two or three trumpeters living, has also returned.

There will be three special nights this week. On Tuesday, June 10, the Boston Athletic Assn., under the direction of Mr. Frank Son, have taken a number of tables. Thursday, June 12, the members of the Euclid Lodge will make merry. For Friday night, June 13, the entire floor has been appropriated by the Insurance Society of Massachusetts.

Post Pops

POP CONCERTS

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, which are now mid-season, has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and cool drinks, also by the guest conductor, Gustav Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr Strube is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture, and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has recently built up a symphony orchestra in Baltimore.

HERALD, JUNE 1,

THE POPS THRIVE

On all nights except Sunday, and particularly the warm ones, Boston is flocking to Symphony Hall to hear an unprecedented combination so far as the musical world goes—the finest of all orchestras playing the lightest of all music. By no means the least part of the Pops are the soloists. During the coming week the following will play Mr. Heim, trumpeter; Mr. Hoffmann the concert master (his last week), and Mr. Gerardi, violinist, Mr. Holy, harpist, Mr. Snow, organist, Messrs, Thillois and Speyer, Frenchmen who play the violin and oboe respectively and who bravely served in the war.

Two special nights of more than usual interest are scheduled. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian night. A program from the country of carolling tenors without some operatic selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the program are not from operas, which proves that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whiz-Bang" program will be interspersed with community singing in the intermissions,

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 2, 1919

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Romanza .....Cella
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to '"Tristan and Isolde"..Wagner
Intermezzo "Naila".....Delibes
"Hymn to St. Cecilia".....Gounod
Messrs. Hoffmann, violin; Holy, harp
Snow, organ.
Finale from the Fourth Symphony..
Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Sometime".....Friml
Reverie, "The Voice of Chimes"....Luigini
Waltz, "Wine Women and Song"...Strauss
In the Hall of the Mountain King
from "Peer Gynt".....Grieg

TUESDAY, JUNE 3
War Camp Community Service Night

March, "Bullets and Bayonets".....Sousa
Overture, "Robespierre".....Litolff
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Prelude and Siciliana from "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Violin Solo, Concert Fantasia.....
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Mr. Thillois.
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Selection, "Jack O' Lantern".....Caryll
Cavalry Charge.....Spindler
Waltz, "Roses From the South"....Strauss
American Patrol.....Meacham

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4

Overture, "Robespierre".....Litolff
Bohemian Dance from "Carmen"....Bizet
Marche Miniature.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Othello,".....Verdi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Oboe Solo.....Paladilhe
Mr. Speyer
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Overture to "The Bartered Bride".Smetana
Little Suite.....Trucco
a. Reverie.
b. Arietta.
c. Gavotta.
Humoresque .....Dvorak
Valse Bleue.....Margis
Selection, "Katinka".....Friml

THURSDAY, JUNE 5.
Italian Night.

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Interludio .....Tirindelli
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascabni
Suite .....Van Westerhout
a. Children's Parade.
b. Canzone.
c. Romanza.
d. Children at Play.
Violin Solo, "La Follia".....Corelli
Mr. Gerardi.
a. Pastorale .....Scarlatti
b. Capriccio (1658-1757)
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote"...
Sinigaglia
Minuet .....Puccini
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....Arditi
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli

FRIDAY, JUNE 6.

March, "Lorraine".....Ganne
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Waltz, "Gold and Silver".....Lehar
Fantasia, "La Traviata".....Verdi
Ballet Music from "Faust".....Gounod
Ave Maria (for strings and organ
Schubert-Wilhelm
Cello Solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Second Polinaise .....Lisz
"Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" .....Wagne
Selection, "Glorianna".....Frim
The Lost Chord.....Sullivan
Cornet Solo, Mr. Heim; organ, Mr. Snow
Waltz, "Morning Journals".....Strauss
Farandole from the Suite "L 'Arlesienne" No. 2.....Bizet

SATURDAY, JUNE 7

March, "The Merry Soldier".....Sabathil
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"
Nicolai
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Violin solo: Two Spanish Dances—a, Malaguena; b, Habanera..Sarasate
Mr. Jacques Hoffmann.
Prelude .....Rachmaninoff
Overture, "The Roman Carnival"...Berlioz
Selection, "Fiddlers Three".....Johnstone
Turkish Patrol.....Michaelis
Waltz, "Eternelle Ivresse".....Ganne
March Militaire.....Schubert

HERALD, JUNE 1,

Symphony Hall Event

An important event announced for this week is war camp community service night at Symphony Hall, for June 3, when several hundred United States army and naval officers and enlisted men, soldiers, sailors and marines will be the guests of Boston war camp community service and a number of its cooperating organizations.

A special program has been arranged by Mr. Jacchia for the occasion, and the novel feature—for Symphony Hall and the Pops—of community singing, to be led by Mr. Edward B. Aborn, will be introduced.

The hall will be decorated with American flags, flags of the allies, the YD standard, state flag, and city and war camp community service insignias.

The list of invited guests includes his excellency Gov. Calvin Coolidge and Mrs. Coolidge, his honor the Mayor and Mrs. Peters, Gen. and Mrs. Edwards, Admiral Herbert O. Dunn, commandant of the Boston Navy Yard; Chaplain Parker, now stationed on the receiving ship of Boston at Hingham, and several hundred service men.

Among those who have secured tables and invited service men as their guests are Mrs. Gamaliel Bradford of Wellesley Hills, Mrs. George W. Wheelwright, Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene, Miss Margaret R. Starratt, Miss Esther Conant, Mr. Chauncey W. Waldron, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus D. Smith, Mrs. George C. Larrabee, Miss Edith M. Howes, Mrs. Mark Andrews, Mrs. H. F. Winslow, Mrs. Herbert E. Fales, Mrs. Addison Burnham, Mrs. Harold Sears, Miss Alma Greenwood, Miss N. Jean Olessen, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Lee, Mrs. Lila Woodbury Lane, Mrs. John Balch of Milton.

HERALD JUNE 1.

WILL CONDUCT "POPS" NEXT WEEK

Gustav Strube, conductor and composer, veteran violinst of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and favorite conductor of the Pops for many a season will preside as guest conductor over the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall for the fifth week, beginning Monday night. This will give Mr. Jacchia full opportunity to recuperate from his illness.

HERALD, JUNE 1,

POPS SECURE GUSTAV STRUBE

Gustav Strube, conductor and composer, veteran violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and favorite conductor of the pops for many a season is in town, ready to act as guest conductor over the Pops orchestra in Symphony Hall for the fifth week of the pops, beginning tomorrow night. It has been deemed wise thus to give Mr. Jacchia full opportunity to recuperate from his illness. For the past fortnight during Mr. Jacchia's enforced absence Mr. Clement Lenom, also a Pops leader of several past seasons, has been guest conductor.

Many Bostonians still speak of the lightness and brightness of Mr. Strube's programs, which would make the rainiest evening sociable. Of his own marches and melodies, which were great favorities, at least "Cruiser Harvard" and the "Serenade" will be heard during the week.

Mr. Strube was a member of the years (190-1913), and conducted the Pops for 14 seasons. At the Worcester festivals for six years he conducted both the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony orchestras. From Boston he went to Baltimore, where for six years he has been a mainstay of the Peabody Institute of Musical Instruction, and virtually created te Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which is municipally owned. Mr. Strube has also composed serious music, which has been performed in the larger cities.

TRAVELER, JUNE 2,

GUSTAV STRUBE TO LEAD POPS FOR WEEK

Gustav Strube, the musician and composer, who is an old favorite among the Pops conductors of the past, has come to Boston to be guest conductor at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall for the present week. Tonight he will make his bow to the Bostonian public for the first time in six years. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bize
Overture to "Oberon".....Webe
Romanza .....Cella
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Serenade .....Strube
Hymn to Saint Cecilia.....Strube
(Violin-harp-organ.)
Finale from the Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Sometimes".....Friml
Reverie, "The Voice of Chimes".....Buigini
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"....Strauss
In the Hall of the Mountain King.....Grieg

POST, JUNE 1,

Jacchia Praises Miss Bellini

Marguerite Bellini. (Photo by White.)

Miss Marguerita Bellini, a young Boston girl of Italian parentage, and who has earned the greater part of the money used for her musical education by her own efforts, has written a work for orchestra that is being considered so seriously that Mr. Brennan, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has brought it to the attention of Mr. Jacchia, the conductor of the Pops.

Mr. Jacchia says that the work has so much merit that he intends to place it on one of his popular programmes during the season.

The young music student is hopeful of an early performance of her ambitious work and is longing for the day of rehearsal. Mr. Jacchia says Miss Bellini shows remarkable gifts in orchestral construction, but adds that, of course, in many places it requires the hand of a more experienced musician to give the score the professional finish.

Miss Bellini is adding to her educational fund by working every night during the Pops season at Symphony Hall. She is one of the 35 attractive waitresses who serve refreshments at the Pop concerts during this season of "light refreshments only" service, and it was in this way that the attention of the management was brought to the talented student.

Aside from the material assistance her earnings at the Pops aid her in her studies, the chief reason for applying for a place among the fair waitresses was for the opportunity it afforded her to hear the orchestra night after night for 10 weeks, a privilege she could not otherwise enjoy and which she considers invaluable to her in the career for which she seems destined.

THE POPS

On all nights except Sunday, and particularly the warm ones, Boston is flocking to Symphony Hall to hear an unprecedented combination so far as the musical world goes—the finest of all orchestras playing the lightest of all music. By no means the least part of the Pops are the soloists. During the coming week the following will play: Mr. Heim, who is perhaps the best trumpeter in the country; Mr. Hoffmann, the concertmaster (his last week), and Mr. Gerardi, violinists; Mr. Holy, harpist; Mr. Snow, organist; Messrs. Thillois and Speyer, Frenchmen who play the violin and oboe respectfully and have bravely served in the war.

Two special nights of more than unusual interest are scheduled. Thursday, June 5, will be Italian night. A programme from the country of carolling tenors without some opera selections would be inconceivable; but the majority of the numbers on the programme are not from operas, which goes to prove that the Italians have produced unoperatic music which is both popular and delightful.

Tuesday night, June 3, has been partly taken over by the War Camp Community Service, Mr. C. W. Waldron, director, for the entertainment of our soldiers and sailors. This will be the only public Pops night this year which has been dedicated to them. A "Whiz-Bang" programme will be in

CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE JUNE 7,

STRUBE RULES THE POPS

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony hall, which are now mid-season, has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and cool drinks, also by the guest conductor, Gustav Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr. Strube is no newcomer to the Pops, and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has recently built up a symphony orchestra in Baltimore.

HERALD, JUNE 3,

EXPECT RUSH FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS

Monteaux Engagement Makes Concert Series Popular

The option to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to renew their subscriptions for the coming season expires tomorrow and the advance sales already indicate a strong public interest in this season's series. The engagement of Pierre Monteaux as conductor, who created such a favorable impression at last year was loaned by the Metropolitan Opera Company to conduct the opening concerts here and who that time, is believed to have much to do with this advance sale. There is every liklihood that by October there will be no seats left to sell from week to week at the Friday afternoon concerts.

Practically every seat has been taken for the 10 Boston Sympathy Orchestra concerts in New York. The five concerts to be given in Washington will be just as popular.

Symphony concerts only have been exempted from the war tax under government regulations and the prices of tickets have remained unchanged. In a sense they are lower, for prices have soared in all other directions and the expense of maintaining the orchestra is much larger than ever before.

GLOBE- JUNE 4

SOLDIERS SING WAR SONGS AT THE POPS

War Camp Service Night Brings Noted Guests

Gov Coolidge, Gen Ruckman Present —Solo by Ferdinand Thillois

Flags and banners adorned Symphony Hall last evening, when more than 25[illegible] persons enjoyed the program of War Camp Community Service night at the Pops. Khaki and blue predominated in the audience. During intermissions the songs of the camps and trenches were sung by the uniformed guests, under direction of E. B. Aborn, with Arthur Fiedler accompanying. A feature of the concert program was the "Concert Fantasia" played by Ferdinand Thillois, the French violinist, veteran of the Marne, Argonne and Chemin des Dames battles.

Among the guests were Gov and Mrs Coolidge, Gen Ruckman, Chaplain McNair, Col Blake, Lieut Parker, Lieut Commander Brickley and Maj A. F. Elwell, who were the guests of Mrs A. Lincoln Filene; Mrs Lila W. Lane, Chauncey W. Waldren, Miss Alma Greenwood, Alexander T. M. Van Renssalaer of New York, Miss Margaret R. Stoddard, chairman of the Home Hospitality Committee, and Ensign H. C. Stoddard, Lieut Marvin S. Bowman, Miss Esther Conant, and 50 of the wounded soldiers from the Base Hospital at Parker Hill, escorted by a group of officers.

Members of the Girls' City Club, Y. W. C. A., members and representatives of girls' societies of Greater Boston, accompanied by uniformed guests from the camps about the city, occupied the galleries.

The orchestral performance was conducted by Agide Jacchia.

HERALD, JUNE 4,

POP CONCERT FOR WAR SERVICE MEN

Governor, Army and Navy Officers Among the Audience

Last night was War Camp Community Service night at the Pop concert and for the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for a body of service men. Gustav Strube conducted. Another feature which gave added interest to the program was the community singing, introduced for the first time at a Pop concert and which was led by E. D. Aborn, song leader of the W. C. C. S.

The decorations of the hall were simple, consisting only of American flags and the standard of the War Camp Community Service. The program was arranged especially for the occasion and included many of the songs that have been so popular for the past two years among the service boys.

Gov. and Mrs. Coolidge, Maj.-Gen McCain of Camp Devens, Col. E. M Blake, representing Maj.-Gen. Edwards Chaplain McNair of the Boston Navy Yard, Lt. H. C. Parker of Camp Devens and Miss Alma Greenwood were guests at Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene's table.

Present also were 50 men from the Parker Hill Hospital and more than 10[illegible] army and navy officers.

TRAVELER JUNE

POPS ON SECOND HALF OF SEASON

Monday evening next inaugurates the second half of the Pops season in Symphony Hall. Mr. Strube will be at the conductor's stand. Mr. Theodorowicz succeeds Mr. Hoffman as concert master. Mr. Heim, the trumpeter, returns, Mr. de Mailly, the admired flutist, returns after a long illness.

There will be three special nights, Tuesday, being Boston Athletic Association night; Thursday, Euclid lodge night, with members participating both as soloists and composers, and Friday night, Insurance night. Monday night's program will be:

March, "Black Bess".....
Overture to "Masaniello".....
Waltz, "Tres Jolie".....
Scenes Pittoresques.....
Overture to "Mignon".....
Suite, "Children's Corner".....
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci".....
Hungarian Dance No. 5.....
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".....
Ave Maria (strings and organ).....
Violoncello solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Waltz, "Enjoy Life".....
Finlandia .....

AMERICAN JUNE 7,

STRUBE LEADS POPS

The popularity of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and iced refreshments, also by the guest conductor, Mr. Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this.

Since next week will inaugurate the second half of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard. Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, a native of Poland, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1895, except for interruptions (such as when he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet), becomes concertmaster of the Pops, which post he has taken for several years. Mr. Heim, rivalled by no more than two or three trumpeters living, has also returned, and takes great delight in playing the love song from "Samson and Delilah," "Killarney" and "Till We Meet Again," not to speak of the huge delight, which he gives in the same, with splendid tone. Mr. Charles DeMailly, long absent from serious illness, will also be welcomed back this week as first flutist.

RECORD, JUNE 7,

Strube Leads Pops

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and iced refreshments, also by the guest conductor, Mr. Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr. Strube is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture, and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons, and has since launched and raised to a state of importance the civic symphony Orchestra of Baltimore.

Since next week will inaugurate the second half of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard. Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, a native of Poland, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1895 except for interruptions (such as when he played second violin in the famous Kneisel Quartet) becomes concertmaster of the Pops, which post he has taken for several years. Mr. Heim, rivalled by no more than two or three trumpeters living, has also returned.

There will be three special nights this week. On Tuesday, June 3, the Boston Athletic Assn., under the direction of Mr. Frank Son, have taken a number of tables. Thursday, June 12, the members of the Euclid Ledge will make merry. For Friday night, June 13, the entire floor has been appropriated by the Insurance Society of Massachusetts.

POP CONCERTS

The popularity of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, which are now mid-season, has been heightened by the combination of warm weather and cool drinks, also by the guest conductor, Gustav Strube, who presided last week and will continue during this. Mr Strube is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite by virtue of his distinguished musicianship, his lively gesture, and the light music which he chooses. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 23 years, the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons and has recently built up a symphony orchestra in Baltimore.

TIGHT BINDING

JUNE 7,

SECOND ...F OF SEASON

...ing next inaugurates the ... the Pops season in Sym... Mr. Strube will be at the ...and Mr. Theodorowicz ... Hoffman as concert mas... the trumpeter, returns. ... the admired flutist, re... long illness.

...be three special nights, ...of Boston Athletic Associ... Thursday, Euclid lodge ...members participating both ...d composers, and Friday ...ce night. Monday night's ...bo:

...Bess" ..... Strube
...sanielle" ..... Auber
...ie" ..... Waldteufel
...ues" ..... Massenet
...non" ..... Thomas
...s Corner" ..... Debussy
...gliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
...e No. 5 ..... Brahms
...Fortune Teller" ..... Herbert
...gs and organ) Schubert-Strube
...llo solo, Mr. Miquelle.
...Life" ..... Strauss
..... Sibelius

AN JUNE 7,

...ADS POPS

...ity of the Pop Concerts ...Hall has been height... combination of warm ...iced refreshments, also ...conductor, Mr. Strube, ...last week and will con... this.

...week will inaugurate ...lf of the season, several ...ged for the second half ...d, Mr. Julius Theodo... ...ive of Poland, member ...n Symphony Orchestra ...xcept for interruptions ...n he played second vio... ...mous Kneisel Quartet), ...ertmaster of the Pops. ...e has taken for several ...eim, rivalled by no more ...three trumpeters living, ...ned, and takes great de... ...ing the love song from ...Delilah," "Killarney" ...e Meet Again," not to ...huge delight, which he ...ame, with splendid tone. ...DeMailly, long absent ...illness, will also be wel... this week as first flutist.

D, JUNE 7,

...e Leads Pops

...ity of the Pop concerts ...Hall has been height... combination of warm ...iced refreshments, also ...conductor, Mr. Strube, ...last week and will con... this. Mr. Strube is no ...the Pops and remains a ...rtue of his distinguished ...his lively gesture, and ...o which he chooses. He ...er of the Boston Sym... ...stra for 23 years, the ...or of a dozen seasons, ...launched and raised to ...portance the civic Sym... ...tra of Baltimore.

...week will inaugurate the ...of the season, several ...ged for the second half ...d, Mr. Julius Theodoro... ...e of Poland, member of ...mphony Orchestra since ...r interruptions (such as ...ed second violin in the ...isel Quartet) becomes ...of the Pops, which post ...for several years. Mr. ...d by no more than two ...mpeters living, has also ...be three special nights ...On Tuesday, June 10, the ...letic Assn., under the ...Mr. Frank Son, have ...ber of tables. Thursday, ...members of the Euclid ...ake merry. For Friday ...13, the entire floor has ...riated by the Insurance ...Massachusetts.

...83. June 7

...ONCERTS

...of the Pop concerts ...all which are now ...been heightened by ...of warm weather ...also by the guest ...Strube, who pre... ...and will continue ...Strube is no new... ...and remains a fa... ...of his distinguished ...vely gesture, and ...hich he chooses. He ...the Boston Sym... ...for 23 years, the ...f a dozen seasons, ...built up a symphony ...more.

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 7

SUMMER MUSIC

The Pop Concerts Turn the Mid-Season Corner with Mr. Strube Conducting, a Few Changes in the Orchestra and a Succession of Light Programmes

WITH the concert at Symphony Hall this evening, the first month of The Pops ends; with the concert of next Monday the second and concluding month begins. As usual, this turning of the mid-season post will bring a few changes in the personnel, but not in the numbers of the orchestra. Mr. Theodorowicz, for example, will succeed Mr. Hoffmann as concert-master and Mr. de Mailly, returning to continuous work for the first time in months, will take Mr. Brooke's chair as first flute. Mr. Strube, moreover, will continue for at least another week as guest-conductor in lieu of the disabled Jacchia. A public that readily recalled his merit as director of the concerts, proved and ripened through twelve summers has welcomed him accordingly, and renewed familiar pleasure in his programmes and performance. Seldom indeed has Mr. Strube been abler or more agreeable conductor than through the five concerts that have brought him back to an old public and made him known to a new. For this evening his pieces are:

March, "The Merry Soldier" ..... Sabathil
Overture to the Opera, "Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia from the Opera, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude to the Opera, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Two Spanish Dances for Violin ..... Sarasati (Mr. Hoffmann)
Prelude in C-sharp minor ..... Rakhmaninov
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz
Selection from the Musical Play, "Fiddlers Three" ..... Johnstone
Serenade ..... Strube
Waltz, "La Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
American Fantasy ..... Herbert

Through next week, Mr. Strube's programme will, for the most part, traverse familiar pieces, often the light numbers that have become little classics of The Pops. On Monday, however, for novelty, two arrangements will be heard from Debussy—one of "The Shepherd's Song," the other of "The Golliwogs' Cake Walk" from the book of fanciful and humorous piano-pieces that he called "Children's Corner." The programme for next Saturday likewise brings for the first time this season a potpourri from Sullivan's operetta, "The Mikado." Three evenings next week have also their special label—Tuesday, when members of the Boston Athletic Association have taken many tables; Thursday when Euclid Lodge will be similarly placed; and Friday when the Insurance Society of Massachusetts will occupy the whole floor. On all three occasions the untaken places in the hall will be open as usual to the public.

POST, JUNE 8

NEW SOLOISTS FOR POPS

Since this day marks the exact middle of the Pops' season, some virtuosi of interest, engaged for the second half of the season, may be booked for. In the first place, Mr. Julius Theodorowicz will be concert master. A native of Poland, he played as soloist throughout Europe. He was concert master in Vienna under the two waltz kings, Komzak and Ziehner. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1898, except for interruptions (such as seven seasons when he played second violin in the great Kneisel quartet.) For several years he has been concert master at the Pops. Mr. Heim, the trumpeter, has also returned to the Pops. His brass octet, which played at Camp Devens and elsewhere last year, was extremely popular, and at the Pops Saint-Saens' "My Heart at Thy Voice," "Killarney" and "Till We Meet Again" "stream in silver tones" from Heim's trumpet.

Charles De Mailly, the young French flutist, who has been absent for months on account of illness, has now recovered, and will resume his duties this week, playing a solo next Wednesday, June 11.

Mr. Strube, who presided as guest conductor last week, will continue during this week.

There will be three special nights this week. On Tuesday, June 10, the Boston Athletic Association, under the direction of Frank Son, have taken a number of tables. Thursday, June 12, the members of the Euclid Lodge will make merry, the occasion being under the supervision of Charles Dennee, W. M. Members will figure on the programme, both as soloists and as composers, and members of the fraternity as well as of the lodge will be particularly welcome. For Friday night, June 13, the entire floor has been appropriated by the Insurance Society of Massachusetts, E. H. Sondheim, president, and Percy A. Upham, secretary. Each of these nights will be public.

ADVERTISER JUNE 8,

Strube Remains as Leader of Pops

THE Pops concerts are becoming ever more popular, because Symphony Hall remains as cool as a cathedral; also because of the iced refreshments ever on hand. Mr. Strube, who presided as guest conductor last week, will continue during this week.

This week marking the middle of the season, several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard. Julius Theodorowicz becomes concertmaster of the Pops. Mr. Heim, famous as a trumpeter, has also returned. Charles DeMailly will also be welcomed back as first flutist.

GLOBE—JUNE 8,

Symphony Hall "Pops"

Mr Strube, the guest conductor of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall, will stay a second week. The special nights scheduled include Tuesday, June 10, Boston Athletic Association; Thursday, June 12, Euclid Lodge, members of the society being on the program as soloists and conductors, and Friday, June 13, Insurance Society of Massachusetts.

Monday evening's program will be as follows: March, "Black Bess," Strube; overture to "Masaniello," Auber; waltz, "Tres Jolie," Waldteufel; scenes pittoresques, Massenet; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; suite, "Children's Corner," Debussy; fantasia, "I Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; selection, "The Fortune Teller," Herbert; "Ave Maria" (strings and organ), cello solo, Mr Miquelle, Schubert-Strube; waltz, "Enjoy Life," Strauss; "Finlandia," Sibelius.

HERALD, JUNE 8

STRUBE TO LEAD POPS ANOTHER WEEK

The Pops concerts are becoming ever more popular with the hot weather, because Symphony Hall remains as cool as a cathedral; also because of the iced refreshments. Mr. Strube, guest conductor last week, will continue during this. He is no newcomer to the Pops and remains a favorite. He was a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 23 years and the Pops conductor of a dozen seasons. He has since launched and raised to a position of importance the Civic Symphony orchestra of Baltimore.

Several virtuosi engaged for the second half may be heard. Julius Theodorowicz, member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1895 except for interruptions (such as when he played second violin in the Kneisel quartet), becomes concertmaster of the Pops. Mr. Heim, trumpeter, has also returned. Charles DeMailly, long absent on account of serious sickness, will also be welcomed back this week as first flutist.

There will be three special nights this week. On Tuesday, June 10, the Boston Athletic Association, under the direction of Mr. Frank Son, has taken a number of tables. Thursday, June 12, the members of Euclid lodge will make merry, under the supervision of Charles Dennee, W. M. Members will figure on the program both as soloists and as composers, and members of the fraternity as well as of the lodge will be particularly welcome. For Friday night, June 13, the entire floor has been appropriated by the Insurance Society of Massachusetts, E. H. Sondheim, president, and Percy A. Upham, secretary. Each of these nights will also be public. The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 9

March, "Black Boss" ..... Strube
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ..... Waldteufel
Scenes Pittoresques ..... Massenet
a, Angelus. b, Fete Boheme.
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Suite "Children's Corner" ..... Debussy
a, Shepherd's Song. b, Golliwog's Cake-Walk.
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Hungarian Dance No 5 ..... Brahms
Selection, "The Fortune Teller" ..... Herbert
Ave Maria (strings and organ) ..... Schubert-Strube
Violoncello solo, Mr. Miquelle.
Waltz, "Enjoy Life" ..... Strauss
Finlandia ..... Sibelius

TUESDAY, JUNE 10.

Boston Athletic Association Night
Hungarian March ..... Berlioz
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" ..... Strauss
Salut d'Amour ..... Elgar
Overture Solennelle "1812," with organ, ... Tschaikowsky
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Violoncello solo, "Caprice Hongrois" ..... Dunkler
Mr. Miquelle
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Overture to "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Fiddlers Three" ..... Johnstone
Largo ..... Handel
Violin, Mr. Theodorowicz; harp, Mr. Cella; organ, Mr. Snow
Serenade ..... Drdla
March, "Joist Infantry" ..... Maquarre

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 11

March, "Father of Victory" ..... Ganne
Overture, "If I Were King" ..... Adam
Waltz, "Showers of Gold" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Cortege de Bacchus, from "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Flute Solo, Mr. DeMailly.
Two Slavic Dances ..... Dvorak
Overture to "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
a, Morning Mood. b, In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Valse Caprice ..... Nagel
Selection, "Mademoiselle Modiste" ..... Herbert
Polonaise from "Eugen Oniegin" ..... Tschaikowsky

THURSDAY, JUNE 12

Euclid Lodge Night.
March, "Massachusetts State Guard" ..... Harlow
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Waltz, "Artist Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Andalusia ..... Sequeira
Harp Solo, Mr. Holy.
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Selection, "The Defender" ..... Dennee
Madrigal ..... Jacchia
Oboe solo, Mr. Stanislaus
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ..... Komzak
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
With organ.

FRIDAY, JUNE 13.

Insurance Association of Mass. Night.
March, "The Comet" ..... Strube
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz from "The Bat" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
a, Danse des Mirlitons. b, Trepak. c, Valse des Fleurs.
Violin solo, "Gypsy Airs" ..... Sarasate
Mr. Theodorowicz
Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Sunshine" ..... Friml
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
March, "Stars and Stripes" ..... Sousa

SATURDAY, JUNE 14

March from "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture to "Pique-Dame" ..... Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" ..... Puccini
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 2 ..... Bizet
a, Pastorale. b, Minuet. c, Farandole.
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
Norwegian Dance ..... Grieg
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
With organ.
Selection, "The Mikado" ..... Sullivan
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
American Patrol ..... Meacham

TRAVELER, JUNE 10,

INSURANCE men of Massachusetts are to be in evidence at Symphony Hall on the evening of "Friday the 13th" next. It's understood, though, Lloyd's has not been called in to accept any risk on them by reason of the day and date

ADVERTISER JUNE

Acoustics Most Important, Says Elson

By LOUIS C. ELSON

BERLIOZ once said—"A concert-hall is in itself a musical instrument," which may explain why Mr. Gericke, when he was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, constantly urged the present writer to come with the orchestra to Philadelphia. "Unless you hear us in the Academy of Music there," said he, "you do not know what the orchestra really is." Some years after I heard our band in that edifice, but Mr. Gericke said the hall had deteriorated a little at that time, on such slight and mysterious causes do the acoustics of an auditorium depend.

Our orchestra has been fortunate from the very beginning, in its halls. The old Music Hall, on Winter place, was one of the most remarkable places for sound in this country. One incident may prove this scientifically. Theodore Thomas was once rehearsing his great orchestra there. They were trying the first movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which begins with the notes A and E alone. Thomas stopped the players after four measures; "No C-sharp," he exclaimed. Again they started and again Thomas brought them to a stop this time with some additional remarks. Once more, and now the director was beginning a most fiery oration when Bernhard Wistemann, the first violin of the organization, spoke: "No one is playing C-sharp, Mr. Thomas, it is the hall!" And so it was. The acoustics were so excellent that the hall sounded the fourth overtone of A so clearly that Thomas thought that some violinist was interpolating a C-sharp.

Again an acoustical mystery, for when the large organ was taken away, some rows of seats added, and the orchestra placed in a slightly different position the beauty of some of the tones in the same hall was impaired and the auditorium became only slightly above the average.

Symphony Hall, in spite of the fact that many scientists were consulted during its construction, was inferior to the old Music Hall, but for some occult reason it is noticeably better now than when it was first used. Something similar may be said about a celebrated hall in Paris. There, too, they consulted many scientists, and numerous were the experiments made beforehand. But when the Trocadero was finished it was (and is) one of the poor halls of musical Paris. Meanwhile the ugly little hall where the competitions used to take place in the Paris Conservatoire was one of the best acoustical spots in Christendom. It was horrible in its lack of ventilation, but they would not allow extra ventilators to be cut in the walls or ceiling, lest in some strange manner the wonderful qualities of sound in the hall should disappear.

AMERICAN JUNE 14,

JACCHIA RETURNS TO POPS.

Next Tuesday will see the return of Agide Jacchia, the favorite Pops conductor, to Symphony Hall, where, all things being favorable, he intends to conduct all the remaining Pop concerts of the season. The enthusiasm and gusto which singles him out from all Pop conductors is stronger than ever from the impatience at his enforced absence.

TRAVELER, JUNE 14,

JACCHIA AGAIN TO LEAD POPS

Conductor Jacchia returns to the Pops in Symphony Hall next Tuesday night. Special nights crowd the week, Monday being New England Conservatory night; Wednesday, Harvard night; Thursday, Tufts night, and Friday, Boston University night.

Tonight's program will be:

March from "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture to "Pique-Dame" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Thousand and One Nights" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" ..... Puccini
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 ..... Bizet
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
Norwegian Dance ..... Grieg
Overture Solennelle "1812" (with organ) ..... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Mikado" ..... Sullivan
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
American Patrol ..... Meacham

JUNE 15, ADVERTISER

Jacchia at Pops Again

Agide Jacchia, long hindered from conducting the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, will preside over the orchestra once more, beginning next Tuesday. Tomorrow night all who are interested in the New England Conservatory of Music will be welcome. Mr. Lenom, who is a member both of the faculty and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct. Wednesday night is Harvard night. Thursday brings Tufts night. For Friday, Boston University has taken the entire house.

RECORD, JUNE 14,

Jacchia at Pops

Next Tuesday will see the return of Agide Jacchia, the favorite Pops conductor, to Symphony Hall, where, all things being favorable, he intends to conduct all the remaining Pop concerts of the season.

Special nights will crowd next week. On Monday all who are interested in the New England Conservatory of Music will be welcome to its particular night, at which the student body and the alumni will celebrate.

On Wednesday, all comers from Commencement week at Harvard will be made to feel at home by the playing of such encores as "Up the Street" and "Cruiser Harvard." Thursday brings Tufts Night, whereat the College Glee Club will sing. For Friday, Boston University has taken the entire house.

HERALD, JUNE 15

JACCHIA WITH POPS AGAIN

Agide Jacchia, long hindered from conducting the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, will lead the orchestra once more, beginning next Tuesday, which post he has every intention of holding through the four remaining weeks, showing the vim with which he opened the concerts in May.

Tomorrow all who are interested in the New England Conservatory of Music will be welcome to its particular night, at which the student body and alumni will celebrate. Mr. Flanders, manager, has engineered the occasion, seconded by Miss Marion Skinner, president of the senior class, and chairman of the entertainment committee. Mr. Lenom, a member of the faculty and of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct a program, including music by students. On Wednesday all comers from commencement week at Harvard will be at home hearing "Up the Street" and "Cruiser Harvard." Thursday brings Tufts night, whereat the College Glee Club will sing. For Friday, Boston University has taken the entire house.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 16,

New England Conservatory of Music Night
Mr. Lenom will conduct.
March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Waltz ..... Langley
Hymn to St. Cecilia ..... Gounod
Violin, Mr. Theodorowicz; organ, Mr. Snow; harp, Mr. Holy.
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Overture, "Rip Van Winkle" ..... Chadwick
English Horn Solos:
Berceuse en Carillon ..... Stuart Mason
Serenade Gaie ..... Stuart Mason
Mr. Speyer, accompaniment by the composer.
Aurora (for organ and orchestra) ..... H. Dunham
Organ, Mr. Snow.
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Overture Solennelle "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
Invocation from "Les Erinnyes" ..... Massenet
'Cello solo, Mr. Georges Miquelle.
Selection, "Jack O'Lantern" ..... Caryll
March, "Stars and Stripes" ..... Sousa

TUESDAY, JUNE 17

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "Il Guarany" ..... Gomes
En Sourdine ..... Tellam
Fantasia, "Othello" ..... Verdi
Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
a, Overture Miniature; b, Danse de la Fee Dragee; c, Trepak.
Organ Solo, Mr. Snow.
Enfantillage ("Children at Play") ..... Van Westerhout
Roumanian Rhapsody ..... Enescu
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Entr'acte Valse ..... Helmesberger
The Toreador, from "Carmen" ..... Bizet

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 18

Entrance of Anthony, from "A Night in Egypt" ..... Arensky
Overture to "The Bronze Horse" ..... Auber
"Love's Dream After the Ball" ..... Czibulka
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Alsatian Scenes ..... Massenet a, Sunday Morning; b, Sunday Evening.
Harp Solo, Mr. Cella.
Traumerei ..... Schumann
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Intermezzo from "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascagni
Waltz, "Eternelle Ivresse" ..... Ganne
March, "Cruiser Harvard" ..... Strube

THURSDAY, JUNE 19

Tufts' Night
Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Fantasia "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Tuftonia's Days ..... Hayes, '13
Aren't You Glad You're a Tufts Man? ..... Hayes, '13
Fight, Tufts, Fight! ..... Newton, '90
Loyalty Song of Jackson ..... Lewis, '87
We Stand ..... Lewis '87
Solo for English Horn ..... Barrett
Mr. Stanislaus.
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Win for the Brown and Blue ..... Savage '07
Dear Alma Mater ..... Lewis, '87
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 ..... Bizet
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Coronation March "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer

FRIDAY, JUNE 20

Boston University Night
Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" ..... Strauss
Meditation from "Thais" ..... Massenet
Violin solo, Mr. Theodorowicz.
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivan
Solo trumpet, Mr. Heim.
En Sourdine ..... Tellam
Overture Solennelle "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
Clarissima ..... Patterson
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Hungarian Dance in D major ..... Brahms

SATURDAY, JUNE 21

Triumphal March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "The Whispering of the Flowers" ..... Blon
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Turkish March ..... Mozart
Serenade ..... Schubert-Jacchia
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Slavic March ..... Tschaikowsky
Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Reve Angelique (with organ) ..... Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss

GLOBE—JUNE 15,

N. E. Conservatory Night Tomorrow at the "Pops"

Agide Jacchia, long hindered from conducting the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall, will preside over the orchestra once more, beginning next Tuesday, which post he has every intention of henceforth holding through the four weeks that will remain of the season.

Tomorrow the New England Conservatory of Music will have its special night at which the student body and alumni will celebrate. Mr Lenom, who is a member both of the faculty and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a program including numbers by students.

The selections will be as follows: March, "Aida," Verdi; waltz, Langley; hymn to St Cecilia (violin, Mr Theodorowicz; organ, Mr Snow; harp, Mr Holy) Gounod; selection, "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture, "Rip Van Winkle," Chadwick; English horn solos, Stuart Mason; "Aurora" (organ, Mr Albert W. Snow), H. Dunham; rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; overture, solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; invocation from "Errynies" (cello solo, Mr Miquelle), Massenet; selection, "Jack o' Lantern," Caryll; march, "Stars and Stripes," Sousa.

Other special nights will be Wednesday, "Harvard"; Thursday, "Tufts"; Friday, "Boston University."

TRAVELER, JUNE 20,

B. U. GLEE CLUB TO SING AT POPS

Plan Big Celebration There Tonight

Tonight will be Boston University night at the "pop" concerts. The entire Symphony Hall is reserved for students, and a larger gathering than ever is expected, due to the celebrating of the 50th anniversary of the chartering of Boston University and the gathering of class reunions.

John P. Marshall, professor of the history and theory of music, and now in the United States service, will be at the organ. Mr. Marshall, until he entered the service, was organist of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Special numbers will be rendered by the men's and girls' glee clubs of the university. The committee in charge includes Miss Mildred Cheney, Waltham; Ralph Carleton, Whitman; Israel Miller, Sharon.

Following the concert graduates will gather at the Woodland Park Hotel and Lasell Seminary grounds for the Epsilon chapter week-end house party and reunion. Raymond A. Robbins, '96, Auburndale, is general chairman, and has 26 committees working with him.

On Saturday morning outdoor sports will begin for alumni and members of the graduating classes, and a baseball game between the alumni and the college team will start the fun. This will be followed by a basket ball game.

A special memorial service will be held in the Lasell Chapel, Sunday morning, at 10:45 o'clock, for the Boston University men who gave their lives in the service of their country. President Samuel H. Merlin will conduct the services.

GLOBE—JUNE 22,

The account books at Symphony Hall show that in this era of soft drinks, ices, cakes and sandwiches at the "Pop" concerts, over $1000 more have been rung in for refreshments to date than last Summer, when the beer freely flowed—a good point for the prohibitionists. However, not before civilization itself totters will the "Pops" yield an inch to the Anti-Tobacco League!

Eighth Week of "Pops" at Symphony Hall

Mr Jacchia, who has resumed his conductorship of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall, will begin the eighth week tomorrow evening with a program for "Graduate Nurses' Night," the entertainment being given under the auspices of the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association.

Wednesday will be "Operatic Night," selections from operas of five Nations being given. Thursday the Boston City Club have taken the entire floor and many balcony seats.

The program Monday evening is as follows: March, "Semper Fidelis," Sousa; overture to "Martha," Flotow; "Reverie," Redway-Rissland; fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; ballet suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; "Song Without Words," Tschaikowsky; intermezzo, "I Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; selection, "Eileen," Herbert; waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; "Manon's Letter," Gillet; quartet from "Rigoletto," Verdi.

ADVERTISER JUNE 22.

JACCHIA MAKES POP CONCERTS LIVELY

Having conducted the Pop Concerts of the past week at Symphony Hall, Mr. Jacchia has demonstrated his ability to make the remaining three weeks of the Pops season the liveliest of all.

Next Wednesday will be operatic night, the only one of the season, although Mr. Jacchia is an operatic conductor par excellence. The operas of five nations will be heard. Tomorrow night has been entitled graduate nurses' night by the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association. For Thursday the Boston City Club has made the night their own by taking the entire floor and many balcony seats.

145

JUNE 22 HERALD,

GLORIFIES THE POPS

Having conducted the Pop concerts of the past week at Symphony Hall, Mr. Jacchia has demonstrated his ability to make the remaining three weeks of the Pops season the liveliest of all. If his unprecedented popularity as a Pops leader may be explained by his electric and tireless energy, his buoyant spirits and his musicianly authority, then the present strength of these qualities mark him as in the fullest power of his career.

Next Wednesday, June 25th, will be operatic night, the only one of the season, although Mr. Jacchia is an operatic conductor par excellence. The operas of five nations will be heard.

Tomorrow night the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association have taken a number of seats under the direction of Anna L. Gibson, R. N.

For Thursday, June 26, the Boston City Club has made the night its own by taking the entire floor and many balcony seats.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 23.

Graduate Nurses' Night.

March, "Semper Fidelis".....Sousa
Overture to "Martha".....Flotow
Reverie ..... Redway-Rissland
Fantasia, "Carmen"..... Bizet
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
(a) Les Chasseresses. (b) Pizzicato.
Song Without Words.....Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Eileen"..... Herbert
Waltz, "Espana"..... Waldteufel
Manon's Letter.....Gillet
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi

TUESDAY, JUNE 24.

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "Masaniello".....Auber
Interlude ..... Tirindelli
Fantasia, "Aida..... Verdi
Ballet Music from "The Cid"....Massenet
(a) Castillane. (b) Aragonaise.
Violin solos. (a) Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2, Chopin. (b) Scherzetto.....Wittman
Mr. Theodorowicz.
Entr'acte "Mignon"..... Thomas
Third Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Fantasia, "Carmen"..... Bizet
Turkish Patrol..... Michaelis
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
The Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 25.

Operatic Night.

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" Tschaikowsky
Prelude to Act III, "Natoma".....Herbert
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Ave Maria from "Othello".....Verdi
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Sextet from "Lucia".....Donizetti
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli

THURSDAY, June 26.

City Club Night.

March, "Bocaccio"..... Suppe
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly".....Puccini
Suite, "Sylvia"..... Delibes
(a) Les Chasseresses. (b) Valse lente.
(c) Cortege de Bacchus.
Ave Maria (for strings and organ) Schubert-Wilhelmj
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" Wagner
Selection, "Fiddlers Three".....Johnstone
"La Paloma"..... Yradier
Waltz, "Violets"..... Waldteufel
March, "Entrance of the Gladiators" Fucik

FRIDAY, JUNE 27.

March from "Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Fantasia, "A Masked Ball".....Verdi
Suite, "Coppelia." (a) Valse. (b) Czardes ..... Delibes
Intermezzo Act II, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Aubade Printaniere..... Lacombe
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Sinbad"..... Romberg
Prelude Act IV, "Carmen".....Bizet
"Pomone," Waltz .....Waldteutel
"Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar

SATURDAY, JUNE 28.

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc".....Verdi
Berceuse ..... Godard
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
(a) Death of Aase. (b) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
A Petits Pas.....Sudessi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Her Regiment".....Herbert
Volga Bargeman's Song (Orchestrated by Jacchia)
"Estudiantina," Waltz.....Waldteufel
American Patrol ..... Meacham

Tufts Night at the Pops

Elaborate costumes worn by ladies at Tufts night at the Pops last Thursday added to the brilliancy of the concert set aside for the eve of the college class day. The hall was crowded with the graduating class and under-graduates who gathered to enjoy an evening that was to be all their own. Mr. Hermon C. Bumpus, president of Tufts, attended with a party of friends, as did Mr. Austin B. Fletcher, chairman of the board of trustees of the college; and Mr. Alfred C. Haskell, president of Tufts club. Mr. James F. Malone led the class cheering. Mr. Jacchia, the regular Pop concert conductor, conducted the regular program, and several extra numbers were sung by the students, with Prof. Lewis of the faculty directing.

ADVERTISER JUNE 2

TUFTS NIGHT AT "POPS" IS POPULAR SUCCESS

Elaborate costumes at Tufts Night a the "Pops" last Thursday added to th brilliancy of the concert set aside fo the eve of the college class day. Th hall was crowded with the graduatin class and undergraduates who gathere to enjoy an evening that was to b all their own. President Hermon Bumpus, Austin B. Fletcher, chairma of the board of trustees of the colleg Alfred C. Haskell, president of Tuf Club, were among those present. Jam F. Malone led the class cheering. M Jacchia conducted the regular program. Several extra numbers, sung by the students, with Professor Lewis of the faculty directing, added spirit and atmosphere to the college night.

POST, JUNE 22,

COMMENCEMENT WEEK BRILLIANT AT POPS

A stellar week of music and merry making supplemented numerous commencements. Patrons of the Pops will long remember the brilliant conservatory night, Monday, when the programme included numbers by well known local composers. Additional interest was given by the presence with the conservatory faculty and students of such Boston favorites as George Chadwick (whose overture "Rip Van Winkle," was played by the full orchestra) brought such tremendous applause that the composer was obliged to bow acknowledgement again and again. Also Stuart Mason, who played the pianoforte accompaniment for his composition with Mr. Louis Speyer as soloist of the English horn; and ever a leader, Mr. Clement Lenom, who conducted the programme as arranged by the conservatory. Mr. Albert W. Snow, organist, played the "Aurora" with the orchestra; and a special number also was Massenet's invocation from "Les Erinnyes," with George Miquelle, 'cellist, as soloist. Conductor Agide Jacchia was among the pleased auditors, and at his table were seated many notable musicians. An ovation to Mr. Langley, one of the youngest of the Symphony players followed the playing of his composition, "The Wanderer," a waltz number. While not forgetting "the music's the thing," Olin Downes, himself, would have been well pleased at the cordialty and genial greetings exchanged between the patrons of the light-hearted groups at the numerous tables.

Elaborate costumes at Tufts' Night at the Pops, Thursday, added to the brilliancy of the concert set aside for the eve of the college class day. The hall was crowded with the graduating class and undergraduates, who gathered to enjoy an evening that was to be all their own. Mr. Hermon C. Bumpus, the president of Tufts, attended with a party of friends; Mr. Austin B. Fletcher, chairman of the board of trustees of the college was another guest who received many friends during intermissions on the programme. Mr. Alfred C. Haskell, president of Tufts Club, and popular, to judge by the groups of friends gathered about his table, was another representative of the college. James F. Malone led the class cheering. Mr. Jacchia, conducted the regular programme. Several extra numbers, sung by the students, with Professor Lewis of the faculty directing, added spirit and atmosphere to the college night.

POST, JUNE 22,

THE POPS

Recovered from his illness and having conducted the Pop concerts of the past week at Symphony Hall, Mr. Jacchia plans to make the remaining three weeks of the Pops season the "liveliest" of all. If his unprecedented popularity as a Pops leader may be explained by his spirit, and his musicianly authority, the present strength of these qualities mark him as in the fullest powers of his career.

Next Wednesday, June 25, will be Operatic night, the only one of the season, although Mr. Jacchia is an operatic conductor par excellence. The operas of five nations, including his own and ours, will be heard.

Tomorrow night has been entitled "Graduate Nurses' Night" by the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association, who have taken a number of seats under the direction of Anna L. Gibson, R. N.

For Thursday, June 26, the Boston City Club has taken the entire floor and many balcony seats.

Agide Jacchia, who for three seasons has been conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, was born near Bologna, Italy, in 1876. He was the favorite pupil of Mascagni, the famous composer, and at the age of 22 received his first professional engagement as conductor of opera. In 1900 he conducted a season of opera in Venice, after which the most important cities of Italy offered him the conductorship of their opera houses. In 1901, at the request of Mascagni, Mr. Jacchia, then only 25 years of age, conducted the first performance in Rome of Mascagni's "William Ratcliff." This was an all-star cast headed by Tetrazzini. Mr. Jacchia recalls with amusement the coincidence of the names of the six stars—they all ended in "ini."

After a season at the San Carlo Opera House, Naples, one of the largest in Italy, Jacchia was invited by Mascagni to become his assistant orchestra leader for his American tour of 1902-03. After returning to Italy he continued his career in his native country for four years and again in 1907 came to this country with the Milan Opera Company. He conducted a season of French opera at New Orleans in 1908 and from there went to South America as director of the Lombardi Opera Company. The end of the season brought the company to California and a successful tour of the large cities of the United States followed.

Mr. Jacchia was the first conductor of the Montreal Opera Company in the seasons from 1910 to 1912, and in the following season conducted an important season in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto by the National Opera Company. Well known artists were engaged from the leading opera companies of the United States for these seasons in Canada, which were the most important in the musical history of Canada in recent years.

The year 1914 brought Mr. Jacchia to New York, where he was the conductor of the Century Opera Company at the Century Theatre, and the following season toured the United States with the Boston Grand Opera Company. His success with that organization and with the Century Opera Company of New York brought his special gifts to the attention of the management of the Symphony Orchestra, with the result that he was engaged for their "Pops" conductor in the spring of 1917. Of the leaders who in the past 34 years have conducted the Pop Concerts, there is none who has enjoyed the popularity of Mr. Jacchia, who is now in his third season.

POST JUNE 23.

PEGGY AT THE POPS

"I always like to come to Infamy Hall and listen to the Pups," said Ma, as she sat down at the table she had reserved for herself and Peggy that evening.

"Not the Pups, Ma," said Peggy. "You mean the Cops. I quite degree with you that it is a nice way to spend the evening, listening to music decomposed by all the old mastiffs."

"It's quite perspiring indeed," said Ma. "Who was that young man who bowed to you out in the slobby?"

"Do you mean that young fellow who was wearing the unicorn?" asked Peggy.

"Yes," said Ma. "The one with the gold epileptics on his shoulders."

"Oh," exclaimed Peggy, "that's a young man I was induced to a few days ago. He's an engine in the navy. He told me he went in as a slob and came right up from the cranks."

"What's a slob in the navy?" asked Ma.

"A second-class serum," explained Peggy.

"Oh," said Ma, absent-mindedly. "Hush, now, my child, they're beginning to commence. They're going to play the Overshoes from Faust."

rom.....

ddress New York City JUN 1 5

ate.....

Ornstein With Boston Symphony

Leo Ornstein's manager, M. H. H. son, reports that a contract has closed for the young pianist's appear as soloist at a pair of the Boston S phony Orchestra's concerts at S Hall, Boston. This memorable in the young artist's career will place on December 19 and 20.

HERALD, JUNE

TUFTS NIGHT AT POP CONCE

Symphony Hall was throng night for the eighth Tufts Pops promoted by the Boston Tufts Cl the Tufts class day committee. than 600 members of the undergr body joined with the members alumni association in singing the musical numbers which were fea the program.

Mr. Monteux conducted the numbers of the program and gave way to Prof. Leo R. Lewis, director at Tufts. The audie plauded when the Tufts Glee Cl the stage for "We Stand," the patriotic song composed by Pro last summer.

The baseball team was pr guests of the evening and, election of Edward Callahan year's captain, the audience br into the Tufts "Fight Chee James F. Malone, '19, of New lowing the intermission Pres mon Carey Bumpus appeared floor and was enthusiastically

REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.
JUN 5

MUSIC and MUSICIANS

THE SUCCESSOR OF HENRI RABAUD

Pierre Monteux, New Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra — His Plans for Coming Season — His Record

Early last month two distinguished musicians sailed for France. The first, Henri Rabaud, was leaving America after a year's sojourn as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra; the second, Pierre Monteux was returning to spend the summer in his native country preparatory to his conductorship of the same great orchestra next season. There was both design and sentiment in his journey; he went in search of new and interesting scores, but also he was to set foot upon his native soil for the first time since he fulfilled his military service at the opening of the war. Called out in the first week of French mobilization, he served two years as a private soldier of the second class in the 35th territorial infantry; he was at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. After devoting two years of his career to continuous, faithful service, he was given his discharge.

As to Programs

On the eve of his departure, Mr Monteux made some very definite and unambiguous statements about his policy for the season of 1919-20. Questioned as to his leanings toward the newer and bolder music and his intentions as regards programs for next winter, he confessed that one of his immediate quests in Europe was for music of the younger French, Italian and Russian schools. However, he explained that whereas the "Monteux concerts" co-existed with four other orchestras in Paris and therefore could legitimately specialize, the Boston symphony concerts must have catholic and balanced programs.

He spoke reverently of the classics, declared himself an ardent admirer of wagner's music, expressed his liking for some American music, mentioning specifically MacDowell, Loeffeer and Carpenter. On the subject of French propaganda, he made these emphatic remarks: "I intend to figure no way when in Boston as a propagandist for French music. Just as good wine needs no bush, so good French music needs no propaganda and that is the only kind I shall play. I do not think I shall find much room on my programs for ultra-modern music. My first concern is always to play the best music of every nation."

Such catholicity was in a measure to be expected, for a varied career had given him ample experience in all the ins and outs of musical performance. Starting as a viola player and member of several ensembles for chamber music, he soon found his true vocation as conductor, and made his mark conducting the "Colonne" and "Monteux" concerts in Paris, grand opera in the larger cities of Europe and at the Metropolitan opera house in New York, not to mention the Russian ballet with which he toured Europe and America.

Success With Boston Symphony Orchestra

It will also be remembered that Mr Monteux conducted the opening concerts of the Boston symphony season just gone by, pending the arrival of Mr Rabaud. He had then been asked to become regular conductor, but the Metropolitan opera management did not see fit to relieve their sole conductor of French opera at the last minute, with the season's plans all made.

He was enthusiastically acclaimed, however, at the two pairs of Boston symphony concerts which he conducted in Boston. H. T. Parker of the Boston Transcript wrote: "Mr Monteux has the most sensitive ear possessed by any conductor since Gericke—not less keen and of Gallic clarity, precision, fineness is Mr Monteux's sense of musical design and of revelation thereof to his hearers. To this insight Mr Monteux adds the musical intuition and experience that mold the phrase, shape the period, graduate the climax as with the composer's voice and ear. To all three he lends the imagination that discovers the just accent that distributes and shades colors, that vibrates to the subtle modulations of a Dukas or a Debussy—a manifold ability, intelligence, imagination, devotion dwell in him. He possesses the true artist's mind and—what is equally essential—the true artist's conscience."

Philip Hale, in the Herald, said: "Mr Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an evoker of clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr Gerick had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston symphony orchestra international reputation; but Mr Monteux has warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr Gericke's nature. As an interpreter, Mr Monteux has given memorable performances of works known and unfamiliar, performances that have been sane as well as brilliant and imaginative. As a man he has in a short time endeared himself to orchestra and public."

And Olin Downes in the Post says: "Mr Monteux is a very simple man, rather under medium hight, erect, uncommonly clear-eyed, unostentatious, self-possessed in the presence of an audience, and quietly master of his men. He had not conducted two minutes before it was apparent that he had made of the Boston symphony orchestra a finer instrument than it has been for many seasons. He is a supremely artistic interpreter, a man profoundly in earnest, and thoroughly equipped for his task."

Personality

Mr Monteux is 42 years old. One of his recent interviewers, Miss Clare Peeler, was similarly impressed with his personal charms. She described him as "short, dark, plump, vivacious to the sparkling point; the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could fancy Mr Monteux making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) informs his ready smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own. . . . Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner, the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience."

The same interviewer probed him on a much-disputed question by asking him, "What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?" "Both," he answered. "It must seem a democracy, but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for orders' sake, but only to get results."

The personnel of the Boston symphony orchestra should afford Mr Monteux the finest conceivable material to work with. The past season has proved that the considerable change of last year was distinctly for the better. In every city where the orchestra was heard the rich and delicate quality of the strings was remarked upon. The brass section remained virtually intact and maintained its old eminence; the woodwind was notably improved by the acquisition of some illustrious newcomers—all "first prize" men from the Paris conservatory.

The usual change from year to year involves from 5 to 10 per cent of the players, and nothing more than this is now transpiring. The distinguished wood-wind section remains unaltered, except that Mr Mimart, clarinetist, has returned from military service in France and will take his old place which Mr Stievenard has been temporarily filling. The only change in the brass choir will be in the second quartet of French horns. In the 60 strings there is also a minimum of change.

Camb. Chronicle
June 21

JACCHIA LEADS POPS AGAIN

Agide Jacchia, the famous conductor of Italian opera, and favorite conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall, has returned to his post after an enforced absence of several weeks. He is now officiating at the helm of the marvelously fine Pops orchestra with the fullest measure of vim, enthusiasm and authority. Nightly, except Sunday, all comers may consume light refreshments while listening to a program of universal appeal.

TRANSCRIPT JUNE 21.

THE POPS

MR. JACCHIA is proving his ability to carry the Pops season to a splendid finish. Conductor of many Italian opera companies in many lands, he has made his mark as a popular leader. Next Wednesday, June 25, will be Operatic Night, the only one of the season. Music from the operas of five nations, including our own, will be heard. Monday night has been christened "Graduate Nurses' Night" by the Massachusetts State Nurses' Association, who have taken a number of seats, under the direction of Anna L. Gibson, R. N. For Thursday, June 26, the Boston City Club has made the night their own by taking the entire floor and many balcony seats.

Following are the programmes for the first three evenings of this week:

MONDAY, JUNE 23—Graduate Nurses' Night
March, "Semper Fidelis" ..... Sousa
Overture to "Martha" ..... Flotow
Reverie ..... Redway-Risslan
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" (a, Les Chasseresses; b, Pizzicato) ..... Delibes
Song without Words ..... Chaikowsky
Intermezzo "I Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Eileen" ..... Herbert
Waltz, "España" ..... Waldteufel
Manon's Letter ..... Gillet
Quartet from "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi

TUESDAY, JUNE 24
Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Interlude ..... Tirindelli
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Ballet Music from "The Cid" (a, Castillane; b, Aragonaise) ..... Massenet Violin solos (Julius Theodorowicz):
a. Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2 ..... Chopin
b. Scherzetto ..... Wittmann
Entr'acte, "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Fantasia "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Turkish Patrol ..... Michaelis
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz ..... Mascagni
The Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 25—Operatic Night
Coronation March from "The Prophet," ..... Meyerbeer
Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin" ..... Chaikowsky
Prelude to Act III., "Natoma" ..... Herbert
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Ave Maria from "Othello" ..... Verdi
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Sextet from "Lucia" ..... Donizetti
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," ..... Saint-Saëns
Meditation from "Thais" ..... Massenet
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," ..... Ponchielli

GLOBE JUNE 19

"POPS NIGHT" FOR TUFTS REVIVED

Faculty and Varsity Ball Team Will Attend

MEDFORD, June 19—Tufts undergraduates and alumni will unite at Symphony Hall tonight for the first regular Pops Night since 1912. Up to that year the affair was a tradition, but owing to changes in commencement exercises the event was dropped from the program of social festivities. Its revival this year has created a great stir and as a result more than 1500 Tufts men will be present tonight.

HAROLD L. SCHENK.

The faculty of the associated schools will participate in the event and the varsity baseball team will be in attendance as special guests of the Boston Tufts Club. Delegations from the General Alumni Association and from alumni chapters at Lawrence, Portland and New York will lead the celebration.

The musical program will be distinctively Tuftonian, with Prof Leo R. Lewis, director of music, as leader. The Tufts Gleen, Mandolin and Banjo Clubs, headed by Arnold E. Thiesfeldt, Ernest Hayward and Jason Bickford respectively, will render popular Tufts songs. "The Sword of Ferrarra," which put the Tufts Gleen Club before the public more prominently than any other musical selection, will be the principal number. Members of the Tufts Musical Quartet, the only organization of its kind in America, also will take part in the program. The cheering will be led by James F. Malone, '19, of Newton, retiring leader on the hill.

The committee includes D. T. Montague, '19, of Boston; Harold L. Schenk, '19, of Wheeling, W Va; Ralph Beattie, '19, of North Andover, and Harold N. Shepherd, '19, of Lynn.

TRAVELER, JUNE 21

OPERATIC NIGHT COMING AT POPS

The long awaited operatic night for the Pops comes next Wednesday night. Mr. Jacchia has arranged a program that bids fair to pack Symphony Hall. Tuesday night will be graduate nurses' night, and Thursday night the Boston City Club will have the entire floor. Tonight's program will be:

Triumphal March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
"The Whispering of the Flowers" ..... Blon
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Turkish March ..... Mozart
Serenade ..... Schubert-Jacchia
Largo (with organ) ..... Handel
Slavic March ..... Tschaikowsky
Introduction to Act III. "Lohengrin" .. Wagner
Reve Angelique (with organ) ..... Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" . Strauss

AMERICAN JUNE 24

Pops Program

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Mr. Jacchia will conduct the following program:

1. Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
2. Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
3. Interlude ..... Tirindelli
4. Fantasie "Aida" ..... Verdi
5. Ballet music from "The Cid" ... Massenet
6. Violin Solo a, Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2 ..... Chopin
   b. Scherzetto ..... Wittmann
   (Julius Theodorowicz)
7. Entr'acte "Mignon" ..... Thomas
8. Third Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
9. Fantasia "Carmen" ..... Bizet
10. Turkish Patrol ..... Michaelis
11. Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" .... Mascagni
12. The Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

HERALD, JUNE 25

Mr. Jacchia

As the World Wags:

I am only a poor press agent. The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall being my business I am beset by anxious inquirers who cannot pronounce the name of our maestro. Therefore I submit to your readers this simple device—as simple as sneezing. Do it this way, exploding on the last syllable:

Yah-KEE-Ah! J. N. BURK.
Boston.

---

n TIMES
ress: New York City
JUN 1 - 19

FRENCH AIRS FOR BOSTON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened on May 5 its annual series of "The Pops," as those lighter concerts led by Agide Jacchia are fondly and delightfully called by dwellers at "The Hub." The management has already announced plans for next season, its thirty-ninth, to start in Boston on Oct. 10, and a month later in New York. Renewals of subscription for Carnegie Hall, as well as for the home series, will be received by W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Judge Cabot and the new Board of Directors, who are nine in number, like the Muses, have again given a deciding vote in favor of French art, inviting Pierre Monteux to resume the baton laid down by Henri Rabaud. It is interesting to note, accordingly, what M. Rabaud's season of pronounced Gallic flavor brought forth. Never was conversion more complete nor allied aim more loyal. Teuton names in Boston concerts shrank to twenty-seven, the old-line composers, good and dead ones, named noncontroversial rather than too strictly classic.

Forty-seven, a full score higher, was Rabaud's record for France. Russia, with eleven works played, led America with nine, and the rest nowhere. For the curious, however, there were Italy and England, three each, and Poland, Norway, Spain, and Belgium, one apiece. The total of works performed included fifteen "first productions" and twelve others new to Symphony Hall. In twenty-four pairs of concerts there twenty solo performers appeared, a dozen being instrumentalists, eight others stars.

"Anon, see Farnaby," is an odd [illegible] that heads Philip Hale's annual repertory résumé. But "Anon," on further reference to the suggested Farnaby, proves to be our old friend "Anonymous," and to cover the authors of an old English suite arranged by Conductor Rabaud, and pleasing withal—pronounced by Mr. Huneker charming in the French adapter's secret of orchestral coloring—when brought forward also in the New York concerts on last Jan. 9.

Allied airs "celebrating the close of the year of Victory," on Dec. 30 and 31 in Boston, accounted for such names as Rouget de Lisle, composer of "La Marseillaise"; Campenhout, of "La Brabanconne"; Gabetti, of the "Marcia Reale"; Henry Carey, of "God Save the King" and "America," and John Stafford Smith of "Anacreon in Heaven," otherwise "The Star-Spangled Banner."

America furnished Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts" to the gala occasion. Other native or adopted Americans, first and last, were Converse, Foote, Gilbert, Hadley, Hill, Kelley, Loeffler, and MacDowell. Russia's contributions all season were Rimsky-Korsakoff, 4; Moussorgsky, 3; Borodin, Glinka, Rachmaninoff, and Tschaikovsky, each 1.

There were one-composer countries: Poland, Chopin; Norway, Grieg; Spain, Laparra. The German classics were: Beethoven, 10, including five symphonies; Mozart, 4; Bach and Schumann, both 3; Mendelssohn and Weber, 2 each, and Brahms, Liszt, and Schubert, 1.

Modern France mightily prevailed: Saint-Saëns, 8; Franck, 7; Berlioz, 4; Debussy, 3; Chabrier, Dukas, Faure, d'Indy, Lalo, Rabaud, and Ravel, 2 apiece, and single works of Bizet, Bruneau, Dubois, Guilmant, Magnard, Massenet, and Schmitt, not to mention Gluck, Mehul, Rameau, and de Lisle.

POST, JUNE 15

It is interesting to observe that coming prohibition, which has already made itself felt at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, has not affected in any way the patronage of these events. Heretofore in previous seasons beers, light wines, etc., have figured on the list of beverages. Anticipating the future, the management eliminated this year all alcoholic stuff from the bill of fare. Some thought this would affect the popularity of the concerts or diminish the number of table parties on the floor. Nothing of the kind has happened. The Pop concerts are enjoying the most successful season in their history, a success which appears to be due, in considerable measure, to the conducting of Mr. Jacchia, who is fortunately sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to resume conducting tomorrow night. The attraction is the music.

The Pop concerts are having a pronounced educational effect as well as providing entertainment. Mr. Jacchia has made the programmes more substantial than they have ever been before, and it is proved that this course is meeting with the support of the public, which is not willing, apparently, that the ability of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be spent on nothing more ambitious than a Strauss waltz. Important and interesting music finds its way into these programmes. A public that did not know the gorgeousness and the color of modern Russian music such as Rimsky-Korsakoff's music of "Scheherazade," or the piquancy of music by early Italian masters, or the products of the genius of contemporaneous Italians besides Puccini, has now discovered the existence of Casella and other men and other contemporaneous men who may outlast the fame of the composer of "Tosca" and "La Boheme."

The Pop concerts are probably doing much to whet the curiosity of the public to hear the programmes of the subscription concerts of the winter time.

This is a fine and constructive thing. But there is something which seems to have left the Pop concerts, never to return, for which we sigh. That is, [illegible] pleasure unconfined [illegible]

The audience was not so plaguey anxious about it. People did not cease sucking lemonade through a straw, or glare around at anybody who ventured to whisper after the conductor had rapped with his baton for the orchestra to begin. The solemnity which is gathering over the Pop concerts was nonexistent. The conductor's art, too, in the good old days, was carefree. The hearer became a simple, sensuous being, like the Faun of Mallarme, as he floated in unreasoning bliss on the delicious waltz rhythms of the orchestra. And emptied a glass of beer the while.

No one thought the worse of him. The music affected him no less, and probably more, than the beer. A Pop concert is not, in our opinion, a place to meditate and pray. There is music which should be champagne to the spirit. It should cause talk and laughter and cause the tired man of business to feel like an irresponsible artist, himself, for a brief space of time. We admit it: we like to be gay. We like to peek under the hat at the next table but one and see if we can catch her eye. We don't mind the music of the popping of a cork, but we can get along without that if the audience will please forget itself and liven up a bit.

Mr. Strube, after years' absence from Boston, was invited to conduct for two weeks during the illness of Mr. Jacchia. He rapped several times for silence, and then commenced the performance of Wagner's prelude to "Tristan and Isolde." Wagnerian music hadn't been played very much in Symphony Hall of late. Many who knew the "Tannhauser" overture didn't know the prelude to "Tristan." Their curiosity was strengthened by a programme note which quoted Wagner's own high-falutin' words about this prelude, about the agony and the sighs of the music, and all that. (If composers only would leave us alone to enjoy their music in our own way!) Just as the sighing was at its height a cat, possibly pro-ally by disposition, certainly a sworn foe of Wagner's music, made its appearance. No one knew where it had come from or what it was going to do. The animal had a hunted look. It sought in vain a place where it could escape the noises on the stage. First it darted under the chair of a fat woman, then it flew out from this refuge and ran straight down the long middle aisle, which goes from the back through the centre of the hall. It went down the hall as though the devil were after it and disappeared. No one knew where it went. Its appearance before the audience was as uncanny as it was brief. But the audience was through listening to the "Tristan" prelude. A roar like the sea went up as the cat made its way down the aisle. Somebody commenced to argue with a waitress about a tip or something, and poor Wagner went down to defeat. There were some enthusiastic souls who applauded, apparently of set purpose, but this did not save the day.

We personally think that the "Tristan" music is out of place at a Pop concert. There is plenty of good music which is in place there. There are plenty of ways to enjoy good music besides sitting like schoolma'ams or the statues on the frigid walls while the music sails by. Let's realize that you can have fun without losing all right to be considered a thinking being. Let's go to the Pop concerts and have a good time.

JACCHIA WITH POPS AGAIN

Agide Jacchia, long hindered from conducting the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, will preside over the orchestra once more, beginning next Tuesday, and, lacking unforeseen events, through the four weeks that still remain of the Pops season. He may be relied upon to impart all of the vim with which he inaugurated the concerts in May to the satisfaction of his audiences.

The coming week abounds in special Pop nights. Tomorrow all who are interested in the New England Conservatory of Music will be welcome to its particular night, at which the student body and the alumni will celebrate. Mr. Ralph Flanders, manager, has engineered the occasion, ably seconded by Miss Marion Skinner, president of the senior class and chairman of the entertainment committee. Mr. Lenom, who is a member both of the faculty and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a programme, including numbers by students.

On Wednesday all comers from commencement week at Harvard will be made to feel at home by the playing of such encores as "Up the Street" and "Cruiser Harvard." Thursday brings Tufts Night, whereat the College Glee Club will sing. For Friday Boston University has taken the entire house.

AMERICAN JUNE 26

THIS IS CITY CLUB NIGHT AT THE POPS

The Boston City Club has taken the entire floor and sections of the balconies for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. Mr. Jacchia will conduct the following program:

March, "Boccaccio" ..... Suppe
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" Strauss
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Ave Maria (for strings and organ) ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .. Wagner
Selection, "Fiddlers Three" ..... Johnstone
"La Paloma" ..... Tradier
Waltz, "Violets" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Entrance of the Gladiator" .... Fucik

POST, JUNE 25,

KARL MUCK TELLS POST HIS PLANS

Former Symphony Leader in Frank Talk With Reporter Bids Good-by to America

Sees a Gloomy Future—Talks of Prison Life—Soon to Leave for Germany

BY HERBERT L. BALDWIN
Post Staff Correspondent
Copyright, 1919, by the Post Publishing Co. (The Boston Post)

UNITED STATES WAR PRISON BARRACKS NO. 2, Chickamauga Park, Georgia, June 24.—"Germans have no place left in America, either in business or art. And I, as one of them, have no idea how long before, if ever, they will have again. I do not want to stay in nor to return to America. My future? It may be anything."

Dr. Karl Muck, once famed leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the same Muck who was sought and petted by Back Bay society folk and who mingled with the elite until the keen eyes of the secret service saw him as a man dangerous to all things American, told his story to a Post staff reporter here in this prison camp today.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

IS A MEEKER MUCK

It was the same Muck whom Boston knew, yet different. A meeker Muck, he appeared far different than the faultlessly-dressed man who ruled with a rod of iron both his musicians and the musical temperaments of his orchestra's aristocratic patrons and patronesses.

Perhaps it was the nondescript dress he wore. Perhaps it was the keen-eyed, square-jawed doughboy who sat nearby with a shotgun loaded with buckshot. Or perhaps it was the lieutenant whose regulations required him to sit within hearing as Dr. Muck talked with the Post man, incidentally the first civilian, with the exception of his wife, whom the former orchestra leader has talked with since he entered the barbed wire enclosures of this prison nearly 15 months since; or perhaps, as he says himself, Karl Muck has changed.

Scant Hopes for Future

He is today, as he admits, practically a man without a country. He is going back, sent back by the government whose betrayal the secret service says he attempted, to the land that gave him birth. At the same time Dr. Muck asserts he has scant, if any, hopes for the future there. The peace terms, he says, have annihilated Germany, have practically eliminated her people as a nation from the earth.

Dr. Muck told the Post man that his imprisonment has shattered his nerves and health. "Rheumatism, and my heart is bothering me, badly." he said. Colonel C. W. Penrose, the genial old military man who commands the prison, smiled and remarked, laconically, "Well, they all have something the matter with them."

Life a Dreamy Monotony

Karl Muck's internment has been no picnic. Its been a monotonous do-nothing, see-nothing, hear-nothing life, restricted within a mile and a quarter of barbed wire fence, about which pace sentries with shotguns and above which loom towers where sit guards with machine guns and searchlights. Two Germans defied its confines. They buried them, riddled with buckshot.

Twelve miles out of Chattanooga, on a plain just outside the shadow of Lookout Mountain, this prison is near nothing. It looks like a small edition of a barren part of Camp Devens. Rows of barracks as at Ayer. Nothing to break the monotony to the eye of the row after row of barracks except two lofty chimneys of the heating plant and the towering sentry boxes. Around all the barbed wire and a double guard at each gate with padlock and key.

Life a Dreary Monotony

It's not the life of Reilly, and stories to the contrary are false. But neither Colonel Penrose nor any of his men have prevented its being not for prisoners of Karl Muck's type. Colonel Penrose explained this to the Post man today, as the old army man twirled the corners of his drooping mustache and chewed at a cigar.

"The worst punishment that we have meted out to any enemy alien has been confinement on bread and water," said Colonel Penrose. "We can't put them to work on rock piles nor roads nor on anything except things having to do with their own upkeep. You see they are not prisoners of war, and the treaties prevent certain things, and having them work at their own upkeep, such as loading food, sweeping their quarters, policing the grounds and things like that, are all the treaties allow."

And the Post man could not just help but think of "scraps of paper" in Germany.

Muck a Model Prisoner

Karl Muck has been a class "A" prisoner. He has no marks for infractions of rules against him. Like officers in the American army, Muck and his class have been allowed their own mess. They paid for it, and the government has purchased for them whatever sort of food they wanted. They have hired their own cooks and their own waiters from among their fellow prisoners, and they haven't had any work to do. Football, baseball, tennis, all kinds of sports have been allowed them, and the Y. M. C. A. has furnished a moving picture show for them twice a week.

Not a patron of the Symphony, unless it were those who were his most intimate friends, would have recognized their former favorite as he came from his barracks to talk with the Post reporter.

A Forlorn Figure

A figure hidden, almost beneath the folds of a raincoat, his face obscured by a drooping black sou'wester, Muck came shuffling along, a bit stoop-shouldered with a guard with a shotgun at his heels. A white duck shirt, without collar nor tie, white duck pants, that sadly needed an iron, and with feet encased only in tan socks and black overshoes, he plodded through a pelting rain to the room assigned by Colonel Penrose for the interview. Muck was not expecting visitors, and the hand that the Post man extended went unheeded.

The former Symphony leader appeared dazed, and was a bit defiant until the Post man introduced himself. At parting he shook hands warmly, and the apparent slight at first, the lieutenant in attendance said, was, perhaps, due to the fact that Muck doesn't like Department of Justice inquisitors.

Had Left Germany for Good

"Where am I going?" he repeated after the Post man. "Where can I go, what can I do? Back in 1912, when I came back to Boston the last time, I cut off all relations in Germany, gave up everything, and came to America as I thought for good. And now, I don't know what I am going back to. Nobody here knows the conditions there, they may change over night. I have no home there, no connections there, nothing there, nor here now.

"There is unrest, even in Germany." This last with the slight hiss of intaking breath that is characteristic of Muck as he talks. He speaks slowly, deliberatingly, a cigarette after another, and after he had emptied a box of an expensive brand that he had with him he smoked the Post man's during the rest of the interview. Muck is tanned almost the brown of an Indian. His mixed black and iron gray hair has thinned out, but he still combs it straight back from his forehead. But to go on with his talk.

Artistic Zenith in Boston

"Yes, even in Germany no one knows that which is to come," he said. "There is unrest in all of old Europe, and one of the first things to suffer in any war or any unrest is art and science. I have no home there, but I wouldn't come back here again. My orchestra is gone. My experiences here have made me not want to come back again.

"For Boston, yes, I have the best of feelings. The years that I spent with the Boston orhcestra gave me the greatest artistic pleasure I ever had in my life, in the heart as well as in performance. Even in the most harrowing times the people of Boston were very nice to me. I never saw any animosity even in the most harrowing times. That last season, I mean.

Letters From Friends

"Yes, I have heard from my friends, from Mr. Ellis, from Major Higginson, from Mrs. Gardner. The letters, oh," and again came that quick hissing intake of breath that punctuated every interjection of the Post reporter as Dr. Muck haltingly talked. "Oh, just letters to cheer up, to wait and things would all come out right, would smooth themselves out, just letters as one friend to another.

"But this place, this heat, this inactivity, my health. I was always the strongest of men. And now my heart is very, very bad. I have had to do away with all exercise, strenuous exercise, I mean. We had what you would call-ergymnastics, I guess, but I had to stop them. My heart will not allow me. Then it is damp here, and I got rheumatism. And the heat, it is terrible. The first summer was bad enough, and I burned almost as black as a negro, but this second summer we all agree is the worst. We wait and we wait, for what?

German, French, Russian Art Gone

"America has never felt any of the horrors of war. My going, the going of other Germans of art and musicianry and science will make no difference to the future of America in any of those lines. This country has not been really tortured by the horrors of war as has the art and science of Germany, of France, and look at Russia, everything gone."

And all during his interview not once did Dr. Muck mention responsibility for the war nor its causes. A direct question by the reporter brought the only flash of fire to his eyes during the talk.

"Do you think that the Kaiser, that Germany might have done differently?" asked the reporter.

The hiss of the quick intake of breath, a flash of the eye, a quick twitch of his hands and then a gesture, the same gesture of a half shrug of the shoulders and a half wave of the hands that is characteristic of Muck, and he replied: "Perhaps." And not once again would he talk of that question.

The Post man asked: "Just what, Dr. Muck, are your feelings towards Boston, toward America?"

Feelings Toward Boston Sad

A wait of a half minute as he puffed his cigarette, then the reply:

"I feel sad, that is all, and I think that it is very natural that I don't feel glad. If you have spent four years in doing the best that you can for art and really devoted every minute of your life to that one thing and never mixed in politics nor anything else the hardest part of all is to be suddenly taken out and expounded, to be sent to absolute loafing or how shall I say it? To have no occupation at all, to have nothing to do but this it gets on ones nerves, I tell you I have always worked hard and now I have nothing to do.

Army to Determine Attitude

"And what could I do if I did stay here? There are no conditions for us working here now, none for any of us. And even at home nobody knows what the conditions are. But here in America there is no place for a German. It may take generations for it to change, yes, and I can't even think when.

"I never had any idea that such a discrimination could take place. And when such treatment is possible I have no idea of how long it will last. Yes, even your young Americans have been taught that a German is something to be despised, to be shunned, to be, well I don't know how to say it. The ideas formed in the Prussian mind as a child are the strongest, and I suppose it is the same with the American child. And there your Americans in the army of occupation are going to determine much of the attitude of the coming generation of Germans towards America.

First Know Americans in Army

"This generation had no idea of America nor Americans, haven't even now. But your American children, they have been taught to despise the German and no 10, no 20, perhaps 0 years can stamp that entirely out of their minds.

"The Germans, I say, had no idea of Americans. They had no idea of fighting Americans. An American was to them a man in a land 3000 miles away; the Germans knew of the geography of the land, but of its people, what kind they were, nothing, and the first that Germany knew of the real Americans is your army of occupation. And from what I read their impressions are one that is going to breed the best terms and all that has gone shows that men should be on the best of terms. But in this time we cannot change. There is no place for the German here today.

Try to Forget America

"At home, what? The attitude of those who leave here tomorrow for Germany is this, I believe, and, yes, I have talked with them. They are going back first of all to forget America." There was no bitterness in his voice as Dr. Muck [illegible] this hour, in that matter all during his interview. He talked hesitatingly, almost, it seemed, unwillingly, and even when he mentioned his own case the tone of his voice was sad rather than bitter.

"They are going back with the idea of 'how shall we find Germany,' rather, I believe, than 'how shall we ever forget this terrible America.' Most of these men have families there; for me I have only a brother in Bavaria. I don't believe that any of them would come back to America if they could, though."

Appointed by Kaiser

The Kaiser himself, it was, who personally appointed Dr. Muck as principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and it was Wilhelm who gave personal permission on June 2, 1906, for Dr. Muck to visit America. Dr. Muck was very close to the German court and of the deposed monarch. The Post man questioned.

"Do you believe that the Kaiser would have been overthrown if the war had not taken place?" Dr. Muck was asked.

A bit of hesitation, and he replied: "Perhaps not so soon. There were bad laws in Germany, especially in Prussia, bad laws regarding elections and such, laws there were not democratic, that didn't in the least represent democracy. The Kaiser had worked years and years to have these laws reformed. But with the junkers, it was impossible."

The Kaiser will never attempt to return to power, Dr. Muck said he believes. "No," he said, "he will never return to rulership. Why? Well, he will not." And that was the only reason he gave. Asked if he believed the vaunted military spirit of Germany was a thing of the past or was only crushed temporarily, Dr. Muck said:

"For the moment, anyway, they are sick of it. Will it come back? I don't know. If you have not had anything to eat for four years or five years you lose the spirit of everything. It all depends on circumstances. Germany must live on but at present they have the spirit of nothing; how can they have

Never Return to Boston

"The treaty, as I have read extracts of it, practically annihilates Germany sends her peoples off from the face of the earth as a nation, and, bah, these flies," and the deposed Symphony leader made a swipe at some score and more that were crawling all over his face and arms. This section of Georgia is strong on flies.

"My friends in Boston?" he parried. And then almost proudly he said: "All my social relations were with the Back Bay. I leave them sadly and I believe that they still believe in me. But I would never go back to Boston. I could not. My feeling is the same as that of ever returning to America. It has been too unpleasant."

Even in this prison Dr. Muck has had opportunity to lead an orchestra in symphonies. The Tsingtau Orchestra, a German organization that was in China when the Japanese captured the place were released, as they were all medical men, and then came to the United States, being here when war was declared, and they were interned. Dr. Muck conducted many of their weekly concerts. "It helped the spirit of the men," he said, "but compared with my Boston orchestra, no," and the "no" was an emphatic one.

War Is Over, Let It Be

Dr. Muck refused point blank to discuss the war or its outcome. "It is over, let it be," he almost flared.

His knowledge of hostilities and of the peace conference, since his internment, has of necessity been what he has learned from newspapers or from his wife. And even the papers that he and his fellow prisoners have received have been rigidly censored. They have been sent direct from the offices of the publishers as none but those were allowed even after they had been scanned by the officials. Mrs. Muck has visited him much. Even as late as yesterday she started on her way back to Boston after a visit. But all her talks with him have been with an officer present.

Mrs. Muck Goes Mack Also

"It has been doubly hard for her," said Dr. Muck. "But in an enemy country in war time it is best to be as inconspicuous as possible, and that is what Mrs. Muck has tried to do. She will go back to Germany with me, and what we shall do there we shall do together. She has no more idea than I. I have heard nothing of any animosity towards any of us in our home country. Perhaps there is, but why should there be?"

And then as the time limit for the interview expired the Post man asked: "Dr. Muck, why was it that you never became an American citizen?"

The musician arose and looking out of the window replied:

Intended to Be Citizen

"I intended to. You see, I came back to the United States in 1912 and in 1914 I decided to settle down in Boston, and in March of that year I bought a house at 50 Fenway, intending to take out my citizenship papers. Then came the war and, well, I intended to become a citizen and stay here."

"Come on, Muck," sang out the doughboy guard, as he slung his rifle into place. "Well, good-by," said the prisoner, as he shook the reporter's hand.

And as No. 1337, for that's Muck's title here, went out into the wet and back towards the quarters where he has to sweep the floor and make the cot bed and wash the windows himself the lieutenant who had sat listening winked solemnly at the Post man and said:

"Well, maybe he did."

POST, JUNE 26,

HOW MUCK LANDED IN DETENTION

Preferred Internment to Trial Involving a Woman

NOT IN PLOT AGAINST SOLDIERS' MORALS

Faced With Proof of Mann Law Violation Chose Prison

The Post's exclusive story yesterday concerning Dr. Karl Muck's prison life caused widespread discussion about Boston. There has always been a great deal of mystery thrown about the case of Dr. Muck and this has given rise to a vast crop of sensational rumors concerning the charges against the former leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

The public has had an altogether wrong idea of just what sent Dr. Muck to a detention prison.

THE REAL FACTS

It was not until the episode in Providence where either Dr. Muck or the management of the Symphony Orchestra refused to put "The Star Spangled Banner" on the orchestra programme that Dr. Muck received any attention from the authorities. It was a costly refusal for Mr. Muck, for the incident created a great storm all over the country and resulted in Washington being flooded with demands that something be done about it.

The Attorney-General then took a hand and sent a sharp and peremptory order to the local authorities of the Department of Justice asking them why they had not done something about Dr. Muck. Thereupon the investigation of Dr. Muck was taken up in earnest.

Find No Direct Overt Act

The net result was this: Dr. Muck had been in frequent correspondence with Count von Bernstorff and other German leaders. He had bought German bonds and was sending money to Germany presumably to assist in waging the war.

There was, however, no fixed and definite crime that could be laid at his door. Enough was secured to show that Dr. Muck was actively sympathetic with Germany, but no direct overt act could be proven.

Woman's Name Brought In

During the course of the investigation in which the authorities were assisted by patriotic members of the Symphony Orchestra, it developed that the name of a young woman in the Back Bay was closely connected with that of Dr. Muck. She had made frequent trips out of the State in Dr. Muck's company and it was felt that he should be arrested and charged with a violation of the Mann white slave act.

However, the definite evidence of this was rather difficult to get, but enough was secured to warrant the indictment when, quite by chance, a letter from Dr. Muck to the young woman in question was secured. How this letter was obtained will make quite a lively story some day.

Given His Choice

This letter was of such a nature that it resulted in a charge of sending scurrilous matter through the mails. Dr. Muck was promptly arrested and he could either accept detention as an enemy alien or go to trial on the charge.

He naturally elected to go to a detention camp. That is why the famous Symphony leader is now in a prison camp.

Propaganda Talk Backed

There never was any ground for statements connecting the name of Dr. Muck with propaganda to ruin the morals of the soldiers. The charge was made while scandalous enough, concerned his own personal conduct. The story was spread [illegible] that coupled Dr. [illegible]

AMERICAN / JUNE

"ROMANTIC" PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March from "Queen of Sheba" ....
Overture, "Oberon" ....
Minuet, "A Masked Ball" ....
Fantasia, "Coppelia" ....
Suite, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ....
Intermezzo, Act II., ...
Aubade Printaniere ....
First Hungarian Rhapsody ....
Selection, "Sinbad" ....
Prelude to Act IV., "Carmen" ....
Waltz, "Pomone" ....
"Pomp and Circumstance" ....

TIGHT BINDING

Post June 29.-

148

UCK
D IN NTION

nternmen volving man

AGAINST S' MORALS

Proof of Violation
Prison

ive story yester-
Karl Muck's widespread disston. There has deal of mystery
case of Dr. Muck rise to a vast crop
ors concerning the former leader of estra.
had an altogether
t what sent Dr.
prison.

L FACTS

he episode in Provi-
Dr. Muck or the Symphony Orches-
"The Star Spangled
chestra programme
eived any attention
s. It was a costly ck, for the incident storm all over the ited in Washington demands that some-
ut it.
eneral then took a harp and peremptory

l authorities of the tice asking them why ne something about on the investigation taken up in earnest.

ect Overt Act

was this: Dr. Muck
quent correspondence
Bernstorff and other
He had bought Ger-
as sending money to bly to assist in wag-

wever, no fixed and could be laid at his secured to show that tively sympathetic with direct overt act could

ame Brought In

se of the investigation, thorities were assisted bers of the Symphony
eloped that the name
an in the Back Bay
ected with that of Dr.
made frequent trips out
Dr. Muck's company
that he should be ar-
ed with a violation of slave act.
definite evidence of this cult to get, but enough warrant the indictment chance, a letter from young woman in ques-
d. How this letter was ake quite a lively story

His Choice

s of such a nature that charge of sending scur-
through the mails. Dr.
mptly arrested and told accept detention as an
o to trial on the charge.
elected to go to a de-
That is why the former der is now in a prison

Talk Baseless

as any ground for state-the name of Dr. Muck to ruin the morals of
the charge against him,
s enough, concerned his nduct. The stories were hat coupled Dr. Muck's

JUNE 27,

PROGRAM AT CERT TONIGHT

will conduct the m at the Pop Con-
y Hall tonight:
of Sheba .....Weber
ed Ball" .....Verdi
.....Delibes
"The Jewels of the
.....Wolf-Ferrari
.....Lacombe
.....Liszt
Rhapsody .....Rombert
Carmen .....Bizet
.....Waldteufel
.....Elgar

HERALD, JUNE 29,

HAVE FIREWORKS
AT POP CONCERT

you ever see fireworks in Sy y Hall? If the idea interests yo d Fourth of July evening at t and witness them. There will r kyrockets, but there will be fi
s and other spectacles in the int
ions, unprecedented in Pops histo
e exact nature of these surpri
ot be revealed until they unf selves on July 4. However, a le who may be overcome wi sity may investigate the back e
e of Symphony Hall at 10 A.
3, witness numerous packing box properties" being wheeled in, a their own guesses. This will be the night of nights at t
for the male singers of the Bost
phony chorus, 80 in number, w
some fine part songs with orchest
by, the eminent chorister, Steph Townsend, who has been engaged a large chorus in Philadelph
autumn to sing in conjunction wi orchestra of that city. To accon te this multitude of music maker stage will have to be extended
Of course there will be popul
also, all present participating.

GLOBE—JUNE

th Week of "Pops"
at Symphony Hall

nductor Jacchia has arranged fo special nights this week at the s" in Symphony Hall, the events
assigned as follows: Monday, alkowsky Night"; Wednesday, a uest" program, and Friday, July 4.
day concert with a male chorus of gers led by Stephen S. Townsend.
concert will be entirely of Ameri-ompositions and introducing some rise" stunts.
s Theodorowicz will be the solo-morrow evening, playing Tschaiy's Melodie and Scherzo, for violin other selections will include the "Souvoff, Arensky; waltz from ne Onegin," Tschaikowsky; "En-of Raymonda," Glazounoff; over-
"1812" Tschaikowsky; suite, "To
eau," Cui; third movement,
erazade," Rimsk-Korskoff; finale
Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky;
ire, Laidoff; "Kammennoi-Os-
Rubenstein; prelude, Rachman-
"Russian Dance," Tschaikowsky.

POST, JUNE 29.

POPS' CELEBRATION

ly two weeks more remain of the on of Pop Concerts at Symphony
Mr. Jacchia has fashioned three special programmes for this week.
Russian-Tschaikowsky Night, which befall tomorrow, June 30, will prob-be considered by many the finest e entire season, for it will consist ther of music from the great mu-nation—Russia. Wednesday, how-is Request Night, and will necesy bring the most popular pro-me of the season, for Mr. Jacchia tabulated a mountain of letters reting favorite pieces, and has coma programme strictly according
te.
celebration of July Fourth, Friday, and patriotic holiday concert, with le chorus of 80, has been arranged.
old such huge forces a 10-foot ex-on of the Symphony Hall stage will to be constructed. Since the sing-are none other than Stephen S.
nsend's Boston Symphony Chorus, part-singing of the very best may looked for when their director nts the platform to conduct four s with orchestra, besides popular s for encores, all participating.
Townsend has been engaged to train
horus in Philadelphia next autumn, ing in conjunction with the orchesof that city.
very number on this programme will American music. Mr. Jacchia has contended that an all-American s programme is altogether a pos-lity, and he has seized this chance prove his proposition, which indeed only be proved in the trying. There moreover, be spectacular displays he intermissions of this monumental s Night. As to their nature, nothcan be revealed except that they are skyrockets, but more interesting, excessively curious may stand and the back entrance of Symphony ll next Thursday morning and watch nerous packing cases of "properties"
g wheeled in.
he programme follows:

AMERICAN PROGRAMME.

s and Stripes Forever .....Sousa
rture, "Herod" .....Hadley rican Patrol .....Meacham
Stern Old Land .....Bullard
Words by Mrs. C. E. Whiton-Stone)
Battle Hymn of the Republic
Julia Ward Howe
Chorus, Stephen S. Townsend, Conductor.
Star Spangled Banner.
s, "A Day in Venice" .....Nevin Gondoliers, b. Venetian Love Song.
Good Night.
tern Morn (for strings and organ)
Chadwick
lude to Act. III., "Natoma" .....Herbert ongs—
Under Stars and Stripes .....Converse
Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust" ....Gounod le chorus (Stephen S. Townsend, conuctor)—America.
lection, "Robin Hood" .....De Koven
To a Water Lily .....MacDowell
To a Wild Rose
ll We Meet Again .....Whiting
merican Military Fantasy .....Rollinson ow Agide Jacchia, the conductor of Boston Symphony Pop Concerts for ee seasons, happened to compose the tional anthem of Central America, told by the gifted conductor. As mu-al director of the Lombardi Opera mpany, Mr. Jacchia was in Guatela in 1908, at the time of the Pan-merican Congress. The Presidents of five republics of Central America t in assemblage for the purpose of rming the United States of Central erica, but opposition to some of its nciples did not appeal to the Presit of Nicaragua, and the project led. But it was on that occasion t Mr. Jacchia wrote the national an-m which has since been used to cele-ate, on the 15th of each September, anniversary of the independence of ntral America of 1821.

Brilliant Music Season Ahead

Seat Sale for Symphony Concerts Is Booming—Metropolitan Prospects Als o Bright—American Composers Stepping to the Front, Says Olin Downes

Signs are everywhere that there will be a very brilliant musical season next winter. By far the greater part of Symphony Hall is now sold out for the Boston Orchestra's subscription concerts on Friday afternoons, and there are practically no aisle seats left for the Saturday evening concerts. This last fact is very encouraging indeed, since during the four years of the war, and even the two years prior to that, it was seldom, granting the absence of a world-famous soloist from the programme, that one could not buy an aisle seat a half an hour before the concert commenced. The Metropolitan Opera Company of New York is experiencing the same favorable omens of patronage. Mr. Gatti, who recently departed for Europe, to stay there until next September, expects the biggest season in the history of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The New York concerts of the Boston Symphony are entirely subscribed for the season our orchestra gives there. And this, mark you, despite the fact that Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony conductor of next season, was flayed alive by the critics of that city when he conducted a pair of Boston Symphony concerts in that city, prior to the arrival in this country of Mr. Rabaud last fall. This seems to indicate two important and excellent things—the first, that there is a large and constantly growing public in this country deeply appreciative of symphonic music; the second, that whatever the personal popularity of the conductor—and we admire Mr. Monteux very much—the reputation and the quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a better band today than it has been for many a year, is the guarantee to the public of the character of its concerts.

tury brick-a-brack, in the vast spaces of the Metropolitan?

NEW PEACE MARCH PLAYED AT POPS

Hundreds of persons attended last night's performance of the Pops in Symphony Hall and listened to the special program which had been arranged on account of the signing of the peace treaty.

The two outstanding features of the evening were the playing of the "Star Spangled Banner" under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, and the playing for the first time of a new march, "Peace Forever," composed by Albert Sand, clarinet player of the orchestra.

Mr. Sand, who lives at No. 87 Gainsboro street, occupied a table on the floor near the stage, with his wife and eleven-year-old daughter, Regina. At the conclusion of the march, in response to tremendous applause, Mr. Jacchia waved several times in the direction of Mr. Sand, who modestly bowed acknowledgment of the approval of the audience. Mr. Sand said that his inspiration to write the march came when he witnessed the parade of the 26th Division in Boston a few weeks ago. He went home that night impressed by the wonderful spectacle he had seen and the march, worthy of Sousa, was the result. It was played last night by the Symphony Orchestra from manuscript, every part of which was in the original manuscript form as it came from the hand of the composer.

Mr. Sand is a Russian and came to Boston in 1914 from the Charlottenburg Opera House at Berlin, where he played first clarinet. Being a Russian, he was glad to leave Germany when he did, as conditions at that time made him practically a prisoner.

Admirers of the conductor were pleased to note that Mr. Jacchia has completely recovered from his recent illness.

American 6/29

ADVERTISER JUNE 2

SPECIAL NIGHTS
AT POP CONCERTS

Only this week and one more remain of the season of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Conductor Jacchia has made three special programs for this week. The Russian-Tschaikowsky night will come tomorrow. Wednesday is to be Request night, and will necessarily bring the most popular program of the season. To celebrate the Fourth of July a grand patriotic holiday concert, with a male chorus of eighty, led by Stephen S. Townsend, has been arranged. There will be good part songs, with orchestra, and popular encores in which all present will be invited to join.

OSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—JUNE 29,

DR MUCK WILL SOON SAIL AWAY FOR GERMAN SHORES

DR KARL MUCK.

Great Conductor Storm Center of "German Spy" Talk Until He Was Interned

In a few days a ship will sail from one of our ports carrying the man who, more than any other native of the Central Powers, was the storm center of the enemy alien problem in the war. Dr Karl Muck, for eight years the idolized leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but for the past year an inmate of a southern internment camp, will leave, he says forever, the country whose hospitality he abused in true Prussian fashion, according to Secret Service agents.

Of the hundreds of Germans whom the United States Government is sending home to Germany, Dr Muck is undoubtedly the most prominent. After the death of Dr Hugo Munsterberg he was the most widely known German in New England, if not in the country. Until the breaking of the storm which began with the famous "Star Spangled Banner" controversy and ended in his internment, he was one of the most admired.

Dr Muck came to Boston from Berlin, where for 14 years he had been the principal conductor of the Royal Opera. He was a personal friend of the Kaiser and it was said when he first left Berlin that Wilhelm permitted him to go solely because of "the high regard which he had for America."

Was a Great Conductor

That Dr Muck is one of the greatest conductors of the day not even those who felt his treachery to America most keenly will deny. When he came for his first American engagement in 1906, conservative musical critics declared that his arrival brought to America "one of the greatest conductors in Europe, a man who stands in the same class with Mottl, Nikisch, Richter and Weingartner." His career at Symphony Hall supported these opinions.

Dr Muck remained in Boston until 1908, when he was recalled. He was given a tremendous sendoff. Banquets were given in his honor, he was presented loving cups and when he and his wife boarded the train for New York, hundreds of music lovers came to see them off. Four years later he returned, to remain as leader until his arrest for plotting against this country.

The charges against the Symphony conductor, when they were first made, seemed incredible to the majority of music lovers of Boston. Of course it was remembered that Dr Muck was a friend of the Kaiser, that he defended Germany's invasion of Belgium and called the Belgians cruel, but most people put that down to natural loyalty to the land of his birth. It took much evidence to convince his hosts and employer that he had deliberately betrayed them.

The controversy over Muck's refusal to allow the orchestra to play the National anthem in Providence, R I, is too recent to need much mention. True or not, the story created tremendous excitement all through the East. The incident occurred in November, 1917. The orchestra was then on tour and many cities refused to allow it to give concerts. In New York special policemen were sent to prevent a demonstration against the leader. Dr Muck sent in his resignation, which was not accepted. A few days later the orchestra, led by Dr Muck, played the National anthem, which was made a regular part of the program and in a few weeks the trouble was partially forgotten.

Arrested March 25, 1918

Then on March 25, 1918, Dr Muck was arrested by agents of the Department of Justice and taken to Station 16, and later to the East Cambridge Jail. While Muck was arrested under the President's proclamation concerning enemy aliens, it was hinted at the time of his arrest and afterward that other and extremely sensational charges might be preferred.

Dr Muck accepted arrest and confinement quietly, and apparently did not encourage those of his former friends who still believed him innocent, in their efforts for his release. It was said that he preferred internment to facing what the other charges might involve. He did not press his claim to Swiss citizenship because of his father's naturalization in Switzerland when the future leader was 8 years old. In April Dr Muck was sent to the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga, where he remained.

Dr Muck was born at Darmstadt, Bavaria, in 1859. His father was a Government clerk, who intended his son for mercantile life. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt he went to Heidelberg to study philosophy. It was while at the university that he became definitely interested in a musical career. The following year he went to the University of Leipzig, from which institution he received the degree of PhD in 1880.

It was the same year that he made what is generally supposed to have been his first professional appearance, although there is a story that he appeared as a pianist at the age of 11 and played the violin in a symphony orchestra a few years later. In 1880, however, he appeared successfully, but soon afterward gave up playing to become a conductor.

His Career as a Conductor

He was made chorus master of the Municipal Theatre at Zurich the same year. The following year he went to Salzburg, Austria, where he remained for a year and then transferred to Brunn, where he became conductor in the Municipal Opera House. This post he held until 1884, when he went to Gratz for two years, then going to Prague. In the Bohemian capital he was conductor of German opera and philharmonic concerts.

During the six years he held this post he had many important engagements in other cities. He was conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to present for the first time in that country Wagner's "Niebelungen Ring." It was in Prague that he met his future wife. As a "guest conductor" he made his first Berlin appearance at the Lessing Theatre in 1891, where he made such an impression that he was offered the post of conductor at the Royal Opera.

The following year he accepted the offer and soon became principal conductor at the Royal Opera. During the 14 years which followed his appointment he conducted orchestras in every capital in Europe. He appeared often at Beyreuth and conducted many of the royal operas at Covent Garden. With Felix Motte he conducted the philharmonic concerts in Vienna in 1905. The following year he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Traveler JULY 3,

JACCHIA DENIES DEAL IS CLOSED

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops in Symphony Hall, today refuted the statement that he was going to Los Angeles to become leader of the Los Angeles ochestra. He has been negotiating with the Los Angeles people about the matter, but, so far as he knows, he has not been appointed to the post.

The Los Angeles management had asked Mr. Jacchia if he would be able to leave Boston by Sept. 1, making an earlier trip first to help select the musicians. No definite arrangements made, however.

HERALD JULY 4,

CHORAL POP CONCERT

The patriotic Pop concert in Sympheny Hall tonight will be the most festive of the season. Stephen S. Townsend will direct a male chorus of 80 in part songs with orchestra and popular songs, the audience to assist. There will be spectacular fireworks in the intermissions. The following All-American program will be the first which has ever been played at the Pops:—

Stars and Stripes Forever .....Sousa
Overture, "Herod" .....Hadley
American Patrol .....Meacham
O, Stern Old Land .....Bullard
Battle Hymn of the Republic.
(Male chorus with orchestra; Stephen S. Townsend, conductor.)
THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER.
Suite, "A Day in Venice" .....Nevin
Easter Morn (for strings and organ)..Chadwick
Prelude to Act III., "Natoma" .....Herbert
Songs—
(a) Under the Stars and Stripes....Converse
(b) Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust"..Gounod
AMERICA.
Selection, "Robin Hood" .....De Koven
To a Water Lily .....MacDowell
To a Wild Rose .....MacDowell
Till We Meet Again .....Whiting
American Military Fantasy .....Rollinson

TRANSCRIPT, JUNE 28

THE POP CONCERTS

THE Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall on Monday will begin their last week but one. Monday night's programme will be a Russian-Tschaikowsky night. Wednesday will be request night, and to celebrate the Fourth of July, a holiday concert with a male chorus of eighty, led by Stephen S. Townsend, has been arranged. The first three programmes of the week follow:

Monday, Russian Tschaikowsky Night
March, "Souvoroff" .....Arensky
Waltz from "Eugen Onégin" .....Tschaikowsky
Entrance of Raymonda .....Glazounoff
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .....Tschaikowsky
(with organ)
Suite, "To Argenteau" .....Cui
Violin Solos:
(a) Melodie ..... Tschaikowsky
(b) Scherzo ..... Tschaikowsky
(Julius Theodorowicz)
Third movement of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Finale of the Fourth Symphony....Tschaikowsky
Polonaise .....Liadoff
Kamennoi-Ostrow (with organ).....Rubinstein
Prelude .....Rachmaninoff
Russian Dance .....Tschaikowsky

Tuesday
Hungarian March .....Berlioz
Overture, "Light Cavalry" .....Suppé
Orientale .....Cui
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .....Boito
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" .....Wagner
Cello Solo, "Pathos" .....Goldstein
(Georges Miquelle)
Dance of the Camarrists, "Jewels of the Madonna" .....Wolf-Ferrari
Tragic Overture .....Chaloff
Selection, "The Firefly" .....Friml
Meditation from "Thais," solo violin..Massenet
(J. Theodorowicz)
Waltz, "The Sirens" .....Waldteufel
March, "Peace Forever" .....Sand

Wednesday, Request Night
"Pomp and Circumstance" .....Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" .....Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .....Mascagni
Finale of "Scheherazade" .....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Trumpet Solo from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
(Mr. Helm)
Volga Bargemen's Song
(Orchestrated by Mr. Jacchia)
Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde"..Wagner
Ouverture Solenelle, "1812" .....Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ) .....Handel
Serenade .....Schubert-Jacchia
"Invitation to the Waltz" .....Weber-Berlioz

AMERICAN JUNE 28,

POPS PROGRAM FOR
TONIGHT IS VARIED

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Mr. Jacobs will conduct the following program:

Entrance of the Boyards .....Halvorsen
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc" .....Verdi
Berceuse .....Godard
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci" .....Leoncavallo
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .....Grieg
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"...Mascagni
A Petits Pas .....Sudessi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
Selection, "Her Regiment" .....Herbert
Volga Bargemen's Song
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .....Waldteufel
American Patrol .....Meacham

POPS NEARLY OVER

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall are entering upon their last week, but one, under the able leadership of Agide Jacchia. For this week are scheduled three special nights of great public interest. The program for the Russian-Tschaikowsky Night, Monday (June 30), will probably be considered by many the finest of the entire season. Wednesday's program, however, is necessarily the most popular; in that Mr. Jacchia has tabulated a mountain of requests for favorite pieces and compiled a program of those which had the most votes.

To celebrate the Fourth of July (Friday) a grand patriotic holiday concert with a male chorus of eighty, led by Stephen S. Townsend, has been arranged. There will be good part songs (with orchestra) and popular songs (all participating). Mr. Jacchia has long been anxious to prove that a rousing Pops concert of nothing but American music is entirely feasible.

TRAVELER, JUNE 28,

THREE BIG NIGHTS COMING AT POPS

Three big nights feature the programs for the Pops in Symphony Hall next week, the next to the last week of the season. Monday night brings the first of these with a Russian-Tschaikowsky program. Wednesday night comes the annual "Request Program," and Friday night, The Fourth, a "Patriotic" program, with a male chorus of 80 voices participating under the leadership of Stephen Townsend, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chorus.. Friday night's program will be an All-American one, with a number of surprises promised for the intermissions. Tonight's program will be:

Entrance of the Boyards .....Halvorsen
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc" .....Verdi
Berceuse .....Godard
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci" .....Leoncavallo
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .....Grieg
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana"...Mascagni
A Petits Pas .....Sudessi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
Selection, "Her Regiment" .....Herbert
Volga Bargemen's Song.
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .....Waldteufel
American Patrol .....Meacham

TIGHT BINDING

Post June 29.-

148

26.

UCK ED IN NTION

nternmen nvolving man

AGAINST RS' MORALS

h Proof of Violation
Prison

ive story yester-
Dr. Karl Muck's widespread disoston. There has at deal of mystery
case of Dr. Muck
rise to a vast crop
ors concerning the e former leader of chestra.

had an altogether
ust what sent Dr.
on prison.

AL FACTS

the episode in Provir Dr. Muck or the e Symphony Orches-
"The Star Spangled
orchestra programme
eceived any attention
ies. It was a costly uck, for the incident storm ali over the ulted in Washington demands that some-out it.
General then took a sharp and peremptory

al authorities of the stice asking them why one something about upon the investigation
taken up in earnest.

irect Overt Act

was this: Dr. Muck
equent correspondence
Bernstorff and other
He had bought Ger-
was sending money to ably to assist in wag-

wever, no fixed and
at could be laid at his as secured to show that itively sympathetic with direct overt act could

Name Brought In

rse of the investigation, uthorities were assisted
bers of the Symphony
veloped that the name man in the Back Bay
nected with that of Dr.
made frequent trips out
Dr. Muck's company
that he should be arged with a violation of e slave act.
definite evidence of this ncult to get, but enough warrant the indictment chance, a letter from e young woman in ques-
ed. How this letter was nake quite a lively story

n His Choice

as of such a nature that charge of sending scur-
through the mails. Dr.
mptly arrested and told
accept detention as an
go to trial on the charge.
elected to go to a de-
That is why the former der is now in a prison

nda Talk Baseless

was any ground for state-ing the name of Dr. Muck nda to ruin the morals of
The charge against him,
ous enough, concerned his conduct. The stories were hat coupled Dr. Muck's

N JUNE 27,

PROGRAM AT NCERT TONIGHT

will conduct the am at the Pop Con-ny Hall tonight:
of Sheba" ... Weber
ked Ball" ... Delibes
"The Jewels of the ... Wolf-Ferrari
... Lacombe
... Liszt
Rhapsody ... Romberg
"Carmen" ... Bizet
Walldteufel
mance" ... Elgar

ERALD, JUNE 29,

HAVE FIREWORKS
AT POP CONCERT

you ever see fireworks in Sym
y Hall? If the idea interests yo Fourth of July evening at t
and witness them. There will r
kyrockets, but there will be fi
s and other spectacles in the int
ons, unprecedented in Pops histo exact nature of these surpri
ot be revealed until they unf selves on July 4. However, a le who may be overcome w
sity may investigate the back e
e of Symphony Hall at 10 A.
witness numerous packing box
properties" being wheeled in, a
their own guesses. This will be the night of nights at t
for the male singers of the Bost
phony chorus, 80 in number, w
some fine part songs with orchest
y, the eminent chorister, Steph wnsend, who has been engaged
a large chorus in Philadelph
autumn to sing in conjunction wi rchestra of that city. To accon
te this multitude of music maker
tage will have to be extended
Of course there will be popul
also, all present participating.

GLOBE—JUNE

th Week of "Pops"
at Symphony Hall

ductor Jacchia has arranged fo
special nights this week at the
in Symphony Hall, the events
assigned as follows: Monday,
alkowsky Night"; Wednesday, a
est" program, and Friday, July 4, day concert with a male chorus of
gers led by Stephen S. Townsend.
oncert will be entirely of Ameri-mpositions and introducing some ise" stunts.
s Theodorowicz will be the soloorrow evening, playing Tschaiy's Melodie and Scherzo, for violin her selections will include the "Souvoroff, Arensky; waltz from e Onegin," Tschaikowsky; "En-
of Raymonda," Glazounoff; over-1812" Tschaikowsky; suite, "To
eau," Cui; third movement,
erazade," Rimsk-Korskoff; finale
ourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky;
re, Laidoff; "Kammennoi-Os-
Rubenstein; prelude, Rachman-
Russian Dance," Tschaikowsky.

POST, JUNE 29.

POPS' CELEBRATION

Only two weeks more remain of the season of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Mr. Jacchia has fashioned three very special programmes for this week. The Russian-Tschaikowsky Night, which will befall tomorrow, June 30, will probably be considered by many the finest of the entire season, for it will consist altogether of music from the great musical nation—Russia. Wednesday, however, is Request Night, and will necessarily bring the most popular programme of the season, for Mr. Jacchia has tabulated a mountain of letters requesting favorite pieces, and has compiled a programme strictly according to vote.

To celebration of July Fourth, Friday, a grand patriotic holiday concert, with a male chorus of 80, has been arranged. To hold such huge forces a 16-foot extension of the Symphony Hall stage will have to be constructed. Since the singers are none other than Stephen S. Townsend's Boston Symphony Chorus, some part-singing of the very best may be looked for when their director mounts the platform to conduct four songs with orchestra, besides popular songs for encores, all participating. Mr. Townsend has been engaged to train a chorus in Philadelphia next autumn, to sing in conjunction with the orchestra of that city.

Every number on this programme will be American music. Mr. Jacchia has long contended that an all-American programme is altogether a possibility, and he has seized this chance to prove his proposition, which indeed can only be proved in the trying. There will, moreover, be spectacular displays in the intermissions of this monumental Pops Night. As to their nature, nothing can be revealed except that they are not skyrockets, but more interesting. Those excessively curious may stand around the back entrance of Symphony Hall next Thursday morning and watch the numerous packing cases of "properties" being wheeled in.

The programme follows:

AMERICAN PROGRAMME.

Stars and Stripes Forever ... Sousa
Overture, "Herod" ... Hadley
American Patrol ... Meacham
Stern Old Land ... Bullard
Words by Mrs. C. E. Whiton-Stone)
Battle Hymn of the Republic
Julia Ward Howe
Male Chorus, Stephen S. Townsend, Conductor.
Star Spangled Banner.
Suite, "A Day in Venice" ... Nevin
a. Gondoliers. b. Venetian Love Song.
Good Night.
Easter Morn (for strings and organ)
Prelude to Act. III., "Natoma" ... Chadwick
Songs—
Under Stars and Stripes ... Converse
Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust" ... Gounod
The chorus (Stephen S. Townsend, conductor)—America.
Selection, "Robin Hood" ... De Koven
To a Water Lily ... MacDowell
To a Wild Rose ... MacDowell
Till We Meet Again ... Whiting
American Military Fantasy ... Rollinson

Now Agide Jacchia, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Pop Concerts for three seasons, happened to compose the national anthem of Central America, sold by the gifted conductor. As musical director of the Lombardi Opera company, Mr. Jacchia was in Guatemala in 1908, at the time of the Pan-American Congress. The Presidents of the five republics of Central America met in assemblage for the purpose of inviting the United States of Central America, but opposition to some of its principles did not appeal to the President of Nicaragua, and the project failed. But it was on that occasion that Mr. Jacchia wrote the national anthem which has since been used to celebrate, on the 15th of each September, the anniversary of the independence of Central America of 1821.

Brilliant Music Season Ahead

Seat Sale for Symphony Concerts Is Booming—Metropolitan Prospects Als o Bright—American Composers Stepping to the Front, Says Olin Downes

Signs are everywhere that there will be a very brilliant musical season next winter. By far the greater part of Symphony Hall is now sold out for the Boston Orchestra's subscription concerts on Friday afternoons, and there are practically no aisle seats left for the Saturday evening concerts. This last fact is very encouraging indeed, since during the four years of the war, and even the two years prior to that, it was seldom, granting the absence of a world-famous soloist from the programme, that one could not buy an aisle seat a half an hour before the concert commenced. The Metropolitan Opera Company of New York is experiencing the same favorable omens of patronage. Mr. Gatti, who recently departed for Europe, to stay there until next September, expects the biggest season in the history of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The New York concerts of the Boston Symphony are entirely subscribed for the season our orchestra gives there. And this, mark you, despite the fact that Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony conductor of next season, was flayed alive by the critics of that city when he conducted a pair of Boston Symphony concerts in that city, prior to the arrival in this country of Mr. Rabaud last fall. This seems to indicate two important and excellent things—the first, that there is a large and constantly growing public in this country deeply appreciative of symphonic music; the second, that whatever the personal popularity of the conductor and we admire Mr. Monteux very much—the reputation and the quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a better band today than it has been for many a year, is the guarantee to the public of the character of its concerts.

tury brick-a-brack, in the vast spaces of the Metropolitan?

NEW PEACE MARCH PLAYED AT POPS

Hundreds of persons attended last night's performance of the Pops in Symphony Hall and listened to the special program which had been arranged on account of the signing of the peace treaty.

The two outstanding features of the evening were the playing of the "Star Spangled Banner" under the leadership of Agide Jacchia, and the playing for the first time of a new march, "Peace Forever," composed by Albert Sand, clarinet player of the orchestra.

Mr. Sand, who lives at No. 87 Gainsboro street, occupied a table on the floor near the stage, with his wife and eleven-year-old daughter, Regina. At the conclusion of the march, in response to tremendous applause, Mr. Jacchia waved several times in the direction of Mr. Sand, who modestly bowed acknowledgment of the approval of the audience. Mr. Sand said that his inspiration to write the march came when he witnessed the parade of the 26th Division in Boston a few weeks ago. He went home that night impressed by the wonderful spectacle he had seen and the march, worthy of Sousa, was the result. It was played last night by the Symphony Orchestra from manuscript, every part of which was in the original manuscript form as it came from the hand of the composer.

Mr. Sand is a Russian and came to Boston in 1914 from the Charlottenburg Opera House at Berlin, where he played first clarinet. Being a Russian, he was glad to leave Germany when he did, as conditions at that time made him practically a prisoner.

Admirers of the conductor were pleased to note that Mr. Jacchia has completely recovered from his recent illness.

Correct 6/29

ADVERTISER JUNE 2

SPECIAL NIGHTS
AT POP CONCERTS

Only this week and one more remain of the season of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Conductor Jacchia has made three special programs for this week. The Russian-Tschaikowsky night will come tomorrow. Wednesday is to be Request night, and will necessarily bring the most popular program of the season. To celebrate the Fourth of July a grand patriotic holiday concert, with a male chorus of eighty, led by Stephen S. Townsend, has been arranged. There will be good part songs, with orchestra, and popular encores in which all present will be invited to join.

OSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—JUNE 29,

DR MUCK WILL SOON SAIL AWAY FOR GERMAN SHORES

DR KARL MUCK.

Great Conductor Storm Center of "German Spy" Talk Until He Was Interned

In a few days a ship will sail from one of our ports carrying the man who, more than any other native of the Central Powers, was the storm center of the enemy alien problem in the war. Dr Karl Muck, for eight years the idolized leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but for the past year an inmate of a southern internment camp, will leave, he says forever, the country whose hospitality he abused in true Prussian fashion, according to Secret Service agents.

Of the hundreds of Germans whom the United States Government is sending home to Germany, Dr Muck is undoubtedly the most prominent. After the death of Dr Hugo Munsterberg he was the most widely known German in New England, if not in the country. Until the breaking of the storm which began with the famous "Star Spangled Banner" controversy and ended in his internment, he was one of the most admired.

Dr Muck came to Boston from Berlin, where for 14 years he had been the principal conductor of the Royal Opera. He was a personal friend of the Kaiser and it was said when he first left Berlin that Wilhelm permitted him to go solely because of "the high regard which he had for America."

Was a Great Conductor

That Dr Muck is one of the greatest conductors of the day not even those who felt his treachery to America most keenly will deny. When he came for his first American engagement in 1906, conservative musical critics declared that his arrival brought to America "one of the greatest conductors in Europe, a man who stands in the same class with Mottl, Nikisch, Richter and Weingartner." His career at Symphony Hall supported these opinions.

Dr Muck remained in Boston until 1908, when he was recalled. He was given a tremendous sendoff. Banquets were given in his honor, he was presented loving cups and when he and his wife boarded the train for New York, hundreds of music lovers came to see them off. Four years later he returned, to remain as leader until his arrest for plotting against this country.

The charges against the Symphony conductor, when they were first made, seemed incredible to the majority of music lovers of Boston. Of course it was remembered that Dr Muck was a friend of the Kaiser, that he defended Germany's invasion of Belgium and called the Belgians cruel, but most people put that down to natural loyalty to the land of his birth. It took much evidence to convince his hosts and employer that he had deliberately betrayed them.

The controversy over Muck's refusal to allow the orchestra to play the National anthem in Providence, R I, is too recent to need much mention. True or not, the story created tremendous excitement all through the East. The incident occurred in November, 1917. The orchestra was then on tour and many cities refused to allow it to give concerts. In New York special policemen were sent to prevent a demonstration against the leader. Dr Muck sent in his resignation, which was not accepted. A few days later the orchestra, led by Dr Muck, played the National anthem, which was made a regular part of the program and in a few weeks the trouble was partially forgotten.

Arrested March 25, 1918

Then on March 25, 1918, Dr Muck was arrested by agents of the Department of Justice and taken to Station 16, and later to the East Cambridge Jail. While Muck was arrested under the President's proclamation concerning enemy aliens, it was hinted at the time of his arrest and afterward that other and extremely sensational charges might be preferred.

Dr Muck accepted arrest and confinement quietly, and apparently did not encourage those of his former friends who still believed him innocent, in their efforts for his release. It was said that he preferred internment to facing what the other charges might involve. He did not press his claim to Swiss citizenship because of his father's naturalization in Switzerland when the future leader was 8 years old. In April Dr Muck was sent to the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga, where he remained.

Dr Muck was born at Darmstadt, Bavaria, in 1859. His father was a Government clerk, who intended his son for mercantile life. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt he went to Heidelberg to study philosophy. It was while at the university that he became definitely interested in a musical career. The following year he went to the University of Leipzig, from which institution he received the degree of PhD in 1880.

It was the same year that he made what is generally supposed to have been his first professional appearance, although there is a story that he appeared as a pianist at the age of 11 and played the violin in a symphony orchestra a few years later. In 1880, however, he appeared successfully, but soon afterward gave up playing to become a conductor.

His Career as a Conductor

He was made chorus master of the Municipal Theatre at Zurich the same year. The following year he went to Salzburg, Austria, where he remained for a year and then transferred to Brunn, where he became conductor in the Municipal Opera House. This post he held until 1884, when he went to Gratz for two years, then going to Prague. In the Bohemian capital he was conductor of German opera and philharmonic concerts.

During the six years he held this post he had many important engagements in other cities. He was conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to present for the first time in that country Wagner's "Niebelungen Ring." It was in Prague that he met his future wife. As a "guest conductor" he made his first Berlin appearance at the Lessing Theatre in 1891, where he made such an impression that he was offered the post of conductor at the Royal Opera.

The following year he accepted the offer and soon became principal conductor at the Royal Opera. During the 14 years which followed his appointment he conducted orchestras in every capital in Europe. He appeared often at Beyreuth and conducted many of the royal operas at Covent Garden. With Felix Motte he conducted the philharmonic concerts in Vienna in 1905. The following year he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JULY 3, HERALD JULY 4,

JACCHIA DENIES DEAL IS CLOSED

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops in Symphony Hall, today refuted the statement that he was going to Los Angeles to become leader of the Los Angeles ochestra. He has been negotiating with the Los Angeles people about the matter, but, so far as he knows, he has not been appointed to the post.

The Los Angeles management had asked Mr. Jacchia if he would be able to leave Boston by Sept. 1, making an earlier trip first to help select the musicians. No definite arrangements made, however.

CHORAL POP CONCERT

The patriotic Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be the most festive of the season. Stephen S. Townsend will direct a male chorus of 80 in part songs with orchestra and popular songs, the audience to assist. There will be spectacular fireworks in the intermissions. The following All-American program will be the first which has ever been played at the Pops:—

Stars and Stripes Forever ... Sousa
Overture, "Herod" ... Hadley
American Patrol ... Meacham
O, Stern Old Land ... Bullard
Battle Hymn of the Republic.
(Male chorus with orchestra; Stephen S. Townsend, conductor.)
THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER.
Suite, "A Day in Venice" ... Nevin
Easter Morn (for strings and organ) .. Chadwick
Prelude to Act III., "Natoma" ... Herbert
Songs—
(a) Under the Stars and Stripes .... Converse
(b) Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust" .. Gounod
AMERICA.
Selection, "Robin Hood" ... De Koven
To a Water Lily ... MacDowell
To a Wild Rose ... MacDowell
Till We Meet Again ... Whiting
American Military Fantasy ... Rollinson

TRANSCRIPT, JUNE 28

THE POP CONCERTS

THE Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall on Monday will begin their last week but one. Monday night's programme will be a Russian-Tschaikowsky night. Wednesday will be request night, and to celebrate the Fourth of July, a holiday concert with a male chorus of eighty, led by Stephen S. Townsend, has been arranged. The first three programmes of the week follow:

Monday, Russian Tschaikowsky Night

March, "Souvoroff" ... Arensky
Waltz from "Eugen Onégin" ... Tschaikowsky
Entrance of Raymonda ... Glazounoff
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ... Tschaikowsky
(with organ)
Suite, "To Argenteau" ... Cui
Violin Solos:
(a) Melodie ... Tschaikowsky
(b) Scherzo ... Tschaikowsky
(Julius Theodorowicz)
Third movement of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Finale of the Fourth Symphony .... Tschaikowsky
Polonaise ... Lladoff
Kamennoi-Ostrow (with organ) ... Rubinstein
Prelude ... Rachmaninoff
Russian Dance ... Tschaikowsky

Tuesday

Hungarian March ... Berlioz
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ... Suppé
Orientale ... Cui
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" ... Boito
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ... Wagner
Cello Solo, "Pathos" ... Goldstein
(Georges Miquelle)
Dance of the Camarrists, "Jewels of the Madonna" ... Wolf-Ferrari
Tragic Overture ... Chaloff
Selection, "The Firefly" ... Friml
Meditation from "Thais," solo violin .. Massenet
(J. Theodorowicz)
Waltz, "The Sirens" ... Waldteufel
March, "Peace Forever" ... Sand

Wednesday, Request Night

"Pomp and Circumstance" ... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ... Rossini
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Finale of "Scheherazade" ... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Trumpet Solo from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
(Mr. Helm)
Volga Bargemen's Song
(Orchestrated by Mr. Jacchia)
Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" .. Wagner
Overture Solenelle, "1812" ... Tschaikowsky
Largo (with organ) ... Handel
Serenade ... Schubert-Jacchia
"Invitation to the Waltz" ... Weber-Berlioz

AMERICAN JUNE 28,

POPS PROGRAM FOR
TONIGHT IS VARIED

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Mr. Jacobs will conduct the following program:

Entrance of the Boyards ... Halvorsen
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc" ... Verdi
Berceuse ... Godard
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci" ... Leoncavallo
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ... Grieg
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
A Petits Pas ... Sudessi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
Selection, "Her Regiment" ... Herbert
Volga Bargemen's Song
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ... Waldteufel
American Patrol ... Meacham

POPS NEARLY OVER

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall are entering upon their last week, but one, under the able leadership of Agide Jacchia. For this week are scheduled three special nights of great public interest. The program for the Russian-Tschaikowsky Night, Monday (June 30), will probably be considered by many the finest of the entire season. Wednesday's program, however, is necessarily the most popular; in that Mr. Jacchia has tabulated a mountain of requests for favorite pieces and compiled a program of those which had the most votes.

To celebrate the Fourth of July (Friday) a grand patriotic holiday concert with a male chorus of eighty, led by Stephen S. Townsend, has been arranged. There will be good part songs (with orchestra) and popular songs (all participating). Mr. Jacchia has long been anxious to prove that a rousing Pops concert of nothing but American music is entirely feasible.

TRAVELER, JUNE 28,

THREE BIG NIGHTS COMING AT POPS

Three big nights feature the programs for the Pops in Symphony Hall next week, the next to the last week of the season. Monday night brings the first of these with a Russian-Tschaikowsky program. Wednesday night comes the annual "Request Program," and Friday night, The Fourth, a "Patriotic" program, with a male chorus of 80 voices participating under the leadership of Stephen Townsend, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chorus. Friday night's program will be an All-American one, with a number of surprises promised for the intermissions. Tonight's program will be:

Entrance of the Boyards ... Halvorsen
Overture, "Jeanne d'Arc" ... Verdi
Berceuse ... Godard
Fantasia, "I Pagliacci" ... Leoncavallo
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ... Grieg
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
A Petits Pas ... Sudessi
Third Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
Selection, "Her Regiment" ... Herbert
Volga Bargemen's Song.
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ... Waldteufel
American Patrol ... Meacham

POST JULY 5,

THRIFT NIGHT AT THE POPS

Special Program Pleases Big Audience

Last night will go down in the history of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall as one of the liveliest, gayest, rip-roaring concerts ever staged in this famous hall. It was "Thrift Night" and was held to propagate the idea of thrift and stimulate the habits of saving through the purchase of thrift and war savings stamps.

From start to finish features never before staged in this hall kept the hundreds of people present on the edge of their seats. Headline attractions were balloon ascensions and the explosion of probably the largest firecracker exploded in Boston over the Fourth. It was eight feet high and two and one-half feet in diameter.

Thrift stamps were sold by the waiters and from booths erected for this purpose. Miss Alice Horan, a Watertwon young woman, took a prominent part in the main feature—the explosion of the giant firecracker. Clad in a costume to represent the Statue of Liberty, Miss Horan stepped forth from the giant cracker at the time of the explosion, mystifying those present.

AMERICAN JULY 5,

NEXT WEEK ENDS POPS

Six more nights remain of one of the most successful seasons of Pop Concerts in the long history of the famous Bostonian institution. It was at first feared that alcohol would be missed, but the number of bottles emptied this year exceeded the total drinks of the last "hard" season by a thousand cases. Agide Jacchia has won the admiration and affection of Pop-goers as perhaps no other Pops conductor.

For Monday night, July 7, a program consisting entirely of ballet and other dance music assembles a varied program of some of the best liked music in the Pops repertory. Tuesday, July 8, will bring Italian-Verdi Night, at which Mr. Jacchia, very much in his own element, could scarcely be heard to better advantage. The Closing Night on Saturday, July 12, with music combining brilliance and popularity, may be counted upon as one of the biggest of the entire season.

The programs of the week follow:

SATURDAY, JULY 12.
Closing night.
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Clarinet solo: Rigoletto Fantasia...Verdi-Bossi
Mr. Albert Sand.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas

149

AMERICAN JULY 5,

GOOD PROGRAM AT POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be conducted by Mr. Jacchia at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege de Bacchus.....Delibes
Overture in C.....Foroni
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Manon".....Massenet
Ballet music from "The Queen of Sheba" Goldmark
Violin solo, "Havanaise".....Saint-Saens
(Mr. Julius Theodorowicz)
Children at Play.....Van Westerhout
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Sindbad".....Romberg
Ave Maria from "Othello".....Verdi
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".....Waldteufel
March from "Tannhauser".....Wagner

ADVERTISER, JULY 6

LAST WEEK OF POPS.

The closing week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall is at hand. The largest ten weeks in the thirty four seasons of Pops history must be attributed first of all to the conducting of Agide Jacchia. The large and fine orchestra has ably responded to his leadership. The absence of alcohol seems to have been no deterrent. More soft drinks have been consumed this season than soft and hard drinks combined in the preceding one. For tomorrow night a program of ballet and other dance music. Tuesday will bring Italian-Verdi Night.

TRANSCRIPT JULY 5,

THE POP CONCERTS

SIX more nights remain of the Pop Concert season in Symphony Hall. On Monday night the programme will consist entirely of ballet and other dance music, and Tuesday will be Italian-Verdi Night. The programmes of the first half of the week are:

MONDAY—Programme of Dance and Ballet Music
Polonaise from "Eugen Enégin"...Tschaikowsky
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Suite, "Nutcracker" (Danse Russe, Danse des Mirlitons, Valse des Fleurs), Tschaikowsky
Finale of "Scheherazade" (The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion).....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark
(Solo 'cello, Mr. Georges Miquelle)
Aragonaise from "The Cid".....Massenet
Dance of the Hours, from "La Giaconda," Ponchielli
Ball at the Capulets, from "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet

TUESDAY—Italian-Verdi Night
March "Venezia".....Fabiani
Overture in C minor.....Foroni
Pastorale (for wood-wind octet); Capriccio for strings.....Scarlatta (1685-1757)
(Arranged by Mr. Jacchia)
Fantasia 'La Tosca".....Puccini
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" (1851); Overture to "I Vespri Siciliani" (1855); Prelude to "Aida" (1871); Fantasia, "Othello" (1887).....Giuseppi Verdi (1813-1901)
Rhapsody "Italia".....Casella
Intermezzo "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Serenade, "Among the Flowers".....Mascheroni
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli

WEDNESDAY
French Military March.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
"Love's Dream After the Ball".....Czibulka
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
"The Marionettes".....Lacombe
Flute Solo: Andante, Scherzo.....Ganne
(Mr. Charles De Mailly. Accompanist, Mme. Charles De Mailly)
Ouverture Solonelle, "1812" (with organ), Tschaikowsky
Selection "Naughty Marietta".....Herbert
Adagio for Orchestra.....Clifton
Impromptu, Op. 90 No. 2.....Schubert-Jacchia
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

GLOBE—JULY 6,

Closing Week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall

The closing week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow evening with a program consisting of ballet and other dance music. In the selection from Goldmark's "Queen of Saba," the solo cellist will be Mr Miquelle.

Conductor Jacchia has arranged the following program: Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; ballet music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; suite, "Nutcracker," Tschaikowsky; finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; ballet music from "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark; aragonaise from "The Cid," Massenet; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; ball music from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; minuet, Bolzoni; waltz, "Blue Danube," Strauss; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet.

HERALD, JULY 6

LAST WEEK OF POPS SEASON

The closing week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall is at hand. The largest 10 weeks in the 34 seasons of Pops history must be attributed first to all to the inspired conducting, the programs, and the personality of Agide Jacchia, whose following of Pop goers increases yearly. The large and fine orchestra has ably responded to his leadership. The absence of alcohol seems to have been no deterrent—a much larger quantity of soft drinks has been consumed this season than "soft" or hard drinks combined in the preceding one.

For tomorrow night, a program consisting entirely of ballet and other dance music assembles a varied program of some of the best-liked music in the Pops repertory. Tuesday will bring Italian-Verdi night, at which Mr. Jacchia, very much in his own element, could scarcely be heard to better advantage. The closing night, on Saturday, with music combining brilliance and popularity, may be counted upon as one of the biggest of the entire season.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JULY 7.
Program of dance and ballet music.
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin...Tschaikowsky
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
(a) Danse Russe. (b) Danse des Mirlitons. (c) Danse des Fleurs.
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba" Goldmark
(Solo 'cello: Mr. Georges Miquelle)
Aragonaise from "The Cid".....Massenet
Danse of the Hours from "La Gioconda". Ponchielli
Ball at the Capulets from "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube... Strauss
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet

TUESDAY, JULY 8.
Italian-Verdi Night.
March, "Venezia".....Fabiani
Overture in C minor.....Foroni
(a) Pastoralle for wood-wind octet. Scarlatti
(b) Capriccia for strings.....1685-1757
(Arranged by Mr. Jacchia.)
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" (1851)
Overture to "I Vespri Siciliani (1855)
1813-1901 Giuseppi Verdi
Fantasia, "Othello" (1887)
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Serenade, "Among the Flowers"...Mascheroni
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli

WEDNESDAY, JULY 9.
French Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Verdi
The Marionettes.....Enesco
Flute solo: Andante-Scherzo.....Lacombe
Mr. Charles De Mailly. Accompanist, Mme. Charles De Mailly.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tschaikowsky
(With organ.)
Selection, "Naughty Marietta".....Herbert
Adagio for orchestra.....Clifton
Impromptu op. 90, No. 2.....Schubert-Jacchia
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

THURSDAY, JULY 10.
Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Aubade Printaniere.....Lacombe
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna"... Wolf-Ferrari
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Trumpet solo, "Echoes from Switzerland" Hoch-Heim
Mr. Gustav Heim.
Scherzo, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Katinka".....Friml
"Largo" (with organ).....Handel
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Polish Dance.....Scharwenka

FRIDAY, JULY 11.
Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Serenato.....Tarenghi
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"... Saint-Saens
En Sourdine.....Tekam
'Cello solo: Hungarian Rhapsody.....Popper
Mr. Georges Miquelle.
Slavic March.....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".....Herbert
Letter of Manon.....Gillet
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"... Strauss
Dance of the Camorristi from "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari

POST, JULY 6.

"GOOD" MUSIC IS POPULAR

"Pop" Concerts Are Proving That Public Taste Is Much Better Than It Is Commonly Supposed to Be —Young Americans Are Succeeding in Opera

An interesting thing is being gradually accomplished at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, which come to an end next Saturday night. The public which doesn't know, as it says, anything about music, but does know what it likes, is discovering rather to its astonishment that it enjoys what is called "good" music (as if there were any real music, whether it were a waltz or a symphony, deserving of any lesser adjective) very much, or, rather, it hasn't even yet made this discovery in a definite way. It goes with greater and greater frequency and in greater number to the Pop concerts. It is given "good" music, frequently of a very serious kind, in sugar coated pills and without being told what the pills contain. The orchestra, which has been gradually increased in numbers as the season went by and the public patronage increased, is now a band capable of playing almost anything in the orchestral repertory which the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts hear in the winter time. The public hears a piece of music, such as the brilliant and fantastical music of the suite, "Scheherazade," which Rimsky-Korsakoff was inspired to write after tales of the Arabian Nights. It finds the music full of color and "go" and not as hackneyed as the music played at cabarets, and Mr. Jacchia, who plays this music again tomorrow night, makes it a frequently recurrent feature of his programmes.

The overture to "Tannhauser," the prelude to "Lohengrin" are old stories to this audience. It even listens with curiosity and pleasure to the prelude from "Tristan." Tomorrow night the music of the "Ball at the House of the Capulets," from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony will be played. On Tuesday night there will be music by the old Italian of the 18th century, Scarlatti, and by the ultra-modern young Italian, Casella, in addition to more popular waltzes, marches, and the like. On Wednesday night one of the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco will figure on the programme. And so forth, including excerpts from practically all of the popular grand operas. The one composition is applauded fully as popularly as the other.

This illumines a question of public education. Conversations with a score of people in this "cultivated" city of Boston, people who frequently and with avidity go to the Pop concerts and listen to the music, show that a great many in this commonwealth are still afraid of the Symphony concerts of the winter. They are afraid for two reasons. One is the seriousness with which these concerts are mentioned and reviewed by the press, and the second is a mistaken idea which still lurks in the minds of the great public about the cost of the subscription Symphony concerts of the winter. There is the illusion in many quarters that Symphony concerts are given on the financial scale of grand opera, but without the patron getting as much of show, flare and publicity for his money.

Now there has been no season in the past twenty years when anyone who wanted to attend all of the Boston Symphony concerts could not do so by purchasing a ticket for the whole twenty-four concerts of the season for the price of $15.00. There are seats which go cheaper. But $15.00 is a safe minimum price for a seat where one can hear well and see well, if not from a front row. There are no seats where it is at all difficult to get the finest effects of the orchestra or where the full brilliance of a fortissimo will not be felt.

From the great soloists who are in America during the season a limited number are engaged to play at these concerts. Some concerts are given without soloists at all, and the experience of every hearer of a few seasons agrees that when all is said and done no soloist is so great and so interesting as the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the wonderful music which it takes such an orchestra to play. But for those who want "personalities" at public entertainments, violinists of the quality and reputation of Heifetz, and pianists such as Paderewski—in the past—Gabrilowitch, Bauer, any one of the most popular pianistic figures of the day, regularly appear. Let us say that 24 concerts cost on the average of from $15.00 or a little less, to $60.00 or a little more for the very best seats. In the one case the cost to the patron per concert is about sixty cents, and in the other less than $3.00. For these prices one hears one of the finest orchestras in existence, under a distinguished conductor, playing all of the best orchestral music, some of which can only be performed by an orchestra of the technical capacity of the Boston Symphony, and a number of the best soloists of the season. Much of the music heard at the Pop concerts also goes on the programmes, and this music is played better at the subscription concerts of the winter than it is in the summer time, because of the exhaustive rehearsals held four days of each week in Symphony Hall. More good music is frequently played in one programme of the type given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the winter time than may be heard in several performances of certain operas, for many an opera which is accepted at least for a few seasons and applauded makes its success because of a sensational plot, gorgeous costumes, scenery of an unusual quality, or for a hundred other reasons which have not to do with the intrinsic melodic value of the music. Whereas the music which endures in the orchestral repertory must have substance and interest to continue there for any length of time.

These things have been said before, but all the saying in the world will not supply the place of demonstration and experience. Demonstrating the interest and beauty of orchestral music is the thing which the Pop concerts are doing in Boston. They have been doing this with particular effectiveness under Mr. Jacchia, because of the spirited conducting and his zeal to make his hearers enjoy music which he enjoys himself. His success of this season is therefore the success which is of the kind particularly appropriate and needful for these concerts, and a further testimony to his grip of his public.

POST JULY 5,

THRIFT NIGHT AT THE POPS

Special Program Pleases Big Audience

Last night will go down in the history of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall as one of the liveliest, gayest, rip-roaring concerts ever staged in this famous hall. It was "Thrift Night" and was held to propagate the idea of thrift and stimulate the habits of saving through the purchase of thrift and war savings stamps.

From start to finish features never before staged in this hall kept the hundreds of people present on the edge of their seats. Headline attractions were balloon ascensions and the explosion of probably the largest firecracker exploded in Boston over the Fourth. It was eight feet high and two and one-half feet in diameter.

Thrift stamps were sold by the waiters and from booths erected for this purpose. Miss Alice Horan, a Watertwon young woman, took a prominent part in the main feature—the explosion of the giant firecracker. Clad in a costume to represent the Statue of Liberty, Miss Horan stepped forth from the giant cracker at the time of the explosion, mystifying those present.

GOOD PROGRAM AT POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be conducted by Mr. Jacchia at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege de Bacchus.....Delibes
Overture in C.....Foroni
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Manon".....Massenet
Ballet music from "The Queen of Sheba" Goldmark
Violin solo, "Havanaise".....Saint-Saens
(Mr. Julius Theodorowicz)
Children at Play.....Van Westerhout
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Sindbad".....Romberg
Ave Maria from "Othello".....Verdi
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".....Waldteufel
March from "Tannhauser".....Wagner

TRANSCRIPT JULY 5,

THE POP CONCERTS

SIX more nights remain of the Pop Concert season in Symphony Hall. On Monday night the programme will consist entirely of ballet and other dance music, and Tuesday will be Italian-Verdi Night. The programmes of the first half of the week are:

MONDAY—Programme of Dance and Ballet Music

Polonaise from "Eugen Enégin"...Tschaikowski
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Suite, "Nutcracker" (Danse Russe, Danse des Mirlitons, Valse des Fleurs), Tschaikowski
Finale of "Scheherazade" (The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion) .....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark
(Solo 'cello, Mr. Georges Miquelle)
Aragonaise from "The Cid".....Massenet
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
Ball at the Capulets, from "Romeo and Juliet" .....Berlioz
Minuet .....Bolzoni
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet

TUESDAY—Italian-Verdi Night

March "Venezia".....Fabiani
Overture in C minor.....Foroni
Pastorale (for wood-wind octet); Capriccio for strings.....Scarlatta (1685-1757)
(Arranged by Mr. Jacchia)
Fantasia 'La Tosca".....Puccini
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" (1851); Overture to "I Vespri Siciliani" (1855); Prelude to "Aida" (1871); Fantasia, "Othello" (1887) .....Giuseppi Verdi (1813-1901)
Rhapsody "Italia".....Casella
Intermezzo "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Serenade, "Among the Flowers"....Mascheroni
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli

WEDNESDAY

French Military March.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
"Love's Dream After the Ball".....Czibulka
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
"The Marionettes".....Lacombe
Flute Solo: Andante, Scherzo.....Ganne
(Mr. Charles De Mailly. Accompanist, Mme. Charles De Mailly)
Ouverture Solonelle, "1812" (with organ), Tschaikowski
Selection "Naughty Marietta".....Herbert
Adagio for Orchestra.....Clifton
Impromptu, Op. 90 No. 2.....Schubert-Jacchia
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

GLOBE—JULY 6,

Closing Week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall

The closing week of the "Pops" at Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow evening with a program consisting of ballet and other dance music. In the selection from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," the solo cellist will be Mr Miquelle.

Conductor Jacchia has arranged the following program: Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; ballet music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; suite, "Nutcracker," Tschaikowsky; finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; ballet music from "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark; aragonaise from "The Cid," Massenet; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; ball music from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; minuet, Bolzoni; waltz, "Blue Danube," Strauss; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet.

AMERICAN JULY 5,

NEXT WEEK ENDS POPS

Six more nights remain of one of the most successful seasons of Pop Concerts in the long history of the famous Bostonian institution. It was at first feared that alcohol would be missed, but the number of bottles emptied this year exceeded the total drinks of the last "hard" season by a thousand cases. Agide Jacchia has won the admiration and affection of Pop-goers as perhaps no other Pops conductor.

For Monday night, July 7, a program consisting entirely of ballet and other dance music assembles a varied program of some of the best liked music in the Pops repertory. Tuesday, July 8, will bring Italian-Verdi Night, at which Mr. Jacchia, very much in his own element, could scarcely be heard to better advantage. The Closing Night on Saturday, July 12, with music combining brilliance and popularity, may be counted upon as one of the biggest of the entire season.

The programs of the week follow:

ADVERTISER, JULY 6,

LAST WEEK OF POPS.

The closing week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall is at hand. The largest ten weeks in the thirty four seasons of Pops history must be attributed first of all to the conducting of Agide Jacchia. The large and fine orchestra has ably responded to his leadership. The absence of alcohol seems to have been no deterrent. More soft drinks have been consumed this season than soft and hard drinks combined in the preceding one. For tomorrow night a program of ballet and other dance music. Tuesday will bring Italian-Verdi Night.

HERALD, JULY 6

LAST WEEK OF POPS SEASON

The closing week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall is at hand. The largest 10 weeks in the 34 seasons of Pops history must be attributed first to all to the inspired conducting, the programs, and the personality of Agide Jacchia, whose following of Pop goers increases yearly. The large and fine orchestra has ably responded to his leadership. The absence of alcohol seems to have been no deterrent—a much larger quantity of soft drinks has been consumed this season than "soft" or hard drinks combined in the preceding one.

For tomorrow night, a program consisting entirely of ballet and other dance music assembles a varied program of some of the best-liked music in the Pops repertory. Tuesday will bring Italian-Verdi night, at which Mr. Jacchia, very much in his own element, could scarcely be heard to better advantage. The closing night, on Saturday, with music combining brilliance and popularity, may be counted upon as one of the biggest of the entire season.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, JULY 7.
Program of dance and ballet music.

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin...Tschaikowsky
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tschaikowsky
(a) Danse Russe. (b) Danse des Mirlitons. (c) Danse des Fleurs.
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.
Ballet Music from "The Queen of Sheba" Goldmark
(Solo 'cello: Mr. Georges Miquelle)
Aragonaise from "The Cid".....Massenet
Danse of the Hours from "La Gioconda". Ponchielli
Ball at the Capulets from "Romeo and Juliet" .....Berlioz
Minuet .....Bolzoni
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube.. Strauss
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet

TUESDAY, JULY 8.
Italian-Verdi Night.

March, "Venezia".....Fabiani
Overture in C minor.....Foroni
(a) Pastoralle for wood-wind octet. Scarlatti
(b) Capriccia for strings.....1685-1757
(Arranged by Mr. Jacchia.)
Fantasia, "La Tosca".....Puccini
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" (1851).
Overture to "I Vespri Siciliani (1855)
1813-1901 Giuseppi Verdi
Fantasia, "Othello" (1887)
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Serenade, "Among the Flowers"...Mascheroni
Ballet Music from "La Gioconda"...Ponchielli

WEDNESDAY, JULY 9.

French Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Love's Dream After the Ball.....Czibulka
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
The Marionettes.....Lacombe
Flute solo: Andante-Scherzo.....Ganne
Mr. Charles De Mailly. Accompanist, Mme. Charles De Mailly.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tschaikowsky
(With organ.)
Selection, "Naughty Marietta".....Herbert
Adagio for orchestra.....Clifton
Impromptu op. 90, No. 2.....Schubert-Jacchia
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

THURSDAY, JULY 10.

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Aubade Printaniere.....Lacombe
Fantasia, "The Jewels of the Madonna".. Wolf-Ferrari
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Trumpet solo, "Echoes from Switzerland" Hoch-Heim
Mr. Gustav Heim.
Scherzo. "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Katinka".....Friml
"Largo" (with organ).....Handel
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Palish Dance.....Scharwenka

FRIDAY, JULY 11.

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Serenato .....Tarenghi
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".. Saint-Saens
En Sourdine.....Telham
'Cello solo: Hungarian Rhapsody.....Popper
Mr. Georges Miquelle.
Slavic March.....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".....Herbert
Letter of Manon.....Gillet
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".. Strauss
Dance of the Camorrists from "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari

SATURDAY, JULY 12.
Closing night.

Comp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Largo (with organ).....Handel
Clarinet solo: Rigoletto Fantasia...Verdi-Bossi
Mr. Albert Sand.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas

149

POST, JULY 6,

"GOOD" MUSIC IS POPULAR

"Pop" Concerts Are Proving That Public Taste Is Much Better Than It Is Commonly Supposed to Be —Young Americans Are Succeeding in Opera

An interesting thing is being gradually accomplished at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, which come to an end next Saturday night. The public which doesn't know, as it says, anything about music, but does know what it likes, is discovering rather to its astonishment that it enjoys what is called "good" music (as if there were any real music, whether it were a waltz or a symphony, deserving of any lesser adjective) very much, or, rather, it hasn't even yet made this discovery in a definite way. It goes with greater and greater frequency and in greater number to the Pop concerts. It is given "good" music, frequently of a very serious kind, in sugar coated pills and without being told what the pills contain. The orchestra, which has been gradually increased in numbers as the season went by and the public patronage increased, is now a band capable of playing almost anything in the orchestral repertory which the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts hear in the winter time. The public hears a piece of music, such as the brilliant and fantastical music of the suite, "Scheherazade," which Rimsky-Korsakoff was inspired to write after tales of the Arabian Nights. It finds the music full of color and "go" and not as hackneyed as the music played at cabarets, and Mr. Jacchia, who plays this music again tomorrow night, makes it a frequently recurrent feature of his programmes.

The overture to "Tannhauser," the prelude to "Lohengrin" are old stories to this audience. It even listens with curiosity and pleasure to the prelude from "Tristan." Tomorrow night the music of the "Ball at the House of the Capulets," from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony will be played. On Tuesday night there will be music by the old Italian of the 18th century, Scarlatti, and by the ultra-modern young Italian, Casella, in addition to more popular waltzes, marches, and the like. On Wednesday night one of the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco will figure on the programme. And so forth, including excerpts from practically all of the popular grand operas. The one composition is applauded fully as popularly as the other.

This illumines a question of public education. Conversations with a score of people in this "cultivated" city of Boston, people who frequently and with avidity go to the Pop concerts and listen to the music, show that a great many in this commonwealth are still afraid of the Symphony concerts of the winter. They are afraid for two reasons. One is the seriousness with which these concerts are mentioned and reviewed by the press, and the second is a mistaken idea which still lurks in the minds of the great public about the cost of the subscription Symphony concerts of the winter. There is the illusion in many quarters that Symphony concerts are given on the financial scale of grand opera, but without the patron getting as much of show, flare and publicity for his money.

Now there has been no season in the past twenty years when anyone who wanted to attend all of the Boston Symphony concerts could not do so by purchasing a ticket for the whole twenty-four concerts of the season for the price of $15.00. There are seats which go cheaper. But $15.00 is a safe minimum price for a seat where one can hear well and see well, if not from a front row. There are no seats where it is at all difficult to get the finest effects of the orchestra or where the full brilliance of a fortissimo will not be felt.

From the great soloists who are in America during the season a limited number are engaged to play at these concerts. Some concerts are given without soloists at all, and the experience of every hearer of a few seasons agrees that when all is said and done no soloist is so great and so interesting as the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the wonderful music which it takes such an orchestra to play. But for those who want "personalities" at public entertainments, violinists of the quality and reputation of Heifetz, and pianists such as Paderewski—in the past—Gabrilowitch, Bauer, any one of the most popular pianistic figures of the day, regularly appear. Let us say that 24 concerts cost on the average of from $15.00 or a little less, to $60.00 or a little more for the very best seats. In the one case the cost to the patron per concert is about sixty cents, and in the other less than $3.00. For these prices one hears one of the finest orchestras in existence, under a distinguished conductor, playing all of the best orchestral music, some of which can only be performed by an orchestra of the technical capacity of the Boston Symphony, and a number of the best soloists of the season. Much of the music heard at the Pop concerts also goes on the programmes, and this music is played better at the subscription concerts of the winter than it is in the summer time, because of the exhaustive rehearsals held four days of each week in Symphony Hall. More good music is frequently played in one programme of the type given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the winter time than may be heard in several performances of certain operas, for many an opera which is accepted at least for a few seasons and applauded makes its success because of a sensational plot, gorgeous costumes, scenery of an unusual quality, or for a hundred other reasons which have not to do with the intrinsic melodic value of the music. Whereas the music which endures in the orchestral repertory must have substance and interest to continue there for any length of time.

These things have been said before, but all the saying in the world will not supply the place of demonstration and experience. Demonstrating the interest and beauty of orchestral music is the thing which the Pop concerts are doing in Boston. They have been doing this with particular effectiveness under Mr. Jacchia, because of the spirited conducting and his zeal to make his hearers enjoy music which he enjoys himself. His success of this season is therefore the success which is of the kind particularly appropriate and needful for these concerts, and a further testimony to his grip of his public.

TIGHT BINDING

POST, JUNE 7

150

AGED SYMPHONY USHER RECALLS DAYS OF PATTI

80 Years Old, George Hartshorn Has Been Chief Doorkeeper Half a Century

By HERBERT W. SEAMAN

One of the things George Hartshorn remembers most vividly, now that he has lived nearly 80 years, is putting on white gloves for Adelina Patti.

Putting them on his own hands, not Patti's.

That was a long time ago, but George Hartshorn has been chief usher at Symphony Hall a long time, and at the old Music Hall before that. It will be 50 years on July 4.

I don't know why this simple circumstance should stick out in his memory, which is a storehouse of good stories, but I do know that when I came upon George Hartshorn in Symphony Hall the other afternoon and interrupted his improving on the grand piano, the first thing that sprang to his mind was the incident of Patti and the white gloves. He had spent the afternoon, as is his wont in the declining years, pursuing grand motives over the keyboard, experimenting with phrases from Chopin and Liszt and Bach, playing by ear, because it is five or six years since he has been able to read music. When I entered the hall he was among the happy, golden notes that have the power to bring back youth. My voice ended his dream and his hand came down on the white and green keys sacred to Grieg. Then he sprang up.

Eighty years old, he sprang up, and then stepped lightly down from the platform to the floor level—a four-foot drop, at least.

"Let me come up," I had said.

"No," he replied, firmly, "I can get down quite easily."

How He Judges Singers

We sat at one of the tables laid out in the "Pops," and George Hartshorn told me first of all about Patti and the white gloves. He did not remember the year of Patti's visit to the old Music Hall, on the site of the present Orpheum, but he did remember the white gloves, because it was the first time the ushers had been ordered to wear them. And as the regular pay for an usher was 50 cents a night and white gloves cost considerably more than a night's pay, there was reason to remember the gloves, and also the thick carpets which were laid in the corridors of the hall and right across the sidewalks into Tremont street and Winter street for the diva's dainty feet.

Not that Patti was an idol of Hartshorn's at any time. He always preferred Melba—"more golden and mellow," he said—and now, in his old age, he is charmed more by Galli-Curci than ever he was by the dead-and-gone greats ones.

An usher of the Symphony, be it known, is no mere usher. Usually he is a university student, and therefore Mr. Hartshorn numbers among the boys who used to obey his orders many men who have attained high places in the professions. And Mr. Hartshorn himself is a musician of merit. Before he became an usher he was leader of his own orchestra. Remember that he was 30 before he began to be an usher. And in the old days of Music Hall he often performed in public, usually at dances and at such occasions as the walking contests, which were a feature of the '80s.

Strenuous Lady Walkers

There has been much talk recently of reviving these walking contests, but from Mr. Hartshorn's account of them they were very dull affairs. A lady would advertise that she would walk a quarter of a mile each quarter of an hour, night and day, for three weeks or so, and for 50 cents or so you could buy a ticket that would admit you any time during the contest. It was a spasmodic sort of thing, and toward the end rather harrowing. The lady, in a short skirt and leggings, would get her quarter of a mile done in six minutes or so and then sit down for the rest of the quarter of an hour. Near the end it became automatic. She would walk her seven laps, and then flop. The end came when a flop lasted more than a quarter of an hour. Less exciting even than six-day bicycle race.

But even these strenuous walking ladies had temperament. One of them was as temperamental as Paderewski himself, the most exacting of artists. This lady wouldn't walk unless the pianist who accompanied her was exactly to her liking. Now, of course, no pianist could be hired who would bang the ivories for six minutes every quarter-hour, day and night, for three weeks; they had to work in relays. And if there was anything wrong with the playing of any one of the six or seven pianists she kept going the fur would fly. George Hartshorn was her favorite pianist, but as he had the hiring of the others he felt the lash of her tongue at times.

Song Competitions and Free Silver

There were other contests at the Music Hall beside walking matches. Mr. Hartshorn told of one lady from Neponset, who, having spent all she had in training her voice, entered the singing competition at the hall. The crowd howled her down and she never sang another note in public. There was also a man who essayed to sing "The Bridge." He dropped in pitch at each verse, but only a quarter-note at a time; if it had been a half-note the pianist might have transposed to follow him. As it was, by the time he had finished the singer was two full tones below the key he started in.

The Music Hall was the scene of many a political meeting in the old days. Hartshorn heard President Grant speak there, but his memory of Bryan's free silver speech was more vivid. But the most spectacular political event in which Hartshorn had a hand was one in which George Fred Williams was involved. It was upon this wise:

"They came pretty near getting the door away from me that night. The Democrats were going to hold their convention there on such and such a day, and there was trouble between the gold Democrats and the silver Democrats over the candidate. Well, on the night before the convention the silver Democrats, headed by George Fred Williams, got into the hall. They stayed there all the evening, and then at 12 o'clock they announced that they would stay all night and probably all the next day. I was to hold the door against all comers. There were lots of comers. The gold Democrats got wind of what was happening, and tried to rush the door. That meant work for me. They pretty nearly beat me two or three times. Then they fetched the police, but the police commissioners ruled that it was a civil affair; and nobody could shift the silver Democrats until the convention was over.

What Happened to George Fred

"All went well until the silver Democrats got hungry. Some of them went out to get something to eat, and George Fred Williams, leader of them all, was among them. And I had orders not to let them into the hall. That meant that George Fred Williams was locked out of his own convention.

"Well, it was a bright and busy time. There were rallies in the street, outside, and I believe a scrap or two, and one man was killed by a live wire in trying to get in by the fire escape."

Mr. Hartshorn was silent for a moment. He stroked his clean-shaven chin. Then he said: "We had horse shows [illegible]

"Society affairs?"

"No. You misunderstand me. A horse trainer would hire the hall and charge admission and invite people to bring along their wildest horses, and he would ride them. I have seen the most rampageous brutes tamed in an hour and riding around the hall quietly, with tin cans tied to their tails. They were good days for Hartshorn's orchestra. We were there. And baby shows, too. And woman suffrage banquets. I heard Julia Ward Howe speak a number of times. The last time was in the new hall here."

Then we talked of dancing, new and old. I asked Mr. Hartshorn how he liked modern dancing. He smiled. He was evidently reluctant to criticize the rising generation which would have to live and endure the world as it is and will be, not as he knew it. Still, he didn't mind admitting that the new dances didn't appeal to him.

"Whatever you play, they get up and waltz to it—if you call it waltzing," he said. He was for the old square dances. "Why, at a little affair recently—well, it wasn't more than about 15 years ago—I was asked to play for dancing at a little house party. Before the dancing was supposed to begin I started to play Tuttle's Serenade, a nice, slow piece in 4-4 time. And I'm blessed if they didn't get up and begin to waltz to it."

"And what did you do?"

"I stopped playing and they stopped dancing. Then I told them it wasn't a dance and I didn't want anybody to dance to it."

Beating the Janitor on Noise

I could have sat hours and listened to this fine old man, who had been present officially at pretty nearly every big meeting in Boston since the first Peace Jubilee of 1869, when he was first engaged as usher. But that would not have been fair to him. There are books in the man. The best plan was to let him roam where he willed in the pleasant fields of memory. Who was I that I should try to guide him with foolish questions?

"Never late in my life," he said. "And I never got my house programmes mixed. I have heard nearly every concert this orchestra and the old Harvard Orchestra ever gave, and never once did I give out the wrong programme.

"I remember when I had been here 25 years. A. P. Peck was manager then—he was the man who hired me—and he gave me a gold medal. But that wasn't anything like the time when I got married 12 years ago. I was over in my apartment on Batavia street, and the ceremony was only just over, parson there and everything, when suddenly there was one awful noise in the street. I heard it coming close, and then it was right under the window. We looked out, and there was Comee, the business manager; and Strube, the conductor, and the painters and the plumbers and the ushers and the whole floor staff out there, with drums and clarinets and horns and trumpets, raising a terrible din. Strube, the conductor, a very dignified gentleman, as I remember, was torturing a trombone and trying to drown the noise made by the janitor from Chickering Hall, who was blacker than the ace of spades, having been attending to the furnace. That was a great day for me.

"And now what will you hear about: Paderewski, or the time they made the ladies take their hats off, or Adelaide Phillips, or what?"

"Go ahead," I said. "Tell me about Paderewski." And Hartshorn told me a story about the great pianist and nation-builder that probably has never been told before, because it is told from an usher's standpoint.

"Paderewski," said Mr. Hartshorn, "is a fine man and a fine pianist—when he is feeling good, but when he isn't you can tell from the way he is playing. Also, he has whims. He can't bear a door to open while he is playing. That's hard on ushers. We always keep the audience out during a movement, but you can't prevent people going out, can you? Well, Paderewski was playing a long opening movement one time, and the crowd was gathering outside. After about 20 minutes somebody said to me, 'Mr. Hartshorn, do you know that this movement lasts about three-quarters of an hour?' I said I don't care if it lasts all night, I'm going to let nobody in. And I didn't, until the end of the movement, and then they poured in. There were so many of them and they took so long, that Paderewski began to get impatient and struck chords. But I paid no attention. I obeyed the rules and seated everybody. By the time he was ready to play again he was pretty mad. I could see he was mad by the way he played.

"But of recent years he has been better, less upset about little things. There is no doubt that his mind has been on Poland more than on music, even. He couldn't help playing well, of course, even when he was thinking of Poland, but little things didn't matter then. I don't know that I consider him the greatest pianist. I'd as soon hear George Copeland."

When Ladies Took Hats Off

Mr. Hartshorn then harked back to 1895, when the Legislature passed a law that women must remove their hats in places of amusement. This revolutionary measure went into effect as quietly as could be. So far as Mr. Hartshorn saw, there was only one objector—"one of the big bugs, she was"—and she steadfastly refused to take her hat off, even when a man behind her was demanding his money back. And there was a time when Mrs. Comee, wife of the assistant manager of the orchestra, sat on an aisle seat with a hat as big as an umbrella.

"But I didn't tell her." I told her husband, in the box office, and he didn't go out and tell her. Probably he was as cautious as I was. She, to my knowledge, was the only person who ever sat through a performance with her hat on, since the passage of the law.

"And then there was the rule about seats in the aisles. One night at a concert I saw a very well-dressed, beautiful lady, sitting on a chair out in the aisle, and when I got closer I saw that it was Adelaide Philipps, the singer. Well, I wasn't going to invite trouble, so I went and saw the manager, and he said: 'I don't care if it's the great Panjandrum himself, she's got to get out of the aisle.' So I went and told her, and she got up and smiled sweetly. But the people sitting near by growled at me, because they saw who it was. And afterwards Adelaide Phillips came to me in the box office and shook hands with me and said: 'Mr. Hartshorn, you are right.'"

It is the prerogative of age to live in the past and to reject the modes of the present. Mr. Hartshorn is not of that sort. I asked him whether the orchestra was better 20 years ago than it is today, and he said no; it is better now than ever it was, and he cannot imagine anything better. And who was the best conductor? I asked. And he replied, "This man—Mr. Jacchia."

Has Heard Great Masters

"How do the singers of today compare with those of other days?"

"They are just as good, some much better—Caruso and Galli-Curci, for example."

"Do you like modern music?"

"I don't see anything new about what is called modern music. It is no better and no more studious than the work of the old masters, of course. Some of the new music I don't understand. This 5-8 and 11-8 time is quite incomprehensible to me."

Then what I thought would be the last question:

"If you had your life to live again, would you act differently?"

"No"—emphatically. "I have a little something saved, of course, but if I had a million I should hate to leave this place." He looked behind him at the great organ and the grand piano. Then he thought a while, and said:

"One evening I came in here and sat down at the organ and began to play to myself. The hall was empty and full of great shadows. I must have been playing a quarter of an hour, when I heard some clapping down in the auditorium. I looked and couldn't see anything, so I played again, and then heard more clapping.

"'Who is there?' I cried. And who should step out of the darkness but Gericke, the conductor, himself. 'That is fine,' he said. 'I didn't know you played the organ, Mr. Hartshorn.' I am very proud of that. Only once did I ever play the big organ in public, and that was during an automobile show. I was 70 years old then.

"Just think: I have heard every conductor of the Symphony since Sir Georg Henschel, and I have heard practically every concert the orchestra ever gave. I sit up here at night on the end of the first balcony, because I like it best.

"And to think that when Mr. Peck gave me this job I didn't expect to be here six weeks. I didn't like Peck at first. He was a peculiar man and hard to get along with unless you knew his ways. They were great days, those early ones. I remember the second peace jubilee, 1874. I was taking money at the doors so fast that I could only throw the bills into a wastepaper basket. There was no attempt to check them; they just poured in."

Record – Thurs. May 29

Harvard Men Make Merry at Pops

Graduates and undergraduates of Harvard made merry last evening at the Harvard Night concert at the Symphony Hall Pops. Owing to the indisposition of Agide Jacchia, the evening's program was conducted admirably by Mr. Lenom.

The Harvard Glee Club rendered many selections and came in for the lion's share of the applause.

Many of the students present thought the Glee Club was putting something over when they started the program by singing "The Drinking Song" and ended with a "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

Selections from "Sinbad" were well received. A special Decoration Day program has been arranged for tomorrow.

Defiantly Facing Prohibition, the Pops Still Charm the Crowd

"What will become of the Pops with prohibition?" has been asked by more than one purveyor of gloom recently. If there can be any solace to the genuine rum guzzler, outside of the forbidden, that solace is the Pops. There is no denying that the beer and wine of old will be deeply missed. So deeply that reformers may come and gloat over a purged Pops, and an extended fountain and cuisine will but poorly comfort the unrequited palate.

The first step was to make the orchestra, 80 strong, and the largest it has ever been. Eighty is an ideal number for general symphonic purposes. More would be actually superfluous. And please do not be alarmed—the programs remain low-brow enough for the most exacting taste. Every bulwark will be set up against the onslaught of the "Anti-Tobacco League." What is more, in defiance of all tradition, there will be young ladies charmingly garbed to serve the tables.

Consider the waltz, "Wine, Women and Song." The clue to this distressing Pop situation has been found in that title. It describes the three kinds of intoxication. The first being blue-pencilled, every effort is being made to glorify the other two.

Dainty maidens are to arrive from somewhere down town every evening, disappear at the left, and emerge as if from the Vogue magazine, in a chic costume, turned out by the busy sewing machine of Mlle. Hazen. Filmy voile over black, with a bit of ribbon at the waist and neck in the color of a particular function.

Gone are the dusky and noisy minions of beer, and gracefully may the light and slender-footed invaders be counted upon to fulfill needs, embellish the scene, and adroitly refrain from dropping trays during the music.

And then the other element of delight—song. Agide Jacchia, the product of melodious Italy and favorite of two seasons at the Pops, is hunting out old operetta scores that have mellowed rather than gone flat with age, and searching among the musical comedies of the year for tunes of distinction.

Mr. Jacchia has made another precedent. He has proved to Pop-goers that it pays to take pains with light music. It is an axiom of the profession that nothing is harder in all symphonic music than to catch the airy swirl of a Viennese waltz—to perfection. Mr. Jacchia has insisted upon rehearsing and polishing up details to make that mark—and he has made it. As for operatic music, Mr. Jacchia has had too large an operatic experience and reputation to leave any doubt on that point. As a youthful student at the famous Conservatory of Music in Pesaro, who became his master and lifelong friend but Pietro Mascagni himself? No wonder the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria" has flowed with such passionate fervor from under his baton. Graduating with medals in 1898, Agide Jacchia became a conductor of the Brescia Opera at the age of 23. During the next four years he conducted both in Milan and Rome. When Mascagni came to this country in 1902, Mr. Jacchia accompanied him as his chief assistant. He returned to Italy and figured as conductor in various opera houses until 1907, when for two seasons he led the Milano Opera Company in San Francisco.

In 1909 he conducted a short and brilliant season of Italian opera in the Academy of Music, New York. During the years 1910-14 he was general music director of the Montreal Opera company and the National Opera company of Canada, successively. The season 1914-15 saw him chief Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. And thence to Boston, where many will remember him as conductor of the National Opera company at the Boston Opera House. He has studied the likes and dislikes of his audiences, and he is fairly bursting just now with enthusiasm over some new pieces which he has discovered and others which he has orchestrated.

The other night a worthy drummer of the Boston Symphony orchestra walked into a dance hall and listened to a jazz band for the first time in his life. His companion looked at him curiously to see whether he would clap his hands to his ears in dismay or jump upon a table and shout "Eureka." He did neither. He watched them for some time, and then said: "I can make 25 per cent. more noise, and I can show them a dozen things in novel effects of percussion."

The Pops came into being in the spring of 1885. Mr. Gericke, as the second conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conceived the idea at the end of his initial season of extending the concerts with lighter music, after the European practice. They were an immediate success, and the old Music Hall, three times a week, became the gayest place in town.

When June came around, that correct institution, the Boston Symphony orchestra, had lost its reserve to such an extent that the false floor was taken out of Music Hall, chairs and tables put in, and the series became "Promenade" concerts occuring every night except Sunday. They were immediately christened the "Pops," however, and were so much liked that they ran right through the summer to the end of September. The following season was almost as long, but the management then decided that such industry was none too good for the musicians, and the Pops have evaporated in July ever since.

Until the spring of 1900 they were given in the old Music Hall. That spring, Symphony Hall not being entirely completed, and Music Hall being required for other uses, the Pops moved to Mechanics' Hall, and in 1901 they moved farther along Huntington avenue to their present home in Symphony Hall.

In case any one should maintain the Pops will not be the best solace in the world for our soldiers, the following incident is cited:

One of our Yankee divisions wrote home last summer, asking for the Pop programs, which his mother sent him. He wrote that "nothing brought him closer to the old town." He is back now, and tells how he tied a program to a stone and hurled it over like a grenade. Some time later it came back in the same way with a sprawling question mark over "Good Morning, Mr. Zip Zip Zip," and next to the "Beautiful Blue Danube," was scratched, "Nur wir konnen spielen." Indeed!

Symphony Concert === Monteux

WEEK-END CONCERTS

RABAUD'S SYMPHONY AND SONGS FROM MUSORGSKY

An Interesting and Grateful Music Characteristic of the Composer and Conductor —Miss Braslau's Vivid Russian Excursion—Intermezzi of a Double Day—Sabbath Entertainments—Mr. Monteux Goes to Paris

THE memory of man runneth not to a day wherein the Symphony Orchestra has undertaken two concerts—one in the afternoon, another in the evening. Yet this thing befell on Saturday—last probably, of the perturbations of routine, of the departures from habit, that two years of war and an autumn of influenza have enforced upon band and audiences. The parade of returned troops on Friday, preoccupying the town and actually passing Symphony Hall, put out of the question the usual afternoon concert. It befell accordingly on Saturday; while four hours later followed the usual repetition of the evening. Possibly the audience at either was smaller than is customary; but otherwise there was no observable consequence. No doubt the players, being musicians in an orchestra "did their bit" in grumbling, since it is the nature of their kind so to do. No doubt, Mr. Rabaud, already fatigued by a long and laborious season and naturally spending himself to the utmost upon his own symphony, felt the strain of a double occasion. Yet doubled only the more gratefully and immediately, was the return. For in the evening as in the afternoon the audience not only received the piece with eager interest and hearty applause, but rose in its places, along with the orchestra, in tribute to the just deserts of the Parisian composer and conductor who has dwelt and worked for a space in this town. Nor were both companies lacking in warmth towards Miss Braslau, the singer of the day from the "jeune troupe" of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Though Mr. Rabaud's symphony—number two in E minor opus five—has entered concert-halls in the United States only in recent years, it is relatively youthful work, written and played for the first time in Paris in 1899. By date of original performance at least, no more than a month separates it from the tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne"; yet it hardly attains the finesse of handling, the adroitness of imagination, distinguishing that piece and still more the opera of "Marouf" and the incidental music to Mr. Firmin-Gémier's version of "The Merchant of Venice"—all three heard in Boston or in New York during the current season. On the other hand, the symphony bears few marks of the direct influence of illustrious elders. There are obvious kinships between the temperament of Mr. Rabaud, as man and composer in youth or in middle age, and the temperament of Franck. The music of the symphony more than once reflects these affinities. Nor is it without mark of the formal procedures that twenty years ago who pant for "reminiscences," no doubt become part of the common and accepted heritage of contemporary music. Those who pant for "remininiscences," no doubt heard in Mr. Rabaud's measures occasional hint of Wagnerian harmonies, progressions, tonal coloring; but where in the music of the middle and conservative generation of European and American composers are they not to be spied out by superfluously searching eyes?

So far as affinities are concerned, it seems fairest and truest to say that Mr. Rabaud's symphony is in the direct line of the symphonic tradition as it descends into our day from Beethoven through Brahms and also through Franck. The large manipulation of tonal masses through the first movement foreshadows in a way the Mahler who ran to excess with them. It was possible in the ascent and amplification of the choral theme of the second movement to hear a faint hint of Bruckner. But no Mahler and (outside Vienna) no Bruckner existed musically in 1899, least of all in Mr. Rabaud's Parisian world. Rather, all these incidental kinships lie within the circle of the classical symphonic tradition continued. By the same token, except in unclouded lucidity and in unflagging logic of design, Mr. Rabaud's symphony bears no distinctively Gallic ear-marks. Within those traits, it is a French music. Otherwise, in 1899, any heir to the symphonic ages, having also the composer's mind, heart and hand, might have written it anywhere.

To hear the music, however, is to take little thought of these coördinations. Rather, Mr. Rabaud's symphony interests the ear, quickens the mind, stirs responsive emotion and generally pleasures the hearer by intrinsic virtue. The motives out of which he builds it and which he intertwines in the successive movements, are as clear as the day and as plainly charactered. In development and progress with them, in contrast and cumulation, Mr. Rabaud discloses no little technical resource and invention. The lay ear follows with unconscious satisfaction in such unified and rounded work, the course of the symphony; the expert listener finds many a detail interesting and piquant. The music, however, is no mere music of an expert craftsman. Throughout it is animated with clear depth and range of mood, with communicating warmth of feeling, with grateful play of imagination. Grave power and large emotion sway and swing the tonal masses, the advances and the recessions of the first movement. The second, with its choral motive, works the illusion of deep and ascetic aspiration—an aspiration characteristically Rabaudian in freedom from the occasional sentimentality of Franck and the frequent sentimentality of Bruckner, in a recurring beauty also, to which the mind rather than the heart answers the quicker.

Out of both divisions shines a clear candor, a warm insistence of melody; for Mr. Rabaud is not of those composers who stifle instrumental song in workmanship or strangle it after a few measures lest they seem too simple in a sophisticated time. The scherzo renews this melodic frankness, touches it with fancy, suggests through all its freedom of form and lightness of pace the fine masculine quality of Beethoven's scherzi. Beethoven-like, again, are the iterated rhythms of the finale; but more Franckian are the mounting brightness and the final advance into large, swelling, choral-like close. A reflective, a logical symphony, if the hearer chooses to exalt these qualities in the music; a symphony warm and even rich with grateful melody; a symphony of exemplary and painstaking workmanship; but also a symphony animate with the directness of feeling, the fine imagination, the justice in all things that underlie the grave, the ascetic, the sincere and the scrupulous Henri Rabaud.

There was intermezzo in the concert when Mr. Laurent, the first flute of the orchestra, played with the string choir three of the seven divisions of Bach's familiar suite in B minor; while for finale stood Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont." Beyond peradventure it is a noble and eloquent music, a large and heroic tapestry in tones. Beyond questioning Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra played it, as they usually play romantic pieces, with light and heat. And yet, and yet, how many times has it been heard at the Symphony Concerts; while other overtures, even some of Beethoven's own, repose year in and year out upon the shelves of the neighboring library! No doubt the late Professor Norton read in "Hamlet" daily with pleasure; but not all of us at the Symphony Concerts are Nortons with Beethoven. There can be too much of him in a season; the standard repertory is indeed a convenient thing; but it has been known to turn classics hackneyed. Fortunately, there was Mr. Laurent to freshen Bach's suite and a Rabaud leading it whose ear at last had compassed the true balance in such pieces between the solo instrument and the accompanying choir. For the first time this season Mr. Rabaud's

Continued on Last Page

Stephen Mottimore and Louisa, his Wife—

(Mr. Permain and Miss Mo

MONTEUX AND MUSIC

SUNDRY OPINIONS FROM THE NEW CONDUCTOR

The Range of His Experiences — Catholicity and Wagner — Symphonic Versus Operatic Pieces—A Word About French, and Also About American, Composers—Orchestra and Leader

NO two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite poles. Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his preoccupied gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words. The other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could not imagine Mr. Rabaud as making enemies; one could fancy Mr. Monteux as making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform his redy smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

Yet Mr. Monteux is ill described if you think him one without strong views, one who veers to the wind of others' opinions. Ask him what he thinks of "Pagliacci" or of the operas of Puccini and see the devotee's indignation in his musician's eye. But if you expect any chauvinistic prejudices to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théatre des Champs-Elysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on four tours he has specialized in ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mais oui; second rate, also. Facile; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with. It is music for the public; as for me I like music for the musicians."

"And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure; the public is not the same for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best, of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"But yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programmes of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programmes must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux continued. "We gave his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saëns was his own organist. He was not at all satisfied with the organist chosen and he said, "I will play the organ myself—but who shall conduct?" It was at rehearsal, and a friend of mine said, 'Monteux is in the audience.' At once Saint-Saëns demands that I come to the stand—that I conduct. Voilà! I have conducted much of Saint-Saëns—'La Princesse Jaune,' 'Phryne,' 'Henri VIII.' But of all his operas I like 'Samson and Delilah.' It is to me his greatest work, almost pure melody."

"There has been no great music growing out of the war, in France at least," Mr. Monteux said regretfully in answer to a question. "Nor will there be for some time, I believe. Men's minds have been on other things. One writes you know to an occasion and one cannot be equal to the occasion as it has been in France these four years."

"Have you ever composed, Mr. Monteux?" He leaned forward confidentially, finger up. "Yes, indeed. I have composed many things. And do you know where they are, those compositions? In a big box, tied up tight with a string. And they will never see the sun, I promise you. I play too much other people's music to write any more of my own. Not since fifteen years ago, when I composed for the last time, have I written anything. For I believe that a man can only have one career, and that mine is to conduct. I shall always be a conductor."

"You find the personal equation a strong factor in conducting, do you not, Mr. Monteux? What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?"

"Both," the conductor answered. "It must seem a democracy but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for the orders' sake, but only to get results." Mr. Monteux seemed as he spoke an epitome of that remarkable nation whose foremost quality has long been the ability to influence others, while always respecting the individual's liberty. One could not imagine this smiling, vivacious little man ever becoming autocratic; but one could readily perceive how his personality might arouse in others enthusiasm for that music which so evidently rules his life.

Presently we spoke of Russian composers and Mr. Monteux expressed his admiration for the works of Rimsky-Korsakov, of Borodin and of Stravinsky. "So many material difficulties have interfered with presenting Russian operas," he said regretfully. "People wonder why more are not performed; but you see it needs more than the composer and the librettist; more even than the artists. Not so with the giving of their orchestral music. I look forward to that. It will be my hope to include all kinds of good music, even American," he added with a laugh. "France ought to hear some of your composers, by the way; you have several that should be known in Europe. Loeffler, Carpenter, four or five others are well worthy to be heard; some have been. Then I shall seek out and bring over some good concert music from Italy. That is a side of Italian musical development that has been too much ignored, for the operatic pieces always receive the emphasis. There are a number of young Italian composers of whom I hear good things said, as well as the older ones whose music I hope to bring forward."

"Is there anything you would especially like to say for publication, Mr. Monteux?"

"Yes," he said, unexpectedly and earnestly. "This: In playing French music I shall not make French propaganda. You understand; Rabaud, Messager and I, we have been brought up in France; it is our country; we naturally love and we play the music of our country. But not to make propaganda for it; that would be stupid. French music is great enough not to need any; and you Americans know and love French music already. I shall not play French music because it is French music, you understand, although I love it. But I shall play the best music of every nation."

[Clare Peeler in Musical America.

AT BOYLSTON ST.
in "Captain Kidd, Jr."
Tessie Kiyakawa in "A Courageous Coward"

Transcript Nov. 18, 1918

At the Feast (IV)

"Alta galatos Tabernandago
"Picaro focsb ria!

On then! What a Sabbath, Madame Marie! Is it the tambourine of the fat chirin! that I hear, or a hogshead that one smashes? It is a battle to the death between Cider and Wine! They are nothing to mature folks, these

Continued on Page Sixteen

Basque Music for Boston

Continued from Page Fourteen

larks. Yet, nevertheless, it is good to hear the laughter of the young people and to chant again in the evening the songs of the dawn!

The girls dance, the boys sneer, the drinkers bawl their songs of labor. And into all this hubbub I mingle prudently the holy chant of the morning, even though the wine of Irrougeli dulls my memory. For the Cascarotes intrude now; and among these bohemians of bewitched glances, who knows where this dance might lead us, which sweeps everything, this frenzied arin-arin where the buck-footed Mr. Debroua (the devil) is sure to sneak in.

Allegro energico, F minor, 6-8—Horns and kettledrums commence a persistent accompaniment figure of marked rythm, with trills in the woodwind; all the strings present a rude dance-tune, and the brass instruments follow suit. There are plentiful modulations, with a lot of orchestral ventriloquizing, and clever shifts of rhythm from 6-8 to 9-8 and back again; then the oboe introduces a second theme in C minor. Both themes are treated anew, exchanging keys. In the final climax the organ combines the hymn-like principal theme of the first movement with the dance-tunes of this, and there is a riotous climax.

In Survey

There is nothing radical in the material or the treatment of this little suite, nor is it consciously conservative. It seems to be quite spontaneous, and proportionally pleasing; in spite of a very direct appeal, I should expect it to wear well. There is much in the external impression of the work which recalls Bizet without the reproach of imitation—not the Bizet of "Carmen," but rather the Bizet of "L'Arlésienne" and still more of "Roma." The work will not only please, it will refresh.

Formally the suite presents a rather complicated and exceedingly well executed example of "generative treatment" in the first movement, after which it drops learning overboard. The man in the street need not be in the slightest degree repelled by the "generative" episode, which is artfully concealed as it should be, instead of thrust forward like a sore thumb or a new pair of gloves, as dutiful young composers sometimes thrust it. To say, however, that the suite is simple of effect does not in the slightest degree imply poverty of resource on the part of the composer, who is, on the contrary, exceedingly fluent in the unpopular arts of counterpoint and thematic variation.

To the present reviewer, the absence of the Zortzico rhythm and character from any and all parts of the suite is in the nature of a distinct lack, because the Zortzico is the exclusive artistic property of the Basque, as well as pleasing on its own merits. Probably the composer could answer quite properly that he has not aimed to exhaust the interest of Basque music in a single suite, or even that one who knows the Basques intimately attaches less importance to the Zortzico than such a total stranger as the present reviewer. At all events, the present suite seems to bear out the theory that the Basques are a cross between the Béarnais and the Mediterraneans!

PHILIP GREELEY CLAPP

Mr. Monteux Foretells

With the promptness that is the wonder of two worlds, the Post Office has today delivered to this department the number of The Musical Courier for April 24 last—a round three weeks in transit from New York to Boston. It contains Mr. Monteux's answers to a question or two about his plans for the Symphony Concerts next autumn. Belated though the paragraphs seem, they follow hereunder.

My appointment is so recent that my plans are still unformulated. I am going to France for a visit, sailing about May 1, and I shall bring back any worthy novelties I may find, but I intend to figure in no way when in Boston as a propagandist for French music. Just as good wine needs no bush, so good French music needs no special propaganda, and that is the only kind I shall play. I do not think I shall find much room on my programmes for ultra-modern music. As for German music, I expect to pursue the same course as I have since the war began. You will remember that I refused to conduct Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" when I first came to America. I do not now expect to place works by living German composers on the Boston programmes the coming season. I do not think that the American people want to hear them; but I shall conduct the classics of musical literature, just as I have done throughout the war, irrespective of nationality.

From Americans I shall play all worthy works that I can find. I hope to do the first symphony of John Alden Carpenter, which, unless I am mistaken, has never been done either in Boston or New York, and other pieces of his as well; and there is fine music which I know by MacDowell, Chadwick and Loeffler. I am very sensible of the kindness and appreciation that has been shown me in America and I hope to show my appreciation of it by doing what I can to help along good American music. You may be sure that, although I have mentioned only some of your best-known composers, I shall be glad to examine manuscripts of new works from the younger and comparatively unknown men, and whatever I judge worthy of a Boston Symphony programme will find a place on one.

Mr. Monteux is mistaken as to Mr. Carpenter's symphony. It was played in Boston a year ago last month, with Mr. Schmidt conducting in lieu of Dr. Muck, who had been eager to bring the piece to hearing. It well deserves repetition under Mr. Monteux. No symphony yet written by an American composer, except Mr. Loeffler's, is comparable with it. Possibly the new conductor will hazard Mr. Loeffler's music as well. It also deserves restudied performance and new hearing.

Items and Announcements

Two overtures, each heard none too often hereabouts, stand on the programme that Mr. Jacchia prepared but in which Mr. Lenom will lead at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall this evening. One is relatively ancient and virtually unknown music, Cherubini's large-voiced overture to his final opera, "Ali Baba"; the other, more familiar, is work of Mr. Chadwick's more imaginative years, the concert overture named for the muse, "Melpomene." In detail the programme is:

March, "Stars and Stripes".....Souza
Overture to the Opera, "Ali Baba"....Cherubini
Song Without Words.....Chaikovsky
Fantasia from the Opera, "Pagliacci"
Leoncavallo
Ballet Music from the Opera, "Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Hymn for Organ, Violin and Violincello.....Nagel
(Messrs. Snow, Hoffmann, Miquelle.)
Turkish Patrol .....Michaelis
Concert Overture, "Melpomene".....Chadwick
Selection from the Opera, "L'Oracolo".....Leoni
Souvenir .....Drdla
The Marionettes .....Lacombe
March from "Aida".....Verdi

Mr. Chalmers Clifton, well remembered in Boston as the ablest conductor of "The Cecilia" in recent years, is to lead the Conservatory Orchestra at Paris in a concert of French and American music, to take place

53

150

From the Public of the Symphony Concerts to Henry L. Higginson

A Memorial Volume Containing 4000 Signatures and a Preface by President Eliot Given Him Today, His Eighty-Fourth Birthday

The Tooled Cover of the Book

TODAY is the eighty-fourth birthday of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder and, for thirty-seven years, the sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To signal the occasion, to surprise and please Mr. Higginson, to recall the end, last spring, of his active connection wth the Symphony Concerts, a few of his friends gave him this afternoon a unique book to be memorial of this long proprietorship. It is bound in full crushed brown levant leather with light brown morocco lining and fly-leaves. The covers, inside and outside, are tooled by hand in gold to a design suggested in the picture above, and made for the book by Mr. F. C. D. Palmer of the Rose Bindery. The pages are of vellum and on them are pasted the names of some 4000 subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, each in his or her own signature upon a little slip of white paper. On the first pages of the book as message and preface to Mr. Higginson stands the following letter to him written by his old friend, President Eliot of Harvard:

Dear Major Higginson:

Some of the thousands of persons who have had their lives made more interesting and happier by the concerts of your Symphony Orchestra in Boston and its vicinity during the past thirty-seven years wish to declare to you on your eighty-fourth birthday their personal gratitude and their strong sense of the public benefits which have resulted and will result from your disinterested and patient labors on behalf of the orchestra and the community it has served. Many of the signers of this Memorial are acquaintances who have long cherished high respect for you and your good works, or friends, old and young, who feel for you the sincerest affection; but most of them are strangers who gladly embrace this their first opportunity to tell you directly that you have gladdened and exalted their physical and spiritual lives.

Boston was historically the right place in the United States to develop an orchestra of high merit. The soil in which you planted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1880-81 had been well prepared during the forty years preceding by a series of earlier organizations for providing orchestral concerts in the community where you and I grew up. These pioneering organizations were the Boston Academy of Music, the Musical Fund Society, the Germania Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society, and the Harvard Musical Association. Their resources were limited, and their achievements modest, but they made ready a supporting public for you. Your purpose was to create an orchestra out of the best available material in all the world competent to render to perfection the best music in the world. In this very difficult undertaking your success has been marvelous. Your plans and policies have been wise, and generous towards both your public and the artists whom you employed. Your orchestra has given year by year a demonstration of the exceeding value of coöperative discipline. You have steadily insisted that the skilled musician's occupation is not a mechanical trade but an artistic profession. You have given your public the pure, refining, exalting, inspiring music of all nations and all periods. You have enlarged and strengthened the appreciation of sweet and noble music in this community.

We shall all better appreciate the work you have done for Boston and the country, if we bear in mind that good music sustains and consoles the human spirit in times of adversity, and is, next to good literature, the best expression of public prosperity, social joy, and religious transport. It transcends the limits of language or race, requires no versions or translations, and ranges freely through all the civilized world and the successive generations of men. Your success in creating the Symphony Orchestra as a permanent institution will have a high educational value in the future; for common enjoyment of immortal music allied with immortal poetry will prove an exalting and binding influence among the various elements of the American population.

On behalf of the signers of this Memorial I greet you and Mrs. Higginson with heartiest congratulations on the principal work of your useful life, warmest thanks, and best wishes for your enjoyment of serene content as you look backward, and still more as you look forward.

Your old friend,

CHARLES W. ELIOT

Major Henry L. Higginson.

Baltimore Sun June 22 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra's New Conductor, Pierre Monteuax, Discusses The Coming Se

Prior To Sailing For France Henri Rabaud's Successor Talks Of His Plans For New Programs For The Orchestra Next Season.

EARLY this month two distinguished musicians sailed for France. The first, Henri Rabaud, was leaving America after a year's sojourn as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the second, Pierre Monteux, was returning to spend the summer in his native country preparatory to his conductorship of the same great orchestra next season.

There was both design and sentiment in his journey; he went in search of new and interesting scores, but he also was to set foot upon his native soil for the first time since he fulfilled his military service at the opening of the war. Called out in the first week of French mobilization, he served two years as private soldier of the second class in the Thirty-fifth Territorial Infantry; he was at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. After devoting two years of his career to continuous faithful service he was given his discharge.

Intentions As To Programs.

On the eve of his departure Mr. Monteux made some very definite and unambiguous statements about his policy for the season of 1919-1920.

Questioned as to his leanings toward the newer and bolder music and his intentions as regards programs for next winter, he confessed that one of his immediate quests in Europe was for music of the younger Italian, French and Russian schools. However, he explained that, whereas the "Monteux" concerts co-existed with four other orchestras in Paris and, therefore, could legitimately specialize, the Boston Symphony concerts must have catholic and balanced programs.

He spoke reverently of the classics, declared himself an ardent admirer of Wagner's music, expressed his liking for some American music, mentioning specifically MacDowell, Loeffler and Carpenter. On the subject of French propaganda, he made these emphatic remarks: "I intend to figure no way when in Boston as a propagandist for French music. Just as good wine needs no bush, so good French music needs no propaganda, and that is the only kind I shall play. I do not think I shall find much room on my program for ultra-modern music. My first concern is always to play the best music of every nation."

His Career.

Such catholicity was in a measure to be expected, for a varied career has given him ample experience in all the ins and outs of musical performance. Starting as a viola player and member of several ensembles for chamber music, he soon found his true vocation as conductor, and made his mark conducting the "Colonne" and "Monteux" concerts in Paris, grand opera in the larger cities of Europe and at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, not to mention the Russian Ballet, with which he toured Europe and America.

It will also be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season just gone by, pending the arrival of M. Rabaud, and he had then been asked to become regular conductor, but the Metropolitan Opera management did not see fit to release their sole conductor of French opera at the last minute, with the season's plans all made.

He was enthusiastically acclaimed, however, at the two pairs of Boston Symphony concerts which he conducted in Boston. Mr. E. T. Parker wrote in the Boston Transcript: "Mr. Monteux has the most sensitive ear possessed by any conductor since Gericke. Not less keen and of Gallic clarity, precision, finesse is Mr. Monteux's sense of musical design and of revelation thereof to his hearers. To this insight Mr. Monteux adds the musical intuition and experience that mold the phrase, shape the period, graduate the climax as with the composer's voice and ear. To all three he lends the imagination that discovers the just accent that distributes and shades colors, that vibrates to the subtle modulations of a Dukas or a Debussy—a manifold ability, intelligence, imagination, devotion dwell in him. He possesses the true artist's mind and, what is equally essential, the true artist's conscience."

Mr. Philip Hale, in the Herald, said: "Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has, in addition, warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature. As an interpreter, Mr. Monteux has given memorable performances of works known and unfamiliar, performances that have been sane as well as brilliant and imaginative. As a man he has in a short time endeared himself to orchestra and public."

And Mr. Olin Downes, in the Post: "Mr. Monteux is a very simple man, rather under medium height, erect, uncommonly clear-eyed, unostentatious, self-possessed in the presence of an audience and quietly master of his men. He had not conducted two minutes before it was apparent that he had made of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a finer instrument than it has been for many seasons. He is a supremely artistic interpreter—a man profoundly in earnest and thoroughly equipped for his task."

Personality.

Mr. Monteux is 42 years old. One of his recent interviewers, Miss Clare Peeler, was similarly impressed with his personal charms. She describes him as "short, dark, plump, vivacious to the sparkling point; the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could fancy Mr. Monteux making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise), inform his ready smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reason of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience."

PIERRE MONTEUAX.

The same interviewer probed him on a much-disputed question by asking him, "What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?" "Both," he answered. "It must seem a democracy, but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for order's sake, but only to get results."

Personnel.

The personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should afford Mr. Monteux the finest conceivable material and maintained its old eminence; the wood-wind was notably improved by the acquisition of some illustrious newcomers—all "first-prize" men from the Paris Conservatory.

The usual change from year to year involves from 5 to 10 per cent. of the players, and nothing more than this is now transpiring. The distinguished wood-wind section remains unaltered, except that Mr. Minart, clarionetist, has returned from military service in France and will take his old place, which Mr. Stievenard has been temporarily filling. The only change in the brass choir will be in the second quartet of French horns. In the 60 strings there is also a minimum of change.

From National
NEW YORK CITY
Address
Date APR 26 1919

WORLD
New York City
APR 27 1919

CURRENT CONCERT SEASON OFFERS USUAL QUANTITY WITH A LIBERAL QUALITY

By Pierre V. R. Key.

SO far as the regular [illegible]n of 1918-1919 is concerned, it is virtually [illegible] concerning the recent appoint[illegible]ras, the oratorio and oth[illegible] [illegible]ual vocal and [illegible]

When Henri Rabaud took h[illegible] the Boston Symphony—after Pierre Monteux had transformed it into the noisiest orchestra in the world—its appearances here reflected distinction. It would be interesting to learn why the directors invited M. Monteux to return. For unless he discloses capacities hitherto undiscovered we fear we shall not enjoy the Boston Symphony concerts as once we did. Praise is due the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra and Leopold Stokowski, who is becoming a factor to [illegible] reckoned with. Whatever else in [illegible] way of symphony programmes [illegible] York had was inferior.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gives more than a hundred concerts every season, at home and in other cities. To rehearse and conduct them requires all the time and energy of a strong man. Henri Rabaud, who has been at the head of this famous organization during the season just closing, has been duly impressed by this fact, and as he is more interested in composing (his opera "Marouf" is in the Metropolitan's repertory and his symphony has been played here, too) he has declined a re-engagement, and the directors have chosen for his successor Pierre Benjamin Monteux. Many will regret the retirement of M. Rabaud, who gave admirable readings of French masterworks, and interesting ones of the German classics, in the interpretation of which latter, however, he displayed a singular conservatism. The choice of M. Monteux as successor may seem odd, inasmuch as he first became known in this country as a conductor of ballet music. But it was ballet music of a superior kind, including such masterworks as Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "L'Oiseau de Feu," as produced by the Ballet Russe. In Paris he began as a viola player in the Colonne Orchestra, and also got experience at the Opéra Comique. Later, he conducted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons. During the present season he has had charge of the French operas at the Metropolitan in this city. He also conducted in Carnegie Hall the first two concerts of the Boston Orchestra—an ungrateful task, as there were some thirty new members, few of them equal to their predecessors.

Baltimore Sun June 22 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra's New Conductor, Pierre Monteux, Discusses The Coming Season

Prior To Sailing For France Henri Rabaud's Successor Talks Of His Plans For New Programs For The Orchestra Next Season.

EARLY this month two distinguished musicians sailed for France. The first, Henri Rabaud, was leaving America after a year's sojourn as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the second, Pierre Monteux, was returning to spend the summer in his native country preparatory to his conductorship of the same great orchestra next season.

There was both design and sentiment in his journey; he went in search of new and interesting scores, but he also was to set foot upon his native soil for the first time since he fulfilled his military service at the opening of the war. Called out in the first week of French mobilization, he served two years as private soldier of the second class in the Thirty-fifth Territorial Infantry; he was at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. After devoting two years of his career to continuous faithful service he was given his discharge.

Intentions As To Programs.

On the eve of his departure Mr. Monteux made some very definite and unambiguous statements about his policy for the season of 1919-1920.

Questioned as to his leanings toward the newer and bolder music and his intentions as regards programs for next winter, he confessed that one of his immediate quests in Europe was for music of the younger Italian, French and Russian schools. However, he explained that, whereas the "Monteux" concerts co-existed with four other orchestras in Paris and, therefore, could legitimately specialize, the Boston Symphony concerts must have catholic and balanced programs.

He spoke reverently of the classics, declared himself an ardent admirer of Wagner's music, expressed his liking for some American music, mentioning specifically MacDowell, Loeffler and Carpenter. On the subject of French propaganda, he made these emphatic remarks: "I intend to figure no way when in Boston as a propagandist for French music. Just as good wine needs no bush, so good French music needs no propaganda, and that is the only kind I shall play. I do not think I shall find much room on my program for ultra-modern music. My first concern is always to play the best music of every nation."

His Career.

Such catholicity was in a measure to be expected, for a varied career has given him ample experience in all the ins and outs of musical performance. Starting as a viola player and member of several ensembles for chamber music, he soon found his true vocation as conductor, and made his mark conducting the "Colonne" and "Monteux" concerts in Paris, grand opera in the larger cities of Europe and at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, not to mention the Russian Ballet, with which he toured Europe and America.

It will also be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season just gone by, pending the arrival of M. Rabaud, and he had then been asked to become regular conductor, but the Metropolitan Opera management did not see fit to release their sole conductor of French opera at the last minute, with the season's plans all made.

He was enthusiastically acclaimed, however, at the two pairs of Boston Symphony concerts which he conducted in Boston. Mr. E. T. Parker wrote in the Boston Transcript: "Mr. Monteux has the most sensitive ear possessed by any conductor since Gericke. Not less keen and of Gallic clarity, precision, finesse is Mr. Monteux's sense of musical design and of revelation thereof to his hearers. To this insight Mr. Monteux adds the musical intuition and experience that mold the phrase, shape the period, graduate the climax as with the composer's voice and ear. To all three he lends the imagination that discovers the just accent that distributes and shades colors, that vibrates to the subtle modulations of a Dukas or a Debussy—a manifold ability, intelligence, imagination, devotion dwell in him. He possesses the true artist's mind and, what is equally essential, the true artist's conscience."

Mr. Philip Hale, in the Herald, said: "Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has, in addition, warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature. As an interpreter, Mr. Monteux has given memorable performances of works known and unfamiliar, performances that have been sane as well as brilliant and imaginative. As a man he has in a short time endeared himself to orchestra and public."

And Mr. Olin Downes, in the Post: "Mr. Monteux is a very simple man, rather under medium height, erect, uncommonly clear-eyed, unostentatious, self-possessed in the presence of an audience and quietly master of his men. He had not conducted two minutes before it was apparent that he had made of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a finer instrument than it has been for many seasons. He is a supremely artistic interpreter—a man profoundly in earnest and thoroughly equipped for his task."

Personality.

Mr. Monteux is 42 years old. One of his recent interviewers, Miss Clare Peeler, was similarly impressed with his personal charms. She describes him as "short, dark, plump, vivacious to the sparkling point; the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could fancy Mr. Monteux making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise), inform his ready smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindliness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reason of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience."

PIERRE MONTEUAX.

The same interviewer probed him on a much-disputed question by asking him, "What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?" "Both," he answered. "It must seem a democracy, but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for order's sake, but only to get results."

Personnel.

The personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should afford Mr. Monteux the finest conceivable material to work with. The past season has proved that the considerable change of last year was distinctly for the better. In every city where the orchestra was heard the rich and delicate quality of the strings was remarked upon. The brass section remained virtually intact and maintained its old eminence; the wood-wind was notably improved by the acquisition of some illustrious newcomers—all "first-prize" men from the Paris Conservatory.

The usual change from year to year involves from 5 to 10 per cent. of the players, and nothing more than this is now transpiring. The distinguished wood-wind section remains unaltered, except that Mr. Minart, clarionetist, has returned from military service in France and will take his old place, which Mr. Stievenard has been temporarily filling. The only change in the brass choir will be in the second quartet of French horns. In the 60 strings there is also a minimum of change.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gives more than a hundred concerts every season, at home and in other cities. To rehearse and conduct them requires all the time and energy of a strong man. Henri Rabaud, who has been at the head of this famous organization during the season just closing, has been duly impressed by this fact, and as he is more interested in composing (his opera "Marouf" is in the Metropolitan's repertory and his symphony has been played here, too) he has declined a re-engagement, and the directors have chosen for his successor Pierre Benjamin Monteux. Many will regret the retirement of M. Rabaud, who gave admirable readings of French masterworks, and interesting ones of the German classics, in the interpretation of which latter, however, he displayed a singular conservatism. The choice of M. Monteux as successor may seem odd, inasmuch as he first became known in this country as a conductor of ballet music. But it was ballet music of a superior kind, including such masterworks as Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "L'Oiseau de Feu," as produced by the Ballet Russe. In Paris he began as a viola player in the Colonne Orchestra, and also got experience at the Opéra Comique. Later, he conducted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons. During the present season he has had charge of the French operas at the Metropolitan in this city. He also conducted in Carnegie Hall the first two concerts of the Boston Orchestra—an ungrateful task, as there were some thirty new members, few of them equal to their predecessors.

WORLD
New York City
APR

CURRENT CONCERT SEASON OFFERS USUAL QUANTITY WITH A LIBERAL QUALITY

By Pierre V. R. Key.

SO far as the regular [illegible] on of 1918-1919 is concerned, it is virtually [illegible] concerning the recent appoint[illegible]ras, the oratorio and o[illegible] [illegible] Symphony [illegible]ual vocal and [illegible]

When Henri Rabaud took h[illegible] the Boston Symphony—after Pierre Monteux had transformed it into the noisiest orchestra in the world—its appearances here reflected distinction. It would be interesting to learn why the directors invited M. Monteux to return. For unless he discloses capacities hitherto undiscovered we fear we shall not enjoy the Boston Symphony concerts as once we did. Praise is due the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra and Leopold Stokowski, who is becoming a factor to [illegible] reckoned with. Whatever else in the way of symphony programmes New York had was inferior.

TIGHT BINDING

From EVENING POST
Address New York City
Date APR 12 1919

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Monteux to Conduct Boston Symphony.

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. He prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, who has been engaged to succeed him, conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud.

He has had a varied career as musician and conductor. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opéra Comique orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot, and Salmon, and in the concerts of the Musical Composers' Society.

He conducted in the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Stravinsky's "Sacré de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

AMERICAN
New York City.
MAY 25 1919

THE prospects of a successful season by the New Symphony Society are excellent, however, in spite of the danger of Mr. Bodanzky's dropping out for one or two concerts because of his obligations to the Metropolitan Opera Company. And those prospects, it would seem, are materially enhanced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's engagement of Pierre Monteux as successor to Henri Rabaud.

IN Boston, Monsieur Monteux may be welcomed with open arms. His achievements here in New York, however, as one of Giulio Gatti-Casazza's corps of operatic metronomists have not won him many admirers. Nor did his two appearances as temporary musical director of the band from the club add greatly to his reputation.

IT is hardly surprising, then, that many of the local patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are seriously considering whether they will not give up their rights as subscribers to the visiting organization and buy season tickets for the New Symphony Orchestra. As between Pierre Monteux and Artur Bodanzky, after all, there can be only one choice.

AMERICAN
New York City.
MAY 25 1919

THE two concerts of the New Symphony Orchestra, with Artur Bodanzky at the baton, offers a case in point. It can hardly be said that the orchestra in itself compares favorably with the Philharmonic, the New York Symphony or the Boston Symphony. Yet did those two concerts, though preceded by only a short period of rehearsing, prove to be far more interesting and inspiring than any one of the other multitudinous symphonic concerts of the year, including those provided by the Philadelphians under Leopold Stokowski. And for what reason? Simply because it so happens that Artur Bodanzky is the greatest conductor now available in America.

From REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.
MAR 23 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH

Orchestra Will Give Concert at College on the 26th

The influence of the Boston symphony orchestra, not merely on local musical conditions, but over wide tracts of the United States, is to-day one of its most notable distinctions. This influence has been felt directly in its many tours, of which the one to the San Francisco exposition of 1915 was the most notable; in the famous conductors it has presented the American public; in the unrivaled artistic quality of its performances.

To-day the conditions which govern the policies of the Boston symphony are changed in many important respects from those of the years to 1917. Its existence was due first of all to Maj Higginson's initiative, energy and generosity; secondly to the foresight and efficiency of the management of C. A. Ellis, and finally to the distinguished European conductors who were given absolute control of all that pertained to the artistic quality of the performances.

Recently Maj Higginson, full of years and weary of the personal responsibilities entailed on him, gave up his personal share in the development of the orchestra and intrusted it to a body of trustees who are fully aware of the fact that the future of the Boston symphony must be the future of an organization which belongs essentially to the public and ministers to the public need. Mr Ellis has resigned his position in favor of his previous assistant business manager, W. H. Brennan. As a result of all this, and in response to legitimate and inevitable public sentiment, extensive changes in the personnel of the orchestra have taken place. Principal among these is the replacement of German musicians by French and Americans.

A German conductor of distinguished gifts, false to his trust and the confidence reposed in him by the management in a most delicate situation, has been replaced by the present conductor, Henri Rabaud, recently made a member of the French institute. Of him, Philip Hale says, "musician of broad sympathies, kind authority and a spirit which blaz when the music makes demand."

The Boston symphony orchestr will be heard at Smith college for t first time under the new conductor o Wednesday evening, March 26, at o'clock, in John M. Greene ha Tickets are now on sale at Music ha Northampton, at $1 and $1.50. T program will be as follows.—

Overture, "Coriolanus" ..... Beethov
Symphony in D minor ..... Fran
Lento. Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppo.
"La Jeunesse d'Hercule," Symphonic Poem ..... Saint-Saens
"Sadko," musical picture... Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Espana," Rhapsody for orchestra.. Chabrier

From STANDARD UNION
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Address
Date APR 20 1919

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. The step is a natural sequence to the success with which Mr. Monteux had at the beginning of this season, when he conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. His versatility in choosing and interpreting symphonic music, both classic and modern, was then a matter of general remark. His varied experience as musician and conductor is indeed unusual. He has played in French orchestras, conducted opera, symphony concerts and ballet in both Europe and America. The ne... to re-

York 1884

From LIFE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y
Date MAY 10 1919

Monteux to Be Boston Symphony Conductor.

HENRI RABAUD, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of over one hundred concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. The step is a natural sequence to the success which Mr. Monteux had at the beginning of this season, when he conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. His versatility in choosing and interpreting symphonic music, both classic and modern, was then a matter of general remark. His varied experience as musician and conductor is indeed unusual. He has played in French orchestras and has conducted opera, symphony concerts and ballet in both Europe and America. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the "Civic Orchestra" in New York and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

EVENING SUN
New York City
APR 5 1919

Concerning Two Leaders.

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of over one hundred concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot Pierre Monteux has been engaged to succeed him. Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. He has had a varied career as musician and conductor. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique orchestra and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon and in the concerts of the "Musical Composers Society."

He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet and with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date APR 17 1919

HENRI RABAUD DECIDES TO LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston, April 16.—Henri Rabaud who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has declined to extend his contract according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last Fall will succeed him next season.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
APR 2
Date

MUSIC AND MU

A musical event that is very attractive in prospect will take place at the Lyric the night of May 15, when the Scotti Grand Opera Company will make i... arance in Baltimore in a interesting affairs are ...cert by the Rus... et at Albaugh's ...ght and the piano ...nger at the Lyric ...undell Hall, both

...sc.

...ssian gipsy mu... ...ssian Cathedral ...stir among the ...being "assem... ...ributed" under ...nevist Govern... ...e world this ...by any wild ...ed such, can ...thodox action ...three quoted

...d that Glaz... ...ow have been ...ing" of these ...there is an ...ly, and that ...of a group of ...omposers.

...gipsy songs ...artet at the ...e this week ...al Committee ...Refugees in ...be given ad... ...e of the ap... ...rchestra, and ...singers will ...osphere"

Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux has been selected as the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following Henri Rabaud, who will return to France and devote himself to composition.

in fact, still is, in the opinion of the Irish peasantry, a diminutive fairy addicted to tall hats and knee breeches Anybody able to catch one would immediately be transformed into a

From TIMES
Address New York City
Date APR 17 1919

MONTEUX SUCCEEDS RABAUD

Metropolitan Opera Conductor to Lead the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, April 16.—Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition, and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last Fall, will succeed him next season.

Metropolitan Opera officials confirmed last night the announcement of Mr. Monteux's release for next season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A similar request last year came too late for a successor to be found for French opera here. Though Monteux's contract had another year to run, Mr. Gatti-Casazza has now waived any further rights, as the Boston offer of $20,000 salary is higher than the Metropolitan ever paid any conductor but Toscanini. Mr. Monteux came to this country originally with the Russian Ballet.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Globe
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date APR -- 1919

The deportation of Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, about whom raged the battle royal upon the matter of his disloyalty to the United States some time since, may be forced by reason of a bill now before Congress. The bill provides for the uncompromising deportation of all enemy aliens interned in the United States immediately upon the signing of the Peace Treaty. Muck and Kunwald, another conductor, are in the class of "resident aliens," and they would suffer deportation with the rest.

884

From UNION
Address New York, N.Y.
Date APR 17 1919

Monteux to Direct Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, April 16—Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to a statement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition and will return to Paris. Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last fall, will succeed him next season.

ork 1884

TIGHT BINDING

From EVENING POST
Address New York City
Date APR 17 1919

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Monteux to Conduct Boston Symphony.

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. He prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, who has been engaged to succeed him, conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud.

He has had a varied career as musician and conductor. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opéra Comique orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot, and Salmon, and in the concerts of the Musical Composers' Society.

He conducted in the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Stravinsky's "Sacré de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date MAY 25 1919

THE prospects of a successful season by the New Symphony Society are excellent, however, in spite of the danger of Mr. Bodanzky's dropping out for one or two concerts because of his obligations to the Metropolitan Opera Company. And those prospects, it would seem, are materially enhanced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's engagement of Pierre Monteux as successor to Henri Rabaud.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

IN Boston, Monsieur Monteux may be welcomed with open arms. His achievements here in New York, however, as one of Giulio Gatti-Casazza's corps of operatic metronomists have not won him many admirers. Nor did his two appearances as temporary musical director of the band from the club add greatly to his reputation.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

IT is hardly surprising, then, that many of the local patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are seriously considering whether they will not give up their rights as subscribers to the visiting organization and buy season tickets for the New Symphony Orchestra. As between Pierre Monteux and Artur Bodanzky, after all, there can be only one choice.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date MAY 25 1919

THE two concerts of the New Symphony Orchestra, with Artur Bodanzky at the baton, offers a case in point. It can hardly be said that the orchestra in itself compares favorably with the Philharmonic, the New York Symphony or the Boston Symphony. Yet did those two concerts, though preceded by only a short period of rehearsing, prove to be far more interesting and inspiring than any one of the other multitudinous symphonic concerts of the year, including those provided by the Philadelphians under Leopold Stokowski. And for what reason? Simply because it so happens that Artur Bodanzky is the greatest conductor now available in America.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

From REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.
Date MAR 23 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH

Orchestra Will Give Concert at College on the 26th

The influence of the Boston symphony orchestra, not merely on local musical conditions, but over wide tracts of the United States, is to-day one of its most notable distinctions. This influence has been felt directly in its many tours, of which the one to the San Francisco exposition of 1915 was the most notable; in the famous conductors it has presented the American public; in the unrivaled artistic quality of its performances.

To-day the conditions which govern the policies of the Boston symphony are changed in many important respects from those of the years to 1917. Its existence was due first of all to Maj Higginson's initiative, energy and generosity; secondly to the foresight and efficiency of the management of C. A. Ellis, and finally to the distinguished European conductors who were given absolute control of all that pertained to the artistic quality of the performances.

Recently Maj Higginson, full of years and weary of the personal responsibilities entailed on him, gave up his personal share in the development of the orchestra and intrusted it to a body of trustees who are fully aware of the fact that the future of the Boston symphony must be the future of an organization which belongs essentially to the public and ministers to the public need. Mr Ellis has resigned his position in favor of his previous assistant business manager, W. H. Brennan. As a result of all this, and in response to legitimate and inevitable public sentiment, extensive changes in the personnel of the orchestra have taken place. Principal among these is the replacement of German musicians by French and Americans.

A German conductor of distinguished gifts, false to his trust and the confidence reposed in him by the management in a most delicate situation, has been replaced by the present conductor, Henri Rabaud, recently made a member of the French institute. Of him, Philip Hale says, "musician of broad sympathies, kindl authority and a spirit which blaz when the music makes demand."

The Boston symphony orchestr will be heard at Smith college for th first time under the new conductor c Wednesday evening, March 26, at o'clock, in John M. Greene ha Tickets are now on sale at Music ha Northampton, at $1 and $1.50. Th program will be as follows.—

Overture, "Coriolanus" ..... Beethov
Symphony in D minor ..... Fran
Lento. Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppo.
"La Jeunesse d'Hercule," Symphonic Poem ..... Saint-Saens
"Sadko," musical picture... Rimsky-Korsakoff
"España," Rhapsody for orchestra.. Chabrier

From EVENING SUN
New York City
Date APR 3 1919

Concerning Two Leaders.

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of over one hundred concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot Pierre Monteux has been engaged to succeed him. Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. He has had a varied career as musician and conductor. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique orchestra and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon and in the concerts of the "Musical Composers Society."

He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet and with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date APR 1 7 1919

HENRI RABAUD DECIDES TO LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston, April 16.—Henri Rabaud who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has declined to extend his contract according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last Fall will succeed him next season.

From
Address
Date

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. The step is a natural sequence to the success with which Mr. Monteux had at the beginning of this season, when he conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. His versatility in choosing and interpreting symphonic music, both classic and modern, was then a matter of general remark. His varied experience as musician and conductor is indeed unusual. He has played in French orchestras, conducted opera, symphony concerts and ballet in both Europe and America. The ne... to re-

From LEDGER
Address Brooklyn, N. Y
Date

Monteux to Be Boston Symphony Conductor.

HENRI RABAUD, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of over one hundred concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. The step is a natural sequence to the success which Mr. Monteux had at the beginning of this season, when he conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. His versatility in choosing and interpreting symphonic music, both classic and modern, was then a matter of general remark. His varied experience as musician and conductor is indeed unusual. He has played in French orchestras and has conducted opera, symphony concerts and ballet in both Europe and America. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the "Civic Orchestra" in New York and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From TIMES
Address New York City
Date APR 17 1919

MONTEUX SUCCEEDS RABAUD

Metropolitan Opera Conductor to Lead the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, April 16.—Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition, and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last Fall, will succeed him next season.

Metropolitan Opera officials confirmed last night the announcement of Mr. Monteux's release for next season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A similar request last year came too late for a successor to be found for French opera here. Though Monteux's contract had another year to run, Mr. Gatti-Casazza has now waived any further rights, as the Boston offer of $20,000 salary is higher than the Metropolitan ever paid any conductor but Toscanini. Mr. Monteux came to this country originally with the Russian Ballet.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Address
Date

The deportation of Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, about whom raged the battle royal upon the matter of his disloyalty to the United States some time since, may be forced by reason of a bill now before Congress. The bill provides for the uncompromising deportation of all enemy aliens interned in the United States immediately upon the signing of the Peace Treaty. Muck and Kunwald, another conductor, are in the class of "resident aliens," and they would suffer deportation with the rest.

From
Address
Date APR 17 1919

Monteux to Direct Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, April 16—Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to a statement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition and will return to Paris. Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last fall, will succeed him next season.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MUSIC AND MU

A musical event that is very attractive in prospect will take place at the Lyric the night of May 15, when the Scotti Grand Opera Company will make ... arance in Baltimore in a interesting affairs are ...ncert by the Russ... et at Albaugh's ...ght and the piano ...ger at the Lyric ...undell Hall, both

...sc.

...ssian gipsy mu... ...ssian Cathedral ...stir among the ...being "assem... ...ributed" under ...evist Govern... ...e world this ...by any wild ...ed such, can ...thodox action ...three quoted

...ed that Glaz... ...ow have been ...ing" of these ...there is an ...dy, and that ...of a group of ...mposers. ...gipsy songs ...artet at the ...e this week ...al Committee ...Refugees in ...be given ad... ...e of the ap... ...chestra, and ...singers will ...osphere"

Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux has been selected as the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following Henri Rabaud, who will return to France and devote himself to composition.

in fact, still is, in the opinion of the Irish peasantry, a diminutive fairy addicted to tall hats and knee breeches Anybody able to catch one would immediately be transformed into a ...

TIGHT BINDING

From EVENING POST
Address New York City
Date APR 17 1919

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Monteux to Conduct Boston Symphony.

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. He prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, who has been engaged to succeed him, conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud.

He has had a varied career as musician and conductor. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opéra Comique orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot, and Salmon, and in the concerts of the Musical Composers' Society.

He conducted in the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Stravinsky's "Sacré de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date MAY 25 1919

THE prospects of a successful season by the New Symphony Society are excellent, however, in spite of the danger of Mr. Bodanzky's dropping out for one or two concerts because of his obligations to the Metropolitan Opera Company. And those prospects, it would seem, are materially enhanced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's engagement of Pierre Monteux as successor to Henri Rabaud.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

IN Boston, Monsieur Monteux may be welcomed with open arms. His achievements here in New York, however, as one of Giulio Gatti-Casazza's corps of operatic metronomists have not won him many admirers. Nor did his two appearances as temporary musical director of the band from the Hub add greatly to his reputation.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

IT is hardly surprising, then, that many of the local patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are seriously considering whether they will not give up their rights as subscribers to the visiting organization and buy season tickets for the New Symphony Orchestra. As between Pierre Monteux and Artur Bodanzky, after all, there can be only one choice.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date MAY 25 1919

THE two concerts of the New Symphony Orchestra, with Artur Bodanzky at the baton, offers a case in point. It can hardly be said that the orchestra in itself compares favorably with the Philharmonic, the New York Symphony or the Boston Symphony. Yet did these two concerts, though preceded by only a short period of rehearsing, prove to be far more interesting and inspiring than any one of the other multitudinous symphonic concerts of the year, including those provided by the Philadelphians under Leopold Stokowski. And for what reason? Simply because it so happens that Artur Bodanzky is the greatest conductor now available in America.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

From REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.
MAR 23 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH

Orchestra Will Give Concert at College on the 26th

The influence of the Boston symphony orchestra, not merely on local musical conditions, but over wide tracts of the United States, is to-day one of its most notable distinctions. This influence has been felt directly in its many tours, of which the one to the San Francisco exposition of 1915 was the most notable; in the famous conductors it has presented the American public; in the unrivaled artistic quality of its performances.

To-day the conditions which govern the policies of the Boston symphony are changed in many important respects from those of the years to 1917. Its existence was due first of all to Maj Higginson's initiative, energy and generosity; secondly to the foresight and efficiency of the management of C. A. Ellis, and finally to the distinguished European conductors who were given absolute control of all that pertained to the artistic quality of the performances.

Recently Maj Higginson, full of years and weary of the personal responsibilities entailed on him, gave up his personal share in the development of the orchestra and intrusted it to a body of trustees who are fully aware of the fact that the future of the Boston symphony must be the future of an organization which belongs essentially to the public and ministers to the public need. Mr Ellis has resigned his position in favor of his previous assistant business manager, W. H. Brennan. As a result of all this, and in response to legitimate and inevitable public sentiment, extensive changes in the personnel of the orchestra have taken place. Principal among these is the replacement of German musicians by French and Americans.

A German conductor of distinguished gifts, false to his trust and the confidence reposed in him by the management in a most delicate situation, has been replaced by the present conductor, Henri Rabaud, recently made a member of the French institute. Of him, Philip Hale says, "A musician of broad sympathies, kindly authority and a spirit which blazes when the music makes demand."

The Boston symphony orchestra will be heard at Smith college for the first time under the new conductor on Wednesday evening, March 26, at 8 o'clock, in John M. Greene hall. Tickets are now on sale at Music hall, Northampton, at $1 and $1.50. The program will be as follows.—

Overture, "Coriolanus" ..... Beethoven
Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Lento. Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppo.
"La Jeunesse d'Hercule," Symphonic Poem ..... Saint-Saens
"Sadko," musical picture... Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Espana," Rhapsody for orchestra.. Chabrier

From UNION
Address
Date

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. The step is a natural sequence to the success with which Mr. Monteux had at the beginning of this season, when he conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. His versatility in choosing and interpreting symphonic music, both classic and modern, was then a matter of general remark. His varied experience as musician and conductor is indeed unusual. He has played in French orchestras, conducted opera, symphony concerts and ballet in both Europe and America. The ne... to re-

From EVENING SUN
New York City
APR 3 1919

Concerning Two Leaders.

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of over one hundred concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot Pierre Monteux has been engaged to succeed him. Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. He has had a varied career as musician and conductor. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique orchestra and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon and in the concerts of the "Musical Composers Society."

He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet and with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
APR 17 1919

HENRI RABAUD DECIDES TO LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston, April 16.—Henri Rabaud who ... from France last November to ... the Boston Symphony Orchestra ... season has declined to extend his contract according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last Fall will succeed him next season.

From TIMES
Address New York City
Date APR 17 1919

MONTEUX SUCCEEDS RABAUD

Metropolitan Opera Conductor to Lead the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, April 16.—Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to an announcement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition, and will return to Paris.

Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last Fall, will succeed him next season.

Metropolitan Opera officials confirmed last night the announcement of Mr. Monteux's release for next season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A similar request last year came too late for a successor to be found for French opera here. Though Monteux's contract had another year to run, Mr. Gatti-Casazza has now waived any further rights, as the Boston offer of $20,000 salary is higher than the Metropolitan ever paid any conductor but Toscanini. Mr. Monteux came to this country originally with the Russian Ballet.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Address
Date

The deportation of Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, about whom raged the battle royal upon the matter of his disloyalty to the United States some time since, may be forced by reason of a bill now before Congress. The bill provides for the uncompromising deportation of all enemy aliens interned in the United States immediately upon the signing of the Peace Treaty. Muck and Kunwald, another conductor, are in the class of "resident aliens," and they would suffer deportation with the rest.

From
Address
Date APR 17 1919

Monteux to Direct Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, April 16—Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has declined to extend his contract, according to a statement by the trustees today. He prefers to devote his time to composition and will return to Paris. Pierre Monteux, who conducted the opening concerts of the orchestra last fall, will succeed him next season.

From LEDGER
Address Brooklyn, N. Y
Date

Monteux to Be Boston Symphony Conductor.

HENRI RABAUD, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of over one hundred concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. The step is a natural sequence to the success which Mr. Monteux had at the beginning of this season, when he conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. His versatility in choosing and interpreting symphonic music, both classic and modern, was then a matter of general remark. His varied experience as musician and conductor is indeed unusual. He has played in French orchestras and has conducted opera, symphony concerts and ballet in both Europe and America. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the "Civic Orchestra" in New York and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MUSIC AND MU

A musical event that is very attractive in prospect will take place at the Lyric the night of May 15, when the Scotti Grand Opera Company will make ... arance in Baltimore in a interesting affairs are ncert by the Rus- et at Albaugh's ght and the piano nger at the Lyric undell Hall, both

sc.

ssian gipsy mu- ssian Cathedral stir among the being "assem- ibuted" under evist Govern- e world this by any wild ed such, can thodox action three quoted

d that Glaz- ow have been ing" of these there is an dy, and that of a group of mposers. gipsy songs artet at the this week al Committee Refugees in be given ad- of the ap- rchestra, and singers will sphere"

Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux has been selected as the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following Henri Rabaud, who will return to France and devote himself to composition.

in fact, still is, in the opinion of the Irish peasantry, a diminutive fairy addicted to tall hats and knee breeches. Anybody able to catch one would immediately be transformed into

Phila. Press. Apr. 20

159

Sir George Henschel, in His Recently-published "Musings and Memories of a Musician," Tells the Story of the Founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which He Organized and Conducted for the First Three Years of Its Existence.

THERE has been published within the year a substantial volume called "Musings and Memories of a Musician" (The Macmillan Company), in which Sir George Henschel recounts experiences of a long and honorable career devoted to the lyric art. It is a particularly genial book and to read it without discovering a single word of censure for anything or anybody except it be a thing that is unworthy or a person who deals in unworthy things, is to get a hint of the causes on which the personal popularity of this artist rested for so many years in England.

It is full of choice bits of wisdom and humor and of apposite anecdote and the temptation to quote is almost irresistible. However, I am going to pass over the artistic in favor of the purely utilitarian, and wrench out of this charming series of memoirs a lesson in history. How many know that Sir George Henschel organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra and put it on its feet, serving as its conductor for the first three seasons of its history? And that it was mere chance that picked him out for the task, which was possible only because he came to this country to marry an American girl?

For those who do not, that portion of his book that relates to the formation of the orchestra will be interesting reading, and even those who do may find in them a new interest when the story comes tripplingly from his pen. There will be space here to quote only a small portion of it, and in the interest of getting as much of it as possible before you, the present writer will take down his hat from the rack and sally forth for a promenade, leaving the office in entire charge of Sir George Henschel, Mus. Doc. (It is characteristic that in his book he tells neither of his being knighted nor of receiving the degree which adorns his name.)

We shall have space only for his narration of how he happened to become the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

"THE MEMBERS of the orchestra of the Harvard Musical Society," he says near the outset of his narration, "had grown old with it; a fact which naturally led to a gradual lessening of the technical and intellectual power of interpretation and, consequently, to a decrease of attraction as regards the public. Their last orchestral concert of the season 1880-1881 happening to fall upon a date only a week or two previous to my marriage to Miss Bailey, she and I thought it would be a nice thing to offer our joint services as soloists on that occasion. The offer was made and gratefully accepted, and, as a counter compliment, I was asked to conduct, at that same concert, one of my own works. I chose a manuscript concert-overture in D minor, an early and rather poor composition which, after its subsequent performance in London under Hans Richter a year or so later, I promptly destroyed. Whether it was that I had succeeded in imparting some of my youthful enthusiasm to the aged band, or that the players were determined to show the newcomer what they were capable of in an emergency, the performance certainly went exceedingly well, and had not only considerable success, but, as will be seen, far-reaching consequences.

"There was among the audience on that night one who, although a keen business man, partner in the old-established highly-respected banking firm of Lee Higginson & Co., had a very deep affection for music, in fact, had as a young man spent some time in Vienna for the purpose of studying that art with a view to making it—in the first place through the means of the pianoforte—his profession, and only been prevented from carrying out his intention by an accident to one of his arms, Colonel Henry Lee Higginson—for after his return from Vienna he had served in the United States Volunteers during the Civil War, becoming major and brevet lieutenant colonel in the First Massachusetts Cavalry, and being severely wounded at Aldie, in Virginia, in 1863—was and, I am happy to add, still is one of those high-minded, public-spirited men of whom any community might well be proud. Fearless, just, kind, upright and honorable in every fiber of his being, he cared for the good of the Commonwealth as much as for that of his own flesh and blood. His wife, a daughter of the great scientist, Louis Agassiz, was one of a small circle of ladies who held what in France they called a salon, at whose afternoon teas the representatives—resident or transitory—of art and science, music and literature, used to meet and discuss the events and questions of the day. * * *

* * *

"IT WAS at the house of Mrs. George D. Howe, a few days after that concert of the Harvard Musical Society, Colonel Higginson asked me to meet him; and there, in a few words, as was his wont, he revealed his plan of establishing in Boston, on a firm financial basis, an annual series of orchestral concerts on a large scale, and asked me if, eventually, I would undertake to form the new orchestra and be its first conductor. There would be no committee. I would be my own master as regards the making of the programs, number of rehearsals, indeed in every respect. He also hinted at a very substantial salary, being, as he remarked, sensible of the fact that such a position would naturally not leave me as free to earn as much by my singing as would otherwise be the case.

"The offer was a very tempting one, especially since the regular conducting of a big symphony orchestra had for a long time been one of my ambitions, but there was the question of casting myself—perhaps for good—adrift from so much that was dear to me in Europe, and I begged to be allowed to think the matter over.

"Two days after my marriage, it was in Washington, where part of our honeymoon was spent, I received a telegram from Colonel Higginson, followed by a letter, in which he definitely offered me the post. And since we had already in our first interview agreed that it would better for us not to bind ourselves for more than a year, thus giving, after the expiration of it, each of us the option of either renewing or discontinuing the agreement, I accepted. All details were settled upon after my return to Boston. I engaged the members of the orchestra, selecting them at Mr. Higginson's very wise suggestion, as nearly as possible from the members of the Old Harvard Society, and among other local players, so as not to arouse too much opposition.

"During my visit to Germany I bought a very extensive orchestral library, taking great pleasure and pride in personally indexing and cataloging the nearly three hundred works I had acquired. Rehearsals commenced early in October and on the 22d of that month the 'Boston Symphony Orchestra,' as with Colonel Higginson's assent I had christened it, was launched on its public career and I became, for the time being, a resident of the United States. * * *

* * *

"THE simple and straightforward announcement made by Mr. Higginson in the Boston papers at the end of March, 1881, headed 'In the Interest of Good Music,' plainly stating the accomplished fact of the establishment of the new orchestra and giving my name as that of the first conductor, came as a great surprise to the general public, not wholly agreeable, I fear, to some musicians, and evidently a positive shock to most critics, one of whom promptly delivered himself of the following declaration: 'Some protest is certainly needed to stem this tide of adulation that rises and breaks at the feet of Mr. Henschel. We have had conductors in Boston, and good ones. It is a mistaken idea of Mr. Henschel's friends—if not of his own—that we have waited here, all unconscious of our own poverty and great needs, for this musical trinity combined in the person of Mr. Henschel—oratoric exponent, composer and orchestral conductor. We are not, and have not been, half as ignorant as they supposed.'

"Others followed suit in similar terms, though apparently with little effect on public opinion, for when, early in September, the sale of tickets for the first season commenced, both Mr. Higginson and I were greatly astonished and gratified at the demand for them. As early as 8 o'clock on the morning of the sale people commenced getting into line before the doors of the old Music Hall, one paper even asserting this to have taken place on the afternoon of the previous day. The 'Transcript,' Boston's premier evening paper, asked in bewilderment: 'Where does all the audience come from? Where have all the symphony-goers been during the last ten years if they have hidden themselves so completely from public view?' This was encouraging."

* * *

THIS is only a fragment of the writer's description of the early days of the Boston Symphony, and several chapters follow to describe the events of the three years he spent in charge of its destinies. At the end of the three years, the organization by that time well established, he felt the call of Europe and especially of his adopted country, England. The plans of the organization had extended and contemplated for the fourth season rather lengthy tours of the New England cities. Sir George—then plain Mr. Henschel—did not feel that he wanted to embark on so complicated a schedule and by agreement with the founder of the organization withdrew, greatly regretted.

The American chapters of his book abound with humorous observation of our country and its people, always kindly and sometimes admiringly put. I will conclude with an anecdote placed in Philadelphia relative to his observations on freedom of class distinctions he found here and could apparently never quite reconcile himself to, with the true British viewpoint.

"My wife and I were staying at a hotel in Philadelphia," he says, "and, having a recital in the evening, took our dinner in the public dining-room, but by ourselves two hours before the official dinner hour. We had the honor of being served by the head waiter, a highly elegant, faultlessly-attired, nice-looking, polite negro. He was scrupulously attentive and must have known our identity, for when we had finished our meal and got up to leave the room, he courteously removed our chairs and said to us: 'I hope you'll have a great success tonight. I've been in the show business myself!'"

J. O. H.

DAUGHTERS OF CONFEDERACY.

The monthly meeting of the Philadelphia Chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy will be held in the Bellevue-Stratford tomorrow at 2.30 P. M. Mrs. William Douglas Mason, president of this chapter, who was a deligate to the convention in Louisville, will give a report of the convention.

ENGLAND suffered infinitely more from the war than America. But nobody in England has been so inept as to try to make the revolutionist, the Prussia-hating, and by-the-Prussians-hated Richard Wagner a scapegoat for the Huns. In London Sir Henry Wood and Sir Thomas Beecham have steadily featured him in concert hall and opera house; and how it has been elsewhere in England we may infer from the following programme of the Good Friday concert given by the famous Hallé Orchestra, in Manchester:

Overture—"Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Romance—"Elsa's Dream" ("Lohengrin") .. Wagner
Miss MIRIAM LICETTE.
Air—"Sound an alarm" ("Judas Maccabæus") Handel
Mr. JOHN COATES.
Symphonic Poem—"Scheherezade" .. Rimsky-Korsakov
Good Friday Music ("Parsifal") ..... Wagner
Passion Music ("Messiah") ..... Handel
Mr. JOHN COATES.
Prelude—Act III ("Lohengrin") ..... Wagner
Air—"Senta's Ballad" ("Flying Dutchman") Wagner
Miss MIRIAM LICETTE.
Entrance of the Gods ("Rhinegold") ..... Wagner

How pleasantly this contrasts with the situation in our Boston, whose famous orchestra did not play a single Wagner number during the season just ending. And why did the Boston orchestra boycott Wagner? Because all of the great German masters were ignored? Oh, no; he was the only one, excepting those still living. Why was Wagner alone boycotted? Was it because a microscopic organization consisting of two men and a woman (Sherlock Holmes couldn't find any more) "agitated" specially against Wagner? Is Boston so easily cowed? Or was it because the Boston Orchestra was piloted by a Frenchman? But why should a Frenchman boycott Wagner any more than an Englishman? It was a French officer who said "We are making war on the Germans, not on their music."

The only plausible explanation of the Boston boycott on Wagner is that M. Rabaud harbored resentment (or let us charitably say he thought he ought to harbor resentment) against him because of his libretto, "A Capitulation," in which certain French statesmen and others were ridiculed during the siege of Paris in 1870. That libretto did arouse much ill feeling—so much so that for twenty-one years no Wagner operas were sung in Paris, although the whole musical public clamored for them, and Le Figaro declared that the conduct of the chauvinist enemies of Wagner was proof not of patriotism but of morbid "patriotitis."

The comic side of all this is that Wagner's farcical libretto was aimed at the Germans much more than at the French. In the final chorus the managers of the royal German theatres are introduced; they dance awkwardly and are laughed at. Wagner himself wrote regarding "A Capitulation": "My subject touches on no other side of the French than one by the illumination of which we Germans are really mirrored in a much more ridiculous light than the French, who, in all their follies, are at least original, whereas we, in our disgusting imitation of them, sink far below the level of the ludicrous."

In view of these facts, does it not seem just a little amazing that the good people of Boston should have been for a whole season deprived of the pleasure of hearing the works of Wagner simply because Henri Rabaud either did not know these facts or lacks a sense of humor?

How about his successor? When M. Monteux was with the Ballet Russe he refused to conduct the music of Richard Strauss. That was understandable for Strauss is still living, and it has been tacitly agreed that living German composers should not be helped to a living by the performance of their works while the war is on. But will he, too, keep Wagner from his Boston and other audiences because of a chauvinistic misunderstanding nearly half a century old? If so, the tea-party spirit must have departed entirely from the Hub, as well as all sense of humor.

[illegible] Metropoli-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau REPUBLICAN
Name
Address
MAY 8 - 1919

RABAUD'S SYMPHONY PLAYED IN BOSTON

Work by Retiring Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Deep Impression

Henri Rabaud's symphony in E minor was played by the Boston symphony orchestra at the pair of concerts on Saturday, April 26—the Friday afternoon concert having been postponed until Saturday on account of the parade. The symphony was first heard in Boston 11 years ago, at one of Mrs R. J. Hall's concerts, conducted by Mr Longy, but had not before been played by the symphony orchestra. It has, however, been played by a number of other American orchestras, and was performed at the Worcester music festival of 1917. The first performance of the work was in Paris in 1899, when Mr Rabaud was 26 years old. The symphony as played in Boston on April 26, under the direction of the composer, the retiring conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra made a deep impression.

A prize composition is often and justly looked on with suspicion, Philip Hale wrote, in his criticism of the concert in the Boston Herald. To satisfy the average judges, the work must be strictly orthodox; all the conventions must be observed; above all, there must be no trace of originality.

Mr Rabaud's symphony is a brilliant exception to the rule. While the workmanship displayed must have satisfied the most critical, the music is far from being pedantic. There is no counterpoint merely for counterpoint's sake. The fresh, vigorous, beautiful themes are developed in an interesting and often dramatic manner. While the different movements are well contrasted, there is a unity of the whole by reason of the ingenious and at times unexpected use in the later movements of preceding themes. The announcement of the virile motif at the beginning at once arouses attention. This and the next theme are followed by a pleasing song for the oboe. This thematic material is worked out in masterly fashion. The whole movement is strongly dramatic, but not theatrical. Here, as in the movements that follow, the hearer recognizes a composer of a sensitive, poetic nature, whose innate virility is controlled by a fine, not finical taste.

This first movement, energetic, now melancholy, wistful, now exultant, is on the whole the expression of a perturbed soul. The slow movement and the scherzo are in a different vein. The former has for its chief subject an impressive Chorale of quiet, solemn beauty. This theme is used in the following movements with marked effects. It is introduced in the scherzo after the light and tripping first subject, introduced with great cunning; witness the variant of it, skilfully orchestrated. And in this scherzo, as in the other movements, Mr Rabaud has shown that he knows when to stop. He does not insist too strongly on an idea though it may please him; he is not enamored of his own thoughts; he does not repeat, dilute, weary. In some respects the finale is the most striking movement of the four. The opening, whirring measures, the mysterious mutterings, the voices hinting prophesying, stir the imagination of the hearer. And in the finale as in the scherzo, the mood is suddenly changed, by the introduction of quieter, contemplative measures. Nor is the apotheosis a blatant appeal, a trap set for the applause of the unthinking.

The production of this symphony is one of the leading features of a season that has been remarkable for the excellence of the programs and for the bringing out of many unfamiliar works that richly deserved a hearing. The reception given to this symphony was much more than a compliment to a departing and honored guest. The music itself made an immediate and deep impression. At the end, when Mr Rabaud was recalled the second time, not only the orchestra, but the audience rose spontaneously and paid a tribute long to be remembered.

160

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date APR 20 1919

Monteux to Conduct Boston Symphony

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over one hundred concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. The step is a natural sequence to the success which Mr. Monteux had when he conducted the opening concerts this season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. As a brilliant conductor of ballet and opera, he was already known to the Philadelphia public. His single concert last autumn with the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed his fuller talents as a cultured and discriminate interpreter of the symphonic classics.

A varied career as musician and conductor also commends him for the post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the "Musical Composers' Society."

He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the "Civic Orchestra" in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From The Spur
Address New York City
Date JUN 15 1919

Pierre Benjamin Monteux, who will succeed Henri Rabaud as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next autumn, has been a familiar figure in the metropolitan musical world for nearly four years. He came to this country as the conductor of the Ballet Russe and for two seasons has been the regular French conductor at the Metropolitan. Born in Paris, April 4, 1875, he won a first prize for violin playing at the Conservatoire. After being a concert conductor in Paris for some years, during which period he originated the Concerts Monteux at the Casino de Paris and introduced Stravinsky's "advanced" music, he became conductor of the Ballet Russe in 1911.

From TIMES
Address New York City
Date AUG 10 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY BOOK.

Bound numbers of the "Boston Symphony Orchestra Program, 1918-19," just issued by W. H. Brennan, manager, and G. E. Judd, assistant manager, from Symphony Hall, Boston, give a complete record of the thirty-eighth season of America's most famous instrumental organization. Henri Rabaud was the conductor throughout the year, and he refused an invitation to remain only because the constant rehearsal gave him no leisure and he preferred to resume his work in Paris as a composer. Philip Hale of Boston furnished the weekly commentary; there were 104 pieces of music produced, and Mr. Hale's text fills most of the 1,352 pages. The conductor of the orchestra next season will be Pierre Monteux.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, Washington's well-known concert manager, announces a partial list of attractions to be presented by her during the season of 1919-20. Mrs. Greene will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its five concerts as usual with Pierre Monteaux, conductor and the soloists, as follows: Rachmaninoff, De Gogorza, Kreisler, Emmy Destinn and Homer.

The Philharmonic and Artists' Course concerts, five in each course, will include Geraldine Farrar, Rachmaninoff, Fritz Kreisler, Metropolitan Opera Quartette, John McCormack, Jascha Heifetz, Mme. Louise Homer, famous Quartet from the Sistine Choir of St. Peter's, Rome, Reinald Werrenrath and Mme. Tetrazzini.

In addition to these course concerts, Mrs. Greene will present for single appearances the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, with Eugen Ysaye, conductor, Alma Gluck and Zimbalist in joint recital, Mme. Galli Curci, Mary Garden and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, with Gabrilowitch as conductor. Negotiations are pending for operatic performances to be announced later.

During last week in New York city concert managers from all parts of the United States met to discuss the musical situation, and formed themselves into an organization known as the National Association of Concert Managers of the United States. Mrs. Wilson-Greene was elected vice president of the organization.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
APR 21 1919

George Copeland, pianist, who will give joint recitals with the Isadora Duncan Dancers in the Lyric Theater tomorrow and Wednesday nights, will have substantial parts of the programs.

At each recital he will play the first movement of MacDowell's Sonata Tragica, Amani's Orientale, Satie's Gnossienne, six Debussy pieces — La Cathedrale Engloutie, Les Fees sont d'exquises danseuses, Voiles, Poissons d'or, Reflets dans l'eau, and Prelude, and six Spanish dances—Granados' Danse Espagnole, Grovlezs Recuerdos and Evocation, Albeniz's Malaguena, Turina's A los Toros and Chabrier' España.

Anna, Theresa, Irma, Lisa, Margot and Erica, the young dancers, will dance ensembles to music from Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis on the first night to a Chopin March Funebre, suite of Schubert waltzes, and a Schubert Marche Militaire, and on the second night ensembles to a Schubert Marche Funebre, Chopin Berceuse, Scenes des Champs Elysees from Gluck's Orpheus, suite of waltzes by Florent Schmitt, and a Chopin Polonaise Militaire. On both nights they will dance ensembles to Chopin's Valse Brillante and Amazon Dances from Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris.

On the first night, Lisa will dance to Chopin's second nocturne and the twenty-first etude; Anna to Chopin's Mazurka No. 25 and Waltz No. 11; Erica to Chopin's seventh prelude and Mazurka No. 24; Theresa to Chopin's Mazurka No. 23, and Irma to Chopin's sixth waltz. On the second night solos will be danced by Theresa to Chopin's fifteenth prelude and tenth mazurka; Lisa to Chopin's thirteenth etude; Anna to Chopin's seventh waltz, and Irma to Chopin's sixth waltz again.

All the participants have acquired a big reputation for poetic translations of motion and sound.

In the announcement that Henri Rabaud "has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract" as conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he "prefers to devote his time to composition" and that Pierre Benjamin Monteux has been engaged to succeed him—news of which was contained in The Star last Thursday, the orchestra's press representative says of Mr. Monteux:

"Mr. Monteux's remarkable results when he conducted the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts last autumn in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud, are too well remembered to need emphasis. He was handicapped by a small number of concerts to reward his labors. He conducted 11 concerts altogether, and one of these in Baltimore. Nevertheless, the fine tonal balance and quality of ensemble which he elicited from a still comparatively strange organization was the subject of general remark. As a brilliant conductor of modern ballet music he was already known. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra he quickly revealed his fuller talents as a cultured and discriminate interpreter of classic symphonic music.

"This is not altogether surprising in view of his wide experience. In Europe he has played in chamber music organizations and orchestras. In Europe and America he has conducted orchestral concerts, opera and ballet.

"Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the 'Musical Composers' Society.' He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the 'Concerts Monteux' at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's 'Sacre de Printemps' and 'Petrouchka,' causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the 'Civic Orchestra' in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company."

Dates have been announced already in The Star for another series of five concerts in Baltimore by this orchestra during the coming season.

It is hoped Mr. Monteux, in his new position, will produce something in Baltimore—and keep on producing it—as original at that which, elsewhere under his direction, caused "violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion." Baltimore needs it, heaven knows!

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
1919

pipe organ students; Adelin Fermin will be in charge of the singing department; J. C. Van Hulsteyn will direct the violin department and Gustav Strube will teach advanced classes in composition, orchestration and score reading.

A series of lectures, recitals and exhibitions, with opening and closing receptions, will be given in accordance with custom. Frederick R. Huber is the director of the summer school.

The Next Boston Symphony Director.

Pierre Monteux, who has been engaged to succeed Henri Rabaud as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in Paris in 1875. He studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier, was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique orchestra, and became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard.

He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the Musical Composers' Society." He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "concerts monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion.

In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

"Circumstances," a well-known musician said, "make Mr. Monteux Mr. Rabaud's natural successor. At the same time the news of the latter's decision to return home will undoubtedly be received with real regret by the musical public of this country, and the orchestra's first season under an eminent musician of France will not soon be forgotten."

JACK DAW.

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
APR 30 1919

BOSTON'S THRILL OF SUSPENSE LACKING

Last Year a Guessing Contest, This Year a Pleasant Certainty.

MONTEUX FOLLOWS RABAUD

Pre-War Directorial Germanism Now Definitely Switched to the French.

LAST year the suspense over the selection of a temporary conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was linked and long-drawn-out. This year—no. Not again the delighted juggling and gambling with great international names. Monteux—that's all!

Mr. Rabaud would not stay with us in this country. He does not wish to conduct any orchestra at all, and, as he is well-to-do, the modest $20,000 per annum Boston stipend could not sway him. He cares only to compose, so he resigned, and insisted that his resignation be accepted.

Vive la France.

So now it will be that other Frenchman in Boston, Pierre Monteux. We have known M. Monteux personally something longer than we have known his predecessor. He has been in this country three years, conducting the Diaghileff Ballet Russe and the French operas produced by the Metropolitan Company. Also last year he directed in Boston till M. Rabaud could arrive.

Back of that is much European playing and directing experience. Monteux is a Parisian, and, of course, a graduate of the Conservatoire. He studied violin, took a first prize in his department at the Conservatoire. But it was actually the viola he played in his professional career, in the notable Colonne Orchestra, the orchestra of the Opera Comique and in the Geloso String Quartette.

Then he became chorus master and assistant conductor of the Colonne Orchestra, leaving that position to become full conductor of the Ballet Russe. After four European tours with the Diaghileff organization, he founded his own symphony orchestra in Paris, giving special Sunday afternoon concerts at the Casino and joining the conducting staff at the Opera.

Sold at Deuxiemes Classe.

This brings us to 1914. Monteux was called out in the first week of French mobilization, and served two years as private soldier of the second class in the 35th Territorial Infantry; he was at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. After these two years of continuous faithful service he was by his appreciative country given his discharge, and took up his musical career again.

Such, in brief, is the life behind the man who will dominate the forces of our great Boston Orchestra next season. He has many interesting ideas, and he has certainly seen practically every kind of musical adventure; the pure symphonic, opera, choral and ballet. We congratulate Mr. Monteux on his Boston appointment. It would seem to be his big chance in the world.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Monteux to Conduct Boston Symphony

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Mr. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and finds that a season of over one hundred concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation.

His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed him. The step is a natural sequence to the success which Mr. Monteux had when he conducted the opening concerts this season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud. As a brilliant conductor of ballet and opera, he was already known to the Philadelphia public. His single concert last autumn with the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed his fuller talents as a cultured and discriminate interpreter of the symphonic classics.

A varied career as musician and conductor also commends him for the post. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the "Musical Composers' Society."

He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the "Civic Orchestra" in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From The Spur

Address New York City

Date JUN 15 1919

Pierre Benjamin Monteux, who will succeed Henri Rabaud as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next autumn, has been a familiar figure in the metropolitan musical world for nearly four years. He came to this country as the conductor of the Ballet Russe and for two seasons has been the regular French conductor at the Metropolitan. Born in Paris, April 4, 1875, he won a first prize for violin playing at the Conservatoire. After being a concert conductor in Paris for some years, during which period he originated the Concerts Monteux at the Casino de Paris and introduced Stravinsky's "advanced" music, he became conductor of the Ballet Russe in 1911.

From TIMES

Address New York City

Date AUG 10 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY BOOK.

Bound numbers of the "Boston Symphony Orchestra Program, 1918-19," just issued by W. H. Brennan, manager, and G. E. Judd, assistant manager, from Symphony Hall, Boston, give a complete record of the thirty-eighth season of America's most famous instrumental organization. Henri Rabaud was the conductor throughout the year, and he refused an invitation to remain only because the constant rehearsal gave him no leisure and he preferred to resume his work in Paris as a composer. Philip Hale of Boston furnished the weekly commentary; there were 104 pieces of music produced, and Mr. Hale's text fills most of the 1,352 pages. The conductor of the orchestra next season will be Pierre Monteux.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, Washington's well-known concert manager, announces a partial list of attractions to be presented by her during the season of 1919-20. Mrs. Greene will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its five concerts as usual with Pierre Monteaux, conductor and the soloists, as follows: Rachmaninoff, De Gogorza, Kreisler, Emmy Destinn and Homer.

The Philharmonic and Artists' Course concerts, five in each course, will include Geraldine Farrar, Rachmaninoff, Fritz Kreisler, Metropolitan Opera Quartette, John McCormack, Jascha Heifetz, Mme. Louise Homer, famous Quartet from the Sistine Choir of St. Peter's, Rome, Reinald Werrenrath and Mme. Tetrazzini.

In addition to these course concerts, Mrs. Greene will present for single appearances the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, with Eugen Ysaye, conductor, Alma Gluck and Zimbalist in joint recital, Mme. Galli Curci, Mary Garden and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, with Gabrilowitch as conductor. Negotiations are pending for operatic performances to be announced later.

During last week in New York city concert managers from all parts of the United States met to discuss the musical situation, and formed themselves into an organization known as the National Association of Concert Managers of the United States. Mrs. Wilson-Greene was elected vice president of the organization.

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

George Copeland, pianist, who will give joint recitals with the Isadora Duncan Dancers in the Lyric Theater tomorrow and Wednesday nights, will have substantial parts of the programs.

At each recital he will play the first movement of MacDowell's Sonata Tragica, Amani's Orientale, Satie's Gnossienne, six Debussy pieces — La Cathedrale Engloutie, Les Fees sont d'exquises danseuses, Voiles, Poissons d'or, Reflets dans l'eau, and Prelude, and six Spanish dances—Granados' Danse Espagnole, Grovlezs Recuerdos and Evocation, Albeniz's Malaguena, Turina's A los Toros and Chabrier' Espana.

Anna, Theresa, Irma, Lisa, Margot and Erica, the young dancers, will dance ensembles to music from Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis on the first night to a Chopin March Funebre, suite of Schubert waltzes, and a Schubert Marche Militaire, and on the second night ensembles to a Schubert Marche Funebre, Chopin Berceuse, Scenes des Champs Elysees from Gluck's Orpheus, suite of waltzes by Florent Schmitt, and a Chopin Polonaise Militaire. On both nights they will dance ensembles to Chopin's Valse Brillante and Amazon Dances from Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris.

On the first night, Lisa will dance to Chopin's second nocturne and the twenty-first etude; Anna to Chopin's Mazurka No. 25 and Waltz No. 11; Erica to Chopin's seventh prelude and Mazurka No. 24; Theresa to Chopin's Mazurka No. 23, and Irma to Chopin's sixth waltz. On the second night solos will be danced by Theresa to Chopin's fifteenth prelude and tenth mazurka; Lisa to Chopin's thirteenth etude; Anna to Chopin's seventh waltz, and Irma to Chopin's sixth waltz again.

All the participants have acquired a big reputation for poetic translations of motion and sound.

In the announcement that Henri Rabaud "has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract" as conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he "prefers to devote his time to composition" and that Pierre Benjamin Monteux has been engaged to succeed him—news of which was contained in The Star last Thursday, the orchestra's press representative says of Mr. Monteux:

"Mr. Monteux's remarkable results when he conducted the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts last autumn in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House and pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud, are too well remembered to need emphasis. He was handicapped by a small number of concerts to reward his labors. He conducted 11 concerts altogether, and one of these in Baltimore. Nevertheless, the fine tonal balance and quality of ensemble which he elicited from a still comparatively strange organization was the subject of general remark. As a brilliant conductor of modern ballet music he was already known. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra he quickly revealed his fuller talents as a cultured and discriminate interpreter of classic symphonic music.

"This is not altogether surprising in view of his wide experience. In Europe, he has played in chamber music organizations and orchestras. In Europe and America he has conducted orchestral concerts, opera and ballet.

"Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, Pierre Benjamin Monteux studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the 'Musical Composers' Society.' He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the 'Concerts Monteux' at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's 'Sacre de Printemps' and 'Petrouchka,' causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916 and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the 'Civic Orchestra' in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company."

Dates have been announced already in The Star for another series of five concerts in Baltimore by this orchestra during the coming season.

It is hoped Mr. Monteux, in his new position, will produce something in Baltimore—and keep on producing it—as original at that which, elsewhere under his direction, caused "violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion." Baltimore needs it, heaven knows!

From RECORD

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

APR 20 1919

BOSTON'S THRILL OF SUSPENSE LACKING

Last Year a Guessing Contest, This Year a Pleasant Certainty.

MONTEUX FOLLOWS RABAUD

Pre-War Directorial Germanism Now Definitely Switched to the French.

LAST year the suspense over the selection of a temporary conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was linked and long-drawn-out. This year—no. Not again the delighted juggling and gambling with great international names. Monteux—that's all!

Mr. Rabaud would not stay with us in this country. He does not wish to conduct any orchestra at all, and, as he is well-to-do, the modest $20,000 per annum Boston stipend could not sway him. He cares only to compose, so he resigned, and insisted that his resignation be accepted.

Vive la France.

So now it will be that other Frenchman in Boston, Pierre Monteux. We have known M. Monteux personally something longer than we have known his predecessor. He has been in this country three years, conducting the Diaghileff Ballet Russe and the French operas produced by the Metropolitan Company. Also last year he directed in Boston till M. Rabaud could arrive.

Back of that is much European playing and directing experience. Monteux is a Parisian, and, of course, a graduate of the Conservatoire. He studied violin, took a first prize in his department at the Conservatoire. But it was actually the viola he played in his professional career, in the notable Colonne Orchestra, the orchestra of the Opera Comique and in the Geloso String Quartette.

Then he became chorus master and assistant conductor of the Colonne Orchestra, leaving that position to become full conductor of the Ballet Russe. After four European tours with the Diaghileff organization, he founded his own symphony orchestra in Paris, giving special Sunday afternoon concerts at the Casino and joining the conducting staff at the Opera.

Sold at Deuxiemes Classe.

This brings us to 1914. Monteux was called out in the first week of French mobilization, and served two years as private soldier of the second class in the 35th Territorial Infantry; he was at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons and in the Argonne. After these two years of continuous faithful service he was by his appreciative country given his discharge, and took up his musical career again.

Such, in brief, is the life behind the man who will dominate the forces of our great Boston Orchestra next season. He has many interesting ideas, and he has certainly seen practically every kind of musical adventure; the pure symphonic, opera, choral and ballet. We congratulate Mr. Monteux on his Boston appointment. It would seem to be his big chance in the world.

pipe organ students; Adelin Fermin will be in charge of the singing department; J. C. Van Hulsteyn will direct the violin department and Gustav Strube will teach advanced classes in composition, orchestration and score reading.

A series of lectures, recitals and exhibitions, with opening and closing receptions, will be given in accordance with custom. Frederick R. Huber is the director of the summer school.

The Next Boston Symphony Director.

Pierre Monteux, who has been engaged to succeed Henri Rabaud as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in Paris in 1875. He studied at the Conservatory of that city, and while a pupil of Berthalier, was awarded a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's orchestra, he was a member of the Opera Comique orchestra, and became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard.

He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the Musical Composers' Society." He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and instituted the "concerts monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion.

In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States in 1916, and became known to our public as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York, and the following autumn he was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

"Circumstances," a well-known musician said, "make Mr. Monteux Mr. Rabaud's natural successor. At the same time the news of the latter's decision to return home will undoubtedly be received with real regret by the musical public of this country, and the orchestra's first season under an eminent musician of France will not soon be forgotten."

JACK DAW.

The Fate of Enemy Aliens

Prejudice Against German Music and Musicians Stimulated—The Unique Case of Fritz Kreisler—The Adventures of Ernest Kunwald and Karl Muck

By H. E. Krehbiel

With this chapter I purpose to conclude my history of the chief incidents in operatic history in New York in the period from the beginning of the war to the end of the season of 1917-'18. The summer of 1917 wore on, and though a growing detestation of all things German became more and more manifest there were no signs of ferment indicating a change of attitude toward art or artists about the opera house or elsewhere. From May to the middle of October, so far as anything of real musical significance is concerned, New York enjoys a dead season. Summer concerts of many kinds there are in profusion, but if they offer much it is as a pleasant stimulus to the enjoyment of the people who flock to the public parks, the recreation piers and other places for which generous provision is annually made by the municipality and the philanthropy of private citizens. As the time for the opening of the concert season in the fall of 1917 approached, however, there were indications that the feeling of liberal toleration toward music and musicians of Teutonic origin was giving way before a prejudice which eventually became as unreasonable as the earlier attitude had been honorable and amiable. Some of the means used to stimulate the prejudice was of a nature which I shall not dignify by either definition or description. The first manifestations of this feeling that attracted more than local attention broke about the head of an artist who had enjoyed popular favor in a greater measure and for a longer period than any of his colleagues. This was Mr. Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, and the reason, no doubt, was because he, an Austrian, had in the previous year served for a brief period (and suffered a slight wound) in the military service of his country. The circumstances had made for his popularity rather than against him in the season of 1916-1917. Mr. Kreisler's was a conspicuous case and deserves to be discussed more fully than others, but in the last instance it illustrated a changed attitude of the United States toward European artists in general, meaning those of great and those of no eminence.

As soon as the war broke out the United States was called upon not only to alleviate want and suffering among the warring peoples but also to give hospitality and support to a horde of performers, singers and teachers who had hitherto earned their livelihood in Europe. What at first was looked upon as a temporary haven had now become the home of hundreds, not to say thousands, of foreigners, who were not likely to return to their devastated and impoverished homes, for a long time at least. Whether or not their sojourn was to work for the cultural good of America was a question not to be answered in the summer of 1917 and is not to be answered yet. The fact that a large number of foreign virtuosi of high rank took up a residence in this country in 1914 and remained here was not looked upon with disfavor at the time, though it was feared that it would lead to a plethora of concerts which might militate to some extent against their educational value. That apprehension was fulfilled, and there is no gratification to be derived from the fact that some of the artists who have intrenched themselves here bear Slavic instead of Germanic names. Their willingness to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" that thrift might "follow fawning" distinguished them from the Austrian Kreisler; but not to his discredit. The storm of opposition, as I have said, broke first over him. Whether or not he should be permitted to play before a club in Sewickley, Penn., kept the people of that suburb of Pittsburgh and Pittsburgh itself in a ferment during the latter part of the summer of 1917. Eventually the concert was cancelled, and in Pittsburgh the Director of Public Safety called on the chief of police to prohibit a concert which was to be given there. Trouble arose in other cities, and Mr. Kreisler, acting with commendable dignity and frankness, cancelled all the concerts for which he had been booked except those which had charitable objects. Concerts, obstensibly of this character, it may well be stated, there were a great many in the ensuing season, as there had been in the preceding, since it was found easy to throw the cloak of charity over many an enterprise in which selfish purpose was disguised as patriotism. Especially was this the case after the imposition by the government of the United States of a war tax of 10 per cent upon the price of all tickets of admission to places of amusement. After the belated declaration of war against Austria, Mr. Kreisler publicly stated that he asked no consideration beyond that to which he was entitled as a well-behaved alien enemy. I am far from contending that he should have been permitted to continue his career as a concert-giver but am giving unusual attention to his case partly because it was the first that excited wide public notice and partly because during the period of excitement which culminated in action directly connected with the history of opera in New York he conducted himself with decorum and dignity, showing no rancor even when the treatment which he received from the newspapers and the pulpit compelled him to withdraw even from his projected charity concerts. He thus preserved his self-respect and the respect of all his friends and many of his political enemies.

This is more than can be said for other foreign artists who found themselves similarly situated. Mr. Josef Stransky, conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, soon was in the vortex of the storm. He too, was an Austrian subject and there were musicians in his orchestra who had never become American citizens by naturalization. Mr. Stransky weathered the gale. The orchestra was purged of its alien enemy element; the Musical Union of New York impeached and deposed its German president; Mr. Stransky defended himself against attacks made against his loyalty to the United States by public proclamation of the fact that he had opened the series of Philharmonic concerts with a performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner," which, without official sanction, had come to be looked upon as the national anthem); that he was a Bohemian of Czecho-Slavic parentage; that Bohemia was favorable to the Allies and fighting for her independence; that he had renounced his native country and declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States; that he had given his services to war charities, etc., etc. He held his position, and though he did not eliminate the music of the German classics from his programmes, he placed a taboo upon the music of living German composers. Dr. Ernest Kunwald, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was less diplomatic. He, too, was an Austrian, and I believe had served in the Austrian army before coming to this country. He fell under suspicion and was arrested by officers of the United States government in December, 1917, freed for a time, but rearrested in January, 1918, and condemned to internment at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., during the period of the war.

The evidence on which Dr. Kunwald was imprisoned was never divulged; neither was that which sent Dr. Karl Muck, who had been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the fall of 1912, to be his companion. Dr. Muck's case caused the greater sensation, because it was the first of the kind of graver consequences and was kept longer in the public mind. Dr. Muck's troubles, indeed, began almost as early as those of Mr. Kreisler. At the first concert of 1917-'18 in Providence, R. I., a request was handed to the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, that the music begin with a performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner." Mr. Ellis compared the list of signatures, that of representative women of the city, with a list of subscribers, and finding few if any of them there, took it upon himself to ignore the request. Intelligence of the incident was sent broadcast throughout the country at once. A storm blew up which was measuraby appeased by the fact that at the next concert in Boston and at every concert thereafter the patriotic music was played under the guidance of the conductor. Stories of Dr. Muck's intense Germanism pursued him, however, and were not nullified by an attempt on his part to take refuge behind an old certificate of Swiss citizenship. The regular concerts were given throughout the season in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and other cities, but a score of the members of the orchestra were Germans and, citizens of the enemy country being prohibited from entering the national capital, the concerts usually given there had to be abandoned. A concert booked for Chicago was also cancelled. The protests against the presence of Dr. Muck in New York be[illegible] vigorous when the last two [illegible] the season were reached, a[illegible] they resulted only in creati[illegible] ter demonstrations for him. M[illegible] ginson, who had founded the [illegible] and maintained it for nearly a [illegible] tion, in the following summer [illegible] from its control and turned [illegible] to a body of trustees. He [illegible] obliged to accept the inevit[illegible] though he stoutly refused to [illegible] that Mr. Muck had in any way [illegible] the laws of the United States [illegible] permitted to see some docu[illegible] evidence which had convinced [illegible] partment of Justice that his co[illegible] was a dangerous alien and [illegible] subjected to the humiliation of [illegible] the man whose cause he had m[illegible] championed arrested on March [illegible] and sent to Fort Oglethorpe [illegible] ternment. Needless to say, the [illegible] patriotism of Major Higginso[illegible] never in question for a momen[illegible]

A few more words must be [illegible] to the history of the concert [illegible] before the operatic record is ta[illegible] and the story of its external fe[illegible] completed. On November 1, 1917 [illegible] went into effect a Federal law [illegible] imposed a tax on tickets for a[illegible] ments. A fear that this tax [illegible] work havoc in the concert field w[illegible] realized. The field had been g[illegible] overworked in the years immed[illegible] preceding and continued to be [illegible] worked down to the end of [illegible] '18, which marks the conclusi[illegible] these studies. In the depar[illegible] of recitals by singers and instru[illegible] alists the maintenance of the pl[illegible] was not difficult of explanation. [illegible] certs by newcomers in New York [illegible] ly are advertising affairs. Those [illegible] give them in the great majorit[illegible] cases seek chiefly to get metropo[illegible] publicity for exploitation in othe[illegible] calities. Audiences and newspaper[illegible] tices are essential to them. The [illegible] mer are procured by the distributi[illegible] free tickets. The fear justified by [illegible] nature of the habitual "deadhead" [illegible] audiences would not be willing to [illegible] even the tax on the price of the tic[illegible] was overcome to a great extent by [illegible] device of having the tax paid by [illegible] concert-giver. It added to the cos[illegible] the advertisement—that was all. Upon the public the tax was not felt as a burden except in the case of artists of established reputation and undoubted merit. In cases where subscriptions had been paid for the series of concerts, with those of symphony orchestras and the opera before the tax law had been enacted the tax was paid in advance by the management, and, where the justice of such a course was obvious, collected from the government in the form of a rebate.

The feeling of intolerance toward German music and musicians was apparent in the concert rooms before public recognition of it was reflected in any action by the directors of the opera company. A great many singers quickly banished all German songs from their programmes; others sang the songs in English translations. Local orchestras in some of the small cities eliminated the music of even the classics, and this folly, which could but result in the debasement of taste, found some men and women, fortunately not many, who justified it. As if the music of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wagner, all long dead before the war was even a dream in the wicked minds of the German rulers and people, could in any wise be connected with the authors of the most monstrous crime of a millennium. In January, 1918, the Philharmonic Society, finding it doubly desirable to repair fortunes already somewhat decayed and now threatened by the controversy over its conductor, proclaimed a policy which left the classic repertory intact, but eliminated the compositions of living German composers. This seemed a proper expedient and one akin with the proscription of German singers at the Metropolitan Opera, of which I now am called upon to speak.

The last half of this chapter will appear next Sunday.

N. Y. Tribune
May 18, 1919

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date APR 17 1919

Estab 1884

MONTEUX TO CONDUCT

Chosen as Musical Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and he finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed Rabaud. Monteux conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Rabaud. As a conductor of ballet and opera, Monteux was already known to the Philadelphia public. His single concert last autumn with the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed his fuller talents as a cultured and discriminate interpreter of the symphonic classics. He was born in Paris on April 4, 1875. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, was a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra and became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States.

American

Wagner in Again.

Wagner is beginning to figure importantly upon the Pops' program. The audiences receive him politely and there are no casualties. Personally, I never believed in excluding dead German composers from concert programs provided their music was the sort which gives pleasure. The only bad feature of letting them in again is the satisfaction it gives the irrepressible Huns, of whom we have a few in our midst. They seem to think that a Wagner overture on our programs is some sort of a "Victory" for the Fatherland.

Now that we have our heel upon the neck of the German Michael I suppose we ought to disregard the hissing of the German geese in our midst, but it is exasperating. An even better argument against Wagner on Pops programs is that Mr. Jacchia is making them heavy enough without him.

There is altogether too much symphonic music on these programs. An audience which is gobbling ice cream, guzzling ginger ale and lemonade and smoking cigarettes is not in the proper frame of mind to be diverted by the Symphony Pathetique of Tschaikowsky, the prelude to Tristan, and even the lively movement from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony.

And it is not fair to the symphonies to play them under such conditions. Jacchia was not brought here to conduct symphonies. More operettas and more ragtime, Mr. Jacchia.

The Fate of Enemy Aliens

Prejudice Against German Music and Musicians Stimulated—The Unique Case of Fritz Kreisler—The Adventures of Ernest Kunwald and Karl Muck

By H. E. Krehbiel

With this chapter I purpose to conclude my history of the chief incidents in operatic history in New York in the period from the beginning of the war to the end of the season of 1917-'18. The summer of 1917 wore on, and though a growing detestation of all things German became more and more manifest there were no signs of ferment indicating a change of attitude toward art or artists about the opera house or elsewhere. From May to the middle of October, so far as anything of real musical significance is concerned, New York enjoys a dead season. Summer concerts of many kinds there are in profusion, but if they offer much it is as a pleasant stimulus to the enjoyment of the people who flock to the public parks, the recreation piers and other places for which generous provision is annually made by the municipality and the philanthropy of private citizens. As the time for the opening of the concert season in the fall of 1917 approached, however, there were indications that the feeling of liberal toleration toward music and musicians of Teutonic origin was giving way before a prejudice which eventually became as unreasonable as the earlier attitude had been honorable and amiable. Some of the means used to stimulate the prejudice was of a nature which I shall not dignify by either definition or description. The first manifestations of this feeling that attracted more than local attention broke about the head of an artist who had enjoyed popular favor in a greater measure and for a longer period than any of his colleagues. This was Mr. Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, and the reason, no doubt, was because he, an Austrian, had in the previous year served for a brief period (and suffered a slight wound) in the military service of his country. The circumstances had made for his popularity rather than against him in the season of 1916-1917. Mr. Kreisler's was a conspicuous case and deserves to be discussed more fully than others, but in the last instance it illustrated a changed attitude of the United States toward European artists in general, meaning those of great and those of no eminence.

As soon as the war broke out the United States was called upon not only to alleviate want and suffering among the warring peoples but also to give hospitality and support to a horde of performers, singers and teachers who had hitherto earned their livelihood in Europe. What at first was looked upon as a temporary haven had now become the home of hundreds, not to say thousands, of foreigners, who were not likely to return to their devastated and impoverished homes, for a long time at least. Whether or not their sojourn was to work for the cultural good of America was a question not to be answered in the summer of 1917 and is not to be answered yet. The fact that a large number of foreign virtuosi of high rank took up a residence in this country in 1914 and remained here was not looked upon with disfavor at the time, though it was feared that it would lead to a plethora of concerts which might militate to some extent against their educational value. That apprehension was fulfilled, and there is no gratification to be derived from the fact that some of the artists who have intrenched themselves here bear Slavic instead of Germanic names. Their willingness to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" that thrift might "follow fawning" distinguished them from the Austrian Kreisler; but not to his discredit. The storm of opposition, as I have said, broke first over him. Whether or not he should be permitted to play before a club in Sewickley, Penn., kept the people of that suburb of Pittsburgh and Pittsburgh itself in a ferment during the latter part of the summer of 1917. Eventually the concert was cancelled, and in Pittsburgh the Director of Public Safety called on the chief of police to prohibit a concert which was to be given there. Trouble arose in other cities, and Mr. Kreisler, acting with commendable dignity and frankness, cancelled all the concerts for which he had been booked except those which had charitable objects. Concerts, obstensibly of this character, it may well be stated, there were a great many in the ensuing season, as there had been in the preceding, since it was found easy to throw the cloak of charity over many an enterprise in which selfish purpose was disguised as patriotism. Especially was this the case after the imposition by the government of the United States of a war tax of 10 per cent upon the price of all tickets of admission to places of amusement. After the belated declaration of war against Austria, Mr. Kreisler publicly stated that he asked no consideration beyond that to which he was entitled as a well-behaved alien enemy. I am far from contending that he should have been permitted to continue his career as a concert-giver but am giving unusual attention to his case partly because it was the first that excited wide public notice and partly because during the period of excitement which culminated in action directly connected with the history of opera in New York he conducted himself with decorum and dignity, showing no rancor even when the treatment which he received from the newspapers and the pulpit compelled him to withdraw even from his projected charity concerts. He thus preserved his self-respect and the respect of all his friends and many of his political enemies.

This is more than can be said for other foreign artists who found themselves similarly situated. Mr. Josef Stransky, conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, soon was in the vortex of the storm. He too, was an Austrian subject and there were musicians in his orchestra who had never become American citizens by naturalization. Mr. Stransky weathered the gale. The orchestra was purged of its alien enemy element; the Musical Union of New York impeached and deposed its German president; Mr. Stransky defended himself against attacks made against his loyalty to the United States by public proclamation of the fact that he had opened the series of Philharmonic concerts with a performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner," which, without official sanction, had come to be looked upon as the national anthem); that he was a Bohemian of Czecho-Slavic parentage; that Bohemia was favorable to the Allies and fighting for her independence; that he had renounced his native country and declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States; that he had given his services to war charities, etc., etc. He held his position, and though he did not eliminate the music of the German classics from his programmes, he placed a taboo upon the music of living German composers. Dr. Ernest Kunwald, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was less diplomatic. He, too, was an Austrian, and I believe had served in the Austrian army before coming to this country. He fell under suspicion and was arrested by officers of the United States government in December, 1917, freed for a time, but rearrested in January, 1918, and condemned to internment at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., during the period of the war.

The evidence on which Dr. Kunwald was imprisoned was never divulged; neither was that which sent Dr. Karl Muck, who had been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the fall of 1912, to be his companion. Dr. Muck's case caused the greater sensation, because it was the first of the kind of graver consequences and was kept longer in the public mind. Dr. Muck's troubles, indeed, began almost as early as those of Mr. Kreisler. At the first concert of 1917-'18 in Providence, R. I., a request was handed to the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, that the music begin with a performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner." Mr. Ellis compared the list of signatures, that of representative women of the city, with a list of subscribers, and finding few if any of them there, took it upon himself to ignore the request. Intelligence of the incident was sent broadcast throughout the country at once. A storm blew up which was measuraby appeased by the fact that at the next concert in Boston and at every concert thereafter the patriotic music was played under the guidance of the conductor. Stories of Dr. Muck's intense Germanism pursued him, however, and were not nullified by an attempt on his part to take refuge behind an old certificate of Swiss citizenship. The regular concerts were given throughout the season in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and other cities, but a score of the members of the orchestra were Germans and, citizens of the enemy country being prohibited from entering the national capital, the concerts usually given there had to be abandoned. A concert booked for Chicago was also cancelled. The protests against the presence of Dr. Muck in New York became vigorous when the last two concerts of the season were reached, and they resulted only in creating better demonstrations for him, Mr. Higginson, who had founded the orchestra and maintained it for nearly a generation, in the following summer withdrew from its control and turned it over to a body of trustees. He had been obliged to accept the inevitable though he stoutly refused to believe that Mr. Muck had in any way violated the laws of the United States. I was permitted to see some documentary evidence which had convinced the Department of Justice that his conduct was a dangerous alien and he was subjected to the humiliation of having the man whose cause he had championed arrested on March 25 and sent to Fort Oglethorpe for internment. Needless to say, the patriotism of Major Higginson was never in question for a moment.

A few more words must be added to the history of the concert season before the operatic record is taken up and the story of its external features completed. On November 1, 1917, there went into effect a Federal law which imposed a tax on tickets for all amusements. A fear that this tax would work havoc in the concert field was not realized. The field had been greatly overworked in the years immediately preceding and continued to be so worked down to the end of the season '18, which marks the conclusion of these studies. In the department of recitals by singers and instrumentalists the maintenance of the plethora was not difficult of explanation. The concerts by newcomers in New York largely are advertising affairs. Those who give them in the great majority of cases seek chiefly to get metropolitan publicity for exploitation in other localities. Audiences and newspaper notices are essential to them. The former are procured by the distribution of free tickets. The fear justified by the nature of the habitual "deadhead" audiences would not be willing to pay even the tax on the price of the ticket was overcome to a great extent by the device of having the tax paid by the concert-giver. It added to the cost of the advertisement—that was all. Upon the public the tax was not felt as a burden except in the case of artists of established reputation and undoubted merit. In cases where subscriptions had been paid for the series of concerts, with those of symphony orchestras and the opera before the tax law had been enacted the tax was paid in advance by the management, and, where the justice of such a course was obvious, collected from the government in the form of a rebate.

The feeling of intolerance toward German music and musicians was apparent in the concert rooms before public recognition of it was reflected in any action by the directors of the opera company. A great many singers quickly banished all German songs from their programmes; others sang the songs in English translations. Local orchestras in some of the small cities eliminated the music of even the classics, and this folly, which could but result in the debasement of taste, found some men and women, fortunately not many, who justified it. As if the music of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wagner, all long dead before the war was even a dream in the wicked minds of the German rulers and people, could in any wise be connected with the authors of the most monstrous crime of a millennium. In January, 1918, the Philharmonic Society, finding it doubly desirable to repair fortunes already somewhat decayed and now threatened by the controversy over its conductor, proclaimed a policy which left the classic repertory intact, but eliminated the compositions of living German composers. This seemed a proper expedient and one akin with the proscription of German singers at the Metropolitan Opera, of which I now am called upon to speak.

The last half of this chapter will appear next Sunday.

N.Y. Tribune
May 18, 1919

From RECORD
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MONTEUX TO CONDUCT

Chosen as Musical Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Estab 1884

Henri Rabaud, who came from France last November to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. Rabaud prefers to devote his time to composition, and he finds that a season of over 100 concerts leaves no opportunity or energy for his chosen vocation. His compatriot, Pierre Monteux, has been engaged to succeed Rabaud. Monteux conducted the opening concerts in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan Opera House, and pending the delayed arrival of Rabaud. As a conductor of ballet and opera, Monteux was already known to the Philadelphia public. His single concert last autumn with the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed his fuller talents as a cultured and discriminate interpreter of the symphonic classics. He was born in Paris on April 4, 1875. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, was a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra and became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He instituted the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. In the same capacity he came to the United States.

Cincinnati

Wagner in Again.

Wagner is beginning to figure importantly upon the Pops' program. The audiences receive him politely and there are no casualties. Personally, I never believed in excluding dead German composers from concert programs provided their music was the sort which gives pleasure. The only bad feature of letting them in again is the satisfaction it gives the irrepressible Huns, of whom we have a few in our midst. They seem to think that a Wagner overture on our programs is some sort of a "Victory" for the Fatherland.

Now that we have our heel upon the neck of the German Michael I suppose we ought to disregard the hissing of the German geese in our midst, but it is exasperating. An even better argument against Wagner on Pops programs is that Mr. Jacchia is making them heavy enough without him.

There is altogether too much symphonic music on these programs. An audience which is gobbling ice cream, guzzling ginger ale and lemonade and smoking cigarettes is not in the proper frame of mind to be diverted by the Symphony Pathetique of Tschaikowsky, the prelude to Tristan, and even the lively movement from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony.

And it is not fair to the symphonies to play them under such conditions. Jacchia was not brought here to conduct symphonies. More operettas and more ragtime, Mr. Jacchia.

From
Address New York City
Date APR 17 1919

MR. RABAUD LEAVES BOSTON ORCHESTRA; MONTEUX SUCCEEDS

French Conductor Returning to France, Compatriot of Metropolitan Appointed.

Henri Rabaud, of Paris, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra the past season following the internment of Karl Muck, has declined the invitation of the trustees to extend his contract. He prefers to devote his time to composition and finds that a season of one hundred concerts leaves little opportunity for this.

His compatriot Pierre Benjamin Monteux, French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, has been engaged to succeed him. Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in conjunction with his duties at the Metropolitan pending the delayed arrival of Mr. Rabaud.

Mr. Monteux has had a varied career as musician and conductor. Born in Paris on April 4, 1875, he studied at the Conservatory there, and while a pupil of Berthalier won a first prize for violin playing. He played the viola in Colonne's Orchestra, was a member of the Opéra Comique Orchestra, and he became much occupied in chamber music, playing in several ensembles, the main purpose of which was to introduce music little heard. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot and Salmon, and in the concerts of the Musical Composers' Society.

He conducted at the several concert halls of Paris, and originated the "Concerts Monteux" at the Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons, where he introduced Strawinsky's "Sacré de Printempts" and "Petrouchka," causing violent demonstrations in audiences of divided opinion. In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Russian Ballet, and with which he made four tours throughout Europe.

In the same capacity, he came to the United States in 1916, and became known here as a conductor of French and Russian ballets. In the summer of 1917 he conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York, and the following autumn was appointed the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan.

Mr. Rabaud's decision to return home will undoubtedly be received with real regret by the musical public of this country, and his single season in America will not soon be forgotten.

The news of Mr. Monteux's appointment was confirmed at the Metropolitan last night, where the new conductor of the Boston Symphony led the last performance of the season of "Mireille." It was said that the Boston orchestra had offered the post to Mr. Monteux last year, but it was so near to the beginning of the opera season that Mr. Gatti-Casazza could not spare his French conductor. Now, however, with the summer to look for another man, the general manager of the Metropolitan yielded to Boston's invitation and Mr. Monteux's desire to accept the important place and cancelled his contract with the Metropolitan, which still has a year to run. Mr. Monteux will receive $20,000 a year at his new post.

Mr. Gatti-Casazza intends to go abroad to look for another French conductor. He will not go until June, probably. He will go through Paris and look over the field.

RECORD, MONDAY, JULY 7, 1919

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE VERY HEAVY

The extremely busy season, which looms ahead of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next winter, is a good indication that concerts are to be as numerous and well attended after the war as before. The probable size of the Symphony subscription sales may be best shown by a statistical statement. The first month's sale of season tickets for 1919-20 already exceeds by 15 p.c. the total sale for last year, figuring up to the opening concerts in the autumn. This is the more significant in that the list of soloists, a highly important consideration with many, has not been announced, nor can be until next autumn. They are being drawn from a larger choice than previously, owing to the re-opening of trans-continental travel.

In point of artistic attainment the prospects are equally bright. The ideal of perfection, so nearly approached by the famous and incomparable orchestra, will have a rare guardian in the newly engaged conductor, Pierre Montecx. Mr. Monteux expects to return from France in the first days of September, bringing some new and interesting scores with him, ready for early rehearsal and full preparation.

162

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND